Chao Gai said, "It is very lucky for us that he has taken a bloody risk in coming here to report to me. Bai Sheng has been arrested, thrown into prison, and has confessed about us. An Inspector named He Tao has arrived with orders from the Prime Minister for the magistrate here for our arrest. He got Inspector He Tao to wait for him in a tea-house, and in the interval he has galloped here to tell me. He has returned, and when the dispatches are delivered the magistrate will immediately send men to arrest us. What shall we do?"
"Had he not told us," said Wu Yong, "we would be caught like fish in a net. But what is the name of our benefactor?"
"He is a clerk in the district yamen," said Chao Gai. He is called Song Jiang, nicknamed 'The Protector.'"
"I have heard of him," said Wu Yong, "but have not met him. Although we live so close together I have never had any chance for meeting him."
Gongsun Sheng and Liu Tang both asked, "Is he not the man whom people call the 'Welcome Rain,' Song Gongming?"
Chao Gai nodded his head in assent and said, "That is the man. We are on the best of terms, and we are sworn brothers. Wu, have you really not met him? His fame is well assured within the four seas. It is not useless to have this man for my sworn brother. But we are certainly in serious danger, what shall we do?"
"My brother, you need not discuss the matter," said Wu Yong. "Of the thirty-six plans the best is to get away at once."
"That was Song Jiang's idea," said Chao Gai. "But where shall we go?"
"I have already formed an idea," said Wu Yong. "We must pack up the booty into five or seven loads for carrying on our shoulders, and then depart for the Shijie Village, and go to the family of the brothers Ruan. But we must immediately send a man in advance to advise them of the matter."
"But how can so many men stay with the brothers Ruan, who are only fishermen?" asked Chao Gai.
"Elder brother," said Wu Yong, "you are not very shrewd. That place is quite close to Liangshan Marsh. That stronghold is very prosperous just now, and the soldiers dare not even go to look at the place. If we are closely pressed by the soldiers we can go there and join the band at once."
"What you say is fine," said Chao Gai, "but I am afraid that they may not admit us."
"As we have plenty of gold and silver," said Wu Yong, "we can send some to them, and then they will admit us."
"As we have agreed to do this," said Chao Gai, "then we had better not delay our departure. Teacher Wu, you had better go with Liu Tang and get servants to carry the booty for you, and when you have safely deposited it with the brothers Ruan you can come back along the road to meet us. I, with Gongsun Sheng will go as soon as everything is well arranged." Wu Yong and Liu Tang went to get about six servants, and as soon as the latter had had their food, they carried the bundles containing the booty and departed. Wu Yong hid a copper wire up his sleeve, whereas Liu Tang carried a halberd in his hand. Altogether there were about ten men in their party.
Chao Gai and Gongsun Sheng stayed behind to arrange other matters. Those servants who did not want to go with them were paid off, and told to go to some other place. All the others who were willing to go with Chao Gai packed up many things, and then also departed.
Song Jiang galloped his horse to the town, and upon arriving at the tea-house he found He Tao at the door looking out for him. He said, "Inspector, you have waited a long time. There was a relative at my home who kept discussing many matters, and that has delayed me a little."
"Clerk Song Jiang, I must ask you to introduce me at once," said He Tao.
Song Jiang did so, and they entered the yamen, and went into the court where the magistrate Shi Wenbing was transacting business. Upon reaching the official desk Song Jiang told the aide of the magistrate to hang up outside of the court the boards with the two characters " Hui Bi" (withdraw, do not disturb), upon seeing which all people would refrain from entering the court. Song Jiang then presented the dispatches from Jizhou Prefecture, and explained in a low tone that He Tao had just brought them under urgent instruction. When the magistrate read the dispatches he was startled and said to Song Jiang, "There is an officer from the Prime Minister who is waiting for our immediate reply. We must send men at once to arrest the bandits."
"I am afraid," said Song Jiang, "that if we dispatch men in the broad daylight the matter will become divulged, and therefore I think that we had better send men in the night to arrest the bandits."
"That chief Chao Gai at the Dongxi Village is well known as a respectable person," said Magistrate Shi, "so why should he take part in such a disgraceful affair?" He then told his attendant to summon Inspectors Zhu Tong and Lei Heng. Upon their arrival he gave them orders, and they got together more than one hundred men, and set off with the magistrate's deputy to arrest the seven men. They were all fully armed with bows and arrows, halberds, swords, and ropes for binding the prisoners, and they reached the Dongxi Village about eight o'clock the same evening. They all stopped at the Guanyin, Goddess of Mercy Temple.
Zhu Tong said, "Ahead is the farmhouse of Chao Gai. There are two roads leading to the house—one at the back and one in front. If we all went to the front gate they might escape by the back door. So we will divide—half will go to the back entrance and the other half to the front entrance. I know that Chao Gai is well trained in military skills but I suppose the other six men may not be decent men. And all the farm servants may help them so how shall we overcome the whole lot? The only plan is that the soldiers on the east side will make a loud noise to frighten them and put them in confusion while those on the west side will fight and arrest them. I will go with half the soldiers and hide near the back entrance and there await your signaling with the whistle. The others will go to the front entrance, and arrest everyone they meet."
Lei Heng said, "That is all right but I think it would be better if you went to the front gate with the deputy magistrate and I will go to the gate at the back."
"You do not understand the position," said Zhu Tong. "There are three roads to this village, and I have noticed them many times before. If I go to the gate at the back I know which road to guard without using torches. You do not know the road by which he will try to escape. If he knows our object he will escape. This is not a matter to be trifled with."
The deputy magistrate said that Inspector Zhu Tong had spoken quite clearly, and that he must take half the soldiers with him.
Zhu Tong said that thirty men would be enough for him. So he took ten archers and twenty foot soldiers.
The deputy magistrate mounted his horse, and Lei Heng put his men some before and some behind so as to protect the magistrate's representative. In front were the foot soldiers with about thirty torches lit, others with swords, hooks, and halberds and they rushed to Chao Gai's farm. Before they were about a few hundred yards to the front entrance of Chao Gai's house, they saw flames leaping from the buildings, and dense clouds of smoke everywhere. They had not proceeded more than ten steps further when they saw fire break out at about forty places in all parts of the buildings. The soldiers shouted and Lei Heng with the vanguard took his halberd, and forced open the front gate. Inside the flames illuminated the yards as clear as daylight but there not even a single man was seen inside. Just then they heard the great shout raised by the soldiers at the back entrance. Now Zhu Tong really had the intention of letting Chao Gai escape, and that was why he had arranged for Lei Heng to go to the front gate. But Lei Heng himself had the same desire, and that was why he wanted to go to the entrance at the back. But owing to Zhu Tong's arguments he had given way and went to the front gate. There he purposely made a great noise, so that this would act as a warning to Chao Gai to escape at once.
When Zhu Tong and his men reached the back entrance, Chao Gai had not finished packing up the movable articles, and when his servants told him of the arrival of the soldiers and urged him to escape at once, Chao Gai told the servants to set the building on fire everywhere, and then with Gongsun Sheng he took about ten other servants and arming themselves with halberds they went to the gate at the back shouting as they went. Chao Gai shouted, "Those who oppose me shall die; those who avoid me shall live."
Inspector Zhu Tong was hiding in a dark place, and upon hearing this called out. "Chief, get away quickly! I have been waiting here a long time."
Chao Gai did not hear this, and was quite prepared to fight to the death. Inspector Zhu Tong, however, was making a way through his men for Chao Gai to escape. Gongsun Sheng was in front of the small band of servants whereas Chao Gai was bringing up the rear. Zhu Tong instructed his archers to go and force open the gate. He shouted out, "Go to the front gate and arrest the thieves." Inspector Lei Heng hearing this went outside the front gate, and told his archers on foot and on horseback to pursue and arrest the thieves. Lei Heng was standing in the light of the fire and was anxiously looking in all directions as though trying to find men. Zhu Tong left his soldiers, and ran after Chao Gai who was now outside the gate. As Chao Gai ran he looked round and shouted to Zhu Tong, "Inspector Zhu! What do you want to arrest me for? I have done no wrong."
Inspector Zhu Tong looked behind, and seeing none of his men he replied, "Chief, you did not understand my object. I was afraid that Inspector Lei Heng would not fall in with my plans so I got him to go to the front gate with some men while I came to this back door so that I could let you escape. Did you see that I made a way through my men for you to pass through? You should go at once to Liangshan Marsh, not any other place for safety."
"I am deeply grateful to you for your kindness," said Chao Gai, "and some day I will certainly recompense you."
Just then Zhu Tong heard Lei Heng calling behind him, "Do not allow him away."
"Chief," said Zhu Tong, "do not get upset but just go straight on your way, and I will try to get Lei Heng to go another way." He then turned his head round, and said to Lei Heng, "There are three men who are getting away by the eastern road. You had better run after them at once."
Lei Heng immediately took many of his soldiers, and led them to the eastern road.
Zhu Tong followed Chao Gai talking with him as they proceeded, and helping him in every manner to escape. When they had got beyond the range of the light from the burning farmstead Zhu Tong missed Chao Gai and in the dark he purposely fell down as though he had stumbled against something, when a number of his soldiers came up and assisted him to rise. Zhu Tong said to them, "In the dark I lost my way, and getting into this wild field I slipped and fell down. I have sprained my leg."
"The thieves have got away," said the deputy magistrate, "so what shall we do?"
"That was not due to our not trying to catch them," said Zhu Tong, "but because it is such a dark night. Among these soldiers there are very few capable men for such a job, as they are afraid of advancing."
The deputy magistrate sent the soldiers away to arrest the thieves but the soldiers thought that the two Inspectors had not been very brave in getting into close touch with the bandits, and therefore they (the soldiers) were not of much use. So they ran off, pretending to do as ordered but they soon came back and said that it was so dark that they could not see the roads.
Just then Lei Heng also returned, and he was saying to himself, "Zhu Tong and Chao Gai were evidently close friends and Zhu Tong has assisted him to escape, while I could not show my friendship." Upon reaching Zhu Tong and the deputy magistrate he said, "Who could catch up to them. The thieves are so smart!"
The two Inspectors and the deputy magistrate returned to the farmyard. It was then about 3 A.M. He Tao had remained inside the yard, and now saw the soldiers returning in batches of fours or fives without having captured a single man although they had been in pursuit nearly the whole night long. He said in a bitter tone, "How can I face the Prefect at Jizhou?"
The deputy magistrate could do nothing but arrest a number of the neighbours, and take them to the magistrate at Yuncheng County.
The magistrate had not slept that night but was waiting to hear the result of the expedition. When he was informed that the bandits had all escaped but that a number of the neighbours had been arrested, he went into the court, and there cross-examined the men who were under arrest.
The neighbours said, "Though we are the neighbours of Chao Gai, yet the remote of us live almost a //away from his farm while the nearer are several houses apart. Usually many men visited Chao Gai who were always practicing with the spear and cudgel but how could we know that they were engaged in this kind of business?"
The magistrate, however, examined them individually trying to find out whether they knew where the bandits had gone to. At last he found a man who had lived quite close to Chao Gai. This man said, "If you want to know about the affairs of Chao Gai you should cross-examine his farm servants."
The magistrate replied, "But I am informed that all the servants have escaped."
The man replied, "There were some servants who did not wish to leave, and they remained behind at the farm."
With the speed of fire the magistrate dispatched men to arrest the farm servants, and in about an hour they returned with two farm servants under arrest.
The magistrate cross-examined them, and at first they declared that they knew nothing but after a severe beating they confessed and said, "There were six men at the farm who were always discussing some matter. One of them was a teacher at a village close by, and was called Wu Yong; another was Gongsun Sheng, a Taoist priest, and still another was a dark-skinned man called Liu. There were three others whom we did not know but they were brought there by Wu Yong. We, however, heard that they were all called Ruan and came from the Shijie Village. They were all three brothers, and were fishermen."
The magistrate had all this evidence written down by his secretary, and he then wrote a dispatch to accompany it to Jizhou Prefecture. He handed these documents, and also the two farm servants, to He Tao and told him to deliver them to the Prefect. Song Jiang arranged for some person to come forward, and stand as guarantor for the neighbours who were to return to their homes.
He Tao escorted the two farm servants with all speed to Jizhou Prefecture, and upon arriving there he found that the Prefect was sitting in court transacting business. He entered the court, and reported the Prefect how Chao Gai and the bandits had all escaped, and the farm buildings had been burnt down. He also brought forward the two prisoners, and repeated their confession.
The Prefect after hearing all this gave an order for Bai Sheng to be again brought forward. Upon his arrival he asked him, "Where do those three Ruans live?"
Bai Sheng saw that he could not get out of the difficult position in any way so he said:
"One of the Ruans is known as the 'Heavenly King Who Stands His Ground,' he is Ruan the Second; another is called 'Short Lived Second Brother' and he is Ruan the Fifth; the other is called 'Living King Yama' and he is Ruan the Seventh. They all live at the Shijie Village."
The Prefect asked, "Who are the other three?"
Bai Sheng replied, "One's Wu Yong, another's Gongsun Sheng, and the other's Liu Tang." The Prefect sent Bai Sheng back to the prison. He then ordered Inspector He Tao to proceed at once to Shijie Village to arrest the three brothers Ruan, and so get some further clue.

Crowds of devils act in concert;
Armed horsemen now are gathered.

019

Up in the fortress, Lin Chong Fights Fiercely & Stirs Internal Strife in their Water-Girt Stronghold & rocks the boat; Chao Gai Seizes & Wins a Battle Down in Marshes of Mount Liang & an army's put to rout

On receiving the magistrate's order, Inspector Ho left the court and went with his men to a conference room.
"That Stone Tablet Village is on the edge of Liangshan Marsh. It has water and reeds and creeks all around," said the police officers. "Without a large force of men and boats, you can forget about going in there to make an arrest."
"True," mused Ho Tao. He returned to the court and spoke to the prefect. "Stone Tablet is full of waterways. It's next to Liangshan Marsh. All around are deep coves and channels, reeds and grass," Ho said. "There have always been robbers in Stone Tablet. Now they've added this gang of toughs. We'll need a strong force if we're going to take them."
"All right," said the prefect. "I'll give you a competent deputy and five hundred soldiers."
Ho Tao went back to the conference room and called out his police escort. He told them to prepare a list of five hundred men and make ready all necessary arms and equipment.
The next day the deputy came to Ho Tao with the prefect's written order. Together, they assembled the five hundred soldiers. With these, plus the policemen, they set out for Stone Tablet.

Meanwhile, Chao Gai and Gongsun Sheng, after burning down the manor, arrived at Stone Tablet Village with a dozen or so vassals. They were met by the three Ruan brothers, all of them armed, and taken to the home of Fifth. Ruan the Second had already sent his mother, wife and child to a place of concealment in the marsh. The seven men discussed joining the outlaws on Mount Liangshan.
"In Lijia Entry a man by the name of Zhu Gui runs a tavern. He's known as the Dry-Land Crocodile and is very hospitable to brave fellows from all over," said Wu Yong. "Anyone who wants to join the gang has to talk to him first. We ought to get boats, load on our belongings, send him some gifts, and ask him to introduce us."
Just then, a few fishermen arrived and reported: "Soldiers, on horse and on foot, are closing in, fast, on our village!"
Chao Gai rose quickly to his feet. "If those knaves catch up with us we'll never get away."
"Don't worry," said Second. "I'll handle them! I'll drown the majority and stab the rest!"
"Keep calm," said Gongsun Shen. "Let me show you what this humble priest can do."
"Brother," Chao said to Liu Tang, "you and the teacher take our families and possessions in boats to the left side of Lijia Entry and wait there. We'll see what's up and join you later."
Second chose two boats. He loaded his mother, wife, child and belongings on one. Wu Yong and Liu Tang boarded the other. Seven or eight fishermen rowed off with both craft to wait at Lijia Entry. Second then told Fifth and Seventh how to deal with the enemy. They were each to go in a small boat and ... The two brothers departed.
Ho Tao, the deputy and the soldiers gradually neared the village. They seized whatever boats they saw along the bank and manned them with soldiers who knew how to swim. The cavalry kept pace on shore, land and water forces moving forward abreast. They set up a shout when they reached Second's house and charged into the yard. But except for a few items of heavy furniture the place had long since been cleaned out.
"Bring me a few of his fishermen neighbours," said Ho Tao.
The men were produced. They said: "His brothers Fifth and Seventh both live in the marsh. You can only get there by boat."
Ho Tao discussed this with the deputy and said: "The marsh is full of creeks and inlets and twisting paths, and ponds and pools of unknown depth. If we break up into small search parties those rascals are liable to catch us in some trap. My idea is to leave the horses in the village with a guard, and all of us proceed in boats."
This was done. Well over a hundred craft had been seized. Some were punted, some were sculled. Now the whole armada advanced in the direction of the fishermen's hamlet where Ruan the Fifth lived. After sailing five or six //they heard someone bawling a raucous song from a thicket of reeds. The pursuers stopped rowing and listened. The words rang clearly across the water:

In the reeds all my life I fish,
Rice and hemp I no planting do;
Rapacious officials I kill them all,
To the emperor I'm loyal and true.

Ho Tao and his men were startled. Then, far off, they saw the singer. He was sculling a small boat. One of the men recognized him. "That's Ruan the Fifth!"
Inspector Ho waved his arm in signal, and the entire flotilla, all armed to the teeth, pressed forward after their quarry.
Fifth laughed scornfully. "How brave you corrupt officials are when it comes to oppressing the common people! What do you want with me? Be careful. Don't tweak the tiger's whiskers!"
Archers behind Ho fitted arrows to their strings, pulled the bows to the full, and let fly. Fifth picked up his sculling oar and dived into the water. When the soldiers reached his boat, he was nowhere to be seen.
Before the armada passed another two inlets, they heard a shrill whistle from the reeds. The boats quickly spread out. Ahead they saw a small craft approaching, with two men. The one standing in the bow wore a black straw hat and a green coir cape. In his hand was a spear shaped like a brush pen. He sang this song:

In Stone Tablet Village I was born,
I've always liked to kill,
Ho Tao and the deputy's heads I'll lift
And present them to the emperor as my gift.

Again Ho Tao and his men were startled. Some of them recognized the singer.
"That's Ruan the Seventh!"
"All together, in full strength," shouted Ho Tao. "Grab that man. Don't let him get away!"
Seventh laughed. "Stinking wretches!" He pointed with his spear and his craft glided into an inlet.
Shouting at the top of their lungs, the soldiers gave chase. The craft of Seventh and the man wielding the sweep oar seemed to fly across the water. They whistled, and turned the boat into a smaller inlet. The pursuing fleet saw that the waterway was becoming narrower.
"Halt," Ho Tao ordered. "Moor the boats by the bank."
He went ashore and gazed around. On all sides were watery wastes and reeds. There was no sign of any path. Ho Tao hesitated. He couldn't make up his mind. He asked directions from a soldier who came from those parts.
"Although I live around here," the man said, "there are many places I don't know."
Inspector Ho sent out two small craft with three policemen in each to scout deeper into the reeds. Two watches passed and they failed to return.
"Those idiots don't do anything right," Ho fumed. He dispatched another five policemen in another two boats. More than a watch went by but these men didn't come back either.
"They're all experienced and clever. How can they act so stupid?" Ho wondered. "Why don't they send one boat back to report? And these soldiers I've brought are just as bad. They don't know up from down!"
It was already late in the day. "I won't solve anything sitting here," thought Ho Tao. "I'd better go have a look myself."
He selected a fast craft and went aboard with several of his best veteran policemen, each heavily armed. Plied by half a dozen oars, with Ho Tao seated in the bow peering at the expanse of reeds, the boat moved off.
The sun by then was sinking in the west. After proceeding five or six //up the inlet, Ho Tao saw a man approaching along one of the banks with a hoe in his hand.
"Hey, fellow. Who are you?" Ho called. "What is this place?"
"I'm a farmer from the village. This is Chop-Head Creek. It doesn't go anywhere."
"Have you seen two boats pass this way?"
"You mean the ones after Ruan the Fifth?"
"How do you know they were chasing him?"
"They're in the dark grove ahead, fighting."
"How far is the grove from here?"
"Only a few steps and you'll be able to see it."
Ho Tao shouted for his men to beach the craft and hurry to the fray. He sent two men up the bank with their tined spears. Suddenly, the "farmer" raised his hoe and with two blows knocked the policemen tumbling into the creek. The astonished Ho tried to scramble up the bank. But the boat began to rock, and a man surged out of the water, yanked Ho's legs and dumped him overboard with a splash. As the other policemen in the boat rose to flee, the "farmer" leaped aboard the craft and smashed their skulls with his hoe, spattering brain matter.
The swimmer dragged Ho Tao by the legs up the bank and bound him with his sash. It was Ruan the Seventh. Second was the man who wielded the hoe. They both reviled Inspector Ho.
"We three Ruan brothers have always liked killing and burning! Compared to us you're nothing! You've got your nerve, coming with a gang of soldiers to arrest us!"
"I couldn't help myself, good fellows. I was only carrying out orders. I would never come after such brave men. Pity my eighty-year-old mother and let me live! I'm her sole support!"
"Truss him up like a dumpling and put him into the cabin."
The Ruan brothers threw the bodies in the water, then whistled. From the reeds four or five fishermen in boats emerged and went aboard the vessel. Seventh and Second each took one of the small craft.
Meanwhile, the soldiers on the boat with the deputy were grumbling. "A police officer like Inspector Ho ought to know better than go out and do his own scouting! All this time and he still hasn't returned!"
By then it was the first watch, and stars filled the sky. The men in the boats were enjoying the coolness. Suddenly, a strange wind blew up behind them, so fierce that it snapped the mooring ropes. The soldiers covered their faces and cried out in alarm.
Helpless, they heard a sharp whistle behind them. They stared into the wind to see a fiery glow in the reeds along the opposite shore.
"We're finished!" they exclaimed.
There were over a hundred government vessels, big and small. These were so buffeted by the gale that they collided with each other, out of control. The fiery glow was now almost upon them. A flotilla of small boats, bound together in pairs, and heaped with reeds and brushwood which were crackling brightly with flames, was sweeping quickly downward in the wind. The government craft were all snarled together and the creek was narrow. They couldn't get out of the way.
The first of the fire vessels pushed in among a dozen or so large boats, and they began to burn. Men, swimming under-water, were propelling the fire vessels forward. The soldiers and their officers leaped for the bank, only to discover that they were surrounded by reeds and marsh, without a strip of solid ground. Then the reeds along the shore also burst into flame, cutting them off completely.
The wind was strong, the blaze was fierce. Soldiers and officers hastily immersed themselves in the soft mud. A small swift craft emerged from the fiery glow, one man sculling in the stern, a Taoist priest seated in the bow, holding a gleaming sword.
"Not a single one will escape!" he shouted.
The men in the mud huddled together in panic. At that moment from the reeds along the east bank came two men leading four or five fishermen, all armed with glittering swords and spears. Another two men, also followed by four or five fishermen, advanced from the reeds along the west bank, and these carried shining fish gaffs. The four bold fellows and their cohorts attacked the hapless foe from both sides. Before long scores of soldiers and officers lay dead in the soggy mire.
Chao Gai and Ruan the Fifth had come from the east bank. Second and Seventh had come from the west. The Taoist priest on the boat who summoned the wind was Gongsun Sheng. These five brave fellows, with the aid of a dozen or so fishermen, slew in the reeds a great host of officers and men. The only one left was Inspector Ho, trussed up like a dumpling in the cabin. Second carried him to the bank and pointed at him angrily.
"You wretched beast! You extort and squeeze the people of Jizhou! Originally I was going to make mincemeat out of you but now I want you to go back and tell that crooked prefect that the three heroes of Stone Tablet—the Ruan brothers, and the ruler of East Bank—Chao Gai, are not to be trifled with! We don't go to your town asking for grain, don't you come to our village seeking to die! If he's got eyes in his head he'll see that even if Premier Cai—never mind a pipsqueak of a prefect—sent men to take us, even if the Premier came in person, we'd put daylight into him with twenty or thirty stabs! We're letting you go. Don't come back. And tell your prick of a superior to stay away if he wants to live! There are no highways in this place. My brother will set you on the road."
Seventh took Ho in a small fast craft to where a road began. "Go straight on from here and you'll reach the highway. All of your men have been killed. If we let you off scot-free, your crook of a prefect would bray his donkey laugh at us. I must ask you to leave your ears here as proof against that!"
He whipped out a knife and cut off Ho's ears. Blood flowed copiously. Seventh wiped his knife, untied the sash that bound his prisoner, and flung him on the bank. Ho, glad to be alive, sought a road that would take him back to Jizhou.

*

Chao Gai, Gongsun Sheng, the three Ruan brothers and the dozen or more fishermen left the Stone Tablet marshes in six or seven boats and went directly to Lijia Entry, where they found the craft of Wu Yong and Liu Tang, and rejoined them. The teacher wanted to know all about how they repelled the soldiers, and Chao Gai told him in detail. Wu Yong and the others were delighted.
They set their vessels in order and went together to the tavern of Zhu Gui the Dry-Land Crocodile. When all had arrived, they said they wanted to join the mountain stronghold. Zhu Gui hastily welcomed them. Wu Yong told him their story. The tavern keeper was very pleased, and greeted them, one by one. He invited them in, begged them to be seated, and ordered the waiter to bring wine.
Then he took a leather-bound bow, fitted a whistling arrow, and shot it into a cove of reeds, opposite. Soon a small boat came out, rowed by one of the brigands. Zhu Gui quickly wrote a letter of introduction, stating the number of men who wished to join, and their names, and gave it to the bandit, instructing him to deliver it to the stronghold. After this he slaughtered sheep to feast his guests.
The next morning Zhu Gui ordered a large boat, and invited the bold fellows on board. Together with the boats which had brought Chao Gai and the others, it set forth for the mountain fortress. After sailing a long time, they came to an inlet. They could hear drums beating and gongs crashing along the shore. Four sentry craft glided out, manned by seven or eight bandits. These recognized Zhu Gui, greeted him respectfully, and returned to their hiding place.
At the Shore of Golden Sands the party disembarked, leaving their families and fishermen to wait by the boats. Several score bandits came down the mountain and led them to the fortress gate. Wang Lun and the other leaders came out to greet them. Chao Gai and his party bowed politely. The bandit chieftain returned the courtesy.
"I am called Wang Lun. The fame of Chao Gai the Heavenly King has long thundered in my ears. It is a pleasure to welcome you to our humble stronghold."
"I am a crude, unlettered fellow seeking refuge, hoping only to be a simple foot soldier under your command. Please do not refuse me."
"You mustn't talk like that. Please come to our small fortress, and we will confer."
All went up the mountain and entered Righteous Fraternity Hall, where Wang Lun insisted that his guests sit on the raised platform. Chao Gai and his six companions stood in a row on the right, while Wang Lun and the other bandit leaders stood in a row on the left. After an exchange of courtesies, they took their seats as hosts and guests. Wang Lun instructed his junior officers, at the foot of the platform, to hail the visitors. When this was done, musicians in an ante-chamber commenced to play. The chieftain ordered a lieutenant to go down the mountain and look after his guests' retinue. These were quartered in a hostel below the gate.
Within the fortress two oxen were slaughtered, and ten sheep and five pigs, and everyone feasted, to the accompaniment of drums and horns. And as they drank, Chao Gai told the outlaw leaders the entire story.
Wang Lun listened uneasily, deep in thought, and made only brief noncommittal replies. They dined until evening, then the brigand chiefs escorted their visitors to the hostel below the stronghold gate, and left them to be waited on by the vassals who had come with them.
Chao Gai was very pleased. "We've committed such serious capital crimes. Where else could we find refuge?" he said to the other six. "If it weren't for the kindness of Chieftain Wang Lun we'd be in a real dilemma. We should always be grateful."
Wu Yong laughed coldly.
"Why are you sceptical, Teacher?" asked Chao Gai. "Tell us what you know."
"You're brave but too honest, brother. Don't think for a moment Wang Lun will let us stay. You didn't see what was in his heart. You noted only his facial expression and manner."
"What's wrong with that?"
"When we first began dining, he was quite friendly. But after you told him how we killed all those officers and soldiers and the deputy, and released Ho Tao, and how bold the Ruan brothers were, his expression changed. Although he answered you courteously, his heart wasn't in it. If he actually wanted to keep us, he would have already assigned us proper seats.
"Du Qian and Song Wan are a couple of boors. What do they know about how to treat a guest? Lin Chong, on the other hand, was a drill instructor in the Imperial Guards, a big city man, very polished. But right now he can't help himself. He holds only fourth place here. I noticed that he looked dissatisfied when he saw how Wang Lun was answering you. He never took his eyes off him. There was clearly something on his mind. I think he'd like to help us but he's in a difficult position. I'm going to throw out a few suggestions, and see whether I can't set them against each other."
"We rely completely on your shrewdness, Teacher," said Chao Gai.
The seven men retired for the night.
The next morning it was announced that Drill Instructor Lin was calling.
"He's come to see us," Wu Yong said to Chao Gai. "Just what we wanted!"
The seven men hurried out to greet their visitor and invited him into the parlour.
"We imposed too much on your generosity last night," said Wu Yong. "We must apologize."
"It is I who must apologize. Though I longed to show my respect, I was not in a position to do so. Please forgive me."
"We have no talent but we are not blocks of wood. We were most sensible of your kind intentions. We're extremely grateful."
Chao Gai begged Lin Chong to take the seat of highest rank. Lin Chong wouldn't hear of it. He pushed Chao into the chair and seated himself opposite. Wu Yong and the other five sat in a row on the side.
"We have long known of the drill instructor's fame," said Chao Gai. "We did not think we would have this opportunity to meet."
"When I was in the Eastern Capital I never failed in courtesy to my friends," said Lin Chong. "I now have had the honour to make your acquaintance but have been unable to behave as I wished. I come especially to express my regret."

"We sincerely thank you," said Chao Gai.
"Quite some time ago I heard of the drill instructor's chivalry in the Eastern Capital," said Wu Yong. "How did you fall out with Gao Qiu, and why did he ruin you? When the army fodder depot was burned in Cangzhou, that also was his doing, wasn't it? And who introduced you to this mountain stronghold?"
"If I told you of the wickedness of that scoundrel Gao Qiu it would make your hair stand on end. And I cannot get revenge! I found refuge here on the recommendation of Lord Chai."
"Not Chai Jin, known in the gallant fraternity as the Small Whirlwind?"
"The very one."
"I have heard much about his righteousness and generosity, how warmly he treats brave men," said Chao Gai. "It is said that he is a descendant of the royal Zhou family. How wonderful it would be to meet him!"
"Lord Chai is famed throughout the land," said Wu Yong. "Surely it was because of your extraordinary skill with weapons, Drill Instructor, that he recommended you here. I am not exaggerating in the least when I say that Wang Lun should have relinquished top leadership to you. This is common opinion and in keeping with Lord Chai's letter."
"Teacher rates me much too highly. I committed a capital crime and found shelter with Lord Chai. He was quite willing to keep me but I didn't want him to become involved. I came to this mountain of my own volition. Little did I know that it's a dead end! I don't mind having a lower rank but Wang Lun is hard to get along with. He's not sure of himself, and is often untruthful."
"He seems friendly enough," said Wu Yong. "What makes him so narrow-hearted?"
"Having you gallant heroes join us would be of great mutual benefit, like embroidering flowers on brocade, like rain on dry sprouts. But Wang Lun's very jealous of the talented and able, he's afraid you'll overwhelm him. When you told, last night, how you slaughtered the soldiers and officers, he was upset. He's plainly reluctant to let your stay. That's why he asked you to rest in this outside hostel."
"Since that's how he feels," said Wu Yong, "there's no point in waiting for him to say so. We'll go somewhere else."
"Please don't take it amiss but I have an idea," said Lin Chong. "I was afraid you bold fellows might be thinking of leaving, so I came early to confer. Why not wait and see how Wang Lun behaves today. If the lout speaks reasonably, not like yesterday, then everything can be discussed. But if he breathes so much as half an improper sentence, just leave the rest to me."
"Your kind consideration is more than we deserve," said Chao Gai.
"Why should you quarrel with your old brothers for the sake of your new?" asked Wu Yong. "If he'll have us, we'll stay. If not, we'll go."
"No, Teacher!" cried Lin Chong. "As the ancients say: 'The astute and the gallant each cherish their own kind.' That filthy churl! What use is he to anybody? Gallant fellows, you can rely on me." He rose and took his leave. "We shall be meeting soon," he said.
They saw him to the gate, and Lin Chong went back up the mountain.
Not long after, a bandit arrived from the stronghold and said: "Today, our chieftains are inviting you to dine in the waterside pavilion in the fort on the south side."
"Tell them we will be there shortly," said Chao Gai. The bandit departed.
"What shall we do, Teacher?" Chao Gai asked Wu Yong.
The teacher smiled. "Don't worry, brother. The stronghold is going to have a change of masters. Lin Chong seems determined to have it out with Wang Lun. If he shows any signs of hesitation, my tongue is sharp enough to prick him into open strife. You all carry concealed weapons. If I stroke my beard, get in and help him."
Chao Gai and the others silently and gladly agreed.
By mid-morning messengers had come four more times to repeat the invitation. Finally, neatly dressed, with weapons hidden on their persons, the seven set out for the feast. Song Wan arrived personally, on horseback, to lead the way, and seven sedan-chairs were provided for the guests. All proceeded directly to the waterside pavilion on the mountain's southern slope, and the seven came down from their conveyances. Wang Lun, Du Qian, Lin Chong and Zhu Gui were waiting to meet them and invite them into the pavilion. Hosts and guests took their seats, to the left and right respectively, on a dais.
Lesser brigands kept on refilling their goblets. When several rounds of wine had been drunk and two courses of food served, Chao Gai proposed to Wang Lun that the seven join the fraternity. But the bandit chieftain casually changed the subject. Wu Yong watched Lin Chong. The drill instructor was glaring at Wang Lun. They drank until afternoon. "Bring them in," Wang Lun said. Three of the bandits went out and soon returned. One of them was carrying five large silver ingots on a platter. Wang Lun rose, goblet in hand, and addressed himself to Chao Gai.
"We are honoured that you heroes have assembled with us here. Unfortunately, our stronghold is only a swampy marsh, not fit for gallants of such stature. We offer these few modest gifts and hope you won't laugh at them. When you have settled in some large suitable fortress, I will personally send men to serve under your command."
"For a long time we have known that this great stronghold welcomed able fighters," Chao Gai replied, "and so we made a beeline here to join. If you won't have us, we shall leave. As to the silver you so graciously offer, we cannot accept it. Not that we are rich but we do have a bit of travel money. Please take back your splendid gift. We must be on our way."
"Why refuse it? We would be very glad to have you. It's only that we're short of grain and housing. Staying in a place like this would be holding you heroes back. It's not in keeping with your dignity. That's why we are not asking you to remain."
Before the words were out of Wang Lun's mouth, Lin Chong, scowling fiercely, shouted: "When I first came here you tried to put me off by saying you were short of grain and housing! Now you tell brother Chao and his gallant company the same story! What's the big idea?"
"Calm yourself, sir leader," Wu Yong begged. "We shouldn't have come. We've only stirred up bad feeling among you. Chieftain Wang Lun is not driving us away, he's sending us off with travelling expenses. Please don't be angry, any of you. We'll go, and that will be the end of it."
"Wang Lun has a knife behind his smile!" said Lin Chong. "He's man of pure words but dirty deeds! I'm not going to let him get away with it!"
"Animal!" barked Wang Lun. "You're not drunk. How dare you speak of me like that? Have you no respect for your superiors?"
"You're an impoverished scholar who failed in the government examinations, a man of threadbare learning," Lin Chong scoffed. "What right have you to be stronghold leader?"
"Our coming here has caused this quarrel," Wu Yong said to Chao Gai. "We must get some boats and depart today." The seven men rose as if to leave the pavilion.
"Stay at least till the end of the banquet," Wang Lun proposed.
With a kick Lin Chong sent the table crashing to one side. He jumped to his feet and pulled a glittering knife from beneath his robe. Wu Yong stroked his beard. Chao Gai and Liu Tang hurried over as if to restrain Wang Lun.
"You mustn't quarrel," they exclaimed.
Wu Yong pretended to be soothing Lin Chong. "Please don't be rash," he urged.
Gongsun Sheng cried to both sides: "Don't destroy your harmony on our account!"
Ruan the Second wrapped his arms around Du Qian, while Fifth enveloped Song Wan, and Seventh did the same to Zhu Qui.
The assembled lesser bandits watched in frightened stupefaction. Lin Chong cursed Wang Lun.
"You're a poor village scholar! If it weren't for Du Qian, you wouldn't even be here! Lord Chai supported you, gave you travelling expenses, befriended you but when he sent me with a letter of introduction, you did everything to put me off! Now these bold heroes come, and you want to send them down the mountain! Does Mount Liangshan belong to you? You're a thief, jealous of men of talent! What good is there in keeping you alive? You haven't any particular ability. Who are you to lead this stronghold?"
Du Qian, Song Wan and Zhu Gui tried to press forward to help Wang Lun but they were held so tightly by the Ruan brothers that they couldn't move. The bandit chieftain turned to go. Chao Gai and Liu Tang blocked his path. Wang Lun realized his danger.
"Where are my boon companions?" he cried.
Several bandits who had always been very close to him wanted to come to his rescue but they were cowed by Lin Chong's fierce manner.
Again Lin cursed the bandit chief, then stabbed him through the heart. Wang Lun collapsed in a heap. Chao Gai and the others each produced a knife. Lin Chong cut off Wang Lun's head and raised it aloft. Terrified, Du Qian, Song Wan and Zhu Gui fell to their knees.
"Let us serve as grooms who hold your whip and stirrup," they begged.
Chao Gai, with polite haste, helped them to their feet. Wu Yong pulled the chair of the highest chieftain from the pool of blood and pushed Lin Chong down into it.
"If anyone disagrees, he will go the way of Wang Lun," he shouted. "From now on Drill Instructor Lin is the leader of Mount Liangshan."
"No, Teacher," said Lin Chong. "I killed the scoundrel out of loyalty to you gallant heroes. I seek no position for myself. I will be the laughing stock of the whole chivalrous fraternity if I take this seat today. I'd rather die, first! But I have another suggestion. I wonder whether you'll listen to me?"
"Speak," said the others. "Who would dare disagree? Let's hear it."
Lin Chong's words were brief. But as a result, in Unity Pavilion many men with but one heart gathered, before Righteous Fraternity Hall scores of righteous fighters assembled. The man who executed Heaven's will—that loyal, generous gallant, would soon arrive.

When Inspector Ho left the audience hall with the Governor's warrant in his hand, he went immediately to the conference room for a meeting with his subordinates. The constables all said: "If you're talking about Stonetable Lake, it's right next to the Marshes of Mount Liang. That's a wild region, full of marshy reeds and tracts of water. Without a big detachment of troops, including boats and cavalry, no one could think of going there to arrest robbers!"
"Good point!" said the Inspector, and back he went to the Governor. "This Stonetable Lake," he pointed out, "is next-door to the Marshes of Mount Liang. It's a whole area of shallow creeks and branching channels, overgrown with reeds and sedge. It's always been a place where people get robbed. All the more so now this band of desperadoes have taken refuge there. Unless you send a really big force, how can we go there and expect to arrest anyone?"
"All right, then," said the Governor. "I'll order a special investigator and five hundred picked troops to accompany you on the mission."
With this new order in his hand the Inspector returned to the conference room. His subordinates were summoned, and over five hundred troops were chosen and told to prepare their arms and equipment. Next day the special investigator turned up with a letter from the Governor. He and the Inspector mustered the troops and together with the Inspector's own men set off for Stonetable.
Meanwhile Chao Gai and the Taoist, Gongsun Sheng, having set fire to the manor, headed for Stonetable with a dozen or so villagers. On the way they met the Ruan brothers, who had come out fully armed to escort them back. All seven then installed themselves at Ruan the Fifth's. By this time Ruan the Second had moved his whole family, old and young alike, to a safe island in the lake. They now discussed their plan to join the rebels on Mount Liang. Wu Yong said: "The point is, there's this inn at the crossroads on the road to Leeside, run by Zhu Gui, the Dry Land Crocodile, whose job is to receive good men from all over the country. If you want to join the outlaws, you first have to contact him. Let us now procure boats and load them with the necessary provisions. We'll include a few introductory gifts for Zhu Gui."
Just as they were discussing all this, some fishermen arrived and said: "Government troops are coming!" Chao Gai responded by jumping to his feet and saying: "If the devils are coming here, we'll stay and wait for them!" Ruan the Second said, "Why not? I'll take care of them myself. Most of them will find death in the water; the rest I'll put to the sword." And Gongsun Sheng said, "All right but just wait and see what a humble Taoist can do!" Chao Gai began to give orders: "Liu Tang, you and the Professor here will take all the valuables, and the children and old people, and load them into boats; you will ferry them across to the Leeside road and wait near the crossroads. We shall remain here to watch developments, and then join you later."
Ruan the Second chose two rowing boats in which they installed the women, old people and children, together with the household goods. Wu Yong and Liu Tang went as escort, one to each boat, while seven or eight retainers rowed them to the crossroads on the Leeside road where they were to wait. Ruan the Fifth and Ruan the Seventh were sent off in boats with secret instructions to ... well, anyway, these instructions envisaged their making contact with the enemy, each in a separate boat.
Meanwhile Inspector Ho and the special investigator, with all their troops, were approaching Stonetable. They commandeered any boats they found moored along the bank. Soldiers who could swim were then transferred to the boats and continued the advance by water, while the cavalry proceeded overland. Boats and cavalry were to converge on Ruan the Second's house in a simultaneous attack by land and water.
On sighting the house, the troops set up a cheer and charged. They burst inside. But the house was completely empty. Nothing remained except a few household articles too heavy to be worth moving.
"We'd better arrest a few fishermen from the neighbourhood," said the Inspector. Under questioning the fishermen divulged that the two younger brothers — Ruan the Fifth and Ruan the Seventh — lived on the lake, and you couldn't reach them without a boat. Inspector Ho and his colleague discussed what to do next. They knew that the lake was full of little backwaters and channels and that finding one's way there was a complicated business. Moreover, the water was muddy and treacherous; you could never tell how deep it was. If they divided up into small groups and searched separately, they risked falling into a trap. So they decided to get the villagers to look after their horses and all go together by water.
In due course they embarked with their troops in the boats that by now numbered more than a hundred and ten, including both punts and rowing-boats. Together they rowed towards Ruan the Fifth's house. They had covered less than two nautical miles, when they heard someone singing, hidden among the reeds. All the boats stopped to listen:

In Duckweed Marsh a fisherman am I,
I neither sow nor reap;
At my hand the wicked officials die,
Yet faith to my Emperor I keep.

As they heard this song, they felt their hair stand on end. Then, far ahead of them, they saw a man sculling a boat with a single oar. He came towards them, singing. There were some who knew him: "It's Ruan the Fifth!" they exclaimed. The Inspector gave a signal and everyone rowed with all their might. The boats shot forward and the troops inside readied their weapons, waiting for the encounter. At this point Ruan the Fifth shouted scornfully: "You cursed officials, you oppressors of the people! You've got a nerve! What makes you think you can show your faces here? You're really trying to pull the tiger's whiskers!"
There were archers in the boat behind the Inspector. They now fitted arrows to their bows, bent them powerfully, and let fly together. Ruan the Fifth saw the arrows speeding towards him and seizing a paddle somersaulted into the water and disappeared. When the attackers reached the spot there was no one!
They rowed on, venturing down two more channels but before they got to the end of the second they heard a whistle from among the reeds. They stopped the boats again. In front two men were sculling a boat towards them. The man in the bow had a blue hat and a green raincoat. In his hand was a short spear. He was singing:

In Stonetable Village I was born and bred,
Killing's my entertainment;
When I meet an official I cut off his head,
That's how my days are spent.

Again the Inspector and his party felt shivers run down their spines. Those who recognized the singer exclaimed: "It's Ruan the Seventh!"
"Row for all you're worth!" the Inspector ordered. "We've got to catch the villain, we can't let him get away!" At this Ruan the Seventh gave a scornful laugh and shouted "Filthy vultures!" Then with a quick twist of his spear he turned the boat that shot off up a narrow channel and disappeared. With a general shout they raced in pursuit. But Ruan the Seventh and his fellow-sculler seemed to fly! As they went they let out piercing whistles. Evidently their idea was to shake off pursuit among the narrow channels. The attackers were led this way and that and the channels seemed to get narrower all the time, till finally the Inspector said: "Stop! Moor the boats and stay close to the bank." When they climbed out onto the bank to look around, they could see nothing but mile upon mile of desolate reedbanks. There was no path to be seen anywhere. The Inspector began to feel anxious. Not knowing what to course to follow, he asked the advice of some locals.
"Even though we live here," they replied, "there are many parts we don't know." So the Inspector dispatched two boats with two or three constables in the bows to search out the way. More than four hours passed but they did not return. "The fools are incompetent," the Inspector pronounced. He sent out another five policemen also in two boats. When these boats had been gone over two hours and there was still no sign of them, the Inspector said: "These were all experienced and effective officers, how can they be so hopeless? How is it that not a single boat has reported back? Why is it that, with all these men we brought along, not one of them is any good?"
The sky showed that it was getting late. The Inspector had to take a decision: "We can't see any end to this marsh, so what's going to happen? There's nothing for it but to go and reconnoitre myself." He chose a fast boat and several experienced and reliable officers, all fully armed. They equipped themselves with good birchwood paddles and the Inspector seated himself in the bow. Then they advanced into the midst of the reedbeds.
The sun had not yet sunk below the horizon as they paddled forward. After they had gone about two miles they saw a man walking along the bank carrying a hoe. The Inspector gave a shout: "Hey, you there! Who are you, and can you tell us where this channel goes to?"
"I be from the village," the man replied. "And this here be called Deadman's Ditch, an' she don't go nowhere."
"Did you see two boats go past?"
"You mean them as were chasing Ruan the Fifth?"
"How do you know they were chasing Ruan the Fifth?"
"Why, because they be fighting up there in Black Crow Wood."
"How far is that?"
"'Tis right there in front of you, you do see it from here."
Hearing this, the Inspector ordered the men to row ahead. Then he put two men, armed with pitchforks, out onto the bank. Immediately the man with the hoe materialized and in a trice he had felled each of them with a single swipe of the hoe, and tumbled him into the water. The horrified Inspector leapt to his feet, intending to jump out but the boat suddenly shot out from the bank and an underwater swimmer broke the surface, grabbed the Inspector by the legs and toppled him into the lake with a resounding splash. Those left in the boat were thinking to flee but the man with the hoe jumped aboard and smashed their heads in one after another, spattering the deck with their brains. By now the Inspector had been dragged out onto the bank by the underwater swimmer, who undid his belt and used it to tie him up. This swimmer was in fact Ruan the Seventh, and the one with the hoe was Ruan the Second. The brothers now gave the Inspector a hard stare and said: "Now you know us! There's nothing we like better than killing and looting! What a fool you must be! Whatever made you think you could come here with your troops and capture us!"
"Friends, I was only following orders," the Inspector pleaded. "It wasn't my idea. I would never have presumed to try and capture the likes of you. Please be merciful. You should know that I have an eighty-year-old mother with no one else to look after her. If only for her sake, I beg you to spare my life."

Their reply was to truss him up like a dumpling wrapped in a lotus leaf and throw him in the bottom of the boat. They got rid of the dead bodies by tipping them into the water. Then they each gave a whistle, and four or five fishermen's boats emerged from the reeds and came to pick the brothers up, each getting into a different boat.

Meanwhile the special investigator, who had remained with the rest of the troops in the other boats, was thinking: "Inspector Ho thought his men were incompetent, so he went to find the way himself but he's been gone an awful long time!" It was in fact already somewhat past seven o'clock and all the stars were out in the sky. Those in the boats were just thinking it was pleasantly cool, when suddenly a wild squall blew up.

It hurls sand and starts stones rolling, wildly churns the water and sets the heavens in motion. It slowly masses the pitch-black clouds and flings out stinging rain. It fills the sky with leaves of the lilies which clog the channels and scatters the white banners of rushes over the surface of the lake. It tears up trees on the peaks of the Kunlun Mountain and awakens the Dragon Lord of the Eastern Sea himself!

The wind was blowing from directly behind them, and they cowered in the boats, covering their faces and cursing their lot, as the boats broke their moorings, leaving them to drift helplessly. At this very moment they heard whistles behind them. Turning back against the full force of the wind to look, they saw a whole section of the reedbank burst into flames.

"We're done for!" they exclaimed.

There were about a hundred and ten boats, large and small that the gale was causing to slam into each other at random and now the flames appeared to be advancing towards them. This was caused by a series of small boats, tied two by two and filled with dry reeds and grass which burnt with a fierce crackling sound, that were being steadily driven onto them by the wind. The hundred-boat flotilla formed a massive log-jam which, in that labyrinth of narrow creeks and channels, could find no outlet. There were about ten bigger boats among them, and these were the first to be caught and set ablaze by the fire-rafts. In fact there were also swimmers under the water who were helping to direct the fire-rafts. The soldiers on the larger boats which were now on fire sought to save themselves by jumping out onto the bank but they found only marsh and swamp, no solid ground at all. And all around the reeds were beginning to burn with the same fierce crackling sound. These troops sent to suppress the bandits now found themselves surrounded and cut off!

The wind blew and the flames burned fiercer. The soldiers could only escape by plunging into the soft mud, where they could barely stand. Then from amidst the flames a fast boat appeared, with one paddler in the stern and a Taoist sitting in the bows wielding a gleaming sword. He was shouting: "Don't let a single one of them get away!" The troops crowded together in confusion, stuck in the soft mud. Then on the eastern bank two men appeared leading a group of fishermen armed with gleaming swords; and two others on the west bank, barbed fishing spears glinting in their hands. On either bank, east and west, four heroes in charge of these groups now led the charge, stabbing to left and right. In a short space many soldiers lay dead in the soft mud.

The two on the east bank were Chao Gai and Ruan the Fifth. The two on the west bank were Ruan the Second and Ruan the Seventh. Gongsun Sheng was the Taoist in the boat. There in the marshes, the five of them, with the aid of a dozen or so fishermen, had slaughtered the entire body of troops. Now only Inspector Ho remained, tied up like a dumpling in a lotus leaf, lying in the bottom of the boat. Ruan the Second heaved him out onto the bank. "You're one of those filthy Jizhou swine who oppress the people!" he shouted at him. "I was going to cut you into ten thousand pieces but I want you to go back and tell that bloody governor of yours that you've met the Ruan brothers, and the famous Chao Gai of East Riverside. Tell him it is not a good idea to provoke them! Tell him that I haven't been to demand provisions in the city yet, so he should leave us alone in the village, if he values his life! Anyone who comes here again to beard us, even supposing he were not just a miserable little local governor but an emissary of the Grand Preceptor, and who thinks to capture us — no, supposing the Grand Preceptor himself comes here looking for us — I shall personally render him transparent by making twenty or thirty holes in him! We're going to let you go, and don't come back again. And tell that bloody official of yours not to gamble with his life! Now, since there aren't any roads here, I shall get my brother to take you to the highroad."

Ruan the Seventh loaded the Inspector onto a small fast boat and took him to the road. "Just go straight ahead," he told him, "and you'll find the way. But since all the others are dead, it doesn't seem fair to let you off just like this, and let your ass of a governor have the last laugh. So I shall ask you to leave your two ears behind as a pledge!" With that he produced a sharp knife and cut off the Inspector's ears, leaving him bathed in blood. He put the knife away, undid the belt which bound the prisoner, and pushed him out onto the bank. There's a poem about this:

The government troops have given up hope
In the battle of Deadman's Ditch.
The Inspector's the only one to escape
And even for him there's a hitch.
He'll have to leave them his ears, they say,
He's lucky not to be dead.
Now instead of his ass's ears,
He'll go home with an ass's head!

So the Inspector, lucky at least to have escaped with his life, set off to find the road back to Jizhou.

Now Chao Gai, Gongsun Sheng, the Ruan brothers and a dozen or so fishermen left Stonetable Lake in six or seven small boats and went over to the Leeside road, where they joined up with Wu Yong and Liu Tang again. Wu Yong asked about the operation against the government troops and everyone was delighted with the story that Chao Gai told in detail. Then all the boats together made their way to the inn of Zhu Gui, the Dry Land Crocodile. When he saw so many people, all wanting to join the outlaws, Zhu Gui became quite excited. Wu Yong explained their situation with complete frankness. Zhu Gui listened with interest and was introduced to them all, one by one. He invited them to sit in the main hall and hurriedly ordered the waiters to prepare a banquet for their entertainment. He then took out his special bow, fitted a whistling arrow to it, and shot it towards the reedy creek. The troops in charge of the boat came rowing out. Zhu Gui quickly wrote a note, listing the names of all the heroes who wanted to join, and gave it to the soldiers, telling them to deliver it to the stronghold. He also killed a sheep for his guests. Thus they passed the evening. Next day they rose early and Zhu Gui called for a big boat which he invited them all to get into, and they set off for the mountain fortress, towing the boats they had come in. Soon they came to the mouth of a channel where drums and gongs were playing. Four patrol boats shot out, manned by seven or eight soldiers. They greeted Zhu Gui, and then returned in the direction they had come.

The party now arrived at Golden Sands Landing. Here the children and the old people, and the fishermen, were to wait with the boats, while a group of soldiers who had come down from the stronghold took the others up through the pass. Wang Lun at the head of his other chiefs came to the pass to meet them. Chao Gai and his friends immediately saluted and Wang Lun ceremoniously greeted them with: "I, Wang Lun, have heard many good things of the great Chao Gai. His name resounds like thunder in the land. I am most happy that he honours our fortress with his presence this day."

Chao Gai replied: "I, Chao Gai, am a rough, unlearned sort of fellow. My desire now is only to conceal my ignorance; my dearest wish is to become a simple soldier under your command. If you do not reject me, I shall be overjoyed."

"No, no, you're far too modest," said Wang Lun. "But please come inside and we can talk things over."

The newcomers followed Wang Lun into the stronghold. When they reached the great Assembly Hall of the Heroes, Wang Lun insisted that they should sit in the places of honour but they refused. Chao Gai went and stood with the others in a straight line on the right, while Wang Lun and his subordinate chiefs ranged themselves in a straight line on the left. Each person was now introduced individually, and then places were assigned according to the rules of etiquette. Wang Lun ordered the lesser chiefs, standing below the dais, to pay their respects, and off to one side some musicians began to play. The lesser chiefs were sent off to see to the entertainment of the rest of Chao Gai's party at the foot of the mountain, where there was a guest house.

In the stronghold two buffaloes were slaughtered, ten sheep and five pigs, and a feast ensued, accompanied by much blowing of fifes and thumping of drums. During the feasting, Chao Gai revealed to Wang Lun and his friends all that he had in mind, holding nothing back. Wang Lun, as he listened, remained silent for a long time, appearing fearful and hesitant. He fell into deep thought, and gave only absent-minded answers.

In the evening, when the party finally broke up, Chao Gai's party were escorted down through the pass to sleep in the guest- house, and people were assigned to serve them. Chao Gai was happy. He said to Wu Yong and the others: "We are criminals, guilty of a capital offence. Where else could we go to find shelter? We would be homeless but for Wang Lun's undeserved kindness. Our debt to him is great."

But Wu Yong only laughed sarcastically.

"Why do you laugh, Professor?" Chao Gai asked. "Is there something I don't know about?"

"You are too trusting," Wu Yong said. "Do you really believe Wang Lun is going to let us stay? You weren't watching him properly. You only saw the false appearance."

"Why do you call it false appearance?"

"Didn't you notice? At first, when you talked during the feast this morning he seemed friendly enough. But later, when you told him how we had killed so many soldiers and let no one off but Inspector Ho, and when you talked about the exploits of the Ruan brothers, his expression changed. It seemed as if his words were quite different from his thoughts. If he was really thinking of letting us stay, he would surely have fixed our positions in the hierarchy this morning. The other two, Du Qian and Song Wan, they are just bumpkins, they don't know anything about manners. Lin Chong, however, is different, he's a former instructor of the imperial guard, a man from the city, experienced and capable, who at the moment has to content himself with fourth position. I watched him carefully: he was observing Wang Lun's way of replying to you, and you could see he wasn't at all happy about it. He kept looking at Wang Lun and he was clearly furious. I think he is well-disposed towards us but he can't show it openly. I think it would only take a few words from me to bring things to the boil in this fortress."

"Well, I trust your judgement, Professor," said Chao Gai.

They all went to bed for that evening.

Next morning at dawn a man came in and announced: "Instructor Lin would like to speak with you."

Wu Yong said to Chao Gai: "He's come to find us. That's just what I wanted."

They rose and dressed hurriedly in order to receive Lin Chong. After inviting him in, Wu Yong stepped forward to say: "We must thank you for all the honour and consideration you showed towards us last night."

"I fear you were not received worthily," Lin Chong replied. "Had I been able to follow my own heart, I should have honoured you as you deserve. But I was not in a position to do so. I hope you will forgive me."

"We are simple people," said Wu Yong, "yet we are not made of wood. How could we not notice the marks of your concern? We are truly grateful."

Chao Gai tried many times to prevail upon Lin Chong to take the place of honour but the latter refused as many times, and it was only after he had pushed Chao Gai into it that he would sit down in the next place himself. Wu Yong and the others then seated themselves. Chao Gai said: "Instructor, I have heard so much about you but I never expected to meet you here in person."

Lin Chong said: "Before, when I was in the Eastern Capital, I never failed in courtesy towards my friends. But today, when I had the opportunity of satisfying a lifelong ambition in making your acquaintance, I found myself prevented from expressing openly the happiness this brings me. For this reason I came to apologize."

"We truly appreciate your delicacy," Chao Gai said.

Wu Yong then changed the subject. "I have heard a very great deal, Instructor, about your marvellous exploits in the capital but I am not fully acquainted with the causes of your falling out with Gao-le-Bel and all the ills he heaped on you. I also heard about the burning of the army stores at Cangzhou, and that it was all contrived by him. But on whose recommendation was it that you decided to join the outlaws?"

"Gao-the-Ball? My blood boils at the mere mention of that scoundrel's name and the thought of all the harm he has done me! To think that I have not yet been able to pay him back! But as to my seeking refuge here, it was Mr. Chai's idea."

"Would that be Chai Jin, the gentleman who's known among the rivers and lakes as the Little Whirlwind?"

"That is he."

"I have heard that Chai Jin is a most worthy and charitable man, one who delights in helping all men of spirit," said Chao Gai. "They say he is a descendant of an Emperor of the Later Zhou. What wouldn't I give to make his acquaintance!"

Wu Yong said: "This Chai Jin is universally known and admired. The fact that he recommended you, Instructor, is proof of your prodigious talents in the martial arts. Nor is it any exaggeration to say that it would have been only right for Wang Lun to have ceded the chief position to you. That is common knowledge. And besides, it would have been in keeping with Chai Jin's letter."

"I thank you for the sentiments. But I had committed a serious crime, remember, that is why I sought the help of Mr. Chai. He would have been willing to let me stay with him but I didn't want to get him into trouble, so I decided to join the outlaws. I didn't realize it was going to land me in this mess. It's not a question of status, it's simply that Wang Lun is weak and vacillating, that's what makes it so hard to work with him."

Wu Yong said: "Chief Wang receives people courteously, however, and seems to want to be friendly. Can he really be so mean of spirit?"

Lin Chong replied: "We should, today, be thanking our stars that such a group of heroes as yourselves have come here to offer us aid and support. We ought to regard it as the height of good fortune, it should be as rain to thirsty young seedlings. But the only emotion that jealous and resentful spirit feels is panic lest your power should eclipse his own. Last night when he heard your story about the massacre of government troops, he was uneasy in the extreme, and he made up his mind not to allow you to stay. That is why he asked you all to come down here to sleep in the guest-house."

Wu Yong said: "If that is how chief Wang feels, we had better not stay and serve him; we should take ourselves off."

"Please," said Lin Chong, "do not behave like strangers. I fore-saw all this. It was precisely because I feared you might with- draw that I came here to give you advance warning. Let us see how he treats you today. If the scoundrel treats you reasonably, not like yesterday, then let no more be said of this. But supposing this morning he steps out of line, be it just by a centimetre, then he shall answer for it to Lin Chong!"

"Really we do not deserve that you should go to such lengths for us. But we are truly grateful," Chao Gai said.

Wu Yong said: "Why should you fall out with old friends for the sake of new? If we can be accepted, all well and good. If we cannot, then we had much better withdraw at once."

"Certainly not, Dr. Wu. Remember the old saying, 'The wise know the wise, the brave man nods to the brave.' There's no point in trying to conciliate this creature, this filthy animal! But I assure you, there's nothing to worry about!"

With this, Lin Chong rose and took his leave, saying: "We shall meet again shortly." They escorted him out and watched him return up the mountain. The situation was like this: Why should they not have leave to stay
When they'd rather stay than leave?
And nobody there could rightly say:
"There's no room for you, I believe!"
Because he who could give them leave to stay
Would rather see them leave,
Fearing that they will end his sway—
Without even a by your leave.

Around nine o'clock a soldier appeared with an invitation. "The lords of the mountain retreat request the pleasure of the visitors' company at a grand banquet in the water pavilion on the southern slopes," he announced.

Chao Gai replied that they would be there shortly, and the messenger left. "What do you think this means, Professor?" Chao Gai asked Wu Yong.

"It's all right," Wu Yong replied, excitedly. "Here's your chance to take over the mountain retreat. Today Lin Chong undoubtedly intends to quarrel with Wang Lun. And should he hold back, then I am quite sure that with this tongue of mine — small but not idle, I may say — I can spur him on. We must all carry hidden weapons. Watch me closely, and when I give the signal, by tugging my moustache like this, we will all do our part." The others could barely contain their excitement.

Around eleven, messengers were again sent and the invitation was issued three or four more times. Chao Gai and the others chose weapons and secreted them on their persons. Now fully prepared, they set off for the banquet. They were met on the way by Song Wan, who was riding down to invite them himself, and a group of soldiers carrying seven sedans. They climbed into the sedans and were carried thus to the water pavilion on the southern slopes. On arrival they descended from the chairs and were welcomed by Wang Lun, Du Qian, Lin Chong and Zhu Gui, and invited inside the pavilion. Here's what the pavilion was like:

Entirely surrounded by water, with the curtains rolled right up giving a clear view of the flowers and the red rail which enclose it: the air sweetly scented by thousands of water lilies spread over the green water. Everywhere the eye is met by the blue-green of lotus leaves extending over the lake. Beyond the painted eaves the shade of leafy willows; outside the closed windows the wind sighs gently in the pines. The beauty of rivers and mountains fills the pavilion where this noble band of heroes is now assembled.

The company seated themselves ceremoniously: Wang Lun and his four colleagues on the left, Chao Gai and the six others on the right. Under the dais soldiers filled and passed the cups. Several rounds were drunk and food was served twice, while Chao Gai and Wang Lun held a lengthy conversation. Every time Chao Gai brought up his idea of joining the stronghold, however, Wang Lun quickly changed the subject. Wu Yong looked at Lin Chong, and saw that he was glaring fixedly at Wang Lun.

The feasting continued till afternoon. Then Wang Lun called out to some soldiers: "Bring it out!" Three or four men left the room and a moment later one came back carrying a big dish on which five big silver ingots were piled. Wang Lun stood up and raising his cup said to Chao Gai: "I am most grateful to you all for having come here to join us. But I fear this poor refuge of ours is but a barren swamp, how can it be home to so many true dragons? So I have ventured to collect these few gifts that I earnestly hope you will not despise, and I request you to look elsewhere for some worthier spot to tether your horses."

Chao Gai replied to this speech: "I had heard much about this great fortress, and how men of honour and importance were received here. It is for that reason that I came here, specially, to enlist in your band. If you find it impossible to take us, we will withdraw of our own accord. I thank you for your offer of payment but I cannot accept it. I do not wish to boast of my wealth but I have to inform you that our resources are entirely adequate, so I would ask you to put away your generous gift immediately. I bid you farewell."

"Why do you reject the gift?" Wang Lun said. "It is not that we do not want to have you but just that our provisions are meagre and our housing poor. I fear that your reputation would suffer from it and you would lose face. That's the only reason I do not want you to stay."

Before he had even finished speaking, Lin Chong, who had looked on with raised eyebrows, glaring ferociously, burst out: "It happened before, when I came to the mountain — you turned me away with the same pretext of inadequate provisions and poor housing! Now when our friend Chao Gai and his company come here you trot out the same old excuses. It simply doesn't hold water!"

"Please don't get so excited!" said Wu Yong. "It's all our fault for coming here, we've upset the good relations between you all. Just now Chief Wang politely asked us to leave, and offered us financial compensation. He didn't say he was throwing us out. So please, calm yourself. We will leave of our own accord."

"His smile hides a knife, the kind words conceal a treacherous heart. I have to speak, I can stomach no more!"

"Do you hear him, the filthy beast?" Wang Lun cried. "He's not even drunk, what excuse has he for speaking to me so offen- sively? Where is discipline?"

"You useless, broken-down scholar," Lin Chong scolded. "There's not an ounce of culture in you, who says you're fit to be lord of this stronghold?"

At this point, Wu Yong said to Chao Gai: "Because of us, the leader has lost face. As soon as the boats are brought, we must depart."

As Chao Gai and the other seven rose and made as if to leave the pavilion, Wang Lun stopped them, saying: "Don't go. Wait till the banquet is over." But Lin Chong kicked the table aside with one foot and leapt to his feet, pulling out from under his robe a dagger that blazed as if it was on fire. At this point, Wu Yong pulled on his moustache and Chao Gai and Liu Tang went over and made a pretence of restraining Wang Lun, saying "Please do not quarrel!" Wu Yong meanwhile pretended to hold Lin Chong back, saying "You must do nothing rash!" and Gongsun Sheng addressed both sides impartially, saying: "Do not let relations be spoiled on our account." The three Ruan brothers went over and stood by Du Qian, Song Wan and Zhu Gui, while the rank and file looked on, open-mouthed.Lin Chong grasped hold of Wang Lun and yelled in his face: "You're just a penniless village scholar, without Du Qian how could you ever have got where you are? Mr. Chai gave you the money, paid your expenses and befriended you, yet when he recommended me to you, what did you do but reject me? And not just once, either! Now this whole bevy of good men come to enlist and you want to send them away too. Do you think Mount Liang belongs to you alone? You envious cur, you can't bear to see anyone better than you! What else are you fit for but the block? There's not an ounce of greatness about you, you've no right to be chief here!"

Perhaps Du Qian, Song Wan and Zhu Gui had thoughts of stepping forward but closely watched as they were, how could they stir? Wang Lun thought to flee at this time but Chao Gai and Liu Tang prevented it. Seeing the turn things had taken, Wang Lun cried out "Where are my bodyguards?" He did indeed have some trusted guards, and they might have come to his aid but when they saw the ferociousness of Lin Chong's expression they thought better of it. So Lin Chong continued to hold onto Wang Lun, and went on cursing him for another moment, until he struck. The blade ripped into Wang Lun's breast and he collapsed on the floor of the pavilion. When they saw Wang Lun was dead, Chao Gai and his companions drew their weapons. Lin Chong quickly severed Wang Lun's head and held it up. Du Qian, Song Wan and Zhu Gui, terrified, knelt and said: "We wish to serve you." Chao Gai and the others hurriedly helped them to their feet. Wu Yong dragged Wang Lun's throne over into the pool of blood and pressed Lin Chong into it, crying out: "If there be any not in accord, let them take good note of Wang Lun! I hereby declare Instructor Lin chief of this mountain fortress!" Lin Chong set up a vehement protest: "No, Professor, no! I acted out of regard for all of you and in the interests of right. It was for that reason I killed that unconscionable villain. Not because I had designs on his position. If you insist on giving the leadership to me, I will be mocked by men of spirit the world over. If you force me to this, I would prefer to die! But there is something I would like to say — will everyone allow me to say it?"

"You are the leader, if you have words to speak of course you must speak them," everyone murmured, "and we of course will listen."

Those words of Lin Chong's, though but few, were to have most important consequences:

In the Gold Pavilion stout hearts assemble;
Here's a company of heroes to make the wicked tremble!

It's a case of:

Heaven's agents now are close at hand;
Enemies of wrong will form a virtuous band.

The Inspector He Tao left the court with the signed order and went into a private chamber to discuss matters with a number of his men. They unanimously said, "As you want us to go to the Shijie Village, we must not forget that that place is quite close to Liangshan Marsh. The lake is very extensive, and there are numerous anchorages for boats among the reeds and rushes. Unless we have a large number of soldiers, boats, and horses, who dare go there to try and arrest the thieves?"

"What you say is correct," said He Tao. He left and entering the hall again spoke to the Prefect, "The village of Shijie is quite close to Liangshan Marsh, and on the lake there are numerous anchorages and narrow tracks in all directions in the reeds and rushes. There have always been thieves in that spot, and recently their numbers have increased. If you do not give me a very large number of soldiers and horses how dare we attempt to arrest the bandits there?"

"As things are like that," said the Prefect, "I will send an officer with five hundred soldiers to go with you to arrest the bandits."

The Inspector He Tao, after receiving these orders, went back to the private room and summoning all the soldiers he carefully selected five hundred of the best men, and then ordered them to go and equip themselves for the expedition. The next morning the military officer with his five hundred soldiers, and He Tao with his men left for the Shijie Village.

After Chao Gai and Gongsun Sheng had set fire to the farm buildings they left with about ten of the farm labourers for the Shijie Village. About halfway there they met the three brothers Ruan, who were armed, and had come to conduct them to their village. Ruan the Second had already sent his family, both young and old, to a place of safety on the lake and now the 7 men discussed whether they should all go to the brigands' stronghold at Liangshan Marsh.

"Just now," said Wu Yong, "at the Li Family Village there is a man named Zhu Gui, 'Dry Land Crocodile,' who keeps an inn there, and offers shelter to brave men. Those who want to join the bandits must first go to him. We had better load all our possessions on a boat, and go there. We can make a present to him, and request him to arrange for us to join the bandits."

While they were discussing the matter several fishermen entered and reported that a large body of soldiers had arrived at the village.

Chao Gai stood up and said, "As they have come we must stay here."

"Never mind," said Ruan the Second, "I will go and meet them. I will cause more than half of them to be drowned, and the rest killed."

"Do not get excited," said Gongsun Sheng. "This is my affair, so you just watch how I deal with them."

Chao Gai said, "Let brother Liu Tang and Wu Yong load all our possessions and also the young and old people on a boat, and then row to the Li Family Village, and wait for us there. We will stay behind to see what the soldiers will do, and then we will follow."

Ruan the Second loaded two large boats accordingly, and Wu Yong went in one, and Liu Tang in the other. About eight men sculled the boats to the Li Family Village. Chao Gai then told Ruan the Fifth and Ruan the Seventh to get some small boats, and fight with the enemy in a certain way.

Inspector He Tao and the military officer upon arriving at the Shijie Village seized all the boats that were moored there. The soldiers who knew how to handle boats were then placed in the boats, and the others were mounted on horseback on the bank. They then all moved towards the village. Upon reaching Ruan the Second's home they raised a loud shout and rushed into the house. But it had already been vacated, and there were only few heavy furnitures left behind.

He Tao instructed his men to arrest some of the fishermen who were neighbours. When the neighbours were brought before him they said, "The two brothers, Ruan the Fifth and Ruan the Seventh, are living at another anchorage, and we cannot get there without boats." He then said to the officer, "This lake has numerous tracks and nooks through the reeds, and where there is open water we do not know how deep the water is. If we divide our forces I am afraid that we may fall into some villainous trap. I think we had better leave our horses here with a few men to guard this village and send all the other soldiers on the boats."

This was agreed to and He Tao and the officer then embarked with the bulk of their men. They had seized more than one hundred boats, some for rowing and others for sculling. They all started off for Ruan the Second's house on the lake. They had not gone five //when they heard a man in the reeds and rushes singing, and all the boats were stopped. The man was singing:

For long I've caught fish at Liao Er,
Neither corn nor hemp do I plow;
I'll kill the corrupt officials,
I'm loyal to Emperor Zhao.

He Tao was surprised at hearing this, and just then he saw the singer in the distance sculling a small boat.

A soldier recognized the man and called out, "That is Ruan the Fifth."

He Tao beckoned with his hand for his men to move forward, and all the boats advanced.

When Ruan the Fifth saw this movement he laughed and cursed them saying, "You are corrupt thieves who oppress the people! How dare you attack me! You come here to pull the tiger's whiskers!"

The soldiers took their bows, and let fly a large number of arrows.

Ruan the Fifth seeing this seized a tool used in fishing, made a somersault, and dived into the water. The soldiers rushed to the spot but could not find anyone there. They punted their boats towards two tracks in the reeds, and heard someone in the reeds whistle. The boats spread out, as they saw another boat approaching them sculled by two men. A man was standing in the boat, wearing a bamboo conical hat, and a grass raincoat, and was holding a spear in his hand. He was singing:

I was born at the village of Shijie,
And I long to slake my thirst for blood;
Let me only behead the deputy and He Tao,
And present their heads to the Emperor Zhao.

Both He Tao and his men were startled upon hearing this. A man called out, "This man is Ruan the Seventh."

"Let all of you advance and seize this thief," shouted He Tao. "He must not escape."

Ruan the Seventh laughed upon hearing this and said, "You crook!" He then pressed his spear and the boat turned round towards a nook in the reeds.

The soldiers seeing this, yelled out and chased him. But Ruan the Seventh and his two oarsmen sculled briskly so that the small boat seemed to fly. He also whistled with his fingers as the boat wound its way through the devious turnings.

The soldiers quickly followed down the narrow channels but He Tao called out ordering them to stop and anchor close to a bank there. He Tao got on the bank and looking round saw nothing but a vast expanse of reeds and rushes without any trace of a footpath on the bank. He was suspicious, so he asked the fisherman they had arrested whether he knew the place. The fisherman replied, "Although I live here yet I do not know all these numerous tracks through the reeds."

He Tao sent some three of his men in a small boat to go forward, and examine the tracks. As they had not returned after four hours He Tao said, "Those men are not good scouts." He then sent five more of his men in two small boats to reconnoiter the tracks. But after another hour had passed those men also had not returned. He Tao said, "Those men were well experienced so how is it that they have not returned to report to me? I never thought there is not a single man of the soldiers who can get out of a scrape by himself." As it was now getting dusk he thought that it would not do to stop in that spot but he decided to first investigate matters himself. He selected a quick boat and six of his reliable men who were armed, to pull the oars and then seating himself at the bow of the boat went towards one of the numerous tracks in the reeds. They went about two //; and now as the sun was setting in the west he saw a man on the bank carrying a hoe. He asked him, "Who are you? What place is this?"

The man replied, "I live at this village. It is called the Decapitation Creek. There are no thoroughfares here."

"Have you seen two boats pass this way?" asked He Tao.

"Are they the boats that were sent to arrest Ruan the Fifth?" asked the man.

"How do you know that they come to arrest Ruan the Fifth?" asked He Tao.

"They are fighting in the forest over there," said the man.

"How far is it from here?" asked He Tao.

"It is just over there—not far away," replied the man.

He Tao gave orders for the boat to stop at the bank, and then told two of his best men to arm themselves and come ashore. But the man took his hoe and struck the two soldiers with it, knocking them down into the water. Upon seeing this He Tao was startled, and was thinking of going on the bank himself. Just at that moment the boat was moved away from the bank, and a man suddenly emerging from the water seized his legs and pulled him off the boat into the water. The men on the boat seeing this were thinking of retreating but the man on the bank used his hoe and brained them all one by one. The man in the water dragged He Tao to the bank, stripped him of his belt and bound him with it. Then He Tao saw that the man who had jerked him into the water was Ruan the Seventh and that the other man on the bank was Ruan the Second.

The brothers cursed He Tao, "We three brothers always like to kill men, and set houses on fire. What a cur you are! How dare you bring your men here to arrest us!"

"Heroes!" said He Tao, "I was sent here by my superiors— It was not my own will. How dare I come here to arrest you? But pray have pity on me and spare my life because at home I have a mother who is eighty years of age, and depends entirely upon me for her support."

One of the brothers said, "Bind him tightly like a 'zongzi' rice dumpling and put him in the hulk of the boat." They then threw the bodies of the soldiers, who had been killed, into the water. The brothers then whistled with their fingers and immediately about five men emerged from the reeds and rushes and came on the boat. They then all departed.

The officer who had been left in charge of the soldiers on the boats thought, "He Tao thought that his men did not know how to carry out his order so he went himself to explore the tracks but so far he has not returned." It was then about 9 P.M. and the sky was studded with stars. The soldiers were all taking a cooling on the boats as it had been a hot day. Suddenly a strong wind sprung up and struck the boats in the stern. The men covered their faces with their hands and bemoaned their luck. The wind snapped the mooring ropes, and the boats were soon in disorder. Just then the soldiers heard a whistle, and looking in its direction they saw at the side of the reeds an outbreak of fire. The men cried out, "We cannot escape from that." There were about one hundred boats, both small and big, and these were now all bumping against each other. The fire approached quickly. They now saw that there was a fleet of small boats fastened together in pairs, and loaded with reeds and grass which was all ablaze and the wind was blowing this mass of flames towards them. Their boats were all mixed up in a disorderly mass, and the channel was so narrow that they could not escape. There were about ten of the big boats all together in one spot, and these pairs of small boats with the fire got between them. In the water beside these small boats were men who guided the boats to their destination. The soldiers on the big boats leaped on shore to escape. But there was no dry ground there, and the fire soon caught the reeds so that there was no way to escape in any direction. They stood in the mud. The wind was strong, and the flames were dangerous. In the fire they now saw a small boat sculled by a man, and with a man seated in it who held a two-edged sword and shouted, "Do not allow even a single one to escape." The soldiers standing in the mud shivered with fear. Instantly they saw on one side came two men leading about five fishermen armed with spears and swords, and on another also advanced two men who were leading four fishermen who were also armed. These men now commenced to attack the soldiers, and in a very short time all the soldiers were killed.

The four leaders were Chao Gai and the three brothers Ruan. The man seated on the boat was Gongsun Sheng who had prayed to Heaven for a wind and had obtained it. These five men had led ten fishermen in the attack on the soldiers, and had succeeded in killing them all in the reeds, or in the water. There was only one man left and that was Inspector He Tao who was lying in the bottom of a boat, tightly bound like a dumpling. Ruan the Second picked him up, and put him on the bank. He then cursed him saying, "You stupid reptile! You have deceived and injured the people of Jizhou. At first I thought of cutting your corpse into ten thousand pieces. But now I want you to return to Jizhou Prefecture, and tell that thief, the Prefect, that the three brothers Ruan, or even Chao Gai are not to be slighted with. We do not go to your town to borrow grains but if he comes to our village it will result in his death.

"We are not afraid of a piddly Prefect, who has an order from the Prime Minister to arrest us, because if Cai himself comes here we shall only cut about thirty holes in his body. If we release you, you must not attempt to come here again. You must tell that prick the Prefect that he had better not have another dream like this one. There are no roads here but I will get my younger brother to show you a way."

Ruan the Seventh got a small light boat, and placing He Tao on board took him to a place where a road started, and then said to him, "You can get away by this road. All the men who came with you have been killed so is it not nice for us to let you go in this way? When the Prefect sees you that asinine thief will laugh at our weakness. I now beg that you will let me have your two ears as a keepsake."

Ruan the Seventh took his sword and cut off both ears of Inspector He Tao. He then cut his bonds, and left him on the bank.

Chao Gai, Gongsun Sheng, the three brothers Ruan, and the ten fishermen embarked on seven small boats and left the anchorage of the Shijie Village, and went to the Li Family Village. There they found the boats that had brought Wu Yong and Liu Tang. Wu Yong asked how the affair with the soldiers had terminated, and Chao Gai told him all the details. Wu Yong and all the men were very much pleased on hearing the news. They then placed their boats together in one place, and went to the inn to find Zhu Gui, the "Dry Land Crocodile." When Zhu Gui saw so many people arriving and assuming that they wanted to join the bandits he went out to meet them. When Wu Yong had told him the news Zhu Gui was much pleased, and saluted each person individually. He then invited them to come into the main hall where he told the servants to bring wine and wait upon the guests. He then took his bow and shot an arrow, that had a whistle attached to it, into the reeds. As soon as the whistling arrow reached its destination a boat carrying a number of bandits came forth, and was sculled towards the inn. He then wrote a letter giving the names and number of the heroes who wished to join the bandits, and handing this to the boatmen, told them to take it at once to the stronghold. A sheep was then slaughtered, and cooked for the assembled men.

They passed the night there, and early the following morning Zhu Gui ordered a big boat, and invited his guests to embark. They also took the boats that had brought Chao Gai and his party, and set off for the bandits' stronghold. In a short time they neared the landing place, when they heard drums and gongs beating. Four small boats came out to meet them, and after the boatmen had saluted by exclaiming "nuo," they retreated.

Upon reaching the landing place called the Jinsha Bank, all the fishermen and other men were told to remain in that place. About ten bandits were there to conduct the leaders to the stronghold. At the barrier Wang Lun with the other chiefs was awaiting them, and they all saluted Chao Gai and his fellow leaders.

Wang Lun said, "I have heard the great fame of Chao Gai, the 'Heavenly King,' like the sound of thunder in my ears. Today I am greatly honoured by you entering our humble 'straw stockade.'"

"I am quite uneducated," said Chao Gai, "and am very rough. Today I want to hide my incapability and am willing to be a subordinate follower of yours, and I hope you won't reject my application."

"Don't talk like that," said Wang Lun. "Please come into our stronghold where we can discuss matters."

They all went up the mountain. Upon arriving at the assembly hall Wang Lun invited them to enter. Chao Gai and his six companions stood in a row on the right-hand side, while Wang Lun and his subordinate leaders stood on the left side. They then each individually pressed each other to be seated. Wang Lun instructed the lower officers standing near the door to salute the guests also, and he then gave orders for the men outside to beat the drums and play the music. He then told some of his men, to go down the mountain and conduct the other followers of Chao Gai to the stronghold and entertain them in the guest chamber where they could stay for the night. He also ordered that two oxen, ten sheep, and five pigs were to be killed and a big feast provided. While they were drinking the wine Chao Gai told them all about his affair from beginning to the end. While listening to this Wang Lun was much upset and very perplexed. He made no remark or comment but muttered to himself.

The feast lasted until the evening when Chao Gai and his men were shown by the chiefs to a guest hall where the former could stay.

Chao Gai was much pleased with the arrangements, and spoke to Wu Yong and the other five men, "We have committed a serious crime and should Wang Lun not treat us so well, we could find no safe place to stay. So we cannot forget to repay his kindness."

Wu Yong gave a sneering laugh.

"Why do you sneer in that way?" asked Chao Gai. "If you know anything you had better tell me."

"You have an honest disposition," said Wu Yong. "But do you believe that Wang Lun is really willing to receive us here? You cannot read his heart but you should carefully notice his conduct."

"What do you see in his actions?" asked Chao Gai.

"Did you not notice," said Wu Yong, "that in the early stage of the feast he spoke with you in a friendly manner but afterwards when you had stated how we had killed many soldiers, policemen, and how we released He Tao, and what splendid heroes the brothers Ruan are, Wang Lun then changed his countenance, and his answers to you were not sincere. If he had really intended to keep us here, he could have decided upon your position in the band early this morning. The two leaders Du Qian and Song Wan are rather rough characters, so how can they understand how to treat guests? Only the other leader Lin Chong was previously a Drill Instructor at the Eastern Capital, he understands everything. Just now he has no alternative but to remain as the fourth-in-command. At the beginning when Wang Lun was discussing matters with you I noticed that Lin Chong did not seem very comfortable, and was always looking at Wang Lun. I saw that Lin Chong might do something for us. I shall speak a few words which might produce a conflict between them."

"I have to depend entirely on your admirable scheming," said Chao Gai.

The seven men slept soundly that night. Early next morning they were informed that Lin Chong wanted to see them.

"That man," said Wu Yong, "is come to have a talk with us; he has fallen in my trap."
The seven men went to the door to invite Lin Chong to enter, and Wu Yong being in front said to him, "We are deeply indebted to you for the grand reception we had last night."
"I am afraid that I did not pay you sufficient respect," said Lin Chong. "Although I should like to have treated you much better yet I am not in a position to do so."
"Although our talents are negligible," said Wu Yong, "yet we can appreciate your intentions. We are extremely obliged to you."
Chao Gai pressed Lin Chong three times to take the seat of honour but Lin Chong declined the honour. At last Chao Gai gave way and agreed to take the premier seat, and Lin Chong took the second seat. The other six men took their seats in a row.
"I have heard of your fame," said Chao Gai, "but I did not expect to meet you today." "When I was in the Eastern Capital," said Lin Chong, "I never treated my friends lightly. But now as I cannot treat you as I would like to, so I came here to beg your pardon."
Chao Gai expressed his thanks for the great favour bestowed upon him.
"I heard previously," said Wu Yong, "that you were noted at the Eastern Capital as a great hero. But I never heard how you fell out with Marshal Gao Qiu, and how it happened that you incurred his displeasure. Afterwards I heard of the military fodder depot at Cangzhou being burnt down, and that it was part of Gao Qiu's plot to aggravate your misfortune but I have not heard who it was that introduced you to these bandits."
"The mention of Gao Qiu," said Lin Chong, "makes my hair stand on end. Yet I am not able to have my revenge. It was Squire Chai who introduced me to this place."
"Is not that Squire Chai," said Wu Yong, "the man whom we know as Chai Jin, the 'Small Whirlwind'?"
Lin Chong said that that was the person.
"I have heard," said Chao Gai, "that Squire Chai distributes wealth in a good cause. He is known to entertain heroes from all quarters. It is said that he is the descendant of the former Zhou royal house. It would be very nice if I could meet him some time."
"According to what people say," said Wu Yong, "the fame of Squire Chai is known everywhere, and it is heard of by all men. I think that if your military skill had been only ordinary he would not have recommended you to the bandits here. Without exaggeration I think that it would have been proper for Wang Lun to have made you the head chief here. Everybody in fact agrees with that, and moreover it would have been in accordance with Squire Chai's recommendation."
"I am flattered by your great praise," said Lin Chong. "It is not Wang Lun who would not have me remain at his home. I have really committed a great crime, and I was really afraid of implicating Squire Chai. I myself was willing to come here instead of staying at his home. But I never expected that I am today held on a dilemma. It is not that I am dissatisfied with my position but Wang Lun has no fixed idea, and his word cannot be depended upon and that makes it very difficult to work with him."
"In dealing with men," said Wu Yong, "he appears to be very amiable but who knows that at his heart he is so narrow-minded."
"Just now," said Lin Chong, "it is very fortunate that many heroes have come to our mountain stronghold to help and assist us in many ways. Your presence is like dressing an embroidery with flowers or like a welcome shower on a parched rice field. But Wang Lun is jealous and envious of capable men, and is afraid that the influence of the heroes will result in his overthrow. Last evening when you told him about your having killed many soldiers I could see that he was uncomfortable, and that was why he did not want you to stay but asked you to pass the night outside the barrier."
"As Wang Lun has that kind of disposition," said Wu Yong, "we need not wait until he asks us to go but must ourselves seek refuge in some other place."
"You heroes," said Lin Chong, "must not look at things in that way, because I have another plan. I was afraid that you had the idea of leaving here, and that was why I came early to discuss matters with you. You had better wait and see how he treats you today. If he is reasonable and quite different from yesterday, then we need not discuss matters any further. But if there is only half a sentence which is doubtful then everything that follows will rest upon my shoulders."
"As you display such kindness," said Chao Gai, "we shall be grateful to you forever."
"In that case," said Wu Yong, "you will break up the old brotherly association for our sake. If we are allowed to remain then we will stay but if we must go then let us depart."
"You are mistaken," said Lin Chong. "There is an ancient proverb: 'One ape will pity another ape, and a good man will have compassion for his fellow men.' I think he must be the offspring of a couple of rotters, as he is a vile brute, and we cannot therefore regard him as a brother. But you heroes need not be troubled about him." Lin Chong then rose to make his departure, and said that he would see them again very soon. He then left after being duly saluted by all the men present.
Shortly afterwards one of the bandits came, with an invitation from the chief Wang Lun for them to dine with him at an arbour on the south side of the mountain. Chao Gai told him to tell Wang Lun that they would soon be there, and he then asked Wu Yong, "What do you think of this meeting with Wang Lun?"
Wu Yong laughed and said, "Sir, you need not worry, as you will soon be in command of this stronghold. I think that today Lin Chong will fight Wang Lun, and if he hesitates then you will find that my three-inch tongue will not be useless, and I can make him risk his life. We must be prepared, and conceal weapons on our bodies. When you see me stroking my mustache you can use your united strength."
Chao Gai and the others were quite pleased at hearing this. After 9 A.M. four times a man came to request them to go to the feast. They all carried weapons but their dress gave no indication of them. Song Wan came to conduct them to the feast, and he was riding a horse. He brought seven sedan chairs carried by bandits, and the party went there and were ushered to the feast. Upon arrival at the arbour they were met by Wang Lun, Du Qian, Lin Chong, and Zhu Gui who conducted them inside where they all took their seats. Wang Lun and his four leaders sat on the left while Chao Gai and his six companions sat on the right. Many bandits served them with wine. After drinking wine and partaking of about two courses of food, Chao Gai attempted to start a conversation with Wang Lun about their joining the band but every time Wang Lun diverted the conversation to some other subject. Wu Yong was watching Lin Chong who sat with his arm over the back of his chair and kept his eyes on Wang Lun's body. Thus the feast went on till after midday when Wang Lun turning round ordered his bandits to bring in a thing, and shortly afterwards a bandit entered carrying in both hands a large tray on which were five ingots of silver. Wang Lun rising with a cup of wine in his hand addressed Chao Gai, "We are greatly honoured by you heroes wishing to join our band but unfortunately our stronghold in the midst of these waters is so small that it cannot accommodate many dragons. As a manifestation of my feelings I wish to present you these gifts, and I hope that you will accept them with a smile. Also should you find a larger stronghold where you can stay, I shall have much pleasure in surrendering myself to you there."
Chao Gai said, "We heard that you were always inviting virtuous men to enter your band, and that was why we came here. But if it is not convenient for you we will of course retire to some other place. We are extremely honoured by your offering us these ingots of silver but we cannot accept them. I do not care to boast of the wealth that we have but we really have enough for our present requirements. I request you to take these presents back, and we will then take our leave."
"But why won't you take the presents?" asked Wang Lun. "It is not that we do not wish you heroes to stay here but because our food supplies and housing accommodation are so scanty that we are afraid that you would soon be dissatisfied with them."
While he was saying this Lin Chong raised his eyebrows and his eyes expressed anger. Leaning back in his chair he shouted out, "When I first came here you falsely said that your food supplies and housing accommodation were scanty, and now that Chao Gai and his heroes have arrived you make the same pretext. How unreasonable you are!"
"Do not get angry," said Wu Yong. "The fault is on our side as our arrival has evidently upset the amiable relations in your mountain stronghold. Wang Lun, your chief, has today diplomatically suggested that we should go, and has even provided us with our traveling expenses. He did not try to drive us away. So I request you to appease your anger as we are quite willing to depart."
"There is a hidden dagger behind his smiling face," said Lin Chong. "His words are nice but his actions are dirty enough. Indeed today I cannot bear with him."
Addressing Chao Gai, Wang Lun said, "Just look at this brute! He is not drunk, and yet he hurts my feelings by this kind of rebellious language."
"You are evidently a poor scholar who has failed in the official examinations," said Lin Chong. "You have no learning so how can you be the leader at this stronghold?"
"Brother Chao Gai," said Wu Yong, "our seeking refuge at this mountain has resulted in causing the chief to 'lose face.' We had better get a boat and depart immediately."
Chao Gai and his six companions rose from their seats in order to leave the arbour. But Wang Lun urged them to finish their meal before going. Lin Chong, however, kicked the table over, and taking a sword from his clothes he flashed it about. Wu Yong stroked his mustache, and seeing this Chao Kai and Liu Tang gathered round Wang Lun, and pretended to urge him not to have any fighting.
Wu Yong plucked at Lin Chong's dress, and said, "Do not be rash!"
Gongsun Sheng addressing both parties said, "Do not break your friendly relations on our account."
Ruan the Second was pressing Du Qian to remain passive; Ruan the Fifth was pretending to persuade Song Wan; Ruan the Seventh to persuade Zhu Gui; while the bandit soldiers were too afraid to speak a word but looked on with surprise.
Lin Chong seized hold of Wang Lun and cursed him saying, "You village bumpkin! You are very lucky in having Du Qian to help here. Squire Chai helped you and gave you plenty of money. But when he recommended me to you, you were not willing to allow me to stay here. Again today you wanted to send these heroes away. This mountain surely is yours! But how jealous you are of capable men! As you are such a useless customer I must kill you. You are so narrow-minded and incapable that you certainly cannot be the chief of this stronghold."
Du Qian, Song Wan, and Zhu Gui all wanted to intervene but were surrounded by the three pretending peacemakers. Wang Lun would have escaped at this time had not Chao Gai and Liu Tang prevented him from doing so. He saw that the position was bad and called out, "Where are my intimate followers?" There were several of his intimates at one side but although they had a desire to help him yet dared not come forward when they saw Lin Chong's fierce aspect. Now Lin Chong caught hold of Wang Lun, and after further cursing he stabbed him in the breast. Seeing this Chao Gai and his men drew their broad swords. Lin Chong cut off Wang Lun's head, and held it aloft in his hand. Seeing this Du Qian, Song Wan, and Zhu Gui were much afraid, and kneeling down they said to Lin Chong, "We are quite willing to 'hold your stirrup and reins' and be your servants." Chao Gai and his followers immediately raised them up on to their feet again. Wu Yong took the chair that was standing in a pool of blood, and placing it at one side said to the assembly, "If you do not submit you will suffer the same fate as Wang Lun. Today we recognize Lin Chong as the chief headman of this stronghold."
Lin Chong shouted, "You are making a mistake. Today I desired justice to reign, and that is why I killed this bad thief. I certainly do not want to occupy the position as your chief. Wu Yong has asked me to occupy this seat but should I do so I should be a laughing stock of all the heroes in the empire. Should you press me any further in this matter I would rather die than submit. But will you listen to just one sentence I wish to say to you?"
The men replied, "We shall of course listen to what you, our chief, have to say." Lin Chong did not say much but the result was that many men of one heart were admitted to the Broken Gold Pavilion (even gold can be broken when 2 hearts are united), and many meetings of righteous brothers would be held at the Hall of Righteous Brotherhood.

The administrator of heaven's justice is coming.
The wealth distributor in good cause is approaching.

020
The Men of Marshes of Mount Liang retreat elect Chao Gai as their Chief; Liu Tang Leaves Yuncheng Town on a Moonlit Night & Goes to Yuncheng County

Still clutching the dagger with which he killed Wang Lun, Lin Chong pointed at all assembled and said: "Although I'm an exile from the Imperial Guards I am able to be with these heroes here today. I turned against Wang Lun because his heart was narrow, because he was jealous of their talents and refused to accept them, not because I wanted his position. I could never have brains and courage enough to destroy the evil ministers surrounding the emperor and repulse their armies. Brother Chao is a gallant, charitable man. He is intelligent and brave. He's famed and admired everywhere. In the spirit of chivalry I propose that he become the leader of this stronghold. What do you say?"
"Very suitable," cried the men.
"No," said Chao Gai. "Since ancient times 'the strong guest must not exceed his host.' Strong I may be but I've only recently arrived from distant parts. I cannot assume high command."
Lin Cong pushed him into the leader's chair. "This is the time. Don't refuse." To the other brigands he shouted: "If anyone disagrees, let him remember what happened to Wang Lun!"
Courteously he insisted that Chao Gai retain his seat. He called to the bandits to come to the pavilion and pay homage. He ordered that Wang Lun's body be removed, and that a feast be prepared inside the fortress. He instructed that all the junior officers stationed on the front and rear of the mountain be summoned to the stronghold for a meeting.
Lin Chong and the others helped Chao Gai into a sedan-chair, then all got on their horses and proceeded to Righteous Fraternity Hall, where they dismounted and entered. Chao Gai was seated on the chair of first rank, in the middle. An incense burner was lit in the centre of the hall. Lin Chong came forward.
"I'm only a crude fellow who knows a bit about arms. I have no learning or talent, no wisdom or technique. Today we are fortunate enough to be here with you gallant men and our just principles are clear. We cannot be casual about authority, as we were before. Teacher Wu Yong shall be our military adviser, in charge of our fighting forces. He must take the second seat."
Wu Young replied: "I'm a simple village school teacher, with neither the leaning nor the ability to manage affairs. Though I've read something of the military classics by Sun and Wu, I haven't shown even half a grain of talent. How can I accept?"
"The time is at hand," Lin Chong said. "No need for modesty." Wu Yong took the second chair and Lin Chong said: "Master Gongsun, please take the third seat."
"That cannot be," Chao Gai protested. "If you keep giving way like this, I'll withdraw completely."
"You mustn't say that, brother. Master Gongsun is known throughout the gallant fraternity. He's an excellent commander, and even the spirits cannot fathom his tactics. He can summon the wind and the rain. There's no one like him!"
"Though I know a bit of magic," said the Taoist priest, "I haven't any real learning to benefit the world. How dare I become a leader? That place belongs to you."
"We all heard your cleverness today in defeating the enemy," said Lin Chong. "A tripod vessel must have three legs. With only two it cannot stand. No need to be polite."
Gongsun took the third seat. Lin Chong wanted to yield further but Chao Gai, Wu Yong and Gongsun wouldn't hear of it. "Because you talked of a tripod needing three legs, we had no choice but to accept the three top positions," they explained. "But we'll all withdraw if you relinquish any further." They firmly seated him in the fourth chair.
"Song and Du should now be seated," said Chao Gai. But Du Qian and Song Wan absolutely refused. They begged Liu Tang, Ruan the Second, Ruan the Fifth and Ruan the Seventh to take the fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth places respectively. Du Qian then accepted the ninth chair, Song Wan the tenth and Zhu Gui the eleventh.
From then on, the positions of the eleven heroes were fixed in Liangshan Marsh. The nearly eight hundred men guarding the mountain front and rear all came and paid their respects, then stood on either side. Chao Gai addressed them.
"Today, Drill Instructor Lin has made me leader of this stronghold and Teacher Wu the military advisor. Master Gongsun also controls military authority. Drill Instructor Lin and the others have over-all charge of the fortress. You lieutenants retain your original commands. Observe your daily duties and guard the palisades and the beaches. Let no mishaps occur. We must all be united in mind and virtue."
He directed that the houses on both sides of the hall be put in order for the two families which had come with them, and ordered that the purloined birthday gifts—the gold and silver and jewels—as well as the valuables he had taken with him from the manor, be brought forth. From these he distributed largesse to the lieutenants and the rank and file brigands.
Oxen and horses were slaughtered as a sacrifice to the gods of Heaven and Earth, and in celebration of the reorganization. The leaders ate and drank far into the night. They feasted in this manner for several days. Then Chao Gai, Wu Yong and the other chieftains checked the granaries, had the fortifications repaired and more weapons made—lances, halberds, bows, arrows, armor and helmets—readied boats large and small, trained their soldiers and boatmen to board vessels and fight, and prepared in general to meet any enemy attack. Of this we'll say no more. One day, seeing how generously Chao Gai provided for the families of the men living in the stronghold, Lin Chong thought of his wife in the Eastern Capital. Was she still alive? He confided his concern to Chao Gai.
"I've been meaning to send for her ever since I came here. But Wang Lun was shifty and hard to get along with, so I kept putting it off. I wish I knew what's become of her."
"Send someone to fetch her, brother. Write a letter, We'll have a man deliver it and bring her here as soon as possible. Then you won't have to worry."
Lin Chong wrote a letter and gave it to a pair of trusted brigands. Less than two months later, they returned to the fortress.
"We went straight to the neighbourhood of Marshal Gao's residence in the Eastern Capital," they declared, "and found your father-in-law's home. We were told that Marshal Gao had been pressing your wife to marry his son. Rather than do that, she hung herself. She's been dead for half a year. Broken with grief, your father-in-law half a month ago fell ill and died. Only Jin Er, the maidservant, is left. She has married and her husband has moved in with her. We checked with your neighbours, and they told us the same story. As soon as we got the facts, we came back to report."
Lin Chong wept. From then on, he cast out all thoughts of home and loved ones. Chao Gai, observing this, sighed. The stronghold settled down to a daily routine of training the men and preparing to repulse attacks by government troops.

During a conference of leaders one day in Righteous Fraternity Hall a bandit hurried up the mountain and announced: "Troops from Jizhou Prefecture, about two thousand of them, sailing this way in four or five hundred boats, large and small! They've stopped temporarily in the lake at Stone Tablet."
"They'll soon be here," Chao Gai said to Wu Yong in alarm. "How shall we deal with them?"
The teacher laughed. "There's nothing to worry about. I have a plan. 'Earth can stop the flow of water, generals can cope with enemy troops,' as the old saying goes." Quietly, he told the three Ruan brothers what to do, then gave instructions to Lin Chong and Liu Tang, and to Du Qian and Song Wan.
Well over a thousand soldiers were assembled in locally commandeered boats on the lake at Stone Tablet, dispatched there by the prefect of Jizhou. They were headed by District Garrison Commander Huang An and a high police officer. Dividing into two squadrons, they proceeded separately across the lake.
Huang An's flotilla, with flags waving and soldiers yelling, advanced swiftly towards the Shore of Golden Sands. As they drew near, mournful notes floated across the water.
"Isn't that a horn?" asked Huang An.
He signalled his boats to halt, and peered into the distance. Three craft came towards them, each rowed by four men, all dressed alike. One man was standing on the prow, a red bandanna on his head and wearing a red silk tunic, a barbed spear in his hand.
One of the soldiers recognized them. "Those are the Ruan brothers," he said to Huang An. "Second, Fifth and Seventh."
"After them," cried Huang An. "We'll take all three!"
From two sides, between forty and fifty craft gave chase, the soldiers shouting fiercely. Shrill whistles came from the three boats that turned and fled. Huang An shook his spear.
"Kill those robbers," he exclaimed. "I'll reward you handsomely!"
The soldiers sent a shower of arrows after the racing craft. The three Ruan brothers whipped fox pelts out of the cabins and warded the arrows off. The government vessels followed in hot pursuit. They had gone only two or three //into an inlet when a small boat sped up from the rear.
"Stop chasing them," a man on the little craft cried. "The bandits have killed all our troops in the other squadron and thrown them into the water, and they've captured our boats!"
"How did you fall into their hands?" Huang An demanded.

"As we were sailing, we saw two boats, far off. There were five men on each. We chased after them. When we had gone about four //; seven or eight small vessels suddenly came at us from the surrounding creeks. Their arrows descended on us like a swarm of locusts. We, turned around quickly. But when we reached an outlet, we found that twenty or thirty men on both banks had stretched a rope across the water. As we drifted towards it, they showered us with stones and blinding lime. We jumped into the water and fled for our lives. A few of us got away. When we reached the place where our horses had been, they were gone, taken by the brigands. The guards were lying dead in the water. Luckily, we found this boat in the reeds, and rushed after you to report."
Huang An groaned. He waved a white flag, signalling his other craft to abandon the chase and return. Just as they swung about, three vessels, followed by another dozen, were seen coming in their direction from behind, each with four or five men on board. These waved red flags and whistled sharply, sailing swiftly towards the government craft. Before Huang An could spread his flotilla out in battle formation, cannon thundered from the reeds that suddenly were alive with red flags. Huang An's confusion bordered on panic.
A voice sang out from the rapidly approaching boats: "Huang An can go—if he leaves his head behind!"
Huang ordered his men to row with all their might and get beyond the reeds. From inlets on both sides of the lake forty or fifty small vessels shot out and deluged the government soldiers with arrows. Huang An tried desperately to get through this forest of feathered shafts. He had only three or four small boats left.
He leaped over into a fast little skiff. He could see his men all jumping into the water. Some were being hauled away on their boats. The vast majority had been slaughtered. Just as Huang An was setting the skiff in motion, Liu Tang, on the prow of a craft near the reeds, reached out and caught it with a grappling hook. He bounded on board and grasped Huang An around the middle.
"Struggle is useless," shouted Liu Tang.
The soldiers who tried to swim were killed with arrows. Those who were afraid to take the plunge were captured on their boats.
Liu Tang dragged Huang An to the bank. From the mountain in the distance Chao Gai and Gongsun Sheng approached on horseback, carrying swords and leading a reinforcement of fifty or sixty men, about half of them mounted. Altogether, nearly two hundred of the enemy were taken prisoner. The numerous captured boats were removed to the waterside fortifications at the southern foot of the mountain.
The brigand leaders and their lieutenants proceeded to the stronghold. Chao Gai got off his horse, went into Righteous Fraternity Hall and took his seat. The others removed their armor and weapons and sat down around him. Huang An was tied to a pillar. Gold and silver and silks were distributed among the rank and file as rewards. A count was made of the battle trophies. More than six hundred horses had been seized. That was Lin Chong's work. Du Qian and Song Wan had won the victory on the eastern lake, the three Ruan brothers on the western. Liu Tang had captured the enemy commander Huang An.
The chieftains were very pleased. Oxen and horses were slaughtered and a feast was laid. Home-made fine wine was served, and fresh lotus root and fish from the lake, to say nothing of peaches, apricots, plums, loquats, dates, persimmons and chestnuts from the mountain orchards, as well as chicken, pork, goose and duck, raised domestically in the stronghold.
Congratulations were exchanged all around. For men newly arrived at the fortress to have achieved so complete a victory was no small accomplishment!
As they were drinking, a bandit entered and said: "A messenger from chief Zhu Gui, below the mountain."
Chao Gai had him brought in, and asked what was up.
"Zhu Gui has heard that a party of several score merchants will be passing this way by land, tonight," said the messenger.
"Just when we were running short of gold and silks," said Chao Gai. "Who will lead this raid?"
"How about us?" said the three Ruans.
"Right, good brothers. Be cautious, go quickly and return soon."
The Ruan brothers left the hall. They changed their clothes, tied on their swords, took their halberds, pitchforks and barbed spears, and selected a hundred men. They bade farewell to the leaders in the meeting hall, and went down the mountain. At the Shore of Golden Sands they boarded boats and went across to Zhu Gui's tavern.
Chao Gai was afraid the Ruan brothers couldn't handle it alone. He sent Liu Tang with an additional hundred men to join them.
"Take only the merchants' money and valuables," he admonished Liu Tang as he was leaving. "Their lives must be spared."
Liu Tang departed. When, by the third watch, the raiders hadn't returned, Chao Gai dispatched Du Qian and Song Wan with still another fifty men.
Chao Gai, Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng and Lin Chong drank till dawn. A messenger entered and said: "Thanks to Zhu Gui we've captured twenty carts of money and valuables and nearly fifty mules, donkeys and horses!"
"Was anyone killed?" asked Chao Gai.
"When the merchants saw us coming at them so strongly, they abandoned their carts, animal and baggage and fled. Not one of them was harmed."
Chao Gai was delighted. "We've just come to the stronghold. We mustn't hurt people." He gave the messenger a silver ingot and went down the mountain to the Shore of Golden Sands in a party with wine and fruit. The leaders of the raid were unloading carts and sending the boats back for the captured horses, donkeys and mules.
It was a joyful reunion. After ceremonial cups were drunk, Zhu Gui was summoned to a banquet in the stronghold. Chao Gai and the others returned to Righteous Fraternity Hall and sat around in a circle. Brigands opened bale after bale of captured booty, putting all the silken clothing in a pile on one side, the ordinary merchandise in a pile on the other, and gold and silver and other valuables in the centre.
The chieftains were very pleased at the large haul. They directed the junior officer in charge of the warehouses to store away half of each pile off for future use. The remainder was divided into two parts. One part was split among the eleven chieftains. The rank and file shared equally in the second part.
A distinguishing mark was tattooed on the face of each captured soldier. The stronger prisoners were made grooms and gatherers of fuel, the weaker were put to looking after the carts and cutting fodder. Huang An was locked up in a building in the rear of the fortress.
"When we first came here seeking refuge," said Chao Gai, "we hoped only to become junior officers under Wang Lun. Then Drill Instructor Lin Chong graciously relinquished the leadership to me. Now we have had two unexpected happy events in a row: First, we defeated the government soldiers, captured many men, horses and boats, and took Huang An. Second, we have seized a great deal of gold, silver and other valuables. We owe all this to your talents, brothers."
"Without the auspiciousness of elder brother we would have obtained nothing," the other leaders protested courteously.
"We seven newcomers must thank Clerk Song Jiang and Constable Zhu Tong for being alive today," Chao Gai reminded Wu Yong. " 'The man who does not repay kindness is not human,' as the ancients said. To whom do we owe our present happiness and prosperity? We must send some of our gold and silver to Yuncheng Town. That is a matter of first importance. And Bai Sheng is still in the prison in Jizhou. We've got to save him."
"Don't worry," said Wu Yong. "I have a plan. Although Clerk Song is a noble person and doesn't seek our thanks, we must do our part. As soon as things are a bit more settled here, we'll certainly have one of our brothers go to him. As to Bai Sheng, we'll send someone not known in Jizhou and have him spend a bit of money among the jailers, high and low, to induce them to relax their strictures. That will make it easier for us to get Bai Sheng out. What we should do now is discuss storing grain, building boats, manufacturing tools of war, strengthening our fortifications, building more living quarters, putting our clothing and armor in order, making spears and swords and bows and arrows, and preparing to meet any government attack."
"That's so," said Chao Gai. "We'll follow your advice." Wu Yong provided a division of duties among the leaders. Of that we'll say no more.

*

Nor need we dwell on how Liangshan Marsh prospered from the time Chao Gai came to the fortress. We'll talk rather of the soldiers who escaped and returned to Jizhou. They told the prefect that the brigands had captured Huang An and wiped out his troops, that the men of the stronghold were very brave, that no one could get near enough to arrest them. The area was a maze of waterways and paths, they reported. Winning a battle there was impossible.
The prefect could only lament to the Premier's special emissary: "Ho Tao went in there first with a large force and was the only one to come back alive—without his ears! He's been resting at home ever since, and still hasn't recovered. All his five hundred men are gone. Then I sent District Garrison Commander Huang An and a senior prefectural police officer with many troops to arrest the bandits, and they too have vanished. Huang An is a prisoner in the fortress, and I don't know how many officers and men have been slaughtered. We can't beat those brigands! What am I going to do?" His insides were being torn by conflicting thoughts but he had no solution.
Just then a lieutenant entered and announced: "A new prefect is approaching the East Gate reception pavilion. I have rushed here to report."
The prefect got on his horse and hurried to the reception pavilion outside the East Gate. From the cloud of dust still hanging there, it was apparent the new official had already arrived and dismounted. The prefect went into the pavilion and met his successor. The latter handed him documents under the imprint of the Council of Administration ordering his replacement by the new prefect. After reading them, the prefect and his successor went to the prefecture where the prefect turned over the seals of office and all monies and grain formerly in his charge. He then laid a welcoming feast for the new official, and told him about his troubles with the bandits in Liangshan Marsh, and how they had just destroyed a large government expedition.
The face of the new prefect turned the colour of clay. "So it was for this Premier Cai raised me in rank," he said to himself. "What a place he's given me, and what an office! No strong soldiers, no able commanders. How am I supposed to apprehend those bandits? Suppose the rowdies come here demanding grain? What am I going to do?"
The next day, the former prefect packed his belongings and departed for the Eastern Capital, to await his punishment. Of him we'll say no more.
After taking office, the new prefect sent for the new garrison commander and they discussed a campaign against the mountain stronghold. They would replenish their troops, buy more horses, store fodder and grain, recruit men who were clever and bold. The prefect wrote to the Council of Administration, requesting that neighbouring prefectures be directed to give all possible aid. At the same time he issued an order to the counties under him to join in the hunt and keep a close watch on their borders. No more of that need be said.

*

When the prefectural order was received in Yuncheng, the magistrate directed his clerk Song Jiang to relay the instructions to the county's subordinate townships. Song read the document and was shocked.
"I never dreamed Chao Gai and the others would go so far," he said to himself. "They've robbed the birthday gifts, killed policemen, injured Inspector Ho Tao, annihilated many soldiers and horses, and are holding Huang An in their fortress! For such crimes whole families and relatives to the ninth degree of consanguinity can be executed. They may have been forced into it but the facts stand. Legally, they have no excuse. If anything should go wrong, they'll be in a terrible fix."
He brooded for a time, then told his assistant Zhang Wenyuan to draw up instructions and make the prefectural order known to the various townships and villages.
Song Jiang left the office. Before he had gone thirty paces, a voice hailed him from behind: "Clerk Song!"
He turned around. There was Grandma Wang, the matchmaker, with another woman. "You're in luck," she said to her companion. "This is our charitable clerk."
"What did you want to see me about?" asked Song.
Grandma Wang blocked his way. She pointed at the other woman. "Her family is from the Eastern Capital, they're not local people. Just three of them—her husband Old Yan, her daughter Poxi, and herself. Old Yan used to be a singer, and he taught Poxi many ballads. She's only eighteen, quite pretty, too. They came here to Shandong to join the household of an official they knew but they couldn't find him. They drifted around and ended up in Yuncheng. But people here don't care much for music and entertainment, and they haven't been able to make a living. They have a flat in a quiet lane behind the magistracy. Yesterday, Old Yan fell ill of the epidemic and died but his wife has no money to bury him. She doesn't know what to do, and she's asked me to find a man to keep Poxi. 'Where can I find anybody who would be so good at a time like this?' I said. I didn't know where to borrow money for her, either. It looked hopeless. Then I saw you, and I hurried after you with Madame Yan. Have pity on her. Help her buy a coffin."
"So that's it," said Song Jiang. "You two come with me. I'll borrow a pen and ink at that tavern at the end of the lane and write a note to the coffin shop in the east part of town." And he asked: "Have you living expenses?"
"We can't even afford a coffin," said Madame Yan. "Where would we find living expenses?"
"Then I'll give you ten ounces of silver."
"You are my parents reborn! I'd gladly serve as a donkey or a horse to repay you!"
"No need to talk like that." Song Jiang gave the widow a silver ingot and departed.
She took the note to the coffin shop, selected a casket, returned home and arranged for the funeral. When it was over, she still had five or six ounces of silver left that she and her daughter kept for their living expenses. Of that we'll say no more.
One day, Madame Yan came to thank Song Jiang, and she observed that he had no woman in the house. Later, she asked her neighbour, Grandma Wang, about it.
"Doesn't he have a wife?"
"I know his home is in Song Family Village but I've never heard any mention of a wife. He works here as county clerk and has only temporary quarters. He's always handing out money for coffins and medicines, and helping people in distress. I doubt if he's married."
"My daughter is a good-looking girl. She can sing and knows all sorts of amusing games. When she was little and we lived in the Eastern Capital she used to wander around the brothels. All the managers thought she was adorable. One or two famous courtesans several times offered to buy her. But I wouldn't agree, because there was only my husband and myself at home and no son to support us in our old age. I never thought Poxi would suffer as a result. When I went to thank Clerk Song the other day I noticed he had no wife around. I wish you'd tell him for me—if he wants a woman. I'll be glad to give him Poxi. He was very charitable to me, with your help. I have no other way to thank him but this much I can do."
The next day, Grandma Wang went to Song Jiang and broached the subject. At first he refused. But he was no match for the marriage broker's eloquence, and finally he consented. He took a house in the western part of town, bought some furnishings, and installed Poxi and her mother. In less than half a month, Poxi was draped in silks and her hair was studded with precious ornaments. Not long after, even Madame Yan had a certain amount of finery. Poxi was living in luxury.
In the beginning, Song Jiang slept with her every night. But gradually, he came to the house less frequently. Why? Well, Song Jiang was a chivalrous man whose main interest was skill with weapons. Sex had only a moderate appeal. Poxi was a frivolous girl of eighteen or so, in the bloom of youth. She was quite dissatisfied with Song Jiang.
One day he brought his assistant Zhang Wenyuan over to have some wine. Zhang was a handsome young fellow, with dark brows, fine eyes, white teeth and ruby lips. Fond of the houses of pleasures, he was something of gadabout, and had learned all the romantic mannerisms. Besides which he was an accomplished musician and could play all the stringed instruments and woodwinds.
Poxi, an entertainer who loved to drink and frolic, was attracted to Zhang the moment she laid eyes on him. She kept giving him emotion-laden glances. Zhang, an enthusiastic drinker and ladies' man, of course understood the girl's suggestive signals. Afterwards, he called when Song Jiang was not at home, pretending to be looking for him. Poxi asked him to stay to tea. They talked of this and that, and suddenly they were lovers.
Who could have expected that from then on the two would burn so hotly that Poxi was left without a particle of affection for Song. She spoke harshly to him whenever he called and never sought to dally with him. Song was a soldierly man who cared little for women. So his visits dwindled to once every ten days or half month.
The lovers stuck together like glue. Zhang came every night and left with the dawn. All the neighbours knew about it, and word finally reached Song's ears. He only half believed the report.
"Anyhow," he thought, "she's not a real wife formally chosen by my father and mother. If she's lost interest in me, what do I care? I'll just stop going." More than a month went by and he did not call. Madame Yan sent an invitation but he wouldn't go. He claimed he was too busy.
To speak of another matter, on leaving the magistracy one day towards evening, Song Jiang went into the shop across the street and sat down to have some tea. A big fellow, dripping sweat and breathing hard as he walked, was gazing at the magistrate's office. He was wearing a broad-brimmed white felt hat and a silken gown of dark green, with leggings and knee-guards and sandals of hemp, a sword at his waist and a large pack on his back.
The man was clearly hesitant about something. Song Jiang got up and followed. The man had gone about thirty paces when he turned around and stared at Song Jiang. He showed no signs of recognition but to Song he looked familiar.
"Now where have I seen that fellow before?" he mused. For the moment he couldn't recall.
A gleam of recognition came into the man's eye. He stopped and looked at the clerk but didn't have the courage to speak.
"What's the matter with the fellow? Why is he staring at me like that?" thought Song Jiang. He too couldn't bring himself to ask.
The man went into a barber shop. "Can you tell me the name of that official outside, brother?" he queried.
"That's Clerk Song Jiang," the barber replied.
Halberd formally in hand, the man approached Song Jiang and hailed him respectfully. "Don't you remember me, sir Clerk?"
"You look very familiar."
"Let's walk a bit, and talk."
Song Jiang led him into a quiet lane.
"That tavern might be better," the man suggested.
The two entered the tavern and went upstairs and sat down in a secluded room. The man rested his halberd, removed his pack and placed it under the table. Then he dropped to his knees and kowtowed.
Song Jiang hastily returned the courtesy. "May I ask your name, sir?" he said.
"Benefactor," the man replied, "how could you have forgotten your younger brother?"
"Who are you? You really do look familiar but I don't remember."
"I'm Liu Tang, known as the Red-Haired Demon. I had the honour of meeting you in Ward Chief Chao's manor. You saved our lives."
Song Jiang was startled. "Brother," he cried, "you're very rash. It's lucky no policeman has seen you, or you might be in serious danger!"
"Even if it meant my life, I had to thank you!"
"How are Ward Chief Chao and the others? Who sent you here?"

"Brother Chao is very grateful to you for saving his life. He feels he must express his thanks. He's now the highest leader of our stronghold on Mount Liangshan. Wu Yong is military adviser of our army. Gongsun Sheng also controls military affairs. Lin Chong gave us full support, and destroyed Wang Lun. He, and the three who were originally there—Du Qian, Song Wan and Zhu Gui—plus us seven make a total of eleven leaders. We have a force of nearly eight hundred men, and grain without measure. There is no way we can repay you for your great benevolence but I have been sent with a letter and a hundred ounces of gold as a token of our thanks to you and Constable Zhu Tong."

Liu Tang opened his pack, produced a letter and gave it to Song Jiang. The clerk read it, then drew a pouch from inside his gown. Liu Tang also took a bundle of gold from the pack and placed it on the table. Song chose only a single gold bar, wrapped it in the letter and put both in the pouch that he again concealed beneath his gown.

"Cover the gold up, brother," he said. He called a waiter to bring wine, a platter of beef, some vegetable dishes and fruit, and to pour the wine for his guest.

Day was drawing to a close when Liu Tang finished drinking. The waiter went out. Liu Tang again opened the bundle of gold on the table. Song Jiang stopped him.

"Listen to me, brother. You seven have just gone to the mountain stronghold. It's time when you can use money. I have a family income I get along on. Keep the rest of this gold for me in the fortress. I'll come for it when I need it. You see I'm not refusing—I've taken one bar. Zhu Tong also has family property. You don't have to give him anything. I'll tell him of your good intentions and that will be enough. I won't ask you to stay the night, brother. If you were recognized it would be no joke. Tonight there will be a bright moon and you'll be able to get back to the stronghold. Don't hang around here. Give my best regards to the leaders and say I hope they'll forgive me for not coming to congratulate them in person."

"We shall never be able to repay you, brother, for your enormous kindness but I have been sent specially with this small token of our appreciation. Ward Chief Chao is our chieftain and Wu Yong is our military adviser. They have ordered me to deliver the gold. How can I take it back? I'll definitely be reprimanded."

"Since your discipline is so strict, I'll write a letter, explaining that you can give them."

No matter how Liu Tang pleaded, Song Jiang remained unyielding. He had the waiter bring pen and paper, wrote a detailed letter and made Liu Tang place it in his pack. Liu Tang was a straightforward fellow. When he saw that Song Jiang was determined not to accept the gold, he wrapped it up and put it away.

It was getting late. "Since you have a reply, brother," said Liu Tang, "I'll deliver it tonight."

"If I don't keep you, you understand why."

Liu Tang bowed four times. Song Jiang summoned the waiter.

"This gentleman is leaving an ounce of silver. I'll drop in tomorrow to settle accounts."

Liu Tang shouldered his pack, picked up his halberd and followed Song Jiang down the stairs. They walked together from the tavern to the end of the lane. Dusk had fallen and a full moon rode in the sky. Song grasped Liu Tang's hand. "Be careful, brother. Don't come here again. There are too many police. It's dangerous. I won't see you off any further. We'll say goodbye here." Liu Tang strode away in the moonlight, heading west. That same night he returned to Liangshan Marsh.

*

As Song Jiang walked slowly back to his quarters, he thought: "How fortunate that none of the police spotted him! That really would have put the fat in the fire!" then he mused: "So Chao Gai has turned brigand. And he's doing things in a big way!"

He had made only a couple of turns through the streets when a voice hailed him from behind. "Where've you been, Sir Clerk? I've been looking all over for you." He looked around, and started in surprise. And as a result, the clerk's timidity turned to courage, and his kindly nature became fierce.

Now Lin Chong, having killed Wang Lun and still holding the dagger in his hand, gestured to the onlookers and said: "I, Lin Chong, former instructor of the imperial guard, here present because I was unjustly banished, declare that today I deliberately sought a quarrel with Wang Lun for this reason: when these good men asked to join our band Wang Lun rejected them on a false pretext, owing to his narrow-mindedness and meanness of heart. It was on this account that I quarrelled with him, not because I had designs on his position. Whatever natural ability I may be possessed of, I am not the kind to confront authority or confound the evil counsellors and traitors who surround a leader. But now here is our brother, Chao Gai, a man of known integrity and generosity, richly endowed with both courage and wisdom, whose name none can hear without wishing to serve him. I hereby propose, for the sake of our great cause, that we instate him as leader and chief of this mountain fortress. How say you?"

All present shouted: "These words are good!"

But Chao Gai said: "No, I cannot accept. There is a saying, 'A strong guest seeks not power over his host.' Whatever strength I may have, I am only a newcomer here, a stranger. How can I usurp power?"

But Lin Chong held out his arms, inviting Chao Gai to assume the throne. "The matter has been decided," he said. "You cannot refuse. And if any here disagrees, let him look carefully at Wang Lun." At the third or fourth invitation, Chao Gai was prevailed upon to accept. Lin Chong ordered everyone to prostrate themselves in front of the pavilion. Then he ordered some of the men to return to the main fortress and organize a banquet, while others removed the body and head of Wang Lun. Men were sent also to go everywhere on the mountain and spread the word that everyone was to assemble in the main fortress.

A sedan was now brought and Chao Gai was carried up to the main fortress accompanied by the others on horseback. On arriving before the Assembly Hall of the Heroes they dismounted and went inside. Chao Gai was helped onto the chief's throne and sticks of incense were lit. Then Lin Chong addressed the assembly as follows: "I am only a rough soldier, my only talent is a certain skill at fencing. I have no learning and no great gifts, no wisdom and no art. Today we of this fortress are most fortunate in welcoming these brave men into our midst. From this time on, right shall triumph, and we must bid farewell to past disorder. Let us also ask the Professor here to be our commander-in-chief, to take charge of our military forces and be responsible for their training and deployment. Let him be second to the chief."

Wu Yong replied: "All my learning was acquired in the village, and I am aware that I have no experience in ordering public affairs and no ability to rescue the world from chaos. Although I have read something of the military classics, the treatises of Sun and Wu, I can boast of no practical achievements in this field. How can I take such a responsibility on myself?"

"It is decided, you cannot refuse," said Lin Chong. So Wu Yong was prevailed upon to take the second place.

"Father Gongsun must take the third place, please," said Lin Chong.

At this point Chao Gai interrupted. "This is impossible," he said. "If everyone is going to cede his place to someone else, then I should be the first to withdraw."

"You've no reason to say that," said Lin Chong. "Father Gongsun is famous throughout the rivers and lakes as a skilled tactician, his manoeuvres can outwit ghosts and spirits and he knows how to summon the winds and the rain. Who can equal him?"

"Although I do possess certain powers," Gongsun Sheng said, "I have no ability to save the world, how can I accept? You should fill that post yourself, Instructor."

"Your miraculous powers were on view in the recent victory over our enemies," said Lin Chong. "A tripod has three legs and it cannot do without any one of them.You must not refuse."

So Gongsun Sheng was obliged to accept the third place. But when Lin Chong continued to efface himself in others' favour, all three objected. "We accepted what you said about a tripod having three legs," they said, "and we didn't refuse the positions you made us take. But if you continue to underrate yourself, we will resign." At their insistence, Lin Chong was obliged to occupy the fourth place. "And now," said Chao Gai, "we must invite chiefs Du and Song to take the next places." But Du Qian and Song Wan would not agree to this either. They insisted that Liu Tang take fifth place, and the Ruan brothers sixth, seventh and eighth places. Du Qian then took ninth, Song Wan tenth, and Zhu Gui eleventh. Thus was the order of precedence among the eleven leaders on Mount Liang arrived at.

Seven or eight hundred men from both sides of the mountain now came to render homage. They waited on either side as Chao Gai addressed them: "You who are assembled here, hear me. Today chief Lin Chong has proposed that I assume the leadership of this mountain fortress. Dr. Wu is to take command of the army, with Father Gongsun as his second-in-command. Instructor Lin will be in charge of all matters relating to the administration of the fortress. The rest of you will continue to carry out your original duties in all areas of the mountain. You must look to the barriers and the lakeside landings, and make sure there are no gaps in the defences. I expect every one of you to carry out his duties with the utmost diligence, in the furtherance of our great cause."

Following this he gave orders for living quarters to be prepared for the Ruan family members. The treasures of the looted birthday convoy — gold and pearls and jewels — were brought up the mountain, together with the money, silk and other valuables saved from Chao Gai's manor. All the lesser chiefs and soldiers received a share of these things in front of the Assembly Hall. Then oxen and horses were slaughtered and an offering made to the spirits of sky and earth, to celebrate these new reinforcements to the group. The feasting continued well into the night, and was resumed again next day, in fact it lasted several days in a row. Following this Chao Gai and Wu Yong met with all the other chiefs to discuss plans. Stores were to be checked and counted, defences repaired and weapons manufactured: sabres, swords, bows and arrows, armour and helmets. All had to be made ready to repel the government troops when they came. Boats of all sizes must be prepared and the troops trained and drilled in techniques of water-borne combat. Suffice it to say that all were brought to a high pitch of readiness.

Friendship in those days was stronger than gold,
The heart's true commitment was valued of old.
Here in the Marshes, the hero keeps faith,
In the face of adversity, danger and death.

At this time Lin Chong saw that Chao Gai was open and generous, liberal with his wealth and just in all his dealings, and that he always had the well-being of everyone at heart, young and old alike. One day Lin Chong suddenly began to think with longing of the wife he had left in the capital. He did not even know whether she was alive or dead. Accordingly he unburdened himself to Chao Gai: "Ever since I came here I have wanted to bring my wife to join me. But Wang Lun was so unreliable and difficult to get on with that I could never make up my mind to do it. I had to leave her in the capital, and I do not even know if she is still living."

"Dear friend," said Chao Gai, "if your wife remains in the capital, why indeed should you not bring her here? Write her a letter at once and we will send someone down the mountain to deliver it and bring her back here by night. That is clearly what we must do."

Lin Chong wrote the letter straight away and sent two of his most trusted men with it. But two months later they returned and told him: "We went straight to the Eastern Capital, to the district where the Grand Marshal's residence is, and found the house of Instructor Zhang. We inquired about your wife and they told us that Marshal Gao had tried to force a marriage upon her and she hanged herself. This had happened six months earlier. Devastated by the grief and uncertainty, Instructor Zhang fell ill and died two weeks ago. The only survivor is your servant, Jin Er. She is now married and living in her husband's house. We asked the neighbours and they all confirmed these things. As soon as we had verified the facts, we returned to tell you."

Lin Chong shed tears on hearing this report but then he put aside his regrets. Chao Gai and the others also sighed when they heard the news. But from now on life in the mountain retreat settled into a routine: everyday they trained and drilled in order to maintain the troops in a state of absolute readiness for the government attack.

Suddenly one day, when the leaders were holding a meeting in the Assembly Hall, a soldier came tearing up the mountain to report: "The Jizhou governor is sending an army of two thousand men and horses and something like four or five hundred boats. They're assembling at Stonetable. I was sent to report this to you."

Disturbed by this news, Chao Gai immediately called in Wu Yong, the army commander, for discussions. "The government forces are coming. How are we going to repel them?"

"You don't need to worry about this," said Wu Yong, full of confidence. "I am fully prepared for them. Remember the old saying? 'When the floods come, the dykes are ready; when the enemy attack, the army's there to meet them.'" Thereupon he summoned the three Ruan brothers and whispered instructions in their ears: "... it must be done thus ... and thus ...." Then he called Lin Chong and Liu Tang and told them, "You two, now .... like so ... and like so ...." Finally he called Du Qian and Song Wan and gave them their instructions. It was really like in the poem:

Marching to encounter Xiang Yu in the West,
This was the day of the first great test!

Now the Governor of Jizhou had appointed Brigadier Huang An, together with someone from the regional anti-bandit bureau, to head an army of over a thousand infantry and horse. They had commandeered all the boats in the area, and deployed their forces near Stonetable Lake. The army was divided into two, in order to attack and seize the marshes in a pincer movement.

Brigadier Huang An embarked his forces in the boats and with banners waving and enthusiastic cries they headed towards Golden Sands Landing. But as they approached the landing, some mournful notes began to sound, ringing out over the water. "Isn't that a bugle?" Huang An said. When they had stopped the boats to listen, three small craft appeared, far off in the distance. There were only five men to each of them, four of them rowing and one standing in the bows. They all wore crimson scarves on their heads and were dressed in identical red silk doublets. They carried halberds. Everyone in the three boats was dressed the same way. Some of the soldiers who recognized them said to Huang An: "It's the three Ruan Brothers!"

"All together, then," shouted Huang An, "row for me all of you till you burst your lungs, we've got to get those three!" Immediately forty or fifty boats on both sides shot forward, the crews cheering lustily. A signal now rose from the three boats and all three turned tail at once. Brigadier Huang, waving his sabre, shouted "Kill the bastards! I'm offering a big reward!" As the three boats fled, the archers in the pursuing government boats released a shower of arrows. The Ruan brothers reached into the holds of their boats for blue fox pelts to cover themselves for protection against the arrows. The government forces had no other thought but to pursue, and they had covered a mile or so when a small boat which seemed to fly over the water came up with them from behind. "Stop the chase!" the occupants shouted. "Our forces in the other division have been killed and cast in the water, and the boats have all been seized!"

"How the devil could they all have fallen into the hands of the enemy?" Huang An exclaimed.

"We were proceeding by water when we saw two enemy boats in the distance heading towards us. There were five men in each one. We made a big effort to try and catch them but before we had gone two miles, seven or eight boats came out from hidden creeks, surrounding us on all sides. They were armed with crossbows, and the missiles began to drop on us like a swarm of locusts. We tried to turn our boats around but we had got into a very narrow channel, and then twenty or thirty men appeared on either bank, hauling on a rope bristling with bamboo spikes. They were holding this contraption across the channel. As we were proceeding forward to take a closer look, lime bottles and stones began to fall on us like rain. The men could only jump into the water and swim for their lives. We managed to escape and make it to the bank but when we looked for our contingent on the bank they were nowhere to be seen. The brigands had grabbed all the horses and the sentries were all lying dead in the water! We managed to find this small boat in the reeds and came to tell you what has happened."

Huang An was horrified and ceaselessly cursed his fate. A white flag was run up, as a signal to his forces to end the chase and return at once. But no sooner had the boats turned, than the three boats they had been chasing, and ten more besides, were pursuing them! Each of these carried no more than three or four men, who were waving red flags and emitting loud whistles. They seemed to fly over the water!

Huang An was about to deploy his boats to meet the new challenge, when the sound of a ballista was heard among the reeds. The next moment he trembled to see a mass of red flags waving on all sides. A shout arose from the pursuing enemy boats: "Huang An can leave but he'll have to leave his head behind!" Huang An ordered his flotilla forward into the thick of the reeds but boats appeared from the little channels on all sides and peppered them with crossbow bolts. Huang An managed to worm his way out of this forest of missiles but he only had three or four boats left. In a desperate attempt to escape he leapt into a small, fast boat. Looking over his shoulder, he saw all his men plunging into the water and swimming for their lives. Those who remained with the boats were mostly killed. Huang An's fast boat raced ahead but a boat shot out from the reeds. Liu Tang stood in the bows. He grappled Huang An's boat with a boat-hook and jumped on board. Catching Huang An by the waist he cried: "Surrender!" All the soldiers who knew how to swim jumped into the water and were killed by crossbow bolts. Those who didn't dare jump were taken alive in the boats.

Liu Tang dragged Huang An to the bank. In the distance Chao Gai and Gongsun Sheng could be seen riding down from the mountain to meet them, with swords drawn and leading a force of fifty or sixty foot soldiers and twenty or thirty horse. Two or three hundred of the enemy were captured and all the boats that were taken to the harbour south of the mountain.

All the leaders now rode back to the mountain. Chao Gai dismounted and went to sit in the Assembly Hall. The other leaders, still in battle array, seated themselves around him. Huang An was tied to the central pillar. Gold and pieces of cloth were brought and shared out among the soldiers as their reward. The booty was inspected and six hundred good horses were found to have been captured, thanks to Lin Chong's generalship. The engagement in the east channel was carried out by Du Qian and Song Wan; the Ruan brothers were responsible for the engagement in the west channel. The capture of Huang An was Liu Tang's achievement.

There was great rejoicing. Oxen and horses were slaughtered and there was feasting in the mountain retreat. Good wine flowed, and there were fresh lotus roots and fish from the lake, together with fruit from the southern slopes of the mountain, peaches, apricots, plums, pears, loquats, mountain dates, persimmons and chestnuts. There were homebred chickens, pigs, geese and ducks, and many other good things to eat that we will not trouble to detail here. All gave themselves up to celebration. For such a total victory to come to them so soon after their arrival at the mountain retreat was really something out of the ordinary!

Wang Lun's boasting was nothing but a laugh,
For a job of this nature he was never the right stuff.
Wait till the new chief returns from the attack:
Then you'll see Mount Liang is on a new track!

But now, in the midst of the feasting, a soldier came and announced: "There's a messenger from down below, from Captain Zhu." When Chao Gai asked what it was about, he said: "Captain Zhu has learnt that a group of merchants is going to pass this way tonight, around ten of them. He sent me to inform you of this."

Chao Gai exclaimed, "It couldn't come at a better time! We're a bit short of money and silk to pay our expenses. Now, who'll go and encounter them?"

"We will," said the Ruan brothers.

"Good but go carefully. Act swiftly and return early."

The Ruan brothers rushed off to change their clothes and buckle on their swords. They equipped themselves also with cutlasses, pitchforks, and boat-hooks. They collected a hundred or so men, returned to say farewell to the leaders and then set off down the mountain. They embarked at Golden Sands Landing and rowed across to Zhu Gui's inn.

Later, fearing that the Ruans might not be able to manage on their own, Chao Gai sent Liu Tang with another hundred men to join them. He instructed them carefully: "Only take the money and goods, do no harm to the merchants." When by midnight no one had reported back he also sent Du Qian and Song Wan with fifty men.

Chao Gai, Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng and Lin Chong went on feasting till dawn, when a soldier came in and said: "All credit to Captain Zhu! We've taken more than twenty cart-loads of money and valuables, and forty or fifty donkeys and mules!"

"Was anyone killed?" Chao Gai asked.

"Those merchants all abandoned the carts, livestock and baggage and ran for their lives when they saw the way we looked. No one was hurt."

"That's good," said Chao Gai. "We've only just come to the mountain, and we don't want to start off making a bad impression." He took some silver and rewarded the soldier. Then he ordered wine and fruit to be carried down to the foot of the mountain, to meet the others at Golden Sands Landing. Here the leaders were unloading the carts onto the bank. When this was done the boats were ordered back to fetch the livestock. Everyone was very pleased with the results. After drinking a few toasts they sent a messenger to invite Zhu Gui up the mountain for a feast. Everyone went to the Assembly Hall, where they seated them- selves in a circle round Chao Gai. Some soldiers were sent to fetch the booty, and the bundles were opened one by one. Silk and items of clothing were piled on one side, merchandise and other goods on the other, while the money and jewels were piled up in the middle. Then the stores-master was called and ordered to take half of everything and add it to the reserves. The rest was again divided in two, one half to go in equal parts to the eleven leaders, the other to be divided equally among the soldiers, those down below as well as those on the mountain. The recently captured government troops received tattoos on their faces; the strongest were assigned to feeding the horses and chopping wood, the weakest to maintaining the carts and cutting grass. Huang An was locked up in a secure cell at the back of the fortress.

"We are newcomers here," Chao Gai said. "Originally we only thought to escape from trouble and misfortune, and we intended to place ourselves under Wang Lun's orders, accepting just minor posts. But our dear brother here, Lin Chong, has honoured us with his support, and now quite unexpectedly we have had two immense pieces of luck. The first is the defeat of the government forces and capture of so many men, horses and boats, the general, Huang An, included. The second is this last windfall of goods and money. Is not all this proof of the remarkable talents of all of you here present?"

"It proves that we are fortunate to enjoy your reflected glory, brother," they all replied.

But Chao Gai had not finished. "The seven of us owe our very lives," he went on, "entirely to Registrar Song and Sergeant Zhu Tong. The ancients said, 'He who fails in gratitude is no true man.' Let us not forget where our present wealth and fortune come from. We must prepare gifts and send someone with them to Yuncheng. This must have priority over everything else. Then there's the question of Bai Sheng, lying in Jizhou gaol. We must get him out of there."

Wu Yong said, "Don't worry. I have thought about these things. Song Jiang is a man of honour, and certainly isn't expecting to get anything from us but in spite of that we must repay him. As soon as things are more or less settled here on the mountain, we must send someone. As for Bai Sheng, someone must go who won't be recognized, with gifts to buy the favour of officials at all levels. If we can get them to relax their vigilance he'll be able to escape. But now there are some other questions we must discuss: the state of our provisions, the building of more boats, the manufacture of arms, upkeep of walls and defences, adding to the living quarters, the making of clothes and armour, the supply of spears, sabres, bows and arrows. We must be fully prepared for an enemy attack."
"Very well," said Chao Gai, "we rely fully on your prodigious knowledge of military affairs."
Wu Yong then assigned to each of the captains his specific duties and told them to get on with it. Of this no more.
But now we must leave the stronghold on Mount Liang that did indeed flourish after Chao Gai's arrival, and turn to the Governor of Jizhou, who had by now heard from some survivors of Huang An's routed army how the government troops had been destroyed in the Marshes of Mount Liang and Huang An himself captured alive. They had told him, moreover, that the bandits of Mount Liang were fearless and well-organized and that no one was likely to get near them, let alone capture them; that access by water was exceedingly difficult, and that among that maze of small creeks and channels the defeat of the government forces was inevitable.
This tale made the Governor curse his luck. He spoke to the Grand Preceptor's man. "When Inspector Ho led a big force there, he was the only one to return alive, and that was with both his ears cut off. We sent him home to rest and he still has not recovered. Of the five hundred who went with him not one came back. Then I sent Brigadier Huang An to do the job, with an officer from the regional anti-bandit bureau and a large army but now they too have been destroyed. Huang An is being held prisoner on the mountain, and I don't know how many of the troops have been killed. If they could make no headway, I don't know what we can do next!"
The Governor's mind was filled with horrors and he could think of nothing sensible. At this moment his chief of administration appeared and said: "An official is about to arrive at the east gate reception room. You'd better get over there right away."
The Governor leapt onto his horse and reached the east gate just in time to see the cloud of dust settling as the new official dismounted in front of the pavilion. The Governor invited him inside. They exchanged greetings, and the newcomer presented a decree from the office of the Imperial Secretariat announcing his own appointment as governor, replacing the incumbent. The old Governor read it through, and immediately afterwards took the new appointee to the government offices, where he handed over the official seal and the records of the treasury and stores. He also organized a banquet in honour of his successor.
When the ex-Governor explained about the power of the bandits and how they had destroyed the government forces, his successor's face turned ashen. His thoughts ran like this: "The Grand Preceptor has promoted me to this position but what a place and what a job! There aren't any good troops even, or capable generals. However am I supposed to subjugate that band of brigands? … And suppose the brigands were to come here, looking for provisions? What could we possibly do about it? …"
The former Governor packed his clothes and belongings next day and took himself off to the capital to receive his punishment. We say no more of him.
After taking office, the new Governor summoned an officer who had just been transferred to the garrison of Jizhou and made plans for recruiting troops and purchasing horses, obtaining provisions and fodder, and enlisting some reliable men and experienced officers, in order to prepare a force for the capture of the outlaws of Mount Liang. He composed a memorandum for the office of the Imperial Secretariat, requesting that all government offices in the area be advised that they must cooperate in the operations against the bandits, and at the same time circulated his plans to all the districts, warning them to be extremely vigilant. We say no more of this.
Now the registrar of Jizhou sent an order to the Magistracy of Yuncheng, requiring that they should strengthen the town's defences and be on the lookout for attacks by the bandits of Mount Liang. When the Magistrate saw this, he told Song Jiang to have a proclamation read in every village exhorting vigilance. These instructions gave Song Jiang food for thought. "Chao Gai and his friends never realized they were getting themselves into something as big as this. First they robbed the birthday convoy, then they killed some policemen and mutilated Inspector Ho, then they maimed or killed a whole lot of troops, and took Huang An prisoner. These are crimes serious enough to warrant punishment for nine generations! True, they were forced into a corner, and couldn't really have acted otherwise. But from the legal point of view their crimes are beyond pardon. If their luck doesn't hold, it's hard to see what can be done to help them." Weighed down by these oppressive thoughts, he ordered the secretary, Zhang Wenyuan to make copies of the decree for every village and hamlet and see to their distribution.
Song Jiang then left the government offices for a stroll, with no particular aim in mind. He had not gone twenty or thirty paces when he heard someone shouting behind him: "Registrar!" He turned and saw it was old Mrs. Wang, the matchmaker. She had another lady in tow, to whom she now turned and said: "Fate is smiling on you, my dear. Here is our generous registrar!"
"What do you want with me?" Song Jiang asked.
Mrs. Wang put out her hand to detain him and, pointing to her friend, said: "I want to tell you about this good lady, Registrar. She's from the capital, she's not from here. There's three in the family, you see, Mr. Yan, the husband, her daughter, Poxi, and herself. Now the husband, Mr. Yan, was always a good singer, and he taught the daughter, ever since she was little, so that she knows all kinds of pleasant melodies. She's just eighteen, you see, and she's a pretty girl. Well, they all came here to Shandong in order to seek the protection of a certain official but they couldn't find him. That's how they got to be here in Yuncheng. They discovered that people here aren't much interested in music for banquets and light entertainment and that, and they can't manage to make a living. They've taken lodgings in a little back-alley behind the government offices. But then, yesterday, the husband died, from some epidemic or other. And poor Mrs. Yan hasn't even got the money to bury him! She was at her wits end, when she came to me for help. Well, I said to her, 'In these times, how do you expect me to find the money?' There's just nowhere she can go, you know, to borrow money or pawn something. But then, just as we were thinking there was no way out, I saw you coming this way. Well, I told Mrs. Yan we must hurry up and catch you. I just hope you can take pity on her and lend her enough to buy a coffin!"
"I see," said Song Jiang. "You'd better come with me then. I'll ask them for a brush and ink at the inn on the corner, and write you a note which you can take to Chen's, east of the government offices. He'll make you a coffin. By the way, have you got anything to live on?"
"I wouldn't deceive you, Registrar," Mrs. Yan said. "When I haven't got money for the coffin how could I have money for anything else?"
"I'll give you another ten taels of silver then, for your daily expenses," Song Jiang said.
"Heaven bless you, Registrar, you've saved our lives. I'd work like a donkey or a horse, if there were some way to repay you!"
"There's no need for that!" said Song Jiang, taking out a silver ingot and handing it to her.
Song Jiang went home, and Mrs. Yan took the paper to Chen's and got her coffin. She went back and attended to the burial, and in the end there were five or six taels of silver left, on which she and her daughter were able to live for a while. No more of this.
One fine morning, this Mrs. Yan went to thank Song Jiang, and she happened to observe that there was no sign of a woman about the house. On returning home, she made some inquiries of her neighbour, Mrs. Wang.
"There doesn't seem to be any woman in Registrar Song's house," she said. "Does that mean he isn't married?"
"They say Registrar Song's family home is in the Song village," Mrs. Wang replied. "But I don't know if he has a wife or not. He is only living here temporarily, because of his job as district registrar. He goes around helping people pay for funerals and giving out medicines all the time; he's a real friend to everyone who's in trouble. I should say he isn't married."
"Ah. You know my daughter is a lovely girl," Mrs. Yan said. "She has a lovely singing voice, and she's got all sorts of fetching ways. Even when she was a child, in the Eastern Capital, she was the talk of all the houses of entertainment; there's not one where they didn't love her. Many's the patron who wanted to take her off me but I always said no. We only had her, you see, to look after us in our old age, that's why I didn't want to let her go. I didn't see that it was unfair to her. Anyway, when I went to see Registrar Song the other day, I noticed there didn't seem to be a woman in his home. So I'd like to ask you to talk to him. If he's looking for someone, I'd let him have Poxi, with all my heart. You helped me the other day, and then I'm indebted to Registrar Song for the help he gave me and I've no way to repay him. It would be so nice if we could put it all on a family basis."
Mrs. Wang listened to this, and next day she went to see Song Jiang, to whom she expounded it at length. At first Song Jiang would not hear of it. But a go-between can make the mountains mate, who's to resist her tongue? He consented in the end. He rented a house in a quiet lane in the western district, equipped it with furnishings and kitchen utensils, and installed Poxi and her mother there. Before two weeks were out, Poxi was a fine lady, with pearls and finery to adorn her and silks and satins galore to dress in. Something like this:

Features fair and bearing proud,
A nature sweet and lady-like;
Tresses, spilt in a raven cloud,
A crescent moon the brow's sweet arc.
One's heart leaps up to glimpse beneath
The spotted skirt exquisite feet;
Emotions beyond all words explode,
When emerald sleeves soft hands disclose.
Those eyes like stars are black as lacquer!
That melting breast is white as snow!
A princess escaped through the palace portals!
A goddess come down to dwell with mortals!

In a few days Song Jiang had seen to it that even the mother had new dresses to show off, and on Poxi he truly lavished clothes and food.
At the beginning Song Jiang slept with Poxi every night but later his visits grew less frequent. Why so? Well, you must understand that Song Jiang was a man's man. That is, his true passion was the pursuit of arms; women did not count for much with him. Now Poxi was only eighteen or nineteen years old, in the very flowering of her age. For this reason, Song Jiang's inattentiveness greatly displeased her.
One day Song Jiang inopportunely took a colleague back to drink wine in Poxi's house. This colleague was Zhang Wenyuan, who was the secretary in charge of public notices, employed in the same office as Song Jiang. Zhang Wenyuan, whom everyone called Third Brother Zhang, was a handsome fellow, with splendid eyes and fine eyebrows, flashing teeth and sensual lips. He was a great frequenter of the pleasure-gardens, and a follower of the floating life. Along with his confident style and flamboyant looks, he was also a fine musician, master of every stringed instrument you could name.
Now, Poxi, remember, had been brought up as a singer in the cabarets. The moment she set eyes on Zhang, her heart leapt within her, and she resolved to have him. She began by casting significant looks in Zhang's direction, and when Song Jiang got up to go and wash his hands, these were supplemented by suggestive words. As the saying is, "If the wind doesn't blow, the trees won't sway; when the boat doesn't disturb it, the water is clear." A libertine like Zhang, how could he fail to understand this kind of thing? When he saw how Poxi was ogling him, with all her feelings hung out on show, he took good note. He returned later, when Song Jiang was out, pretending that he had come to look for Song Jiang. Poxi insisted he should stay and take tea. There was talk, and more talk, and then it was done! Who could have known that the moment Poxi arranged matters with Third Brother Zhang she would wax as hot as a coal from the fire? But then, Zhang was an expert in these affairs. Well, you know what they say, if you don't want trouble, don't go looking for it! All this befell because Song Jiang — a thousand times foolish, a million times foolish — took this Zhang home for a drink, that's what gave her the opportunity to take a fancy to him. Remember the old saying, "Affairs of the heart can start with tea, and wine's a famous bawd"? Well that's the rule Song Jiang failed to note. Once Poxi and young Zhang got together, she hadn't even half a kind thought to spare for Song Jiang. From now on when Song Jiang paid her a visit, all he got was insults, never the least attempt to please him. However, Song Jiang, as we said, was a man's man: he didn't think this woman's charms worth losing sleep over, so he took to going there only once or twice a month.
So now these two, Zhang and Poxi, were stuck to each other like glue or lacquer, from night till morning; all the neighbours knew about it. Eventually some rumours blew into Song Jiang's ears. Half believing and half doubting, Song Jiang said to himself: "After all, she's not a real wife chosen by my father and mother, so if she doesn't care for me, what's the point in bothering her? The best thing is just to stay away." And from then on he let several months go by without a visit. Mrs. Yan wore herself out sending messages to invite him; Song Jiang simply said he was busy and didn't go. That's the way it is:

A girl in her bloom would follow the running brook;
A good man's heart isn't set on blooms that fade.
Matrons love money, young women fall for a look;
Love is but pedlar's wares, a treacherous trade.

Here the story divides. One day Song Jiang had left the Magistracy at dusk and gone to sit in a teahouse to order tea. From here he happened to observe the arrival of a tall stranger, wearing a white felt cap in the Fanyang style, a dark-green silk doublet, his legs encased in gaiters with knee-guards, and hemp sandals with eight buckles on his feet. A dagger was stuck in his belt, and he carried a heavy pack on his shoulders. He had been walking so fast he was covered in sweat and panting for breath. His gaze was turned towards the government offices. Thinking there was something very strange about this fellow's movements, Song Jiang quickly rose and left the teashop and began to follow him. After going some twenty or thirty paces, the stranger turned and looked straight at Song Jiang but appeared not to know him. Song Jiang also regarded the stranger, and thought there was something familiar about him. "Now where have I seen that fellow before? Could it be …?" he wondered but for the moment left this thought in the air. Noting Song Jiang's interest, the stranger returned his look, and also seemed to remember something. He stood there looking at Song Jiang but could not bring himself to approach him. "This fellow is behaving very oddly indeed!" Song Jiang thought to himself. "Why does he keep staring at me?" But neither could Song Jiang make up his mind to speak. At this point the stranger went over to a barber's stall beside the road and said, "Friend, who is that official over there?"
"That's Registrar Song," the barber replied.
Immediately, gripping his halberd, the stranger approached Song Jiang and greeted him respectfully: "Your Honour! Don't you recognize your younger brother?"
"Certainly your face is familiar, my friend," Song Jiang replied.
"Will you come with me, please?" the other said. "I would like to talk to you."
Together they drew aside into a quiet lane. "This inn looks a good place for a quiet talk," the stranger said.
The two of them went upstairs. They chose a secluded alcove and sat down. The stranger set down the halberd and took off his pack and thrust it under the table. He then threw himself down in front of Song Jiang, in humble greeting. Song Jiang hurriedly returned his courtesy and said: "May I venture to inquire your name, sir?"
"Benefactor, have you really forgotten me?" said the stranger.
"Who are you?" Song Jiang asked. "Certainly your face is familiar but I'm afraid I just can't remember."
"I had the honour to meet you at the house of Mr. Chao," the other replied, "when you saved my life. I am Liu Tang, the Red-Haired Devil."
Song Jiang received a great shock. "My dear fellow, what a risk you are taking! Lucky no constable has seen you, there could have been a disaster!"
"If I can show my gratitude, I've no fear of dying," Liu Tang said. "I came especially to give you our thanks."
"How are Mr. Chao and the other friends?" Song Jiang asked. "Did someone send you?"
"Our leader, Chao Gai humbly greets you," Liu Tang said. "You saved his life and now he is chief of the retreat on Mount Liang. Dr. Wu Yong is commander of the army, and Gongsun Sheng is his deputy. Lin Chong has thrown all his weight behind them and has eliminated Wang Lun. Altogether, with Du Qian, Song Wan and Zhu Gui who were already members of the band, and the seven of us, we are now eleven leaders. At present we have about seven or eight hundred men in the stronghold and a vast supply of provisions. Chao Gai has not forgotten your great kindness but he did not know how to repay you. He sends me with a letter and with a hundred taels of gold in token of his gratitude. Afterwards I am to go to thank Sergeant Zhu and Sergeant Lei."
Liu Tang opened his pack and took out a letter which he gave to Song Jiang. Song Jiang read the letter, and then undid his doublet and pulled out a purse, while Liu Tang took out the gold and put it on the table. Song Jiang took just one piece of gold and wrapped it in the letter; he then put them into the purse that he returned to the pocket inside his doublet. "My friend," he said, "take that gold back where it came from." Calling the innkeeper, he ordered wine, a big plate of sliced meat, and a selection of vegetables and fruit. He told the server to pour wine for Liu Tang.
Daylight was fading. After drinking, Liu Tang opened the bag on the table and was about to take out the gold. Song Jiang hurriedly stopped him, saying: "My friend, listen. Now that the seven of you have just joined the mountain stronghold, you are particularly in need of money, whereas I have enough to live comfortably. Take that back to the stronghold, and if I need financial assistance I will send my younger brother Song Qing to ask for it. So that you won't think that I am spurning your friendship, I have taken one piece in token. Sergeant Zhu also has money of his own, and you don't need to give him any. I will convey your feelings to him. As for Lei Heng, he doesn't know I went to warn Mr. Chao; what is more, he is a gambler, and if he should happen to use the money at the tables it could really stir things up, so whatever you do don't give any gold to him. Dear friend, I can't ask you to stay the night with me because some one might recognize you, and that wouldn't be at all funny. But there should be bright moonlight tonight, so you will be able to make the journey back to the mountain retreat. You shouldn't hang around here. Please tell the other chiefs how grateful I am, and beg them to forgive me for not coming to say it in person."
"But we're indebted to your kindness forever," Liu Tang said. "I was specially sent to convey our feelings and bring you this little present, as a mark of those feelings. With Mr. Chao as chief, and with Wu Yong commanding the troops, discipline's much tighter than before. I daren't return like this. I'd have to answer for it in the camp, that's for sure!"
"Since your regulations are so strict," Song Jiang said, "I shall write a note for you to give them. That will make it all right."
Liu Tang implored Song Jiang to accept the gift but Song Jiang would not agree. He took some paper and borrowed a brush and inkstone, and produced a neatly written reply that Liu Tang carefully concealed about his person.
Liu Tang had a straightforward nature: when Song Jiang refused like this, he assumed it was because Song Jiang didn't want to accept, so he took the gold and wrapped it up as before. Then, seeing that it was dusk, he said: "Since you have written a reply, I will go back right away this evening."
"My friend," Song Jiang said. "I can't retain you here but my heart goes with you."
Liu Tang prostrated himself again four times. Song Jiang called the innkeeper and said, "I am leaving a tael of silver here. I'll come round tomorrow and settle up."
Liu Tang shouldered his pack, took up his halberd, and followed Song Jiang downstairs. Leaving the tavern, they walked together as far as the end of the lane. It was still more or less daylight, and the round disk of the eighth-month moon was climbing the sky. Song Jiang took Liu Tang by the hand and said "Take care not to return, my friend, there are too many police about. I cannot escort you further, we must part here."
It was a bright moonlit night. Liu Tang lengthened his pace and set off westwards; it was the middle of the night when he regained the fortress on Mount Liang. As for Song Jiang, when he left Liu Tang he directed his steps slowly homewards, musing as he went, "Lucky no policeman saw, otherwise it might really have started something!" And again, thinking, "That Chao Gai, he's ended by becoming an outlaw, what a business!" He had only passed a few bends in the road when he heard someone shouting behind him: "Registrar, where have you been? I haven't seen you for days." Song Jiang turned to look. It was Mrs. Yan. Had it not been for this meeting, things would have been very different. Song Jiang would never have exchanged caution for recklessness, benevolence for ferocity.

After killing Wang Lun, Lin Chong pointed his broad sword towards the men and said, "I was previously an officer in the army but had been banished. Today these heroes came to join our band but Wang Lun was narrow-minded, and jealous of them so that he wished them to go away. Therefore I killed him, and I did this not because I wanted to be your chief. But if in the future you wish to fight the army and those vile ministers at the capital I am afraid that my courage and strength will not be of much use. Now we have Chao Gai whose wisdom and bravery are known all over the empire. Today I fought for our rights, and now propose that he should be our chief. Do you agree to that?"
"What you say is quite right," said the men.

"That won't do," said Chao Gai. "An ancient proverb says, 'However strong the guest should not try to overthrow his host.' As I have just come from a distant place how could I be your chief?"
Lin Chong gently pushed Chao Gai into the chair, and said, "Our business is now finished so do not decline the offer. If there are any men who oppose us we shall treat them in the same way as we treated Wang Lun." After much pressing he got Chao Gai to take the seat. He then shouted out that everybody must assemble outside and make obeisance to Chao Gai. After doing this the bandits went to prepare a feast. He then told some of the men to remove Wang Lun's body. He also sent some men to summon all the minor leaders to meet at the assembly hall. Lin Chong and the others asked Chao Gai to mount his horse, and the whole company then mounted horses or rode in sedan chairs to the assembly hall. Upon entering the hall they got Chao Gai to take the seat of honour, and then brought in an incense urn which they placed in the centre of the hall.
Lin Chong came forward and said, "I am only a coarse fellow with a little knowledge of how to use the cudgel and lance. I am without learning or ability. Very luckily these heroes have come to our mountain stronghold today. We now all understand the justice of our cause, and therefore we must improve on what has been done here before. As we have Wu Yong here I suggest that we make him the second-in-command, and assign him the duties of adviser controlling both troops and their officers, and also arranging plans of strategy."
"I was only a teacher in a village," said Wu Yong, "and I am afraid that I have not the ability to assist you in military affairs. Although I have some knowledge of the strategems of Sunzi's and Wuzi's Art of War (B.C. 4th and 6th century) I yet have done nothing great so how can I become second in command?"
"Our business is now complete," said Lin Chong, "so do not let us be too polite."
Wu Yong thereupon took the seat of the second-in-command.
"Now Gongsun Sheng must take the position of third-in-command," said Lin Chong.
"This will not do," said Chao Gai. "If there is any more of this politeness I shall resign from the leadership."
"You are wrong," said Lin Chong. "Gongsun Sheng is capable in commanding soldiers, and even the spirits do not know his plans. Where is there a man who can control the wind and rain as he does?"
"I have only a few small tricks," said Gongsun Sheng, "and they are not of much help so how dare I become the third-in-command? You ought to occupy that position."
"We have just beaten our enemies," said Lin Chong, "but we know that it was due to your excellent plan. An incense urn has three legs and is useless without the third, so I hope that you will accept the position of the third-in-command."
Gongsun Sheng took his seat as the third-in-command.
"Lin Chong then started to urge another man to take the fourth seat but the three leaders objected and said, "You pointed out that an incense urn should have three legs, and therefore we accepted the three highest positions, and if you persist in urging for a fourth we shall retire from office." They induced Lin Chong to accept the position of fourth-in-command. They then invited Song Wan and Du Qian to take the next positions. But both men were not willing to accept. After a great deal of talk it was agreed, at last, that Liu Tang should be fifth; Ruan the Second, the sixth; Ruan the Fifth, the seventh; Ruan the Seventh, the eighth; Du Qian the ninth; Song Wan the tenth; and Zhu Gui the eleventh. This was how the eleven commands at Liangshan Marsh were arranged. At that place there were about eight hundred bandits, and they assembled in two large bodies and saluted their new leaders.
Chao Gai addressed them saying, "I have been invited by Drill Instructor Lin Chong to occupy the position of commander of your stronghold, with Wu Yong as strategist, and Gongsun Sheng as adjutant. Lin Chong and the other leaders control the affairs of this place, and you men must carry on your affairs as before, guarding the barriers and banks. We must now be all united and with one mind, and must maintain our cause of justice." He then gave orders for the houses to be repaired, and arranged for the use of the families they had brought there. He instructed some of the bandits to fetch the birthday presents seized at the Huangni Ridge and also the valuables from his own village and he divided them among the bandits and their leaders as rewards.
Cows and horses were killed to provide meat for an offering to the spirits of Heaven and Earth, and celebrate their success. They all had a feast, and the leaders only separated until well after midnight.
The celebrations and feasting continued for several days.
Chao Gai, Wu Yong, and the other leaders then held conferences to consider their food supplies in the granaries, repairs to the defence works and embankments, the making of all kinds of accoutrements including spears, swords, bows and arrows, mailed armor, and helmets, so as to be prepared for an attack from the army. They also got their fleet of boats in order, and drilled the men in fighting on water.
One day Lin Chong saw that Chao Gai was so generous in making arrangements for the families brought to the mountain and happened to think of whether his wife at the Eastern Capital was living or not so he decided to tell his affairs to Chao Gai. He said to him, "Ever since I have been here I have had a desire to bring my wife to this place but as Wang Lun's disposition made our future uncertain I hesitated to carry out my plan until now. I do not even know whether she at the Eastern Capital is alive or not."
"Then why not go to the Eastern Capital and bring her here?" said Chao Gai. "You write a letter, and I will at once send a messenger with it."
Lin Chong wrote a letter the same day, and selecting two reliable men he dispatched them with it. In less than two months the men returned and said to Lin Chong, "We arrived at the Eastern Capital, and near the commander-in-chief's headquarters we found the home of Drill Instructor Zhang where we inquired about your wife, and were informed that Marshal Gao Qiu had arranged a marriage with her by force. She had committed suicide about half a year ago. Drill Instructor Zhang had grieved so much that he became sick and also died about half a month ago. The maidservant Jin Er being left alone had married a man, and they now lived at that house. We got all this confirmed by our close inquiries of the neighbours. Being satisfied as to the reliability of these statements we came back here to report to you."
Upon hearing this Lin Chong wept. Chao Gai and the other leaders were very sorry for Lin Chong when they heard the news.
We need not say anything further about the stronghold except that everyday the soldiers were drilled, and got ready to resist an attack from the army.
It happened however that on a certain day while the leaders were discussing matters in the assembly hall, a bandit came and reported that about two thousand soldiers had arrived from Jizhou Prefecture, and were encamped at the Shijie Village where they had about five hundred boats.
Chao Gai was startled upon hearing this, and turning to Wu Yong, his military strategist, asked him, "As the army has arrived how do you suggest that we should meet them?"
The Prefect at Jizhou had instructed the garrison commander Huang An together with the Inspector to take a thousand soldiers, and collect boats from all over the district which were to proceed from the lake of the Shijie Village to Liangshan Marsh by two main routes. Huang An embarked his soldiers and horses on the boats, and with much shouting and fluttering of flags set out for the Jinsha Bank. When approaching that place they heard strange sounds coming from the water. Huang An asked, "Is not that sound from battle horns? Stop the boats!" Looking around they saw in the distance three boats coming towards them. On each boat were four men pulling at two large sculls, and one man standing alone. The man standing wore dark crimson caps, and had red gauze coats, and they each were armed with a spear having a hook behind the head. The men who were sculling were all dressed alike. A man recognized the three men and told Huang An that they were the three brothers Ruan.
"You men must all work together and arrest those three men," ordered Huang An.
About fifty boats started off to arrest the brothers, the soldiers making a great noise. But a whistle was heard and immediately the three boats turned round. Huang An was standing on the leading boat twirling his spear and cried out, "Kill these thieves! I will reward you handsomely!"
The three boats in front received a shower of arrows from the boats behind. The three men descended into the holds of their boats, and brought forth a fox skin which they placed at the sterns of the boats as shields. The boats behind kept chasing after them. When they had gone about a //a small fast boat overtook Huang An's boat, and reported, "We must not pursue! The boats that were following the other route have all been seized, and the men killed."
"How is it that our men were entrapped by those thieves?" asked Huang An.
The man on the swift boat replied, "While we were proceeding with our boats we saw two boats in the distance with five men on each. We pursued them. When we had gone about a //we saw about eight small boats emerge from anchorages on four sides of us. The boats were armed with crossbows, and fired arrows like a cloud of locusts. Our boats turned and retreated but when we got to the narrow mouth of the creek we found about thirty men on each bank, and they had fastened a split bamboo rope across the entrance. When we got up to the rope the men on the bank threw a shower of bottles of lime and stones at us. Our men realizing the dangerous position they were in. all jumped into the water. We reached the bank, and could see neither horses nor men there. All the men in charge of the horses had been killed in the water. Among the reeds we found a small boat so we hurried here to report the matter to you.'
Huang An was upset when he heard this, and taking the white flag signaled to his fleet to stop the pursuit and return. All the boats turned. But before retreating, they saw that accompanying the three boats were now more than ten others with about five men on each who displayed a red flag, and whistled with their fingers, and were approaching at great speed. Huang An was thinking of meeting the attack by spreading out his boats but just then he heard in the reeds on the bank the sound of explosives being fired. He then noticed that on the banks on every side were red flags, and he became much agitated.
The pursuing boats were now close and a voice from them called out, "Huang An, leave us your head before you go."
Huang An took the scull, and forced the boat to the bank. Just then about fifty boats emerged from the small creeks on either hand. They were armed with crossbows that discharged a hail of arrows. In this shower of arrows Huang An was trying to find a way of escape. He had only about four boats left. He jumped into a small fast boat and looking round saw that his men one by one plunged into the water. His boats were seized, and more than half of the men who were aboard them were killed. Huang An was sculling his boat but he had not gone far when he saw near the bank a boat on which was Liu Tang who reached out a hook to draw Huang An's boat and alighted upon it. He seized Huang An by the waist, and shouted out, "Don't struggle!" The soldiers who could swim had now all been killed by the arrows from the crossbows and those who could not swim had been captured alive aboard. Liu Tang dragged Huang An to the bank. In the distance they saw Chao Gai and Gongsun Sheng mounted on horses, armed with swords, leading a party of about sixty men and thirty horses, in reserve at the foot of the hill. About two hundred of Huang An's men were captured alive and these with the boats seized were now taken to the stronghold on the south side of the mountain. All the bandit leaders now came to the headquarters.
Chao Gai dismounted and proceeding up the hill took his seat in the assembly hall. The leaders of the bandits assembled there, and laying down their arms took their seats all around the hall. Huang An was brought in, and tied up to a pillar of the building. A lot of gold, silver, and silk was brought in and divided among the bandits as a reward for their victory. It was reported that Lin Chong had seized altogether about six hundred good horses; that Du Qian and Song Wan had performed good services on the eastern side of the hill; that the three brothers Ruan had done meritorious service on the west side; and that Liu Tang had captured Huang An. The leaders were all much pleased, and orders were given that cows and sheep should be slaughtered, and a feast prepared. There was wine prepared on the mountain by themselves; lotus roots and fresh fish from the lake; fresh peaches, apricots, plums, pears, loquats, dates, persimmons, chestnuts, and other fruits which grew on trees near the lake. Chickens, pigs, geese, ducks, and such fowls which were kept on the hill. We need not go to the details but a fine huge feast was given immediately in celebration of the great victory they had accomplished.
During the feast one of the brigands arrived and reported that a man had been sent there by their leader Zhu Gui. Chao Gai inquired as to his business and the man replied that a large party of travellers would arrive that evening and so he wished to report the matter.
"We are just now short of money for expenses so who will go on this expedition?" asked Chao Gai.
The brothers Ruan offered to go.
"Good brothers," said Chao Gai, "you go quickly and come back soon but be careful."
The brothers Ruan left the hall at once, and changing their clothes, armed themselves with swords, halberds, the arresting-fork (with pliable prongs to fasten on legs, arms, or neck), the spear with a hook behind the head, and selected one hundred men to go with them. They reported their departure to the leaders in the hall, and then descending the hill to the Jinsha Bank where they embarked and crossed over to Zhu Gui's wine shop.
But Chao Gai thought that the three brothers were not capable enough to undertake this enterprise so he ordered Liu Tang to follow them with another hundred men as a reenforcement. He then said to Liu Tang, "It will be very fine if you capture the gold and valuables but I do not want you to kill or injure the travellers."
Liu Tang then departed with his men.
Up to midnight no report had been received as to how matters were progressing, so Chao Gai sent Du Qian and Song Wan to take fifty more men as a further reenforcement.
Chao Gai, Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, and Lin Chong drank wine together till daybreak, and then a soldier arrived who reported that Zhu Gui had captured more than twenty carts loaded with gold, silver, and other valuables, besides fifty donkeys and mules.
"Have they killed any men?" asked Chao Gai.
The soldier replied, "When they saw our threatening aspect they all escaped and left everything behind so that not a single man was killed."
Chao Gai was much pleased at hearing this and said, "Hereafter we must not injure people." He then took an ingot of silver and gave it to the messenger. He gave orders that wine and fruit should be taken down to the Jinsha Bank for the victorious leaders. The leaders also went down the hill, and took the carts carrying the loot on the bank and they instructed boats to be punted across for the horses. All the leaders were much pleased. After drinking some wine a messenger was dispatched to request Zhu Gui to attend a feast at the mountain stronghold.
Chao Gai and the other leaders then went up the mountain to the assembly hall where they took their seats in the spacious easy chairs. He then told the brigands to bring in the booty, and spread it out in the hall. All the silks were piled up in one place; the inferior goods in another place; the gold and silver valuables in the centre. He then instructed the treasurer to take charge of half of the booty, and keep it in the treasury for future use. The other half was to be again divided in half; one part for the leaders and the remainder for the brigands.
Huang An was to be locked up in the prison but all his soldiers were to be branded, and the best men selected to attend to the horses, and gather and cut firewood. The others were to look after the carts, and cut grass for the horses.
Chao Gai said, "Previously we were escaping from danger, and fled to this mountain with the hope of occupying some small rank under Wang Lun but owing to the gracious favour of my worthy brother Lin Chong we were pressed to occupy our present exalted positions. We did not expect so soon to have two such grand affairs, as defeating the army, and seizing a large quantity of men, horses, and boats; and arresting Huang An; and then capturing such a large amount of valuable booty. But was this not due to the fine work of you all?"
The leaders all replied, "It was due entirely to you, our elder brother's good luck."
Chao Gai said to Wu Yong, "All us seven owe our lives to the exertions of Song Jiang and Zhu Tong. The ancients had a saying, 'It is inhuman to forget a generous act.' But where has our present happiness and pleasure come from? We have now plenty of money so I think we ought to send some of it to Song Jiang at Yuncheng County. Again we ought to send a man to Jizhou Prefecture to rescue Bai Sheng from his imprisonment there."
"Sir, do not be anxious," said Wu Yong, "I have a plan. Song Jiang is a just and benevolent man, and he certainly will not expect us to reward him for his services. But we must not be deficient in politeness. We can wait until all the affairs of our mountain stronghold are settled, and then we can send one of our brothers to do the business. In the case of Bai Sheng we can send a man with money to bribe both the higher and lower officials and arrange for his escape from prison. We can now discuss our store of grain; the making of boats; the preparation of more arms; repairing our barriers and defence works; and the building of more houses. We shall put in order our clothes, outer-coats, armor, and make some more spears, swords, bows, and arrows in readiness for another attack from the army."
"All these shall depend on your wise instructions," said Chao Gai.
But we need not go into the question as to what orders Wu Yong gave to all the minor leaders.
We need not mention further how everything prospered at Liangshan Marsh since Chao Gai became the chief there but we will now relate how those soldiers of Huang An who had escaped reported to the Prefect at Jizhou how the army had been defeated and exterminated; and how Huang An had been taken prisoner. They also reported how brave and fierce were the men at Liangshan Marsh; and how difficult it would be to capture them; how difficult it was on the lake to find the way on account of the numerous creeks and anchorages; all this making it impossible for them to be victorious.
The Prefect was distressed upon hearing this, and spoke to the officer from the Prime Minister, "He Tao lost a great many men and horses, and only himself escaped with the loss of both ears. I sent him home to recuperate but so far he has not recovered. I sent five hundred men but they were all lost. I then dispatched garrison commander Huang An with an Inspector and many men but they also have been all lost. We do not know exactly how many have been killed but they could not defeat the bandits, who took Huang An captive."
The Prefect felt so much perplexed and could see no solution of the difficulty. But just then a messenger came in and reported, "There is a new official approaching the town, who will be at the reception hall at the Eastern Gate in a few minutes."
The Prefect immediately mounted his horses, and upon arriving at the East Gate where the reception hall for officials was situated he saw the man dismounting in a cloud of dust. The Prefect dismounted, and entering the arbour saluted the visitor who handed him an appointment from the Imperial government testifying himself to be a new Prefect. He conducted his successor to his yamen where he handed him his seal of office, and then gave him particulars of revenues in the treasury, and food on hand.
He then invited the new Prefect to a feast where he explained how strong the bandits were at Liangshan Marsh, and how his soldiers had been defeated and killed.
When the new Prefect heard this statement of affairs, he turned pale, and without speaking he meditated, "When the Prime Minister Cai, promoted me to Prefect I did not think the position was like this. Here there are no efficient troops, or capable generals so how can I capture these brigands? Should they come here to borrow some grain what could I do?"
The next day the old Prefect was ready with his baggage and left for the Eastern Capital to answer the charges made against him.
Soon after the new Prefect had been at his post he invited a military officer who had just been appointed to take charge of the garrison at Jizhou Prefecture. He then gave orders that the army must be brought up to strength, and the bravest and boldest men must be recruited; horses and grain purchased, and preparations made for another attack upon Liangshan Marsh. He also wrote dispatches to the capital asking them to instruct the surrounding villages to join him in this attack. He also ordered the county magistrates in his prefecture to assist in capturing the brigands, and to suppress any disorder in their districts.
The recording secretary sent the Prefect's dispatch to the magistrate at Yuncheng County instructing the latter to get his defences ready in case of an attack from the bandits at Liangshan Marsh. The magistrate after reading the dispatch gave it to his secretary Song Jiang with an order to write dispatches to all the villages to get their defences ready. When Song Jiang read the dispatch he thought that he never expected Chao Gai and his six followers would do such a big thing as the capture of the birthday presents, killing many soldiers; branding He Tao; imprisoning Huang An, and capturing many soldiers and horses. For such an act their families were liable to be decapitated according to the law. Although they were compelled to do this yet according to the law they could not be pardoned. "If they are not careful what hope is there for them?" He was very sorry but told his clerk Zhang Wenyuan to write the dispatches to all the villages as ordered. When the dispatches had been dispatched Song Jiang left the yamen but he had not gone more than thirty steps when he heard someone behind calling to him. Looking round he saw a matchmaker, Grandma Wang who was accompanied by another old woman who wished to speak to him. Grandma Wang said to her companion, "Now you are lucky, as the clerk who does benevolent things is coming, and you can tell him your business." Song Jiang turning round asked what she had to say to him.
Grandma Wang, however, told the other woman called Madame Yan to keep quiet, and she herself spoke to Song Jiang: "This woman has just come from Eastern Capital, and with herself there were three in the family—her husband and a girl called Yan Poxi. Her husband could sing very well, and taught his daughter Poxi to sing also with him. She is eighteen years old, and has a good colour. They came to Shandong to find a certain gentleman but after wandering about a lot they have failed to find him. Although they can both sing they have not found men of pleasure in this district, and they now live for the time being in an alleyway just behind the yamen. Yesterday her husband was seized with cholera, and died suddenly. She has no money to even bury the corpse so she asked me to help her, and arrange a marriage for her daughter. But I told her that I could not find a suitable man all at once. We were wondering how to borrow some money, when I saw you, so we followed you to ask whether you would provide a coffin for them."
"Follow me to the inn in the alleyway," said Song Jiang, "and there I will give you a letter to Old Chen to provide a coffin for her. But what are you going to do after that?"
"I will not deceive you," said Madame Yan, "I have no means of any kind."
"I will give you ten taels of silver," said Song Jiang.
"You are as generous as a father or mother to us," said Madame Yan, "and we shall have to requite you in some way."
"You need not talk like that," said Song Jiang. So saying he took the silver and gave it to her, and then withdrew and went home.
Madame Yan took the note given to her by Song Jiang, and got a coffin from Chen Sanlang. After the funeral she still had about five taels of silver left to cover further expenses.
Upon a certain morning Madame Yan called at Song Jiang's house to thank him for his kindness, and she noticed that there was no woman in the house so she asked Grandma Wang, the matchmaker, whether Song Jiang had a wife or not.
Grandma Wang replied that Song Jiang's people lived at the Song Family Village but she had not heard that he had a wife. He was the Chief Clerk at the yamen, and lived by himself. She was always hearing that he assisted poor people with coffins, medicine, and food. She thought that he had no wife.
"My daughter is very good-looking," said Madame Yan, "and also sings well and is proficient in amusements. When we lived at the Eastern Capital she was young and she often visited the houses of prostitution where she was much liked. Some heads of these brothels very often asked that my daughter be allowed to join them but I would not agree. Because if we had let her go we should have had nobody to look after us. We did not expect that we should have such misery which has already ruined her future. A few days ago I saw that Song Jiang had no wife in his house so I should be glad if you would tell him that if he would like a wife I should be willing to give him my daughter. We have no means of recompensing him for his kind assistance but I would like to make him a relative of mine.

The next day Grandma Wang went to see Song Jiang, and talked this matter over with him. At first Song Jiang was averse to marrying the girl but with Grandma Wang's strong advocacy of the match, he at last agreed to live with the girl. He then rented a house in an alleyway on the west of the yamen, and furnished it, and then asked Madame Yan and her daughter to go and live there. In less than a fortnight he gave the girl Yan Poxi many ornaments for the head, and clothed her in rich silks. The mother also had good clothing and there was nothing lacking in the way of luxuriant life.

At that time Song Jiang slept with Yan Poxi every night but gradually he became a less frequent visitor. Now why was this? Previously Song Jiang had been very keen on practicing with spears and cudgels, and prefered this to the pleasures of sex. Yan Poxi was about nineteen years of age, and like all girls of that age was fond of sexual enjoyment. Therefore she grew dissatisfied with Song Jiang.

One day Song Jiang made a mistake in bringing his assistant Zhang Wenyuan to Yan Poxi's house to drink wine. Zhang Wenyuan had beautiful eyes, white teeth, red lips, and spent his leisure idly. He was quite a dandy and was also quite a good player on string and wood instruments. When Yan Poxi saw Zhang Wenyuan she was much pleased with him and noticed him carefully. Zhang Wenyuan being quite the cad, noticed the effect he had produced. He also noticed the sly movements of her eyes and eyebrows, and knew there was something behind them that he accordingly bore in mind.

Whenever Song Jiang was away, Zhang Wenyuan seized the opportunity to go to the house to presumably visit him. Yan Poxi used to invite him to drink tea or wine, and after some talk they became lovers. She never gave a thought of Song Jiang, and when he came she always insulted him. Song Jiang was not a woman chaser and thenceforth he went to the house once every ten days. But Zhang Wenyuan and Yan Poxi stuck together like glue and varnish. He went there at night and left the following morning, and all the neighbours knew this.

Consequently Song Jiang heard rumours, and half believing them, he thought that since his parents had not selected the girl for him that meant that she was merely a concubine and not a wife, there was no reason for him to lose his temper about her. He would simply stay away from the house. So he did not go there for several months. Madame Yan many times sent a man to invite Song Jiang to come to the house but he always sent a reply that he was too busy.

It happened one day that Song Jiang went into a tea-house just opposite the entrance to the yamen, and sat down to drink tea. He there noticed a big man wearing a white broad brimmed felt hat, a black and green silk wadded coat, puttees wound round his calves, hempen shoes with eight rows of laces, a sword at his side; he carried a bundle on his back, and was perspiring heavily, and panting for breath. He looked inside the yamen as he passed. He was stumbling along, and Song Jiang seeing this, left the tea-house, and followed the man. When they had walked about thirty steps the man looked round but seeing Song Jiang did not recognize him. But Song Jiang saw something in the man's face which seemed familiar, yet he could not remember where he had met him before. He thought a little without finding a clue. The man stopped, and looking carefully at Song Jiang thought that he also knew him but not being certain he did not care to speak.

Song Jiang thought, "This is somewhat strange but why does the man look at me like that?" He also did not like to speak to the man. The man crossed the road, and entering a hairdressing saloon asked, "Who is that clerk over there?" The shopkeeper said that he was Song Jiang. The man taking hold of his sword, and stepping forward saluted Song Jiang by the sound "nuo," and then asked, "Do you not recognize me?"

"I think I know your face," said Song Jiang.

"Let us go to another place, and have a talk," said the man.

They then went into a small quiet alleyway where the man suggested that they go into an inn there. They did so, and finding a secluded cabinet upstairs they sat down there. The man took off his sword, placed his bundle under the table, and then suddenly stooped down and kowtowed. Song Jiang did the same and said, "Do not do that. May I know your name?"

"Benefactor! How is that you forget me?" asked the man.

"But who are you?" asked Song Jiang. "I seem to know your face but I quite forget your name."

"I met you before," said the man, "at the village of Chao Gai, where you saved our lives. I am Liu Tang, the Red Haired Demon."

Song Jiang was startled at this, and said, "How brave you are! I am afraid that if the yamen people see you you would be in danger."

"I do not care a damn," said Liu Tang. "I have specially come here to thank you for your assistance in the past."

"And how is Chao Gai and his followers?" asked Song Jiang. "Who told you to come here?"

"Chao Gai himself told me to come here to thank our benefactor," said Liu Tang. "He is now commander of the bandits at Liangshan Marsh, and Wu Yong is the second-in-command. Gongsun Sheng is third-in-command. Lin Chong manages everything, and he killed Wang Lun. Du Qian, Song Wan, Zhu Gui, and Lin Chong, the old leaders at Liangshan Marsh together with our seven make a total of eleven leaders now. At our stronghold there are altogether about eight hundred men, and large supplies of grain. They have not forgotten your kindness, and have sent me to present a letter to you, and also one hundred taels of gold. Then I must find Zhu Tong, and also thank him for what he did." He opened his bundle, and taking out a letter handed it to Song Jiang. The latter after reading it lifted up the front part of his long gown, and brought out his letter case. While he was doing this Liu Tang had placed the gold on the table, and Song Jiang picked up one piece and put it into his letter case along with the letter. He then asked Liu Tang to put the remainder of the gold back in his bundle, and ordered the waiter to bring wine, a large piece of meat, vegetables, and fruit for Liu Tang to eat. It was getting evening by the time Liu Tang had finished his food and wine, and the servant had left them. Liu Tang then wanted again to open the bundle, and give the gold to Song Jiang but the latter prevented him from doing so and said, "Younger brother, please listen to me! You seven leaders at the mountain stronghold will be in need of money. I have enough money at home to meet my needs, so I request you to keep this gold at your stronghold, and when I am in need of it I will call for it. I am not polite because I have taken a piece of the gold. Zhu Tong has also got enough money at home, so that you need not send him any money. I will explain the matter to him when I meet him next time. Younger brother, I cannot invite you to come and stay at my house because if anyone saw you it would be very awkward. Tonight there will be bright moonlight and you had better then depart, and get back to your mountain stronghold. Please convey my compliments to your leaders, and ask them to excuse me for not going personally to see them."

"Elder brother and benefactor," said Liu Tang, "I was told to come here, and make a small recompense for your kindness. I have to obey the orders of my leaders Chao Gai and Wu Yong and as I have not done as they required how dare I go back? If I go back like this I shall be punished for dereliction of duty."

"As your commanders are so severe," said Song Jiang, "I will write a letter explaining the matter and give it to you."

Liu Tang pleaded hard for Song Jiang to take the present but the latter was still unwilling to do so. Song Jiang borrowed a pen and ink from the wine shop proprietor, and wrote a letter, and gave it to Liu Tang. Liu Tang was an honest man, and seeing that Song Jiang would not accept the gold he put it back in his bundle. Seeing that it was dark Liu Tang said that he would go, and Song Jiang said that he would not detain him because they knew each other so well. Liu Tang saluted four times, and Song Jiang then called the innkeeper and said to him, "This gentleman leaves here a tael of silver, and I will come tomorrow, and settle your account." Liu Tang then put his bundle on his back, took up his sword, and went out with Song Jiang. It was quite late but there was a full moon as it was then the middle of the eighth month.

Song Jiang took Liu Tang by the hand and said, "Younger brother, please be careful. Do not come here again as it is a dangerous place for you as there are so many policemen about. I cannot go with you any further so I will now take leave of you."

So Liu Tang took his departure by the west road towards Liangshan Marsh. Song Jiang walked home and on the way, he thought, "If a policeman had noticed our meeting what a row there might have been? So Chao Gai has 'fallen into the grass' and is now a bandit. It will surely develop into a great affair."

He had just turned about two corners when he heard a person behind him calling out, "Chief Clerk! Where're you going? I've not seen you for these last few days." Turning round Song Jiang was startled. `Song Jiang was now made fierce, his good heart turned to anger.

021

The Old bawd Brothel-Keeper gets drunk, Strike,s Beats, & shows Bullock Tang the Ox-Er the door; Song Jiang sees red in a Fit of Anger, Slays, & Kills the Girl Yan Poxi While Angry — and Poxi is no more

As Song Jiang ambled back to his quarters along the moonlit street after seeing Liu Tang off, it was Madame Yan who hailed him from behind. She hurried to catch up. "I sent someone with an invitation a long time age but you're so important it's hard to get hold of you," she said. "If my baggage of a daughter has said anything to offend you, forgive her for my sake. I've reprimanded the girl, and told her she must apologize. I'm in luck tonight, running into you. We can go back together."

"I'm busy at the magistrate's office. I can't get away. I'll come another time."

"Nothing doing. The girl is at home longing for you. Comfort her a bit. Why must you be this way?"

"I'm really busy. I'll come tomorrow, for sure."

"No, tonight." She pulled him by the sleeve. "Who's provoking you against her? We're dependent on you for the rest of our lives. Whoever is telling you stories, don't believe him. Make up your own mind. If my daughter has done anything wrong, I'm the one to blame. Please come with me."

"Stop insisting. I'm busy and can't get away."

"The magistrate won't punish you if you put your work off a little while. I'm not likely to run into you again. You must come. I've things to tell you when we get home."

Song Jiang was an impetuous fellow, and the old woman clung to him tenaciously. "Let go of my arm," he said. "I'll go."

"Don't rum away. An old woman like me could never keep up with you."

"What would I do that for!"

They continued on, side by side. At the door, Song Jiang halted. Madame Yan pulled him by the hand.

"You've come this far. Why not go in?"

Song Jiang entered and sat down on a bench. The sly old woman, afraid that he would try to escape, sat down beside him.

"Daughter," she called, "your beloved is here."

Poxi was lying on her bed, staring at the lamp and thinking of nothing in particular. She was hoping that Zhang would come. When she heard her mother say: "Your beloved is here," she thought it was the young rake. She got up quickly and fixed her hair.

"That rogue," she muttered. "He made me wait long enough. I'll box his ears!"

She flew down the stairs and peeked through the lattice wall. The glass lamp in the parlour brightly illuminated the figure of Song Jiang. Poxi promptly turned, went back up the stairs and threw herself down on her bed.

Madame Yan heard her daughter's footsteps come down and then go up again. "Your lover is here, daughter," she shouted. "Why have you gone away?"

From her bed, Poxi replied: "This room isn't so far that he can't reach it! He's not blind! Why doesn't he come up here instead of waiting for me to come down and greet him? Don't gabble so!"

"She's bitter that you stayed away so long," Madame Yan explained to Song Jiang. "That's why she talks like that." The old woman laughed. "I'll go with you."

Song Jiang felt uncomfortable and awkward. But Madame Yan was insistent, and he went with her up the stairs.

The girl's room was fairly large. In the outer half was a dressing-table and bench. The inner half contained on one side a carved bed with railings at head and foot and hung with a red silk canopy. There was a clothing rack and a towel at one end of the bed. At the other was a washbasin. A pewter lampstand rested on gold lacquered table that was flanked by two matching stools. In the centre of the middle wall was a painting of beautiful girl. Four wooden armchairs stood in a row along the wall opposite the bed.

Madame Yan pulled Song Jiang into the room, and he sat down on one of the stools near the bed. The old woman went over and pulled her daughter up.

"Sir Clerk is here. He's been staying away because you've offended him. You have a rotten temper but you think of him often. It hasn't been easy for me to get him to come. Yet instead of getting up and apologizing, you sulk!"

Poxi pushed her hands away. "What are you making such a fuss about? I haven't done anything wrong. If he never comes how can I apologize?"

Song Jiang listened but did not speak. The old woman pulled a chair over beside him and pushed the girl down on it.

"You sit here with him. If you won't apologize, at least behave yourself."

But Poxi refused to sit by Song Jiang. She took a chair opposite. The clerk kept his gaze lowered and remained silent. Poxi averted her face.

" 'Without wine and soy sauce how can you lay a feast?' " quipped Madame Yan. "I've got some good wine. Now all we need is some food and we'll be able to express our apologies. Daughter, keep sir Clerk company. Don't be embarrassed. I'll be right back."

"That old woman has me nailed down tight," thought Song Jiang. "When she goes downstairs, I'll leave!"

But Madame Yan guessed what he was planning, and bolted the bedroom door from the outside after her.

"The old bawd's out-foxed me," Song Jiang said to himself.

Madame Yan went downstairs, lit the lamp by the stove, saw that the water was hot, and added a few sticks of wood. She took some change and, at the end of the lane, bought fruit, fresh fish, a tender chicken, and pickled fish. These she brought home, and put them on plates. After pouring the wine into a jug, she ladled some into a kettle and heated it on the stove. She poured the warm spirits into a wine pot. Then she cooked a few dishes and carried these, along with three cups and three sets of chopsticks, on a tray upstairs.

She set the tray on the dressing table, opened the bedroom door, entered, and placed the food and drink on the table of gold lacquer.

Song Jiang still sat with his head down. Poxi with her face turned.

"Daughter, pour the wine."

"You two drink. I don't feel like it."

"Your father and I spoiled you since childhood. But you shouldn't act like this in front of others."

"What if I don't pour the wine? Will his sword come flying and cut off my head?"

The old woman laughed. "It's all my fault. Sir Clerk is a gentleman. He won't take umbrage at the likes of you. If you won't pour the wine at least turn around and drink with us."

But the girl wouldn't look at Song Jiang, and Madame Yan had to toast him herself. He reluctantly drank a cup.

"Don't blame her," the old woman urged with a smile. "I know there are a lot of rumours. I'll explain everything tomorrow. Some people are envious of you. It burns them up to see you here. They'll say anything that comes into their heads. Just empty farts! Don't listen to them. Now, let's drink."

She filled the three cups and said to her daughter: "Quit acting like a child. Have some wine."

"Leave me alone! I'm full. I couldn't touch another thing."

"Come now, daughter. Drink with your beloved."

Poxi said to herself: "I've given my heart to Zhang. Who wants to stay with this lout! But if I don't get him drunk I suppose he'll be wanting things from me." She forced herself to down half a cup.

Madame Yan laughed. "My girl is upset. Relax, have a few drinks and go to bed. Sir Clerk, drink your fill."

Song Jiang couldn't resist her urgings. He drained four or five cups in a row. The old woman also had quite a few. She went downstairs to heat some more wine. She had been annoyed when her daughter refused to drink. Now that the girl had changed her mind she felt much better.

"If we can inveigle him into staying tonight," she thought, "he'll get over being angry. The thing is to hang onto him for a while longer, then we'll see."

By the stove, she drank another three cups. This only increased her craving, and she filled a bowl and downed that, too. Madame Yan then poured half a kettle of heated wine into the pot and crawled back up the stairs. She found Song Jiang sitting in silence, with lowered gaze. Poxi, her head turned away, was toying with her skirt. The old woman laughed.

"You two aren't made of clay. Why don't you speak? Be a man, sir Clerk. All you have to do is show a little tenderness and whisper a few sweet nothings."

Song Jiang didn't know what to do. He said not a word. To stay or go, both seemed wrong.

"You never come to see me," Poxi thought, "and now you expect me to talk and play around with you as usual. Not a chance!"

Madame Yan had drunk a lot of wine and she babbled all kinds of nonsense. Gossiping about this one, slandering that, she talked a blue streak.

While this was going on, Tang the Ox went looking for Song Jiang. Tang was a pedlar of pickled meats and vegetables who also managed to do some of hustling on the streets of the county town. Song Jiang often helped him financially. Whenever Tang picked up a bit of useful information about court cases and litigants he let Song Jiang know, and the clerk gave him some money. And so, if Song Jiang ever had need of him, Tang went all out.

On this particular evening Tang had lost at gambling, and he went to the county office to put the touch on Song Jiang. But the clerk was nowhere to be seen.

"Who are you looking for in such great haste, brother?" asked one of Song's neighbours.

"What a thirst I've got. I'm looking for my patron but he's not around."

"Who is your patron?"

"Clerk of the county court, Song Jiang."

"I saw him going off with Madame Yan not long ago."

"That daughter of hers is a dirty tramp. She and young Zhang are really hot for each other. The girl's cheating on Song Jiang. He probably got wind of it and stopped going there. Today, the old bawd must have tricked him into paying a visit. I've got no money and my throat is dry. I'll just drop by and borrow enough for a few bowls of wine."

Tang headed for Madame Yan's house. A lamp was burning and the door was not locked. As he reached the foot of the stairs he heard the old woman laughing wildly in the room above.

He tiptoed up the stairs and peered through a crack in the wall. Song Jiang and Poxi both were gazing downward. The old woman was sitting at the head of the table, jabbering twelve to the dozen. Tang stepped in and greeted each of them courteously. He remained standing near the entry.

"Just in time!" thought Song Jiang. He gestured with pursed lips.

Tang was a clever fellow. He got the signal. "I've been looking all over for you," he said to Song. "And you've been here drinking, snug and peaceful, right along!"

"Has something important happened at the county office?"

"You've forgotten, sir Clerk. It's about that matter that came up this morning. The magistrate is having fits in his chambers. He's sent four or five court attendants looking for you. His Worship is raising the roof. You'd better get going!"

"If it's that important, I suppose I must." Song Jiang stood up and headed for the stairs. Madame Yan stopped him.

“Don’t pretend, sir Clerk. I know he’s putting on an act.” She whirled to face Tang the Ox. “Tricky rogue! Think you can fool me? You’ve as much chance as taking the adze from Lu Ban the Great Carpenter! At this hour the magistrate is home drinking and merry-making with his wife. What official business would he bother about tonight? You can’t diddle me with your phony stories!”
“The magistrate is really waiting for him. It’s very urgent. I wouldn’t lie!”
“Dog farts! These old eyes are crystal clear. You saw the clerk signal with his mouth to invent a tale. Instead of encouraging him to stay, you try to lure him away! ‘Killing can be forgiven but never deception,’ as the old saying goes.”
Madame Yan jumped up, grabbed Tang by the neck with both hands, and rushed him stumbling down the stairs.
“Get your hands off my neck,” Tang yelled.
“You’re ruining our business, cutting off our food and clothing! That’s as bad as killing a man’s parents or his wife! Make any more noise and I’ll clobber you, you thieving beggar!”
Tang stepped up to her. “Let’s see you hit me!”
Filled with the courage of wine, Madame Yan slapped Tang so hard he staggered out backwards, taking the bamboo door curtain with him. The old woman, swearing a blue streak, rolled up the curtain, put it inside, closed the double doors and bolted them firmly.
Tang the Ox bawled from the yard: “Dirty whore-monger, if it weren’t for Clerk Song I’d smash your house to smithereens! You just wait. It I don’t get you on an odd day, I’ll get you on an even!” Cursing, he pounded his chest. “If I don’t kill you my name isn’t Tang!”
Madame Yan went back up the stairs. “You shouldn’t pay any attention to that beggar,” she said to Song Jiang. “He came to cadge the price of a couple of drinks. All he does is stir up trouble. A stinking wretch who’ll die in the streets dares to come to my door with his quackery!”
Song Jiang was an honest fellow. Now that the old woman had seen through his attempt, he couldn’t bring himself to leave.
“Don’t hold this against me, sir Clerk. We know how good you are to us. Daughter, drink this cup with sir Clerk. You two haven’t seen each other for a long time. I can imagine how eager you are to get to bed. I’ll just straighten up a bit in here and go.”
She had two more cups with Song Jiang, collected the bowls and dishes, and went downstairs to the kitchen.
“I’ve heard that this girl and Zhang are hitting it off,” the clerk said to himself, “but I’m not sure. There’s nothing I’ve seen with my own eyes. If I go now she’ll think I’m a rube. Besides, it’s late and I want to sleep. I may as well find out how this girl really feels about me.”
The old woman came up the stairs again and called: “It’s late. Go to bed, you two.”
“Mind your business,” snapped Poxi. “Go to bed yourself!”
Madame Yan laughed and went downstairs, saying: “Rest well, sir Clerk. Enjoy yourself. Take your time getting up in the morning.”
She put the kitchen in order, washed her feet, blew out the lamp, and retired. Song Jiang, sitting on the stool, glanced at the girl and sighed. It was already the second watch. Poxi lay down on the bed, fully clothed. She rested her head on her embroidered pillow, and rolled over facing the wall.
“The trollop goes to sleep without even looking at me,” Song Jiang thought irritably. “Her mother wangled me into coming here and plied me with wine. I can’t keep my eyes open. It’s late. I’d better get some rest.”
He removed his head kerchief and put it on the table, took off his tunic and hung it on the clothes rack. The sash around his waist, with its attached dagger and pouch, he draped over the bed rail. Then he pulled off his silk shoes and white socks and lay down with his head towards the girl’s feet.
Half a watch later, he heard her snicker. Song Jiang was furious. How could he sleep? “‘Joy regrets night’s swift race. Misery hates its leaden pace,’” he thought.
By the time the third watch had gone and the fourth begun, he was completely sober. At the fifth watch he got up, washed his face in the basin with cold water, dressed, tied his kerchief on his head. “Unmannerly slut,” he muttered.
Poxi heard him. She hadn’t slept either. She turned around.
“You ought to be ashamed!” she retorted.
Swallowing his rage, Song descended the stairs.
Madame Yan heard his footsteps and called from her bed: “Sleep a little longer, sir Clerk. Wait until daylight before you go. There’s no reason to get up at the fifth watch.”
Song Jiang did not reply. He unbolted the door.
“If you must go, sir Clerk,” said the old woman, “pull the door closed behind you.”
Song Jiang did so. Still smouldering, he set out quickly for his quarters. As he was passing the magistracy, he saw down the street a small lampglow. Grandpa Wang, the medicinal broth seller, was coming to the square in front of the county office to catch the morning market.
The old man hailed him, “What are you doing up so early, sir Clerk?”
“I had too much to drink last night. Just now when I awoke I counted the beat of the watch drum wrong.”
“The wine surely upset your stomach. I’ve just the soup for that. Let me give you a bowl.”
“All right,” said Song Jiang. He sat down on a bench. The old man filled a bowl with thick broth and handed it to him.
As he was sipping it, Song Jiang thought: “I often drink his soups, and he never asks me to pay. Though I promised to buy him a coffin, I still haven’t done it.”
He remembered the gold Chao Gai had sent and the bar he had selected and put in his pouch. “I’ll give him the money now. That will make him happy,” he thought.
“Grandpa, I haven’t given you the money yet I promised you for your coffin,” he said. “I have some gold here which you can have. Buy yourself a coffin and keep it in your home. When you reach a hundred and go to your final rest, I’ll pay your funeral expenses.”
“You’re always so good to me, benefactor, and now you give me money for a coffin. There is no way I can thank you in this life but in my next incarnation I’ll serve you as a donkey or a horse!”
“Don’t talk like that.” Song Jiang pulled up the edge of his over-vest and felt for his pouch. He uttered a groan and thought: “I must have left it on that creature’s bed rail last night. I was so angry I could think only of getting out, and forgot to put on my sash. The gold doesn’t matter but it’s wrapped in Chao Gai’s letter! I was going to burn it when I was with Liu Tang in the tavern but I was afraid he’d go back and say I treated his mission lightly. I decided to destroy it when I returned to my quarters but Madame Yan nabbed me before I could get there. Then last night I thought I’d burn it in the lamp. But I was afraid the girl would see and so I didn’t do it. This morning I left in such a hurry I forgot it! I’ve often noticed Poxi looking at song sheets that means she can read a bit. If she gets her hands on that letter, it will be very bad!”
He stood up and said: “Forgive me, grandpa. I meant what I said. But the gold is in my pouch, and I left home so quickly this morning I forgot it. I’ll get it now.”
“Don’t bother,” said the old man. “Any time will do.”
“You don’t understand. I left something important with it. I need them both.”
Song Jiang set out rapidly for Madame Yan’s house.
Meanwhile, after Poxi heard Song leave, she got up. “That oaf kept me awake all night. Frozen face, hoping I’d apologize and be nice to him. I don’t want him! Zhang and I get along fine. Who wants to bother with Song Jiang! If he doesn’t come around, so much the better!”
She spread the quilt, took off her tunic and skirt, opened her chemise and stepped out of her slip. In the light of lamp by the bedside she saw the sash hanging on the rail. Poxi laughed.
“That black-faced rogue was so drunk he forgot his sash. I’ll give it to my Zhang to wear.”
As she lifted it, with dagger and pouch attached, the pouch felt unusually heavy. Poxi opened it and spilled its contents on the table. Out came a gold bar and a letter. She picked up the gold bar, gleaming yellow in the lamplight.
“A gift from heaven,” she laughed. “My Zhang has been getting too thin. Now I can buy him some good things to eat.”
She put the bar down and opened the letter. She saw Chao Gai’s signature, and what he had written.
“Aha!” she said. “I knew that the bucket went to the well but here we have the well also coming to the bucket. Song Jiang is all that prevents me and Zhang from becoming man and wife. Today I’ve got him in the palm of my hand. So he’s in cahoots with the bandits in Liangshan Marsh, and they’ve sent him a hundred ounces of gold. I’ll fix him!”
She again wrapped the gold bar in the letter and put it in the pouch. “Even with five demons he won’t snatch this away!” she said to herself.
Poxi heard the door downstairs squeak open, and the old woman call from her bed: “Who’s there?”
“Me,” Song Jiang replied.
“I told you it was too early, sir Clerk but you wouldn’t listen. Now you’ve come back. Go up and sleep with Poxi. Wait until daylight, then leave if you must.”
The clerk made no reply but mounted the stairs. Hearing that it was Song Jiang, the girl hastily rolled the pouch and dagger in the sash, got under the covers with the bundle, turned facing the wall, and pretended to snore.
Song burst into the room and went straight to the rail of the bed. His belongings were gone. The clerk was in a panic. He controlled his anger over the shabby way the girl had treated him all night and shook her by the shoulder.
“For the sake of my kindness to you before, give me back my pouch.”
Poxi continued to feign sleep. Song Jiang shook her again.
“Don’t be angry. I’ll apologize to you later.”
“I’ve been sleeping peacefully here. Who wakes me so rudely?”
“Quit acting. You know very well it’s me.”
Poxi turned around. “Oh, Black-Face. What are you saying?”
“I want my pouch.”
“Did you put it in my hands? Why ask me for it?”
“I left on the rail at the foot of the bed. Nobody else has been here. You must have taken it.”
“A demon’s run away with your wits!”
“I behaved badly last night. I’ll apologize to you later. But you must return my pouch. Quit fooling around.”
“Who’s fooling? I never took it!”
“You hadn’t undressed before, or covered yourself with the quilt. You must have taken it when you got up and laid out the bedding.”
Poxi’s lovely brows rose and her starry eyes widened. “Yes, I took it, and I’m not going to give it back. Now have me arrested as a thief!”
“I didn’t say you stole it.”
“I’m not a thief, I’ll have you know!”
Song Jiang’s panic was growing. “I’ve treated you and your mother well. Give it back to me! I’ve things to do!”
“Always mumbling that I was carrying on with Zhang. He’s not your equal in some ways but at least he isn’t a dirty criminal! He doesn’t consort with bandits and robbers!”
“My darling sister, keep your voice down! If the neighbours hear, it won’t be any joke!”
“If you’re afraid people will hear, you shouldn’t do such things. I’m going to hold on to that letter! I might return it but you have to do three things, first.”
“I’ll do thirty, gladly, to say nothing of three!”
“Maybe you won’t agree.”
“Anything in my power, I’ll do. What do you want from me?”
“First, give back my contract of sale to you, and write another transferring me to Zhang in marriage, with a guarantee that you’ll never contest it.”
“Agreed.”
“Second, all the ornaments in my hair, the clothes on my body, the furnishings in the house, all come from you. Write another promise that you won’t ask their return.”
“Agreed.”
“It’s the third thing I’m afraid you’ll balk at.”
“I’ve already agreed to two things. Why not a third?”
“I want those hundred ounces of gold Chao Gai sent you from Liangshan Marsh. In exchange, I’ll let you off your ‘top-magnitude crime,’ and return your purse and what’s in it.”
“Your first two demands I’ve already agreed to. It’s true I was sent a hundred ounces of gold but I refused them, and told the man to take them back. If I still had the gold here I’d gladly present it to you with both hands.”
“Fine words! ‘Money to an official is like blood to a fly.’ They sent you gold and you turned it down? That’s a farting lie! Among officials ‘What cat doesn’t eat meat?’ Does the King of Hell let condemned souls go? Who do you think you’re kidding? Give me that gold. What does it mean to you? If you’re afraid it’ll be identified as stolen goods, melt it down first!”
“I’m an honest man, you know that. I wouldn’t lie. If you don’t believe me, give me three days’ time. I’ll sell my family belongings and raise the money for you. Let me have my pouch.”
The girl laughed coldly. “Tricky, Black-Face, aren’t you? Do you think I’m a child? I give you the pouch and letter today, and three days from now you give me gold? Not a chance! With one hand I take the money, with the other I release the goods. Let’s have it, quick, and get this over with!”
“I don’t have any gold, I tell you!”
“Is that what you’re going to say when I accuse you in court this morning!”
At the mention of the word “court,” Song Jiang began to burn. He glared at the girl.
“Are you going to give it back or not?”
“Dare I refuse, with you so fierce?” she said sarcastically.
“You really won’t give it back?”
“No, a hundred times no! I’ll return it to you in the county court!”
Song Jiang grabbed the quilt covering Poxi and yanked it off. She didn’t care about her nakedness but lay huddled with the bundle clutched to her chest. Song recognized the fringe of his sash.
“So that’s where it is!”
He seized the bundle with both hands. The girl wouldn’t let go. Song hauled for dear life. Poxi clung in a death grip. The clerk gave another hard pull, and the dagger fell out on the mattress. He instinctively pounced on it. The girl looked at the dagger in his hand and screamed.
“Murder! Black-Face wants to kill me!”
It wasn’t until then that the idea entered his mind. All his suppressed fury burst forth like a wave. Before Poxi could scream again he pushed her down with his left hand and with his right slit her throat. Fresh blood spurted. Poxi gurgled. Afraid she wouldn’t die, Song Jiang slashed with his dagger once more. The girl’s head dangled loosely on the pillow.
Song quickly unwound the pouch, extracted the letter and burned it in the lamp flame. He fastened the sash around his waist and went downstairs.
The old woman, lying in bed below, heard the quarrel but hadn’t paid much attention until her daughter screamed: “Black-Face wants to kill me!” Worried, she jumped out of bed, dressed, and hurried up the stairs. She collided with Song, who was just starting down.
“What are you two raising such a row about?” she demanded.
“Your daughter was insufferable! I killed her!”
“Now, now,” Madame Yan smiled, “you may get angry easily, and be a little nasty when you’re drunk but you wouldn’t kill anybody. Stop teasing.”
“If you don’t believe me, go inside and see! I killed her, all right!”
“I don’t believe it,” said Madame Yan. She pushed open the door and looked. Her daughter’s body lay in a pool of blood.
“Frightful,” she gasped. “How could you do such a thing!”
“I’m a man of principle. I won’t run away. Do with me what you will.”
“The jade was no good. You weren’t wrong to kill her. But now I’ve no one to support me in my old age.”
“That’s no problem. You needn’t worry, if that’s how you feel. I have a bit of property. I can see to it that you have plenty of food and clothing for the rest of your days.”
“That’s fine. I thank you, sir Clerk. But what are we going to do about burying my daughter?”
“Easy. I’ll go and buy a coffin. When she’s being placed in it, I’ll deal with the coroner. And I’ll give you another ten ounces of silver for funeral expenses.”

"We'd better get the coffin now, before daylight. We don't want the neighbours to see anything."
"All right. Bring me a pen and paper and I'll write a note, then you go for the coffin."
"Just a note won't solve anything. Unless you go in person, they won't deliver it quickly."
"You're right," said Song Jiang.
They went downstairs. The old woman took a lock and key from the kitchen, locked the house door behind them and put the key in her pocket. Then she and the clerk walked in the direction of the county office.
It was not yet daylight but the gate of the magistracy was already open. As Madame Yan and Song Jiang neared the left of the entry the old woman suddenly clutched him.
"I've got a murderer here!" she yelled.
Song Jiang nearly jumped out of his skin. He clapped a hand over her mouth.
"Shut up!"
But Madame Yan continued her clamour. Several policemen ran over. They saw it was Song Jiang she was clinging to.
"Be quiet, woman," they said. "Our clerk isn't that kind. Speak nicely, if you've anything to say!"
"He's a murderer! I've caught him and I'm taking him to the magistrate!"
Song Jiang had always been very kind, and he was well liked by everyone, above and below. There wasn't a person in the magistracy who didn't defer to Song Jiang. And so none of the policemen was willing to lay a hand on him. Besides, they didn't believe Madame Yan.
At that moment Tang the Ox came by. He was carrying a tray of freshly washed pickled ginger for the early market held in front of the county office each morning. He saw Madame Yan seize Song Jiang and heard her exclamations. Tang remembered the abuse he himself had taken from her the previous night. He put his tray down on one of the benches of Grandpa Wang, the broth seller, and rushed over.
"Old bawd," he shouted. "Why are you handing on to our clerk?"
"Don't you let him get away," Madame Yan shrilled, "or you'll answer with your life!"
Tang the Ox was furious. He pried her hands loose and slapped her so hard she saw stars. She staggered dizzily and let go. Song Jiang walked directly into the market crowds. The old woman fastened herself on Tang.
"Clerk Song killed my daughter and you helped him escape!"
"How did I know!" Tang cried in confusion.
"Policemen, catch that murderer! Otherwise, you'll be implicated too!" Song Jiang's prestige was so high that none of the police would touch him. But Tang the Ox was a different matter. They closed in swiftly. I of them took the old woman, and 3 or 4 grasped Tang and dragged him backwards into the magistrate's court.
Truly, calamity and happiness have no volition. Man brings them on himself. Go in a flaxen cape to put out a fire and you'll be consumed by flames.

As Song Jiang was strolling home after leaving Liu Tang, while the moon shed its brightness on the street, he was suddenly accosted by Mrs. Yan.
"Registrar!" Mrs. Yan shouted as she hurried towards him. "How many times I've sent to invite you! But you're such a great man, and it's so hard to get you! Now, if ever that naughty child of mine has said anything which has given offence, then for the sake of an old woman, please pardon her; I shall talk to her myself, I'll see she apologizes. Really, fate has led me to you this evening, now do let us both go and see her."
"I have matters to attend to at the office today," Song Jiang said, "affairs that cannot be deferred. Can't we make it another day?"
"That won't do at all," Mrs. Yan said. "My daughter is at home, expecting you. Just show her a little kindness, that's all it needs. How can you begrudge her that!"
"But really I am busy," Song Jiang said. "I'll go tomorrow."
"I want to go with you this evening," Mrs. Yan insisted. Then, taking a firm hold of Song Jiang's sleeve, she went on: "Who's turned you against us? You know how we count on you, my daughter and I! You're our support for the rest of our days. The things people say are just idle gossip, you shouldn't listen to them. You should make up your own mind. If my daughter has done you some wrong, then say it's my fault. Come, just one little visit."
Song Jiang said: "Enough! I have business to attend to. I simply don't have the time!"
"Just for missing a little bit of work at the office," Mrs. Yan said, "I know His Excellency won't blame you for that. If you lose this opportunity, it may not be easy to find another. Do come with me and pay just this one little visit. When we get to the house I'll tell you something."
Song Jiang was a man who hated wasting time. Infuriated by the old woman's importuning, he said: "All right, all right, I'll come. But let go of my arm."
"Yes, Registrar," Mrs. Yan cried, "but you won't try to give me the slip, will you? You know I'm an old woman, I couldn't catch you."
"This is intolerable!" Song Jiang growled.
And this is how they arrived before the door, one chasing behind the other. Here's how it was:

The drinker 'tis that's tipsy, not the wine;
Love's source is in the lover, not in beauty.
If what you plan to do brings nought but pain,
Were it not best from doing it to refrain?

When Song Jiang came to a halt, Mrs. Yan stretched out her arms, to cut off any retreat. "Now you're here, Registrar," she said, "surely you're going to come in?"
Song Jiang entered and seated himself on a stool. The old woman was no fool — remember what they say? "When an old bawd gets her hands on you, there's no escape!" — Mrs. Yan was terrified, you see, that Song Jiang would run away, so she sat herself down beside him and called out: "Poxi, my dear, the one you love is here!"
Poxi just now was lying on her bed, absently gazing at the solitary lamp, counting the hours till Zhang's visit. When she heard her mother call out, "The one you love is here!" of course she thought it was Zhang! She rose hurriedly, and, composing her raven tresses with one hand, muttering to herself the while, "The wretch, to keep me waiting like this! I ought to box his ears for him!", flew downstairs.
Outside the sitting-room, she peeped through a hole in the screen, brightly lit from behind by a porcelain lamp. When she saw that it was Song Jiang, she turned and fled upstairs again. She threw herself down on the bed, in the same position as before.
Mrs. Yan had heard Poxi come downstairs, and heard her go back upstairs. She called out: "Poxi, where are you going? your lover is here!"
Poxi, from her bed, replied: "Is it so far to my room? Can't he come here? He's not a blind man is he? Why can't he come up by himself? Why should it be me who has to go down and receive him? Anyway, what is there to make such a bloody fuss about?"
Mrs. Yan said: "The little wretch is angry because you didn't come before. It's soured her temper. She just wants you to give her some attention, that's why she says these things." She laughed and said, "Come on, Registrar, we'll go up together."
When he heard Poxi going on like this, Song Jiang felt more than a little uncomfortable. But with the old woman hauling on his arm, there was nothing for it but to go upstairs.
It was a six-beam room, divided into two halves. The first half was occupied by a low table with chairs set around it. The other half served as bedroom, and had a bed decorated on three sides with carved reliefs. There was a rail down each side of the bed, and a silk canopy above. At the head, to one side, there was a rack for hanging clothes, with a towel on it. On the other side was a wash-basin. A gold lacquer table supported a lamp with a pewter stand and beside the table there were two stools. Right opposite the bed hung the picture of an elegant lady. Facing the bed were four armchairs arranged side by side.
When Song Jiang reached the top of the stairs, the old woman propelled him into the room. He seated himself on a square stool, facing towards the bed. Mrs. Yan went over to the bed and started to pull her daughter up, saying: "The Registrar is here. Come on, you get in a bad mood and say nasty things to upset him, so then he doesn't want to come here. But then you just lie there moping. Now I've gone to all the trouble of getting him to come, and look at you, you won't even get up and apologize! You can't even bring yourself to be civil!"
Poxi jerked her hand free and said: "What are you raving about? I didn't do anything wrong. He's the one who decided not to come. What am I supposed to apologize for?"
Song Jiang heard all this but said nothing. The old woman got a chair and placed it beside Song Jiang. Then she began tugging at her daughter again, saying: "Just come and sit by your lover's side for a bit. So you don't want to apologize, very well but control your temper. You haven't seen each other for a long time, surely you can find something nice and loving to say?"
But she was totally unmoved, the trollop. The most she would do was seat herself opposite Song Jiang.
Song Jiang remained silent, and didn't look up. And when Mrs. Yan looked at her daughter, the latter also looked away. "Well," said the old woman. "If the wine doesn't flow, the party won't go! And I've got a bottle of good wine stored up, so now I'll just go and get some fruit and nuts and we can make it up to the Registrar. Do you hear me, Poxi? Stay here and keep the Registrar company! And don't be shy. I won't be gone a minute."
"The old woman's trapped me," Song Jiang was thinking. "I can't just leave. But I'll wait till she goes downstairs, then I'll be able to slip away." However the old woman had read his mind. There was a bolt on the outside of the door, and when she left the room, she slid it across. "The old witch has really out-manoeuvred me," Song Jiang said to himself.
Mrs. Yan went downstairs and lit the lamp in front of the stove. She already had a big pot of water warming for foot-baths. She added some wood to the fire, took some money and went off to buy fruit, fresh fish, a spring chicken, pickled fish and jellyfish and other provisions. Returning, she heaped the food on some dishes, and then got the wine and poured half of it into the warmer which she put into the big pot of hot water to warm. Later she ladled the wine into a jug, collected some of the dishes of food, together with three winecups and three sets of chopsticks, and took them upstairs on a big tray. She put all this down on the long table. Then she opened the door of the inner room and laid the food and drink out on the table inside.
Song Jiang was still sitting with lowered head; Poxi was still looking away. "Get up and serve the wine!" Mrs. Yan said to her daughter.
"Drink it yourselves," Poxi said. "It doesn't interest me."
"Come now," Mrs. Yan said. "Your father and I always indulged you, since you were little. But really you can't behave like this in front of other people."
"If I don't serve the wine, so what? A magic sword isn't going to come and chop off my head, is it?"
Mrs. Yan just laughed: "All right, it's my fault," she said. "But the Registrar is a gentleman, he's not like you. If you don't want to serve the wine, all right. But at least turn round and drink a cup with us."
Poxi would not even turn her head. The old woman served Song Jiang herself. Song Jiang had no alternative but to drink.
"Don't be angry, Registrar," said the old woman, forcing a laugh. "Put those nasty rumours out of your mind. I'll tell you all about it another day. People see you coming here, and they can't contain their envy, they talk and they talk, the dirty pissers and farters. But don't you pay them any attention. You just drink your wine." She poured another three cups of wine and set them on the table. "Stop behaving like a child," she said to her daughter, "and at least drink one little cup."
"Oh, why can't you leave me alone!" Poxi said. "I've no appetite, I don't want anything."
"It's not proper," her mother grumbled. "You're supposed to drink, to keep your lover company."
All this while, Poxi was thinking, "To have to sit here and accompany this slob, when I don't want to think about anything but my Zhang! But unless we can get him drunk, he's sure to come and molest me afterwards." So reluctantly she picked up a cup of wine and downed half of it.
"It's nerves, dear, that's all," the old woman said. "You just relax now and drink a cup of wine before you go to bed. You too, Registrar, drink up!" At her insistence Song Jiang had to drink three or four more cups, while the old woman drank repeatedly and then went downstairs to warm more.
It had really worried her when she saw her daughter wasn't drinking; but once Poxi changed her mind and accepted a cup, the old woman began to think gleefully: "Now if we can only persuade him to stay the night, all his resentment will be forgotten. If we can just hold onto him a little longer, then we're in business!"
Excited by these thoughts, she swallowed down three big bowls of wine as she stood by the stove, and then, since the urge came upon her again, poured and drank yet another. Then she filled the jug from the big warmer and clambered up the stairs with it. She found Song Jiang still sitting in silence with lowered head, and her daughter averting her gaze and fiddling with her skirt. She gave a laugh and said, "After all, you're not statues are you? Why is it you don't even make a sound? Come on, Registrar, I know you're supposed to be so manly but surely you can show a bit of affection, or say something to please her?"
Song Jiang couldn't think what to do, so he kept his mouth tight shut; there seemed to be no way forward and no retreat. As for Poxi, she was thinking to herself: "You don't pay any attention to me. You expect it to be like before. You want me to come and grovel, and then join in your little games. Well, I'm not playing!"
The old woman had had a lot to drink, and now she was beginning to jumble everything, extolling the Zhangs and cursing the Lis, reading off a proper rigmarole. There's a poem for her:

To keep the patron in her clutches
She butters him up with flattering speeches.
How many good men has she misled!
Cut her tongue out when she's dead!

Now there was in Yuncheng a hawker of pickles and preserves called Tang, generally known as the Bullock. As he was an idler, always hanging about in the street, and since Song Jiang had often helped him out, he used to keep Song Jiang informed of what was going on, thus earning himself certain small sums of cash. He would lay his life down for Song Jiang if Song Jiang had need of his services.
That evening he had just got into trouble gambling, and all he could think of was to find Song Jiang, whom he looked for first at the government offices, and then at his house but in vain.
"Who are you looking for, Bullock?" the neighbours asked. "And what's the hurry?"
"I'm up to here in it, that's what." the Bullock said. "I've got to find my protector but I can't see him anywhere."
"And who is your protector?" they asked.
"It's Registrar Song from the Magistracy," the Bullock said.
"I just saw him with Mrs. Yan," someone said, "they were walking together."
"Of course!" said the Bullock. "That Yan Poxi, the cheap slut! She's been going at it with Third Brother Zhang, hot as two coals from the fire, and Registrar Song's the only one who doesn't know. Mind you, I think he got wind of something, because he hasn't been going there lately. I suppose tonight he's been waylaid by that old bawd Mrs. Yan; she dragged him off there, I bet. Well, I'm broke, and up to my neck in it, I think I'll just get down there and see if I can come by the wherewithal to buy a cup of wine or two."
When he reached Mrs. Yan's door, he found the place fully lit, and the door not locked. Entering and penetrating as far as the inner stair, he heard the old woman hooting and cackling above. He tiptoed up the stairs and peered through a chink in the partition. There were Song Jiang and Poxi, both sitting with lowered heads, and Mrs. Yan across the table from them, jabbering on and on about nothing. He slipped into the room, greeted all three in turn, and remained standing to one side.
"This fellow's appearance is most opportune," Song Jiang thought. He made a little sign with his lips.
The Bullock was smart and recognized his cue. Looking straight at Song Jiang, he said: "I looked everywhere. And all the time your Honour was sitting here, drinking. Some people have all the luck!"
"Do you mean to tell me something urgent has come up at the office?" Song Jiang said.
"Your Honour, how come you've forgotten?" the Bullock said. "It's that business this morning, the Magistrate's in the office doing his nut. He's got half a dozen constables out looking for you, none of them can find you. He's not at all pleased about it. You'd better get a move on, sir."
"Well, if it's so urgent, I shall have to go," Song Jiang said. He stood up and began to head for the stairs but the old woman was barring the way.
"Stop acting, Registrar," she said. "Bullock Tang's a real twister." Then, turning to Tang, she said, "Do you think you can deceive an old woman with those dirty tricks? That's really trying to teach your grandmother to suck eggs! His Excellency will have gone home long ago, he'll be sitting at ease with his wife now, drinking wine, what sort of business can there be at the office? You think you're so clever but you don't fool this old woman so easily!"
The Bullock said: "It's the truth, the Magistrate is waiting for him, there's something urgent. I wouldn't tell a lie!"
"Up your mother's!" the old woman said. "I've got eyes, you know, eyes like crystal balls. I saw that sign the Registrar made, to get you to play your part. By rights you ought to help by begging him to come here, not try to steal him away! Well, as they say, 'Murder one can forgive but not an insult to one's feelings!'" With this she sprang up and gripping Tang by the scruff of his neck, roughly thrust him from the room and down the stairs.
"Why d'you have to get rough?" Tang cried.
"Haven't you heard," the old woman yelled, "that to spoil other people's business, and take away their livelihood is as bad as killing your parents and your wife? One more sound out of you and I'll really give you something to squeal about, you thieving parasite!"
"Just you try!" Tang retorted truculently.
Inspired by the wine, the old woman thrust her splayed fingers into Tang's face, dealing him two such blows that he made an instant exit, head over heels, right through the curtain in the doorway. She followed this up by drawing the curtain back behind the door, both leaves of which she then closed and secured, not for a moment ceasing in her curses.
Thus worsted, Bullock Tang stood outside the door and bellowed: "You filthy old bawd! All right! If it wasn't for Registrar Song I'd smash your house to pieces! Never mind, one day — if it's not an even date it'll be an odd one — I'll settle your account for good, or my name's not Tang!"
Finally he took himself off, pounding his chest and still swearing. The old woman went upstairs again. "Why you waste your time with that scum, I simply don't understand," she said to Song Jiang. "He just goes around cadging drinks all the time. He's trouble, that's what. To think that a filthy beast like that, that's going to croak in the gutter some day, should have the nerve to come here and try to throw his weight about in my house!"
Song Jiang was an honest man; the old woman having caught him out, he couldn't just walk away. "Don't take offence, Registrar," she went on. "I've got to look out for myself, that's all. But come now, Poxi, you must drink this cup with the Registrar. I can tell that after not seeing each other such a long time you'll want to go to bed soon. I'll just clear these things away and then I'll leave you alone." After forcing another two cups of wine on Song Jiang, she collected the cups and dishes, and retired downstairs with them to the kitchen.

Song Jiang meanwhile was turning things over in his mind. "I think this girl is having an affair with Zhang but I don't actually know it," he was thinking. "I haven't seen anything with my own eyes. If I leave now I'll seem like a fool. Besides, it's very late. The reasonable thing is to stay and sleep a little. I can observe the girl, and see how she behaves towards me tonight."

Mrs. Yan reappeared at this point. "Goodnight, Registrar," she said. "I do hope you'll both go to bed early."

Poxi answered her: "That's none of your business, go to bed yourself."

The old woman laughed and went downstairs again, saying, "Have a good rest, Registrar. After such an evening of pleasure, you'd better not get up too early in the morning." She tidied up the kitchen, washed her hands and feet, blew out the light and settled down to sleep.

Song Jiang, meanwhile, sat on his chair and waited. What he expected was that Poxi would come to him, as formerly, coy and seductive, and the awkwardness would soon be dissipated. What he didn't know was that Poxi was thinking: "Zhang is all my heart has room for, and now this one has to butt in; he's about as welcome as a skewer through the eye. And the fool expects me to come running to him, like before! Well, that's not this girl's idea at all, not at all. The boat's got to be steered to the shore, I've always heard, not the shore to the boat. So if you don't make the first move, fine! Suits me down to the ground!"

Reader, take heed! This is indeed the most terrible of sports! If the other decides to love you, nothing, not swords and knives, water or fire, will stand in the way, nothing deter her; but if you're not fancied, you can be sitting on mountains of gold and silver, you won't get a blind bit of notice. Remember the saying? If the lady loves, the oaf is an Adonis; if madam has no fancy for him, the gentleman's an oaf. Song Jiang was a brave and honest man, he didn't know how to deal with women. And this Poxi was besotted with her Zhang, who was so attentive, who knew so exactly how to treat her! He dazzled and seduced her and caused such turmoil in her heart, how could she love Song Jiang?

So they both sat there that evening, facing each other in the lamplight, and neither spoke a word; they were at a total impasse, and about as lively as two terracotta images waiting to be carried into the temple. By and by, night deepened; through the window the moon could be seen:

The stars are bright and from far off the moon
Through the casement slants its chilly sheen;
Under the door the cold wind flings night air,
The watchtower drum beats out the passing hour —
One watch scarce done, the next one on its heels.
In a distant yard the anvil coldly rings,
A thousand beats herald a thousand more.
Bells, tinkling on painted temple eaves
Afflict the traveller's lonely heart.
The flickering lamp within the sumptuous bower
Palely lights the girl's long sigh:
The courtesan's heart burning with fierce desire,
The hero's spirit serene as the rainbow's arch.

As Song Jiang sat there he cast a sidelong look at Poxi and gave a little sigh. It was almost nine o'clock. Poxi, without undressing, lay down on the bed. Resting her head on the embroidered pillow and turning away to face the wall, she composed herself for sleep. "Can the wretch really disregard me completely and go to sleep?" Song Jiang thought. "Today I had to listen to the old woman going on and on, and I had to drink I don't know how many bowls of wine, I just can't take any more. It's late now and I'd best sleep." He took off his cap and laid it on the table, and removed his outer clothing and hung it on the rack beside the bed; he undid his embroidered belt, to which were attached a little dagger and his wallet for holding documents, and hung them all on the bed-rail, removed his silk shoes and stockings, and lay down at Poxi's feet.

An hour or so later he heard Poxi, at her end of the bed, give a contemptuous laugh. Suddenly Song Jiang was filled with anger, how could he sleep? As the saying is, "Nights of pleasure haste away; to the lonely man the hours drag slow." Around midnight the effect of the wine had worn off completely. At last it was nearly dawn, and Song Jiang rose and washed his face in the basin of cold water. Then he put on his outer clothing and his cap, cursing Poxi under his breath: "The cheap slut, she really has no manners!" Poxi couldn't sleep either, and when she heard this, she turned over and retorted: "You ought to die of shame!"

Swallowing his rage, Song Jiang went downstairs. Mrs. Yan, heard his tread on the stair and shouted from her bed: "Registrar, sleep longer, don't go till it's daylight. What's the point of getting up when it's still not even light?" Song Jiang did not answer but simply went and unbolted the door. The old woman shouted again: "If you go out, then, please shut the door after you." Song Jiang went out and closed the door. Not knowing how best to calm his rage, he thought at first of rushing straight home. But as he was passing in front of the government offices, he saw a light burning, and on closer inspection, found that it was Old Wang, the vendor of tonic soup, setting up his stall for the morning market.

When the tradesman saw it was Song Jiang, he hastened to ask: "Why so early this morning, your Honour?"

"I was drunk last night," Song Jiang said. "I misheard the watch."

"It looks as if the wine upset you and you could do with a pick-me-up. You'd better try my tonic soup."

"Excellent idea," Song Jiang said, seating himself on a stool. Old Wang ladled out a bowl of thick soup and handed it to Song Jiang, who drank it. Suddenly a thought came to him: "I've often drunk his tonic soup, and he's never asked me to pay for it. I promised him a long time back that I'd buy him a coffin but I've never done so. There's that gold Chao Gai sent me yesterday, the piece I accepted for myself is in my wallet. Why don't I give it to the old man for his coffin and make him happy?"

He said: "Mr. Wang, in the past I've often promised you I would let you have the money for a coffin but I've never given it to you. Today I happen to have a little gold with me, I'm going to give it to you so you can go to Mr. Chen's and buy a coffin to take home. When you've passed a hundred and fulfilled the term of longevity, I will take care of all your final expenses."

"You are always good to me," Wang said. "Now if you're going to give me this coffin, for my burial, there's no way I can repay you in this life but in the next I'll be your donkey or your horse."

"Please, it's nothing to make a fuss about," Song Jiang said. But when he pulled up his doublet and went to take out the wallet, what an unwelcome surprise! "Holy Heavens! I must have left it last night on that slut's bed-rail. I was so angry at the time, all I wanted to do was leave, I forgot to put my belt on. It doesn't matter about a bit of gold. But the letter from Chao Gai is wrapped round it! I would have burnt it immediately in the winehouse in front of Liu Tang but then when he went back and told them, they would have thought it impolite. I meant to burn it as soon as I got home, only I was interrupted by that Mrs. Yan. I might have burnt it with the lamp last night but I didn't because I didn't want that trollop to see. This morning I was in such a hurry to leave I forgot it completely. I've often seen her reading lyrics of songs, she's not illiterate. If she gets hold of that letter, heaven help me!"

He stood up and said: "Mr. Wang, excuse me. I wasn't trying to deceive you, I thought I had the money in my wallet but I came out in such a hurry I must have left it at home. I'll go and get it for you."

"Don't trouble now," Wang said. "There's plenty of time."

"Ah but there's something else I left with it," Song Jiang said. "So I've got to go and get it." And so saying, Song Jiang rushed back to the Yans' house. Now, you see:

It's clear that problems are this hero's lot.
Heaven ordained he'd lose the precious purse.
Lovers have tiffs, there's nothing new in that.
But who'd have thought a gift would start the rot!

As for Poxi, when she heard the door close behind Song Jiang, she dragged herself up, muttering to herself: "That shit! He's got me so worked up I didn't sleep all night. He's a real creep, he just sits there waiting for me to go and butter him up. Well, I don't give a damn! I've got my Zhang, why should I put up with you? I hope you never set foot in here again!" Still muttering, she rearranged the covers, undid her bodice, took off her skirt, unbuttoned the front of her dress and removed her underwear. The bedside lamp was still burning brightly. It shone on the red silk belt which Song Jiang had hung on the bed-rail when he took it off. When she saw it, Poxi began to laugh. "Blackie's left his belt; well, it's nothing to him. I shall take it and give it to my Zhang to wear."

When she went to take it, she also picked up the dagger and the wallet. Feeling something heavy in the wallet, she opened it and shook it out on the table. Out fell the piece of gold wrapped in the letter. She examined the little packet. When she saw it was a bright gold piece, shining in the light of the lamp, she laughed to herself again: "Heaven has sent me the wherewithal to buy food and give Zhang a feast. He's been looking thinner lately, I was just wanting to get something special to strengthen him up." She put the gold away and then opened out the letter under the lamp and looked at it. The name Chao Gai was written at the top, and it mentioned all kinds of things. Poxi gave a cry of triumph. "I thought the bucket had to go to the well but now, what have we here, the well has come to the bucket! I want to marry Zhang, and you were all that was in the way, you shit! But now I've got you! So you're in league with the brigands of Mount Liang, are you? And they've sent you over a hundred gold pieces! Don't worry then. I can dispose of you whenever I like now."

She wrapped the letter round the gold piece again, and replaced them in the wallet. "I don't care if you send all the devils in hell to fetch it!" she said.

At this very moment, while Poxi was talking to herself upstairs, the sound of the downstairs door was heard. The old woman shouted "Who is it?"

"It's me," Song Jiang answered.

"I told you it was too early, Registrar but you wouldn't listen to me," the old woman said. "And now you're back. Go back to bed with Poxi for a while, you can leave when it's daylight."

Without replying, Song Jiang rushed upstairs.

When she heard Song Jiang return, Poxi quickly gathered together the belt, the dagger and the wallet and hid them under the covers. Then she lay down facing the wall again and pre-tended to sleep.

Song Jiang burst into the room and went straight to the rail at the head of the bed, to get his things. But there was nothing there. His heart sank. However, it was necessary to restrain the rage that had filled him since the night before. He reached out a hand and shook the girl. "I've been good to you in the past, please return my wallet," he said.

Poxi continued to feign sleep and pretended not to hear.

"Don't be angry," he said. "I'll make it up to you another time."

"I'm trying to sleep. Who is it?"

"You know perfectly well it's me," Song Jiang said. "What's the point of pretending?"

Poxi rolled over and said, "What do you want, Blackie?"

"Give me back my wallet," Song Jiang said.

"You didn't give it to me, what are you talking about?"

"I left it on the bed-rail. No one else has been in here. You're the only one who could have picked it up."

"Bah! You must be seeing things!" she said.

"I was in the wrong last night. Tomorrow I'll make it up to you. But right now give me back my wallet. Stop playing games."

"Who'd want to play games with you? I haven't got it!"

"You went to bed without taking your clothes off, before; now you're sleeping under the covers. Obviously you took it when you got up to make the bed."

Then Poxi, raising her willow-leaf eyebrows and opening her shining eyes very wide, stared at him and said: "All right, I took it. But I'm not giving it back. You can call the police if you like, go on, take me to court for thieving!"

"I haven't suggested you're a thief," Song Jiang said.

"Then you admit I'm not a thief!"

Hearing all this Song Jiang felt even more afraid. He said, "I've never treated you and your mother badly, please give it back. I have to go to work."

"I suppose you're angry because of me and Third Brother Zhang," Poxi said. "Well, there's a difference all right, between you two. He's not a criminal who ought to be chopped into pieces. He isn't in league with bandits, like you."

"My dear girl," Song Jiang said, "don't talk so loud. We don't want the neighbours to hear." "You're scared people will hear about it. Well, you've only yourself to blame! I've got the letter and I shall keep it safe. If you want me to let you off, you'll have to agree to three conditions."

"That's all right, I'd accept them if they were thirty!"

"I'm afraid you won't agree to them."

"If they are not impossible they will be performed. Just tell me what they are."

"From today you must return the contract by which I was given to you, and sign another paper certifying that you agree to my marrying Zhang, and will not at any time in the future contest the marriage."

"I accept."

"The second is that you sign a paper saying that you will never ask for the jewels I wear or my wardrobe or the household furnishings, even though they were all provided by you."

"I accept."

"I'm afraid you're not going to accept the third condition."

"I've accepted the first two. Why ever should I refuse the third?"

"Then you must give me immediately the one hundred pieces of gold sent you by Chao Gai of the Marshes of Mount Liang, and in return I will keep quiet about your capital offence and return to you the article contained in the belt."

"I've agreed to both of the first two conditions. But those hundred gold pieces — although they were indeed offered to me, I didn't accept them, I sent them back. If I really had them, I would give them to you with both hands."

"I knew it!" Poxi said. "How true the saying is, 'An official who sees money is like a fly that smells blood.' They send someone to offer you gold, and you ask me to believe you've sent it back? What a load of balls! You're a government official aren't you? 'What cat doesn't like fish?' Does Yama, King of Hell, set the dead free and send them back? Who are you trying to fool? What's so difficult about giving me the hundred pieces of gold? If you're afraid because it's stolen gold, just melt it down and give it to me like that."

"You must know I'm a man of honour," Song Jiang said, "I couldn't tell a lie. But if you won't believe me, give me three days and I'll go home and sell everything to get your hundred pieces of gold. So now give me back the wallet."

Poxi laughed contemptuously. "You're a cunning bastard, Blackie," she said. "You think you can cheat me like a little child. Imagine me giving you the wallet and the letter now, and three days later coming to ask for the gold, that would really be like the paid mourners asking for money after the coffin's gone! No, it's got to be money in one hand, merchandise in the other. Quick, run and get the money, and we'll make the exchange."

"But I assure you the money does not exist," Song Jiang said.

"All right, let's see if tomorrow you still say the same thing at the magistrate's court!"

Hearing the words "magistrate's court," Song Jiang's temper boiled over. There was no way of holding it in now. He gave the girl a ferocious look and said: "You still won't give it back?"

"D'you really think I'm going to give it back, just because you look at me like that?"

"You really won't give it back?"

"I won't, how many more times do I have to say it? The only way I'll give it back is in front of the Magistrate!"

Then Song Jiang tore the bedcovers away from the girl. She had taken the item in question to bed with her; she didn't mind about the bedcovers but she clutched the belt to her breast with both hands. However, as Song Jiang pulled away the bedcovers, he had seen the end of the belt emerging next to the girl's breasts. He gave a cry of triumph: "Here it is!"

Either you must abstain, or you've got to go all the way; half-measures don't work. Song Jiang pulled with both hands. The girl refused to let go. There was Song Jiang at the bedside, pulling for all he was worth, and Poxi holding on for dear life! Then Song Jiang gave a mighty tug and the little dagger was shaken loose and fell out onto the bed. He picked it up.

When she saw Song Jiang with the dagger in his hand, Poxi screamed: "Help! Blackie is going to kill me!"

This cry it was that gave Song Jiang the idea. All that accumulated anger had found no outlet till now. When she screamed a second time, he held her down with his left hand, and brought the right hand down quickly, slashing across the throat. The red blood spurted out. She went on gurgling and Song Jiang struck again, in case she was not dead. This time the head fell on the pillow, the neck practically cut through.

The hand acts and a life is severed;
A knife falls and the girl is dead.
Now the seven wandering senses
Repair to the solemn halls of death;
Now the three ethereal spirits
Must return to the city of the unjustly dead.
Bright eyes closed forever,
The body lies straight and stiff athwart the couch;

Sweet mouth half open,
The blood-soaked head has fallen back on the pillow.
Beauty's accustomed glamour now is fled:
Could these poor charms entice you into bed?

Having, in his rage, killed Yan Poxi, Song Jiang grabbed the wallet, pulled out the letter, and burnt it in the flame of the lamp. He then fastened on the belt and ran downstairs. The old woman who was sleeping below had heard them arguing but had not paid much attention. But when she heard her daughter shout: "Help, Blackie is going to kill me!" she didn't know what was going on. She jumped up, dressed, and hurrying upstairs ran straight into Song Jiang. "What are you two making such a fuss about?" she asked.

"Your daughter is really too badly behaved," Song Jiang said. "I've killed her."

"What a thing to say!" said the old woman, laughing. "I know you've got a fierce look about you, and sometimes you can't take your drink but as for killing people ... Registrar, you shouldn't make fun of an old woman!"

Song Jiang said: "If you don't believe me, go to her room and look. I really have killed her."

"I don't believe you," she said. But when she pushed open the door, there was the body lying in a pool of blood.

"Mercy on us!" she cried. "What am I to do?"

"I'm a gentleman," Song Jiang said. "I don't run away. I'll do whatever you wish."

"The wretched girl had a bad character," the old woman said. "I can understand your killing her. But now, you see, I've got no one to care for me in my old age."

"That's no problem," Song Jiang said. "If that's how you feel, there's no need to worry. I have means enough to keep you in food and clothing, and ensure you live out the rest of your days in comfort."

"That's good then, Registrar. I am truly grateful. But what about her, on the bed there, how are we going to bury her?"

"That's quite simple," Song Jiang said. "I will go to Chen's and buy a coffin for you. When the coroner's men come for the burial, I will take care of them. And I'll give you ten taels of silver for the funeral expenses."

"Registrar," she said, pretending gratitude, "we'd better get the coffin quickly before it gets light. We don't want the neighbours to see."

"Good," said Song Jiang. "Bring me paper and ink and I'll write you a note so you can pick it up."

"A note won't do. You'd much better go and fetch it yourself, then they'll get it done at once."

"Yes, you're right."

They went downstairs together. The old woman fetched a padlock from her room. She locked the front door and kept the key.

So now there they were, the two of them, just about to pass the government offices. It was still very early and the day had not yet dawned but the office gates had just been opened. When they were almost level with them, just a little to the left, the old woman suddenly grabbed Song Jiang and shouted: "Help, murder! This is a murderer!"

Song Jiang was horrified. He quickly turned and put a hand over her mouth, saying, "Shut up!" but he couldn't silence her. Some constables who were waiting in front of the government offices came running. When they recognized Song Jiang, they said: "Shut your mouth, you silly old hag. The Registrar can't be a murderer. If there's something wrong, all you need to do is explain properly."

"But it's true," said Mrs. Yan, "he is a murderer. Arrest him for me and we'll go to the Magistrate together."

Now everyone knew Song Jiang for the most upright of men, he was loved by all, high and low. In the whole district there was not a single person who didn't respect him. So none of the constables was willing to lay hands on him, or to give credence to the old woman's accusations. As the verse says:

When the good man is in trouble, everyone is sorry;
The wicked are hated, even when fortune smiles.
If all your life you make restraint your creed,
You can expect favour in your hour of need.

Just then, while the old woman was shouting in vain for help, Bullock Tang happened to pass, carrying a tray of pickled ginger, off to ply his trade in front of the government offices. He saw the old woman hanging on to Song Jiang and yelling for justice. When he realized it was Mrs. Yan, all the anger of the day before came back to him. He put his tray down on one of the stools belonging to Old Wang, the vendor of tonic soup, and then forced his way through the crowd, shouting: "You old bawd, what do you think you're doing, molesting Registrar Song like this?"

"Bullock Tang," the old woman replied, "don't you try and help him to escape, or you'll pay for it with your life!"

The Bullock was enraged, he wasn't going to listen to her, not on your life! He seized her arm and wrenched it away. At the same time, without stopping to ask questions, he spread his five fingers and dealt the old woman a blow that made her see a whole sky-full of stars. She almost passed out and had to let go. Song Jiang made his escape, disappearing into the crowd.

The old woman now grabbed Bullock Tang, shouting: "Registrar Song has killed my daughter, and you let him go!"

Tang began to be afraid. "How was I supposed to know?" he said.

"All of you help me to arrest the assassin!" the old woman screamed. "If you don't, you're all accomplices." The policemen, out of respect for Song Jiang, had refused to act. But when it came to Bullock Tang, they arrested him without hesitation. They advanced in a group, and while one of them seized Mrs. Yan, three or four of them grabbed Tang. Pushing and pulling him this way and that, they marched him off to the Yuncheng Magistracy. It was really a case of:

Luck & ruin need no door,
We summon them for ourselves;
Who dressed in hemp would fight a fire,
Ignites himself, and makes the flames burn higher.

When Song Jiang had left Liu Tang he took advantage of the bright moonlight to stroll towards his home but he happened to meet Madame Yan who quickly came forward and said to him, "Although I sent requests for you to come and visit us yet you did not come probably because you are such an important person. My worthless daughter may have said some bad things and offended you but I will punish her and tell her to apologize to you. By chance I meet you this evening so I should be glad if you would come with me."

"I am very busy at the yamen today," said Song Jiang, "and I cannot arrange to get away but I will come some other day."

"That will not do," said Madame Yan. "My daughter is expecting you at home, and I think you had better go and console her. Why do you act so harshly?"

"I really am very busy today," said Song Jiang, "but I certainly will go tomorrow."

Madame Yan said, "But I want you to go today." She took hold of Song Jiang's coat, and pulled him, "Who has been estranging your mind against us? I and my daughter will have to depend on you for the remainder of our lives. You must not listen to what other people say about us as that is only idle talk. You yourself must take charge of our affairs. Whatever wrong my daughter has done I am responsible for. I think you had better come with me this time."

"You need not tug at me like that," said Song Jiang, "I am really too busy to go now."

"If you neglect your business a little," said Madame Yan, "the magistrate will not punish you. I let pass this opportunity, I am afraid that we shall have a difficulty in meeting again. I hope you will come with me to my home where I shall have something to tell you."

Song Jiang being a quick-tempered man was annoyed at the woman still holding his coat so he said, "Release me at once! I will go with you."

"Then do not run away," said the woman, "because I cannot catch you."

"Why do you speak to me in such a way!" said Song Jiang.

They both started off, and when they reached the house Song Jiang stopped in front of the door. The woman spread out her arms behind him and said, "As you have come so far why do you not enter?" Song Jiang then entered, and sat down on a stool inside. Now the woman was very crafty, and being afraid that Song Jiang might try to get away, she sat down by his side and called out to her daughter, "Daughter, your lover has arrived!" Yan Poxi was upstairs lying on the bed, and was just idly thinking and gazing at the lamp. When she however heard her mother say that her lover had arrived she at once thought it was Zhang, and got up at once. She put her hair in order while she muttered to herself. "That fellow again. I am tired of waiting for him. I shall have to box his ears!" She hurried downstairs, and looked through the door screen. There was a glass lamp which gave a good light in the room, and by its aid she saw Song Jiang sitting there. Upon seeing this she immediately turned round, and going back upstairs again lay down on the bed. Madame Yan had heard her daughter come downstairs and then go back so she called out:

"Your lover is here. Why did you go back upstairs?"

"Is this room too far away?" asked the girl Yan Poxi, still lying on the bed. "Cannot he come here! As he is not blind why does he not come himself. Or is he waiting for me to fetch him? You are too talkative!"

Madame Yan said, "My daughter has not seen you arrive. She is very bitter about your being absent for so long. You must expect to be abused in this way." Laughingly she said, "How would it be if I go upstairs with you?"

When Song Jiang heard the girl Yan Poxi talk in this way he was somewhat annoyed but as the woman was now pulling at his coat again he gave way and went upstairs. There was a large room upstairs with six rafters, and one half near the entrance was occupied by a table and several stools. The other half was a bedchamber with a bedstead carved on three sides, and railings at the head and foot. The bed had red gauze curtains, and at the side was a clothes horse with towels hanging on it. On a yellow lacquered table was a pewter lamp, a bowl for washing the hands, and a brush. On both sides of the table were two stools. In front of the table there was hanging a picture of a woman. Facing the bed were four plain chairs standing in a row.

Upon entering the room Song Jiang sat down on a small stool close to the bed. Madame Yan went to the bed and assisted her daughter to rise, and said, "The Chief Clerk is here! Your bad disposition and talk has hurt his feelings. He did not want to come here. You stay at home and only think about him. Now after great difficulty I have induced him to come. Why do you not get up, and say something to him? Your manner will turn him against you."

The girl Yan Poxi shook off her mother's hand, and said, "Why are you doing this? I did not do anything bad, and as he himself did not want to come here, what have I got to apologize for?"

Song Jiang heard this but held his peace. The woman placed a chair close to Song Jiang and pulled Yan Poxi towards it saying, "Now you sit down near him. You may not apologize but you must not be so irritated."

But the girl did not want to sit close to Song Jiang, and sat down opposite him. Song Jiang bent his head down, and the girl turned her head to one side so as not to look at him.

Madame Yan said, "If we have no wine how can we have pleasure? I have some wine, and I will buy some fruit and then we can have a talk with this Chief Clerk. My daughter, while I am away I want you to sit near this Chief Clerk, and do not feel ashamed."

"As this woman stays here I am not able to get away," thought Song Jiang. "But as soon as she leaves here I will go after her."

Madame Yan saw that Song Jiang still wanted to leave so when she left the room she fastened the door with a kind of latch so that it could not be opened from inside. Song Jiang perceived the move, and thought that Madame Yan had correctly judged his intention. On getting down below Madame Yan went to the kitchen, and saw a pan of water on the stove so she added fuel to the fire to make it boil. She then went to the alleyway and bought some fruit, fresh fish, cooked chicken, a condiment of fish. Upon returning home she arranged this food on a tray, filled a jar with wine, and half filled a pewter kettle with it, and then placed the latter in the pan of boiling water to warm the wine. When it was warm she poured the wine into a winepot, and filled several bowls with vegetables; brought out several wine cups; three pairs of chopsticks; and placing these all on a tray took them upstairs. She placed them on the table in the outer room, and then opening the door of the inner room, she took them in and placed them on the yellow varnished table.

She saw that Song Jiang was still holding his head down and her daughter turning her head away, so she said, "Daughter, get up and offer a cup of wine."

"You two can drink together," said Yan Poxi, "as I am not in a good frame of mind."

"Daughter," said Madame Yan, "since you were a child your parents have been indulgent to you. But you cannot be wayward to any other person."

"But if I won't offer him wine—what then?" asked Yan Poxi. "Do you think he can throw a sword and cut off my head?"

Madame Yan laughed at this, and said, "Now it is my fault. But he is well-mannered, and not the same as you. If you will not offer him wine, then you can at last turn your head this way and drink the wine."

But as Yan Poxi was still unwilling to turn her head, Madame Yan herself offered Song Jiang a cup of wine, and he felt constrained to drink it. Madame Yan laughed and said, "I hope that you will not be offended. You must not pay attention to other people's idle talk, and tomorrow I will tell you matters fully. People outside saw you come here very often and being jealous spread all kinds of nonsensical stories but they're just farting. Take no notice of what they say. Now drink up your wine." She filled three cups of wine, and placed them on the table. She then spoke to her daughter again, "Do not behave in this childish manner but drink a cup of wine at least."

"You need not bother me any more," said Yan Poxi, "I have had enough to eat."

"Daughter," said Madame Yan, "you ought at least to drink wine with your lover."

Yan Poxi heard this but thought that as she preferred Zhang Wenyuan she would not submit to any annoyance from this fellow. However, if she did not make him drunk he would certainly want more from her. She then exerted herself and drank half a cup of wine.

Madame Yan laughed again and said, "Daughter, do not worry again but cheer up and after drinking two cups of wine you can then go to sleep. Chief Clerk, you also had better drink a few cups of wine."

Because she had exhorted him so much Song Jiang drank about five cups of wine. Madame Yan also drank several cups of wine, and then went downstairs to warm some more wine. She had not been at all pleased when she saw that her daughter would not drink the wine but now that her daughter had done so she was glad and said to herself, "If we can only keep him here for this night his anger will subside, and when that has disappeared we can continue to live with him for some time more." While she was attending to the fire she drank three big cups of wine. She began to feel half tipsy but still she measured out another bowl of wine. She then filled a kettle half full of warm wine and crawled upstairs with it. She saw that Song Jiang still hung down his head, and that her daughter still turning away her head was toying with her skirt. She laughed loudly and said, "You two are not clay images so why do you not say something? Chief Clerk, you are a man you ought to be kind. It would be better if you flirted a little with her."

Song Jiang did not know what to do so he remained silent. He indeed had no plan for getting away from that place. Yan Poxi thought that he never normally came to visit her but now expected her to apologize to him, and laugh and flirt as before. But she was not going to flirt with him just then.

Madame Yan drank much wine, and she was getting fuddled. She criticized loosely about other people and gossiped as she wished.

Now in the town there was a man named Tang Niu-er whose business was to sell pickles. When he had nothing to do he roamed about the streets looking for odd jobs, and Song Jiang had helped him many times. If he heard of any thing he went and told it to Song Jiang who gave him money for the information. He was not afraid of taking risks. Now on this day he had been gambling and had lost all his money so he went to the yamen to find Song Jiang. But he could not find him there, and the people on the street asked him whom he was looking for, and why he was in such a hurry.

"I am in a great hurry," said Tang Niu-er, "I am trying to find my patron; but I cannot find him."

"Who is your patron?" asked the people.

"He is the Chief Clerk at the yamen—Song Jiang."

The people told him that they had just seen him walking along with Madame Yan.

"That girl Yan Poxi," said Tang Niu-er, "is a deceiving slut. She and that fellow Zhang Wenyuan have the real hots for each other and are now hoodwinking Song Jiang. The latter has heard some rumours and therefore he has not been there for a long time. Now he must have been dragged away by that brothel-keeper Madame Yan who will try and get into his good graces again. So I will now go there, and drink some wine with those two and perhaps also earn a little money." When he reached the entrance of the Yan family's house he saw the lights inside, and noticed that the door was not locked. He entered and standing at the foot of the ladder he heard Madame Yan upstairs laughing loudly. Proceeding stealthily he ascended the ladder, and peeping through a chink in the door saw Song Jiang and Yan Poxi hanging down their heads, Madame Yan was sitting at the side of the table, and was simply driveling. He opened the door, saluted the three, and then awaited.

Song Jiang thought that the fellow had arrived at a very opportune moment so he looked towards him and pursed his lips as a hint for him to speak. Now Tang Niu-er was a smart man, and understood the hint, and immediately said to Song Jiang, "I have been looking for you everywhere. How is it that you are wasting your time and drinking wine here?"

"Are you looking for me because of some urgent business at the yamen?" asked Song Jiang.

"Sir," said Tang Niu-er, "why do you forget things? Early this morning there was an affair at the yamen. The magistrate was upset, and sent men about five times to find you but they all returned without having found you, and this worried the magistrate very much, sir, you had better go back at once."

As the matter is evidently urgent I must go at once," said Song Jiang. He got up to depart but Madame Yan stood in front of him, and said, "Sir, you must not go. This man is only inventing a false tale." Turning to Tang Niu-er, she said, "You tricky thief. Do you expect to fool me? It reminds me of the old proverb, 'Do not try to get the axe from Lu Ban, the god of the carpenters.' The magistrate will by now have left the court, and returned to his wife to drink wine and enjoy himself. What is the business he is upset about? With such talk you might try to deceive an imp but you cannot get round me with it."

"It is quite true that the magistrate is still waiting to transact that affair, and I am not telling lies," said Tang Niu-er.

Madame Yan abused him, saying, "Your mother is farting like a dog. I have two eyes, and can see things quite clearly. I saw the clerk motion with his lips to you, and give you the lead to say this. You did not induce him to come here so why do you now want to take him away. A proverb says, 'Murder may be pardoned but unreasonableness is hard to forgive.'" She then jumped forward, caught him by the neck, and in the struggle which followed Tang Niu-er fell down the ladder. Standing below he asked why she had assaulted him. The woman shouted, "Don't you understand that ruining one's trade and livelihood is as much as killing one's parents and wife? Now don't make a loud noise about this or I will give you a beating, you thief and beggar!" She had now descended the ladder and Tang Niu-er challenged her, "Hit me!" and without more ado she slapped his face with her hand, and knocked him through the hanging screen at the door. She then put the screen in position, closed both leaves of the door, and bolted them. Tang Niu-er recovering from the blow stood outside the door, and shouted, "You crooked brothel-keeper! You need not hurry! If not for my respect for Song Jiang I would have entered now and smashed all your things up. If I don't meet you one day I shall meet you some other day. If I don't eventually kill you, my name is not Tang." He then departed, beating his breast and cursing as he went.

Madame Yan re-ascended the ladder, and addressed Song Jiang, "Sir, don't take any notice of that beggar. He is a scandal-monger, and only does it for a drink. He sleeps in holes and corners, and will die an untimely death. Such a thief now attempts to fool us at our door!"

Song Jiang was a very honest man, and seeing that she had seen through their ruse he had no means of escape.

The woman continued, "Sir, you must not blame me for this. I know that you have treated me very well before. Now, please drink a cup of wine with my daughter. I guess that as you two have not seen each other for a long time, you want to go to bed early." After pressing Song Jiang to drink two more cups of wine, she picked up the tray, and went downstairs to the kitchen.
Song Jiang being left in quietness upstairs meditated that there might have been something between Madame Yan and her daughter and Zhang Wenyuan but he could not make out whether the rumour was true. Again as it was too late in the night, so he decided to sleep there whereby perhaps he would find out what Yan Poxi's ideas were. He would also be able to find out what were the state of the girl's feelings towards him.
Just then Madame Yan came upstairs again, and remarked that it was getting late, and that she had already told them to go to bed.
"Mind your own business," said the daughter. "You go to bed yourself."
As Madame Yan again departed downstairs she laughed and said, "I hope you will have a peaceful sleep, sir, have much pleasure this night, and get up late tomorrow morning." Upon arriving downstairs she put the things in the kitchen in order, washed her hands and feet, and then went to sleep.
Song Jiang sat on the stool for a long time looking at the girl and then heaved a sigh. It was now about 10 P.M., and the girl without undressing lay down on the bed, with her face turned away from him and went to sleep. He thought that she was a mean detestable person as she had not shown any respect for him but had just gone to sleep. He had been wheedled with so much talk from that old woman, and drunk so much wine, and as it was now so late that he had to go to sleep there. He then took off his headgear, and placed it on the table; took off his outer garments, and put them on a clotheshorse; unloosened his belt, and placed his dagger and secretarial hand bag on the rail at the head of the bed; took off his boots and socks; he then got on the bed and lay down the reverse way to the girl. After a little time he heard the girl laughing in a sneering manner. He felt quite melancholy and could not sleep any way. There is an ancient saying, "When the pleasure is great the night seems short; when one feels lonely the time seems unending." By about 3 A.M. the effects of the wine had vanished, and about five o'clock Song Jiang got up, washed his face in cold water and dressed. He then said, "You common slut! You have no decency."
The girl also did not sleep, and hearing this she turned over, and said to him, "I see that you do not blush." Now Song Jiang was very much upset, and without saying anything he went downstairs.
Madame Yan was still in bed but hearing the sound of footsteps on the ladder she called out, "Sir, you had better take a little rest, and leave when it is quite daylight. But why do you get up at five o'clock?"
Song Jiang did not reply to this but went to the door to open it. Madame Yan called out again, "Well, if you will go will you please close the door as you go out?" Song Jiang did this. He was still very much annoyed, and he thought of going back. Upon reaching the yamen gate he saw there a lamp burning brightly on a small stall owned by a medicine vendor named Wang who had opened business to catch the early customers. When the stall keeper saw Song Jiang he quickly asked him, "Sir, why are you out so early?"
"I drank too much wine last night," said Song Jiang, "and mistook the watchman's reports of the time of night."
"As you got drunk last night," said Wang, "you had better have a bowl of this dried orange peel soup which will sober you up."
Song Jiang agreed to this, and sat down on a stool. Wang mixed a very strong dose of his medicinal soup, and handed it to Song Jiang. The latter meditated that this man never asked for money when he drank his soup, because sometime before he had promised to provide a coffin for him but so far had not given it to him. Song Jiang then remembered that he still had in his purse the piece of gold he had accepted the previous day from Chao Gai's agent, and he thought it would please Wang very much if he now gave him the money to buy a coffin. He, therefore, said to Wang, "Sometime ago I promised to give you money to buy a coffin but as I have now got some gold here I will give it to you, and you can go and buy a coffin from Old Chen and keep it in your home. When you die at the age of a hundred, I will also provide some more money."
"My benefactor," said Wang, "I am deeply grateful for your providing me with a coffin. I cannot possibly expect to be able to repay your generosity during this life but in the next life if I am a donkey or a horse I will certainly do my best to make up for your kindness."
"You need not say that," said Song Jiang. He then lifted his gown to get at the purse in a pocket of his waistcoat but he was startled and thought: "How sad! I have forgotten that I left my purse on the rail at the head of the bed, and in leaving in a hurry did not put it back in my belt. The money does not matter much but it is wrapped up in that letter from Chao Gai. I ought to have burnt the letter in the wine shop while Liu Tang was there but I did not want him to tell Chao Gai of such a thing as the latter might think I did not value his letter. I would have burnt it in my lodging had not that woman Yan induced me to go with her. I could have burnt it in Yan's house but I was afraid of that girl seeing me do so. If I had not left so hurriedly this morning I would not have forgotten it. I saw that Yan Poxi was looking at a book of songs, so that she evidently can read and if she finds that letter there will be trouble. He then stood up, and said to Wang, "Please excuse me. I am not telling a lie because I thought I had the money in my purse but now I find that it is not there so I will go back home and get it."
"You need not go for that," said Wang. "It will do if you give it me tomorrow."
"But I have another matter I must attend to at the same place so I had better go," said Song Jiang. He then departed with all speed to Madame Yan's house.
When Yan Poxi heard Song Jiang leave her room she got up, and soliloquized. "That fellow annoyed me so much that I could not sleep. He was so impudent as to expect me to apologize to him. But I won't apologize! I am on very good terms with Zhang Wenyuan, so why should I go out of my way to apologize to Song Jiang. If he does not come here again I shall not mind." While saying this she put the bed in order, took off her outer wadded coat, her waist belt, and her undergarments. There was a lamp burning near the head of the bed, and by its light she saw the purse hanging on the bed rail. Upon seeing this she laughed and said, "Black the Third" (her nickname for Song Jiang) has so many things that he has forgotten his purse. I will take it and give it to Zhang Wenyuan to wear." When she picked it up she felt that it was heavy so she took it and emptied its contents on the table, and saw the bar of gold and the letter. When she saw that it was really gold she laughed again and said, "Heaven intends this gold for me to buy some food for Zhang Wenyuan to eat. He has been rather lean these last few days, so I will buy some food for him as a nourishment." She then picked up the letter, and saw that it concerned the business of Chao Gai. She soliloquized, "I thought the water bucket should be lowered down the well but now the well is inside the bucket. So Song Jiang is in my hands. I can now arrange to marry Zhang Wenyuan as I have that fellow in my hand. You have got a hundred taels of silver from the brigands at Liangshan Marsh as you act as their agent. There is no need for any sudden action, as I can deal with you whenever I like. So I will take this letter and the bar of gold and put them again in the purse, and have no fear of you telling the fairy fox to come here and steal them away."
Just as she was saying this she heard someone pushing at the street door down below, and she also heard her mother call out from her bed "who is that?"
The person outside called out, "It is I!"
Madame Yan replied, "I told you it was too early, and instead of believing my word you would go. And now you realize that it is still early, you have come back. But you can come in, and have another sleep with my daughter, and then depart when it is broad daylight."
The man did not reply but went upstairs. Yan Poxi hearing this knew that it was Song Jiang, and hurriedly hid the purse belt and dagger in the bed quilt. She then lay down on the bed with her face turned to the wall, and pretended to snore as though she was sound asleep.
Song Jiang burst into the room, and went to the head of the bed but when he did not see his belt and purse on the rail where he had left them, he was surprised. But suppressing his temper he shook the girl and said, "Just think of my previous kindness to you, and return at once my purse and belt."
But the girl still pretended to be asleep, and did not reply.
So Song Jiang shook her again and said, "Do not be annoyed at my disturbing you like this. I will come again tomorrow, and explain matters."
Yan Poxi now replied, "I want to sleep. Who is calling me?"
"You know who it is," said Song Jiang, "so why do you pretend like this?"
The girl turned over and said, "Black the Third! What did you say?"
"Give me back my purse," said Song Jiang.
"Why do you ask me for it, seeing that you did not hand it over to me?"
"I left it on the rail at the head of your bed. As evidently no man has been here since I left you must have taken it," said Song Jiang.
"Bah! Did you not see a demon come here?"
"It was my fault last night," said Song Jiang, "and I will apologize tomorrow. But now you give me the purse, and fool me no more."
"Who is trying to fool you? I certainly have not had it."
"When I left you had not taken off your clothes to sleep," said Song Jiang. "But now you have pulled the quilt over you. You must have taken my purse when you got up to put the bed in order."
The girl raised her eyebrows in surprise, and opening wide her eyes said, "Well, I did take it but I won't give it back. You can send some one from the yamen and have me arrested as a thief, and give your decision also."
"I will not accuse you of being a thief," said Song Jiang.
"Then you know that it is not me that is the thief?" said Yan Poxi.
When he heard this he became more upset and said, "I always treated both of you well, so give it to me at once. I must go to attend my business."
"You previously did not like me to have anything to do with Zhang Wenyuan," said Yan Poxi. "He may be disagreeable with you but he is not deserving of death. He is anyhow better than you as he has no transactions with bandits."
"Dear sister," said Song Jiang, "do not talk in such a loud voice as it will be of grave consequence if the neighbours hear what you say."
"As you are afraid of people outside hearing of your affair," said Yan Poxi, "you ought not to have done it. I am certainly going to keep your letter. But I will let you off if you will do three things for me."
"Even if you ask me to do thirty things for you I will do them," answered Song Jiang.
"But I am afraid that you won't do them," said Yan Poxi.
"If I can do them I will do them," said Song Jiang. "May I ask what those three things are?"
"First," said Yan Poxi, "you must return to me the document I gave you when you purchased me as your concubine, and also write a letter permitting me to marry Zhang Wenyuan, and promising that you will not make trouble between us."
"That I agree to," said Song Jiang.
"The second," said Yan Poxi, "is that all the jewellery and clothes and other things that you have presented to me shall belong to me, and you will also put that down in writing."
"That also I will do," said Song Jiang.
"But I am afraid that you will not agree to the third condition," said Yan Poxi.
"I have already agreed to two, so why not the third also?" asked Song Jiang.
"You must also give me the hundred taels of gold that you received from Chao Gai at Liangshan Marsh, and I will then return to you the letter which is an extremely important piece of evidence should there be a very big court case."
"I will do the first two things you require," said Song Jiang, "but I am afraid that I cannot do the third, because although they sent one hundred taels of gold yet I refused to accept it. Had I received it I would certainly present it to you with both hands."
Yan Poxi said, "You perhaps remember the common saying, 'If an official sees money he grabs it as a fly sees blood.' Do you expect me to believe that you sent the money back? You're just farting. Officials are like cats, and who ever heard of a cat refusing to eat meat? When a man reaches the afterlife will King Yama let him off? You've got to be kidding! You must give me the money at once. If you are afraid that people will discern it as booty from the bandits you had better get it melted down at once."
"You ought to know that I am an honest man and not given to telling lies," said Song Jiang. "If you however do not believe what I say then give me three days so that I shall have time to sell my household goods, and then I will give you a hundred taels of gold. Now give me my purse."
Yan Poxi sneered at him and said, "How artful you are! You treat me as if I was a child. If I gave you the purse and the letter now it would be like a dirge singer at a funeral asking for payment after the burial. It would be better if you came again with money in your hand, and I will then exchange the letter for the money."
"But I have not got the money," said Song Jiang.
"Then we shall have to go to the court where you can say that you have not got it," said Yan Poxi.
When Song Jiang heard the word "court" he could not restrain his anger any more. He glared at her and said, "Are you not going to hand me that letter?"
The girl replied. "As you are so terrible I won't give it to you."
"So you really mean not to give it to me?" said Song Jiang.
"I won't," said Yan Poxi, "and I can assure you a hundred times more that I would not give it to you. I will only give it to you in the yamen court."
Song Jiang pulled the quilt off her. Yan Poxi took the purse, and held it to her breast with both hands. Song Jiang saw the purse in her hands when he pulled the quilt off, and said, "So you have it!" so saying he reached forward with both hands. But Yan Poxi would not let go. Song Jiang was now determined to get it at all costs, whereas the girl was equally determined to die rather than give it up. Song Jiang caught hold of the dagger and with a wrench got it away. When the girl saw that he had got the dagger she called out, "Black the Third! Murder!" This suggested to Song Jiang the idea for the first time and when she called out "murder" a second time he seized her and cut her throat with the dagger. As Song Jiang was afraid that she might not be dead, he took his dagger, and cut off her head that rolled to one side on the pillow. He then took the letter from the purse, and holding it above the lamp burnt it to ashes. He put on his belt, and went downstairs.
Madame Yan down below was not asleep but although she heard the two talking upstairs in rather loud voices she paid no attention to it. But when she heard her daughter call out "Murder," she hastily got up, put on her clothes and was going up the ladder when she met Song Jiang coming down. "What are you two quarreling about?" she asked. "As your daughter had no manners I killed her," he said. "Why do you talk like that?" she asked. "Only your eyes look wild and you are always so bad-tempered when drunk as to be fond of killing someone. Please do not joke with me."
"If you do not believe," he said, "then go upstairs and look in the room. I certainly have killed her."
"I do not believe that," said Madame Yan. But when she pushed the door open she saw the head lying in a pool of blood. She then said, "How awful! What shall I do?"
"I am a hero, and will not try to escape," said Song Jiang, "and I will do whatever you require."
"She was not a good girl," said Madame Yan, "and you were quite right in killing her. But who will support this old woman now?"
"That does not matter," he said. "As you look at it in that way there is no need for grief. I am wealthy, and I will see that you are well provided for for the rest of your life."
"It is very good of you to talk like that," she said, "and I wish to thank you very much. But as my daughter's corpse is here how shall we get rid of it?'
"That will be easy," he said. "I will go to Old Chen and get a coffin for you. I will also send the coroner here to arrange matters without any inquiry being held. I have here ten taels of gold which you can have to cover any small immediate expenses."
She thanked him again and said, "You had better get the coffin sent at once before daybreak so that the neighbours may not know what has happened."
"All right," said Song Jiang. "Let me have pen and ink, and I will write a note for you to take to Chen and get the coffin."
"Instead of writing a letter it would be much better if you go yourself and get the coffin sent here without delay."
"Let it be so, then," he said. They both went downstairs, and Madame Yan locked the street door. They then both went to get the coffin.
It was very early and not yet twilight but as they were passing the yamen a man was just opening the door. There Madame Yan took hold of Song Jiang, and called out, "Here is the murderer!" Song Jiang was startled upon hearing this but putting his hand over her mouth, said, "Do not call out!"
Many men in the yamen had heard the cry however, and came out to see what was the matter. Upon recognizing it was Song Jiang, they told the woman to desist as Song Jiang was not that kind of man, and that if she had anything to say she need not shout.
Madame Yan however called out, "He certainly is a murderer, and I want you to arrest him, and take him into the yamen."
But Song Jiang had always had an excellent reputation, and was generally liked, so that now there was not a single man there who would come forward to lay hands on him, and they did not believe what she said. Just then Tang Niu-er happened to pass that spot carrying a tray of preserved ginger for sale, and he saw Madame Yan holding Song Jiang, and calling out in an offended tone. Now remembering how she had assaulted him during the night he placed his tray on Wang's stall, and making his way through the crowd he shouted: "You brothel-keeper! Why are you holding this clerk?"
"Tang," she said, "do not attempt to get this man away from me, or you will have to answer for it with your life."
But Tang Niu-er took hold of her hand, and wrenched her loose of Song Jiang, and then gave her a sounding smack on the face which made her see stars. Before she recovered from her faintness, Song Jiang had escaped through the crowd.
Madame Yan, however, having taken hold of Tang Niu-er, called out, "Song Jiang has killed my daughter, and this man has helped him to escape."
"How could I know that?" asked Tang Niu-er hurriedly.
Madame Yan appealed to the crowd. "Will some of you assist me in arresting the murderer? If you do not do so you will be charged for allowing him to escape."
As none of the yamen aides were afraid of Tang Niu-er so they arrested him and also Madame Yan and took them into the yamen.

Fortune has no fixed tendency
It conies as one invites it;
To put out fire in a hempen coat,
One brings the flame on his body.

Tang Niu-er escaped.

022

The old woman Mrs. Yan Raises a Row at the County Office & Makes a Scene in the Magistrate's Court & shelves her grievance when they pay; Constable Sergeant Zhu Tong Gallantly & Righteously Lets Song Jiang Escape & get away

When the magistrate heard that the man the police had arrested was involved in a murder, he hastily came out and convened his court. In swarmed the policemen with Tang the Ox. The magistrate surveyed the people before him. To the left knelt a middle-aged woman, to the right a buffoon of a man. "What's all this about a murder?" the official demanded. "My name is Yan," said the woman, "and I had a daughter called Poxi. I sold her to Clerk Song Jiang as a concubine. Last night the three of us were drinking together. This Tang the Ox barged in and began making trouble. I cursed him and drove him out. All the neighbours know. This morning Song Jiang left early but then he came back and killed my daughter. I was hauling him to the magistracy when Tang the Ox pulled him free. I beg for justice!"
"You dared to help the culprit get away?" the magistrate said to Tang. "I didn't know anything about it. I only went to her house to borrow a little money from Song Jiang for a few bowls of wine. She threw me out. This morning I was on my way to market with some pickled ginger and I ran into her tugging at Song Jiang in front of the county office. I walked over to calm them down, and Song left. How did I know he killed her daughter?"
"You're talking rot," shouted the magistrate. "Song Jiang is an upright gentleman. He'd never kill anyone. The murderer must be you! Where are my officers?"

The court personnel were summoned. Zhang Wenyuan, on learning that Madame Yan had accused Song Jiang of killing her daughter—and his mistress—drew up her allegations in a formal complaint and docketed it. He then called men from the coroner's office, and the local ward chief, plus several neighbours, and they went together to the house of Madame Yan.
An examination of the corpse was conducted. Beside it lay the murderer's knife. A check revealed that death had been caused by cutting the victim's throat. The body was then placed in a coffin and removed to a monastery to await burial. The examining group returned to the county office.
The magistrate was very friendly with Song Jiang and wanted to exonerate him. He questioned Tang the Ox repeatedly. Each time, Tang said: "I know nothing about it."
"Why did you go to their house last night and raise a fuss? You must be involved."
"I only wanted some money for wine ..."
"Nonsense. Beat this lout!"
The attendants pounced on Tang like ravening beasts, trussed him up and gave him forty or fifty blows. But he stuck to his story. The magistrate knew Tang had nothing to do with the murder. It was only his anxiety to help Song Jiang that caused him to put Tang through this grilling. Finally, he had a cangue fastened around Tang's neck and ordered that he be removed to prison.
Zhang Wenyuan respectfully approached the magistrate. "The knife we found is Song Jiang's dagger," he said. "He ought to be brought in for questioning. Then we'll know where we stand."
Zhang was persistent, and the magistrate couldn't very well refuse. He sent men to Song's quarters to get him. The clerk had already fled. The policemen came back with a few neighbours and reported: "The murderer has escaped. No one knows where he's gone."
"His father Squire Song and his younger brother Song Qing live in Song Family Village," said Zhang. "They can be arrested and held as sureties until Song Jiang is caught and questioned."
The magistrate would have much preferred to fix the blame on Tang, and release him later after things cooled down. But Zhang had already prepared the necessary documents and instigated Madame Yan to press her charges. The magistrate had no choice but to send two or three men with a warrant for the arrest of Squire Song and his son Song Qing.
They arrived at the Song family manor and the old man came out to greet them. When all were seated in the hall, they handed him the warrant that he read.
"Please hear me, sirs. Our family have been farmers for generations," he said. "We earn our living from these fields and orchards. But Song Jiang is an unfilial son. Since childhood he's been rebellious. He wouldn't accept his station in life, and insisted upon becoming a court officer in spite of my urgings. I therefore disinherited him a few years ago, officially, before the previous county magistrate, and had him stricken from the family register. He is no longer a family member. He has his own quarters in town, and I and my son Song Qing work our fields here in this little village. Song Jiang does not share our food. He has nothing to do with us. I was always afraid he would do something wrong and get us involved. So I had the magistrate give me a formal disinheritance certificate. I'll show it to you."
Although the policemen knew this was an escape device, prepared long in advance, they were on very good terms with Song Jiang and wouldn't do anything to hurt him.
"We'll make a copy of it," they said, "and bring it back to the magistrate."
The squire feted them with dishes of chicken and goose, poured them wine, and presented them with a dozen ounces of silver. He produced the certificate and they copied it. Then they took their leave of the squire, returned to the county office and reported to the magistrate.
"Squire Song disinherited Song Jiang three years ago," they said. "Here is a copy of the certificate. For that reason we were unable to bring the old man in."
The magistrate was only looking for an excuse not to prosecute Song Jiang. "Squire Song has the certificate and Song Jiang has no other close relatives," he said. "All we can do is offer a reward of a thousand strings of cash for his arrest. Have proclamations to that effect posted everywhere."
At Zhang's instigation Madame Yan again came before the magistrate, her hair dishevelled in a fine display of grief.
"Song Jiang must have been hidden by his brother Song Qing to avoid having to appear in this case! Why doesn't Your Worship arrest him and see to it that I get justice?"
"His father complained about his disobedience three years ago and had him officially stricken from the family register. He has a certificate to prove it. We have no grounds for bringing in the old man and his son as sureties for Song Jiang's arrest."
"Your Worship, everyone knows that Song Jiang is called 'Filial and Gallant Dark Third Master.' That certificate is false! Justice, Your Worship, I beg you!"
"Poppycock! That certificate has my predecessor's official seal. How can it be false?"
Madame Yan sobbed and lamented. "Your Worship, 'The importance of human life is vast as the sky!' If you don't give me justice, I'll have to appeal to the prefecture! My daughter suffered a cruel death!"
Zhang then spoke in Madame Yan's behalf. "If you don't arrest Song Jiang, she'll go to the prefect, and that will be bad," he warned. "Suppose the prefecture starts checking our handling of the case? I won't know what to say."
Clearly there was reason in Zhang's words. The magistrate drew up the necessary papers and summoned constables Zhu Tong and Lei Heng.
"Take some men to the Song manor in Song Family Village and arrest the criminal Song Jiang."
On receiving the written documents, the constables selected about forty soldiers and proceeded briskly to the manor of the Song family. The old man hastily emerged to greet them.
"Please don't blame us, Squire," the constables said. "We're acting under orders. We have no choice. Where is your son, the clerk?"
"Song Jiang is an unfilial son. I have nothing to do with him. The previous magistrate separated him from us, as my certificate attests. Song Jiang was stricken from our family register over three years ago. He doesn't live with us and he never comes here."
"We've been ordered to make an arrest," said Zhu Tong. "I'm afraid we can't take your word for it. We'll have to search. Our superiors won't be satisfied with anything less." He ordered the soldiers to surround the manor, then said to Lei Heng: "I'll guard the front gate. Constable Lei, you go in and search."
Lei Heng entered the manor and explored it from end to end. Finally, he returned to the front gate.
"It's true. He's not in there," he said to Zhu Tong. "I'd better make sure," said Zhu Tong. "Constable Lei, you and our brothers guard the gate. I'm going to look the place over carefully, myself."
"I'm a law-abiding citizen," said Squire Song. "I wouldn't conceal anybody on the premises."
"This is a murder case," said Zhu Tong. "You must forgive us."
"Go right ahead, Constable. Make a thorough search, by all means."
"Constable Lei, you keep an eye on the squire. Don't let him leave."
Zhu Tong entered the manor, leaned his halberd against the wall, bolted the manor gate, and went into the family chapel. He pulled the altar table to one side, raised a trap-door, and twitched a thin rope handing down.
Below, a bell tinkled. Soon after, Song Jiang emerged. He viewed Zhu Tong in amazement.
"Don't blame me, brother, for coming to arrest you," the constable said. "You've always been very good to me, and we never concealed anything from each other. One day when we were drinking you told me: 'In front of the Buddha in my family chapel is an altar table. Beneath that is a trap-door leading to a concealment place below. You can use it if you ever have to hide out.' I remembered that, and today, when the magistrate sent me here with Lei Heng, against my will, I knew I'd have to find some way to cover for you. His Worship, the magistrate, also wants to help but Zhang and Madame Yan have been threatening to go to the prefect if he doesn't pursue the case, so he had to send me and Lei Heng to search the manor. I was afraid Lei Heng might interpret his orders too strictly and, if he saw you, not be flexible enough. So I posted him at the front gate and came here to you directly. This hiding place isn't bad but it's not really safe. Suppose someone found out about it and made a search? What could you do?"
"I've been thinking the same thing, myself," said Song Jiang. "If it weren't for your kindness, brother, I'd be jailed in no time!"
"No need to talk like that. The question is where can you go that's safe?"
"There are three possibilities. One is in Henghai County of Cangzhou Prefecture—the manor of Chai Jin the Small Whirlwind. Another is in Fort Clear Winds in Qingzhou Prefecture—the home of Hua Rong, known as the Lesser Li Guang. A third is in Squire Kong's manor on White Tiger Mountain. He has two sons. Kong Ming, the elder son, is called the Comet. Kong Liang, the younger, is called Flaming Star. I met them both several times in our county seat. But I can't decide which of these three places is best."
"Make up your mind quickly, brother, and act. You must go tonight. There's so time to lose!"
"I'll leave dealing with officials above and below entirely to you, brother. Come to the manor for whatever money you need."
"Don't worry. I'll take care of everything. Just concentrate on getting away."
Song Jiang thanked Zhu Tong and went back into his hideout. The constable replaced the trap-door and the altar table. He opened the door, picked up his halberd and came out.
"He's certainly not in the manor," Zhu Tong announced. And he called to his confederate: "Constable Lei, we'll take Squire Song in, shall we?"
"Zhu Tong is on very good terms with Song Jiang," Lei Heng mused. "Why does he want to arrest his father? That can't be what he means at all. If he says it again, I'll show my own sympathy."
The two constables assembled their soldiers and re-entered the hall. Squire Song courteously served everyone with wine.
"Never mind the drinks," said Zhu Tong. "We have to ask you and your fourth son Song Qing to come with us to the county."
"Why haven't we seen him?" queried Lei Heng.
"I sent Song Qing to the village to have some farm tools made. He's not in the manor. As for that unfilial Song Jiang, I disinherited him three years ago. I have an official document here to prove it."
"There's no use your talking," said Zhu Tong. "We have orders from the magistrate to bring you and your fourth son in."
"Constable Zhu," said Lei Heng, "please listen to me. If Clerk Song committed a crime, there must be some reason. It may not be a capital offence. Squire Song has a certificate—bearing an official seal, so it can't be false. We ought to remember what a good friend Clerk Song has been to us in the past, and make some concessions. If we take back a copy of the certificate, that will be enough."
Zhu Tong said to himself: "I spoke that way deliberately to lull any suspicion Lei might have." Aloud he said: "Since that's how you feel, brother, I don't want to play the villain."
"I sincerely thank you both," said the old man fervently. He had wine served to all, and presented the two constables with twenty ounces of silver. Zhu Tong and Lei Heng turned the money over to their forty men to be shared among them.
After copying the certificate they bid farewell to Squire Song, left the village, and returned with their men to the county.
They went directly to the magistrate, who was holding court. He asked them for a detailed report.
"We searched the entire manor and all the settlements around it twice," they said, "but Song Jiang was nowhere to be found. Squire Song is sick in bed and can't be moved. His condition is critical. Song Qing went away the month before last and still hasn't returned. For that reason, we were only able to bring you this copy of the certificate."
"In that case..." said the magistrate. He drew up a report to the prefect above him and prepared a proclamation calling for Song Jiang's arrest. Of that we'll say no more.
Many in the county office who were friendly with Song Jiang spoke to Zhang Wenyuan on his behalf. Zhang didn't want to offend them. Besides, nothing could bring the girl back to life. Zhang himself had often received favours from Song in the past. And so he let the matter drop.
Zhu Tong gave a sum of money to Madame Yan. He urged her not to appeal to the prefect. Since she accepted the compensation, she had no choice but to agree. He also sent a man with silver to the prefecture to see to it that no action was called for on the magistrate's report.
The magistrate issued a "Wanted" poster and an offer of a thousand strings of cash for Song Jiang's arrest. For "having let a criminal escape," Tang the Ox was given twenty blows, tattooed on the cheek and exiled to a place five hundred li away. Those being held as witnesses were released under bond and sent home.

*

Song Jiang's family were farmers. Why did they need a concealment cellar? Because in the Song Dynasty it was easy to get along if you were an official but very difficult if you were a small functionary. Why do we say that? Wicked ministers held sway in the imperial court. They used only their intimates and relatives and grabbed every penny they could lay their hands on. What was so hard about being a functionary? When a clerk committed a blunder in those days, if let off lightly he'd be tattooed and exiled to a wild and distant military outpost. If given the full penalty under the law he would be executed and all his property confiscated. It was wise to have a hiding place prepared in advance.
And to prevent his parents from becoming involved, he had them declare him unfilial and stricken from the family register. They obtained an official certificate as proof. He lived away from home, and had nothing to do with them, conducting all family business secretly in his private quarters. Many a man made such arrangements in the Song Dynasty.
To get back to Song Jiang. He emerged from the underground concealment and discussed the problem with his father and brother. "If it weren't for Zhu Tong," he said, "I would have been caught and prosecuted. We mustn't forget to repay his kindness. Now, brother and I must flee. If Heaven pities us and a general amnesty is declared, we shall return and see you again, father. Send money to Zhu Tong secretly, and ask him to use it discreetly above and below. Tell him to give some also to Madame Yan, so that she won't appeal and make difficulties."
"You can rest assured about that," said his father. "Be careful on the road, both of you. When you reach your destination, send me a letter, if you find a trustworthy messenger."
The two brothers tied their belongings into packs during the night. At the fourth watch they rose, washed, had breakfast, and got ready to go. Song Jiang was wearing a white felt hat with a broad brim, a white silk robe, a plum-pink sash, leggings and hemp sandals. Song Qing was dressed as a servant and carried the packs. They kowtowed and said goodbye to their father in front of the hall. None of them could restrain their tears.
"There is a long road ahead of you," said Squire Song. "Stay out of trouble."
Both sons instructed the vassals to look after the manor and take good care of the old man, and make sure he had plenty to eat. Then they looked on their swords, picked up their halberds and left the Song Family Village.
It was late autumn and early winter, and they moved along briskly. "With whom should we cast in our lot?" they wondered, after covering several stages.
"In the gallant fraternity I have often heard the name Lord Chai, of Henghai County in the prefecture of Cangzhou," Song Qing remarked. "They say he is the direct descendant of the emperors of Later Zhou. Of course, I've never met him. Why don't we put ourselves under his protection? He's chivalrous and generous, they say, and cordially receives all bold fellows and helps men in exile. He's the living incarnation of hospitable Meng Changjun. We ought to join him."
"That's what I've been thinking," Song Jiang responded. "Though we haven't met, he and I have been keeping up a correspondence."
They headed for Cangzhou, crossing mountains and streams, passing county towns and prefectural cities. Travellers stopping at inns must be careful of two things—eating from infected bowls and sleeping in beds where men have died.
But to get back to our story. After several days the brothers came to the borders of Cangzhou. They asked directions to Lord Chai's manor and, when they arrived there, addressed one of his vassals.
"Is Lord Chai at home?"
"No. He's gone to the eastern manor to collect grain rents."
"How far is it from here?" asked Song Jiang.
"Over forty li."
"How do we get there?"
"May I presume to ask your names, sirs?"
"I am Song Jiang, from Yuncheng County."
"Not Clerk Song, known as Timely Rain?"
"The same."
"Lord Chai speaks of you often, and says how sorry he is that you and he have never met. I'll be glad to show you the way."
The vassal led Song Jiang and his brother to the eastern manor. They reached it in less than three watches.
"If you two gentlemen will wait in this pavilion," said the vassal, "I will inform the lord that you are here."
"Good," said Song Jiang.
He and Song Qing entered the mountainside pavilion, rested their halberds, removed their swords and packs, and sat down.
Not long after the vassal departed, the central gate of the manor opened and Lord Chai came running out, followed by four or five attendants. He rushed up to the pavilion and dropped to his knees before Song Jiang.
"If you knew how I've been thinking of you! What heavenly wind brings you here? Nothing in my life have I wanted more. What wonderful luck!"
Song Jiang also fell on his knees and kowtowed. "Though only a distant petty functionary, I've come especially to see you!"
Lord Chai raised him up. "The lamp wick flowered last night, and this morning a magpie called. I didn't realize these were portents of your visit, brother!" His face was wreathed in smiles.
Song Jiang was delighted with the warmth of his reception. He introduced his brother.
"Take Clerk Song's luggage," Lord Chai instructed his servants. "They'll be staying in the west room of the rear hall." He led Song Jiang by the hand into the main hall, where they seated themselves as host and guests.
"If you don't mind my asking, brother," said Lord Chai, "how were you able to find time from your duties in Yuncheng County to come to our insignificant village?"
"For a long time your fame has thundered in my ears, my Lord. Although I received letters from you frequently I never could pay my respects in person because unfortunately my humble office always kept me busy. I'm a man of no talent, and I've done a stupid thing, and now my brother and I must find refuge. We recalled your chivalry and generosity, and we've come here hoping to join you."
Lord Chai smiled. "Don't worry, brother. Even if you committed the gravest crime you'd be safe here. I'm not boasting but there isn't a police chief or army officer who dares cock an eye at our little manor."
Song Jiang gave a complete account of how he killed Yan Poxi. Again Lord Chai smiled.
"Forget it. Even if you killed an official appointed by the imperial court or robbed the government treasury, I'd have no compunctions about concealing you here."

He invited the two brothers to bathe, and presented them with fresh clothing, kerchiefs, silken shoes and clean stockings. They bathed, put on their new garments, and a vassal brought their original clothes to their room. Lord Chai invited them to the rear hall where wine and tidbits had been prepared.
Their host asked Song Jiang to sit at the head of the table, while he seated himself opposite. Song Qing sat down at the side. A dozen or so ranking vassals and several overseers were also present. By turns they toasted the guests and waited on them, joining in the merriment. Lord Chai repeatedly urged the brothers to drink without restraint. Song Jiang thanked him again and again. By the time they had drunk half their fill the three were expressing the highest mutual regard and admiration.
Day was drawing to a close, and lamps were lit. "Enough of wine," Song Jiang begged. But Lord Chai wouldn't hear of it. They continued drinking until the first watch. Song Jiang rose to relieve himself. His host directed a vassal to light his way with a lantern to the end of the eastern veranda.
"I'll have to miss the next round," said the clerk. He made a wide detour and came out of the front porch, crossed the courtyard diagonally and mounted the veranda running along the eastern wing.
Song Jiang was eight-tenths drunk, and he staggered along, not looking where he walked. A big fellow, chilled by a malarial attack, was on the veranda huddled over some burning embers on a shovel. Song Jiang, head high, stepped on the handle and bounced the embers into the man's face, startling him so that he broke into a sweat. Angrily he rose and grasped Song Jiang by the front of his tunic.
"Who are you, you son of a bitch, that you think you can play games with me!"
Song Jiang was surprised speechless. But the vassal carrying the lantern cried out: "Don't be rude! He's his lordship's most favoured guest!"
"Guest, guest," the man muttered. "I was a guest too, at first, and 'most favoured' as well. But Lord Chai listens to the lies of his vassals, and has become distant towards me! How true it is that 'friends don't last forever'!"
He pulled back his fist to hit Song Jiang. The vassal dropped his lantern, rushed forward and intervened. But he couldn't separate the two men. Three more bobbing lanterns came flying in their direction.
"I couldn't find you, sir Clerk," said the voice of Lord Chai, as he quickly approached. "What's all the fuss?"
The vassal explained about the shovel. Lord Chai smiled.
"Do you know this illustrious clerk?" he asked the big fellow.
"Illustrious, my foot! Compared to our Clerk Song of Yuncheng, he's nothing!"
Lord Chai laughed. "Have you met Clerk Song?"
"We've never met but the whole gallant fraternity has heard of Song the Timely Rain! He's world famous."
"What's he famous for?"
"It would take too long to tell it all but he's real hero. What he starts, he finishes! As soon as I get over this illness, I'm going to join him."
"Would you like to meet him?"
"Who wouldn't!"
"Bit fellow, he's as far as a hundred and eighty thousand li; and as near as right in front of you!" Lord Chai pointed at Song Jiang. "This is Song the Timely Rain!"
"You're not joking?"
The clerk said: "My name is Song Jiang."
The big fellow stared, then dropped to his knees and kowtowed. "I never dreamed I'd meet you today, brother!"
"I don't deserve such courtesy."
"But I was just very discourteous. I beg your pardon. I 'have eyes but didn't recognize Mount Taishan'!"
The man remained kneeling. Song Jiang hastily raised him to his feet. "What's your honourable name, sir?" Lord Chai told Song Jiang the name of the man and where he hailed from. Truly, meeting a tiger in the mountains or bandits in the forest strikes terror to the traveller's heart. But awe at this man's name caused the stars to pale and the rivers to run backwards.

Now when the constables had seized Bullock Tang, they dragged him off to the Magistracy. On hearing it was a question of murder, the Magistrate hurriedly convened his court. The constables pushed Bullock Tang forward in front of the bench. The Magistrate found himself faced with an old woman kneeling on his left and a young oaf on his right. "What is this about a murder?" he asked. The old woman spoke first: "My name is Yan," she said. "I had a daughter called Poxi and she was given to Registrar Song as minor wife. Yesterday evening when my daughter and Song Jiang were drinking together, this Tang came round looking to cause trouble, and when he left he was shouting insults, as the neighbours can testify. Early this morning Song Jiang went out for a while, and when he came back he killed my daughter! I grabbed him and I was just bringing him here but this Tang got him away from me. Your Excellency, I want justice."
"Well, you! What do you mean by helping a criminal escape?" the Magistrate said to Tang.
"I didn't know nothing," Tang said nervously. "All I know is, yesterday when I went to find Registrar Song and ask for the price of a cup of wine, Mrs. Yan grabbed me and chucked me out. This morning I was just going to start selling my ginger when I saw Mrs. Yan holding onto the Registrar in front of the Magistracy. When I saw this I went and remonstrated that I shouldn't have, and he ran off. But I didn't know nothing about his killing her daughter."
"This is all nonsense!" the Magistrate shouted. "Song Jiang is an honest man and a gentleman. How could he go and kill someone? You must be the one who's responsible for this murder. Where are the guards?"
The court officers were summoned. But at this point the clerk, Zhang Wenyuan came on the scene. He heard Mrs. Yan tell how Song Jiang had murdered her daughter — his mistress! He proceeded to take statements from all the witnesses, then drew up an indictment on Mrs. Yan's behalf and entered the case in the register. The district coroner was called. Together with his assistants, the ward chief and a number of the witnesses from the neighbourhood, he went to Mrs. Yan's, where entry was effected, and the corpse produced and examined in situ. The murder weapon, a dagger, was found to be lying beside the body. Repeated examinations established that death had resulted from the cutting of the throat while the victim was still alive. When these investigations had been completed, the body was placed in a coffin and sent to the temple, while the witnesses were brought to the government offices.
Now Song Jiang was on excellent terms with the Magistrate, and the latter would have dearly liked to get him off. To this end, Bullock Tang was interrogated repeatedly but all he would say was that he knew absolutely nothing about it.
"Of course you're implicated, you scum!" the Magistrate said. "Why did you go there and make trouble last night?"
"Like I said, I just happened to go there, 'cos I was looking for the price of a cup of wine ..."
"He's lying! Beat him!"
The officers swooped on Tang from all sides like wolves and tigers and tied him up and beat him but even after forty or fifty strokes he still wouldn't change his story. Of course, the Magistrate knew very well that Tang knew nothing. But his idea was to save Song Jiang. So the interrogation continued. Finally a cangue was imposed and Bullock Tang was thrown into gaol.
Zhang Wenyuan now approached the bench and said: "This is all very well but the murder weapon is a dagger belonging to Song Jiang and Song Jiang ought to be brought in and questioned. That's the only way we'll get to the bottom of this."
He kept repeating this demand till in the end there was no way the Magistrate could go on covering up. He had to send officers to Song Jiang's home to arrest him. But by this time Song Jiang had already fled and they returned with no one but a few neighbours. "The murderer, Song Jiang, has escaped," they said. "No one knows where he has gone."
Zhang Wenyuan now came forward again and said: "Since the criminal, Song Jiang, has fled, his father, Squire Song, and his brother, Song Qing, who live in the Song village, must be arrested. A deadline should be set for the criminal's arrest and his family members should be held as hostages until such time as Song Jiang appears in court for questioning."
At first the Magistrate was very reluctant to issue the warrant. He was still hoping to confuse the issue and make Bullock Tang the scapegoat, intending to release him surreptitiously later on, when the affair blew over. But Zhang Wenyuan had drawn up an indictment and was inciting Mrs. Yan to keep returning to the tribunal to demand justice. Realizing that he could not prevent it, the Magistrate had to make out a warrant and send several officers to the Song manor to arrest old Squire Song and the younger brother, Song Qing, and bring them back.
When these officers, bearing their warrant, arrived at Squire Song's, the Squire came out to receive them and invited them to sit with him in the thatched hall. They showed him the warrant. "Please sit down, everybody," he said, "and let me tell you something. Like my ancestors, I engage in agriculture and make my living from cultivating these fields and orchards. Song Jiang is not a filial son, and from childhood he has gone against my wishes. Refusing to keep to his station in life, he chose to go off and join government service, even though I tried a hundred times to dissuade him. For this reason, I went a few years back to the government offices to denounce him and have him struck off the register of my household. Since then he has lived in town, while I and my son, Song Qing, live alone here in the country and work the land. He gets his living separately from us, and has nothing to do with us. I always feared that he might do something untoward and get us into trouble, so I had the previous magistrate make out a certificate for me, testifying to all this. I can show it to you, gentlemen."
The officers were all good friends of Song Jiang's, and they knew perfectly well that this was a precaution that he had taken long before. But the last thing they wanted was to cause him any trouble, so they said: "If you have this certificate, Squire, you'd better show it to us. We'll make a copy and then report back to the tribunal." The Squire for his part had his servants kill some chickens and geese and serve them with wine. He also made the officers a gift of a dozen taels of silver, and gave them the certificate to copy. After this they took their leave of Squire Song and returned to inform the Magistrate. "Three years ago," they said, "Squire Song disowned Song Jiang and obtained an official certificate to that effect. Here is an exact copy of it. In view of this we didn't think it right to arrest him." Only too happy to find excuses for Song Jiang, the Magistrate said: "If there's a certificate and he has no other relatives, all we can do is announce a reward of one thousand cash for his capture, and post 'Wanted' signs everywhere."
Zhang Wenyuan now got Mrs. Yan to appear again before the tribunal. Her hair uncombed and falling about her face, she stood there and complained: "Song Jiang is actually hidden in the house of his brother, Song Qing, who will not give him up to the law. Your Excellency, how can you fail to arrest Song Jiang, how can you deny justice to an old woman?"
The Magistrate said: "His father officially declared him rebellious three years ago and disinherited him. There's an official certificate to prove it, so how can we arrest the father and brother?"
"Your Excellency," Mrs. Yan protested, "everyone knows Song Jiang is as famous for being a good son as for his dark complexion. That certificate is false. I demand justice!"
"Nonsense! The certificate has my predecessor's personal stamp on it, how can there be anything wrong with it?"
Mrs. Yan began to make a great commotion, right there in the court, weeping and wailing and shedding crocodile tears for her daughter. "It's foul murder, it cries out to heaven," she sobbed, "if I don't get justice here I shall go to the provincial court. My poor daughter's been murdered, horribly murdered!" Zhang supported her, saying: "Your Excellency, if you don't take steps to arrest the culprit, this old woman may take her case to a higher authority, and then there will be real trouble. If there's an investigation and they question me, I shall find it difficult to know how to reply."
Recognizing the truth of all this, the Magistrate was forced to issue a warrant and send for the two sergeants, Zhu Tong and Lei Heng. When they appeared he instructed them: "Take an appropriate number of men and go to the Song's and arrest the criminal, Song Jiang." As the poem testifies:

The unwanted burden's lightly cast aside.
What traveller stops to mourn a broken flower?
Once cherished like a flower, Poxi lies dead:
The sweet cheat has become a thing to dread.

Sergeants Zhu and Lei at the head of a troop of some forty men, took themselves off to the Song village. When Squire Song heard about it, he hurried out to receive them. "Please don't blame us, Squire," they said. "It's not our idea, we're under orders. Where is your son, the Registrar?"
"I beg to inform you, sergeants," said the old man, "that that disobedient son of mine no longer has anything to do with me. I denounced him to the previous magistrate, and I've a certificate here to prove it. He's been living on his own for more than three years now and is no longer a member of my household."
"Well, even if that's so," said Sergeant Zhu, "we are obliged to follow instructions and make the necessary arrests. I am afraid we cannot simply take your word for it that he is not here. You'll have to let us conduct a search before we go back and report." So saying he ordered his men to encircle the compound. "I'll watch the front entrance," he said, "while you go in and search, Sergeant Lei." Sergeant Lei went in and searched the manor from top to bottom. When he came out he said: "He's certainly not here."
"All the same, I'd like to make quite sure," said Zhu Tong. "Sergeant Lei, you and the men guard the gate while I go in and see for myself."
"I'm a law-abiding citizen," said Squire Song. "How could I be hiding him?"
"This is a murder case," said Sergeant Zhu. "Please don't take offence."
"Of course not, Sergeant, if it's necessary. Search as much as you like."
"Sergeant Lei, please keep the Squire here, and make sure he doesn't go anywhere."
Zhu Tong now went inside. He propped his sabre against the wall, locked the door behind him and entered the little shrine. Here he moved the altar table to one side, prised up a plank, and uncovered a rope. He gave the end of this rope a tug and a bell sounded. Immediately Song Jiang emerged from the cellar. When he saw Zhu Tong he got a shock.
"Mr. Song," the Sergeant said, "please don't blame me for coming to look for you here. We've always been good friends and confided in each other. Do you remember how one day when we were drinking you told me there was a hiding-place under the altar to the Buddha? You said that below the image of the Buddha of the Three Ages there was a loose plank right under the altar table, and that if I was ever in serious trouble there was a place I could come and hide. I've always remembered what you said, and when the Magistrate sent me here with Sergeant Lei I thought I'd better throw a little dust in people's eyes. The Magistrate himself is on your side, it's only Third Brother Zhang and the old woman who keep yammering on in court, claiming that the court won't give them justice and threatening to go and complain to the provincial governor. That's why he had to send us to search your house, you see. I was afraid Sergeant Lei might not be as flexible as he ought and if he found you, well, he wouldn't know how to handle it, that's why I fixed it so he'd stay at the front gate and I could come and have a little talk with you. You're all right here, I suppose but it's not really safe. What'll you do if someone gets to know about it and they come and search again?"
"That's just what I've been thinking," Song Jiang said. "If it wasn't for your savoir-faire I'd already be under lock and key."
"I wouldn't say that. But I do think you ought to consider where you're going to go."
"I've worked out that there are three possibilities. One is in Cangzhou, the house of Chai Jin, the Little Whirlwind. Another is Hua Rong's house in Qingzhou; and the third is Squire Kong's house on White Tiger Mountain — he has two sons, Kong Ming, known as Curly and Kong Liang, known as Hothead. They've often been to see me at the office. I can't decide which of the three places is best, I'm still trying to make up my mind."
"Well, don't take too long about it. If you're going to leave, it had better be soon. In fact, you'd best leave tonight. Any delay is risky."
"I count on you, my friend, whatever they undertake against me! If you have need of anything, money or valuables, please don't hesitate to come here for it."
"Don't worry, sir. I shall do all that's needed. You just think about getting away."
Song Jiang thanked the Sergeant and withdrew into his hiding-place.
Sergeant Zhu replaced the plank and moved the altar back. He unlocked the door and picked up his sabre. When he went out, he said: "You were quite right. He's not in the manor." Then he addressed Lei Heng. "Sergeant Lei, we'll have to take Squire Song into custody, won't we?"
Lei Heng was surprised. "Zhu Tong and Song Jiang are good friends," he thought to himself. "Then what's all this about wanting to take the Squire in? It must be the exact opposite of what he really means. If he mentions it again, I'd better show him I'm on their side."
The sergeants ordered all their men into the thatched hall. Squire Song hurriedly produced wine for them all. "Please don't offer us anything," Sergeant Zhu said. "We'll have to ask you and your younger son to come with us to the government offices."
"By the way, how come we haven't seen your other son?" Sergeant Lei asked.
"He's not here," Squire Song said. "I sent him off to another village to get some farm implements. And you know, Song Jiang is a disobedient son and he left home three years ago. I've got an official certificate proving it."
"How can we accept that!" Sergeant Zhu said. "We've got a warrant from the Magistrate authorizing us to arrest you and your younger son and take you down to the government offices for questioning."
"Wait a bit, Sergeant Zhu," said Sergeant Lei. "What I say is, if Registrar Song has committed some sort of crime there's got to be extenuating circumstances. It can't be a capital offence. And seeing as Squire Song has got that certificate, with an official stamp and all, so we know it isn't a forgery, surely, in view of Registrar Song's previously having been a good friend, why can't we help him out a bit? Surely it would be sufficient if we just copy out the certificate and go back to report?"
Sergeant Zhu, who of course was only saying all this to allay suspicions, said: "Well, if that's what you think, Sergeant, I don't want to be the one to make trouble."
Squire Song thanked them both: "I am truly grateful, Sergeants, for the consideration you have shown me." He now had food and wine served, and he offered them twenty taels of silver as a reward for their helpfulness. They steadfastly refused, and it was finally divided among the men. A copy was made of the certificate and then they took their leave and returned to the government offices.
The Magistrate had just entered the court. When he saw the two sergeants were back, he asked them to give an account of themselves. "We searched the manor twice," they said, "from top to bottom, and the neighbouring village but he's really not there. Squire Song is sick and in bed, he is unable to move, he could pass away at any moment. The younger son went away last month and hasn't returned yet. Therefore all we could do was copy the certificate. Here it is."
"All right then," said the Magistrate, "we shall just have to send this certificate to the Governor and put out a general order for the culprit's arrest wherever he may be." We shall say no more of this.
Now Song Jiang had many friends in the office, and they all went to Zhang Wenyuan and spoke on his behalf. In the end Zhang could not withstand the pressure. In any case, the girl was dead, and Zhang too had received favours from Song Jiang, so he decided to call it a day. Sergeant Zhu got together some money to pay off Mrs. Yan, so she wouldn't appeal to the higher authority. Having got some money out of it, and since there was evidently nothing more to be done, she gave in. Sergeant Zhu also sent someone with a sum of money to the district capital to ensure that the report was accepted. The Magistrate threw all his weight behind these manoeuvres. After announcing a reward of one thousand strings of cash and having "Wanted" notices posted, he had Bullock Tang convicted of "perverting the course of justice by securing the escape of a criminal," and sentenced him to twenty strokes of the cane and tattooing and banishment to a distance of two hundred miles. The witnesses were all released and allowed to return home. But this was all later. There's a poem which goes:

Because of a harlot he's in a real scrape;
Though hid in the cellar, he may not escape.
Zhu Tong is the one who exhorts him to flee;
That man deserves praise in the highest degree.

By the way, if the Song family were just farmers, how did they come to have a secret hiding-place? Well, back in the Song Dynasty, you see, it was easy to be a high-up official but hard to be a simple clerk. Why was it easy to be a high-up official? Because the court was corrupt and the ministers all flatterers. Positions simply went to relatives and those with money. And why was it hard to be a clerk? Because if a clerk made the smallest slip he was branded and banished to some god-forsaken frontier zone; if his fault was more serious his house and property were confiscated and he might well pay with his life! That is why Song Jiang had prepared his hiding-place in advance and to prevent his parents being implicated had made them denounce him and strike him off the household register. They lived apart and there was a certificate to prove that there were no further relations between them. But the cellar was set up so that he could live at home secretly. In the Song era there were many who arranged things like this.

Meanwhile Song Jiang had emerged from hiding and was having discussions with his father and brother. "If it hadn't been for Sergeant Zhu's kindness this time, they'd have locked me up," Song Jiang said. "We mustn't forget him. Now Song Qing and I must get away immediately. If heaven is merciful there will be an amnesty some day and then I can return and we'll be together again. Meanwhile, Father, please send someone discreetly to Sergeant Zhu with money and ask him to use it to buy goodwill and to provide Mrs. Yan with an allowance so she won't go and appeal higher up."

"Don't you worry about all that," the Squire said. "You just make sure you and your brother go carefully. Once you find somewhere safe look for a reliable messenger and send me a letter."

That evening the two brothers tied their bundles. Next morning they rose well before dawn, washed and rinsed their mouths and breakfasted. Then they disguised themselves for the journey. Song Jiang wore a white Fanyang hat, a white satin tunic, tied at the waist with a plum-coloured cotton sash, gaiters and hemp shoes with numerous eyelets. His brother was dressed as his servant and carried the baggage. They came out of the thatched hall to bid their father a respectful farewell. All three were unable to restrain their tears.

"You have a long journey ahead of you," the old Squire said, "try not to get too downhearted."

The two brothers told the servants to take good care of the house, serve the master faithfully and make sure he lacked for nothing. Then, each providing himself with a dagger and a sabre, they departed from their ancestral home.

It was late autumn when they started their journey; winter was about to begin:

The lotus all are faded,
The leaves are falling fast;
The cricket's song is ended
Among the withered grass.
Geese from the sky are dropping
Upon the level sand,
A thin rain is falling,
Wetting the maple stand.
Ground frost in the morning
Forewarns of winter's waste,
It takes a lonely journey
To teach you Autumn's taste.

Well, they travelled several stages, and all the time they were thinking, "Where can we go and stay?"

"I have often heard people speak the name of Mr. Chai, in the district of Cangzhou," said the younger brother. "They say he is descended from an emperor. I've never actually met him but don't you think we should try him? They say he's a fair and generous man who likes entertaining men of valour and helping those who have been banished. They say he's another Mengchang,[1] in fact. So let's take refuge with him."

"I was thinking the same," said Song Jiang. "Although we have often corresponded, I have never had the chance to meet him."

After this discussion, they took the Cangzhou road. There were many mountains to climb and rivers to ford on the way, and they passed through many different districts. It's the lot of every traveller to stop somewhere for the night, and there are two things he cannot avoid: eating from dirty bowls and sleeping in beds where men have died! But back to the point: the two Song brothers eventually reached the district of Cangzhou and asked where Mr. Chai's house was. They were directed to it, and arriving in front of it they asked a retainer if Mr. Chai was at home.

"Mr. Chai is at his eastern residence, receiving the tithes," the man told them. "He's not here."

"How far is the eastern residence from here?" Song Jiang asked.

"About ten miles."

"Can you tell us how to get there?"

"May I make so bold as to ask your names, sirs?"

"I am Song Jiang of Yuncheng."

"Would you be Registrar Song, the gentleman they call 'The Opportune Rain'?"

"That is correct."

"The master often speaks of you. He often says how sorry he is he's never met you. If you are Registrar Song, I'd better take you there myself."

So saying, the man eagerly set out to show them the way to Chai Jin's eastern manor. In something under six hours they arrived at the gates of a fine well-stocked mansion set in an orderly domain. Here's what they saw:

A manor-house fronting broad waters and backed by the high hill, situated amid cunningly set groves of acacia and willow, and provided with a number of fine guest-houses. Cattle, sheep, mules and horses graze within its ample confines, while among the fish-ponds roam chickens, geese and other fowl. White cranes stalk in front of the main hall, and painted birds strut in the courts. So open-handed is the master, so ready with aid for the oppressed, that you'd say a second Mengchang is come: he's like another Sunwu, rescuer of the needy and prop of the downfallen. Here you can see why they say, 'When a house is well-provisioned the chickens and dogs are fat; when there's no lack of servants, the children have time to play.'

"May it please you to wait here, sirs, in this pavilion, while I go and tell the master," said the retainer.

"Very well," said Song Jiang. He and Song Qing put down their weapons and took off their packs and sat down in the pavilion. The man had been gone only a moment when the gates of the house burst open and out rushed Chai Jin, followed by a number of servants. He ran to the pavilion where Song Jiang was waiting, prostrated himself and said: "I have wanted so long to meet you, and now fortune has brought you to my door! My prayers are answered! How happy I am!" Song Jiang likewise prostrated himself and said: "I have come most humbly to beg your protection." Chai Jin raised him up, saying: "Yesterday my lamp was flickering, and this morning the magpies called but I would never have guessed the visitor was going to be someone so important!" His face was radiant with smiles.

Song Jiang rejoiced to see how graciously Chai Jin received them. He now told his brother to pay his respects, and Chai Jin told the servants to take their luggage and prepare a room for them in the west wing, behind the main hall. Holding Song Jiang's hand, he led him into the main hall, where they seated themselves according to the rules.

"May I venture to ask you something, dear brother?" Chai Jin said. "I seem to have heard that you are very much occupied with government affairs in Yuncheng. How have you found time to honour me with this visit?"

"I have known your reputation for many years, and your name has resounded like thunder in my ears. I have received your gracious letters, and it has always been a sore point with me that my wretched job did not leave me time to visit you. But now I am in trouble. I have committed a fault which cannot be repaired, and my brother and I decided that our only course was to come to you and beg your protection, knowing you to be as generous as you are just."

"Then set your hearts at rest," said Chai Jin, delightedly. "Had you committed the most terrible of crimes, once you are in my house, you shall have no cause to worry. I do not wish to boast but I dare to say that whatever troops may be pursuing you, none will wish to confront me!"

Song Jiang now rendered a detailed account of the killing of Poxi. At the end of it, Chai Jin merely smiled and said: "Have no fear, Brother. If you had killed an important minister or robbed the provincial treasury, I would still be happy to harbour you in my house." He then invited them to bathe them- selves and presented them with complete new sets of clothes, including silk headwear and slippers and clean stockings, to change into when they came out of the bath. When they had changed, servants took the old clothes to their room. Then Chai Jin invited them to an inner chamber, where a banquet had been prepared, and made Song Jiang take the place of honour while he sat down opposite. Song Qing sat next to his brother.

When they were all seated, a dozen or so local retainers and overseers began to pour for them and pass round the cups. Chai Jin urged Song Jiang and his brother to cast off inhibitions and drink many toasts with him, and Song Jiang never stopped expressing his thanks. In the end they were all quite drunk and they fell to expressing their undying affection for one another. It grew dark and lamps were lit. Finally Song Jiang said: "I've drunk enough." But Chai Jin would not let them stop. They went on till well into the first night watch.

Suddenly Song Jiang stood up, because he wanted to go to the bathroom. Chai Jin told a servant to take a lamp and show him the way to the east gallery where the ablutions were. "Just count me out for this round," Song Jiang said. He made a big detour, descending from the gallery in front and then circling back till he reached the east gallery. He was about three quarters drunk, and he stumbled a little as he went. But he kept on regardless.

Now there was a man under the gallery, a big ruffian who was suffering from malaria and because he couldn't stand the cold night air was crouching over some hot coals in a shovel. Song Jiang was not looking where he was going and he stumbled against the handle of the shovel, kicking it so that the burning coals flew up into the big man's face. The fellow got such a mighty shock he broke out into a sweat. He leapt up and gripping the front of Song Jiang's clothing began shouting at him: "Who the bloody hell are you? Are you trying to make a fool of me?" Song Jiang was struck dumb. But the servant with the lantern immediately shouted: "Mind what you say! This is the master's special guest!"

"Special guest? Special guest? When I first came here I was a special guest, and everyone treated me well. But now the servants are always telling tales about me, everyone ignores me. It's true what they say, 'Nothing lasts forever'!" He made as if to hit Song Jiang. The servant rushed in to stop him, trying without success to calm him down. Several other lanterns were now seen flying towards them down the gallery and Chai Jin arrived himself. "I was wondering what had happened to the Registrar. What's all this noise about?"

The servant explained what had happened. Chai Jin started laughing. "Listen here, Big Man," he said, "this is the celebrated Registrar!"

"Celebrated?" said the other. "Celebrated? I bet he's not as famous as Registrar Song of Yuncheng!"

This increased Chai Jin's amusement. "Do you know Registrar Song then?"

"I don't exactly know him but the brethren of the rivers and lakes all call him the Opportune Rain, I know that much. And he's said to be as generous as he is just. He helps anyone in a tight spot. He's world-famous."

"What's he so famous for, then, Big Man?"

"I can't tell you just now. But he's a real man. He knows what's what, he knows the score! As soon as I'm better I'm going to go and find him!"

"You want to meet him?"

"You bet I want to meet him!"

"Big Man, what's far may be a thousand leagues away but what's near is in front of your nose!" Chai Jin pointed to Song Jiang and said, "This happens to be Song Jiang, the Opportune Rain!"

"Do you mean it, or are you having me on?"

Song Jiang spoke now: "I am Song Jiang," he said.

The big man stared at him very hard, then sank to his knees, saying, "I think I'm dreaming! To meet you face to face!"

"You do me too much honour!" Song Jiang said.

"My behaviour just now was terrible," the big man said. "How can you ever forgive me? I couldn't see what was in front of my nose!" He remained there kneeling and refused to get up. Song Jiang hurriedly helped him to his feet, saying: "May I ask your name?" Chai Jin answered for him. He told his name and his place of origin and it was to have an important bearing on events. Truly one can say:

When tigers are seen on the mountain at play,
The heart faints, the spirit quails.
When outlaws overrun each forest way,
Courage melts and resolve fails.

In fact, it is a case of:

At mention of his name the moon and stars withdraw,
Rivers reverse their course and run uphill.

THE police having arrested Tang Niu-er took him into the yamen, and as soon as the magistrate heard that there was a murder case to be heard he immediately took his seat on the bench. The magistrate saw the prisoner kneeling on the right, and a woman kneeling on his left. He inquired what the case was about, and the woman replied: "My name is Yan. I had a daughter Poxi who was kept by Song Jiang. Last night my daughter and Song Jiang were drinking wine together when this man Tang Niu-er came and made trouble. When he left the house he was cursing so that the neighbours all heard him. Early this morning Song Jiang went out but came back and murdered my daughter. I took hold of Song Jiang but when we were in front of your yamen this man Tang Niu-er interfered and so Song Jiang got away."

Addressing the prisoner the magistrate asked, "How dare you assist a murderer to escape?"

Tang Niu-er replied, "I did not know what had happened. Last night I went to find Song Jiang and ask him for a drink of wine, and this old woman took hold of me and turned me out of the house. Early this morning I set out to sell some preserved ginger, and in front of your yamen I saw this woman take hold of Song Jiang. I went to try and stop the trouble and Song Jiang got away. I do not know any reason why he should have killed the girl."

"Nonsense!" said the magistrate, "Song Jiang was a very honest man, so how could he recklessly kill anyone? You must have done this yourself. Where is the clerk of the court?"

The clerk of the court Zhang Wenyuan came forward. He knew that it referred to the death of his sweetheart and took a record of the evidence. He also wrote out an accusation for Madame Yan. The coroner was then sent together with the neighbourhood chief and the neighbours and upon arriving at the house opened the door. Taking the corpse outside he closely examined it and found the dagger near the body, and after a careful investigation came to the conclusion that the dagger had been used to murder the girl. He then allowed the people to place the body in a coffin, and deposit it in the courtyard of a monastery. They then all returned to the yamen.

Now the magistrate had a good opinion of Song Jiang, and wanted to prove him to be innocent so he cross-examined Tang Niu-er with many questions. But Tang Niu-er said that he did not know what had preceded or followed the murder.

"But why did you go last night to the house and create a disturbance?" asked the magistrate. "You certainly are implicated."

"I just happened to go there for a cup of wine," replied Tang Niu-er.

"Nonsense!" said the magistrate. "Beat him!"

The police seized the prisoner, bound him with a rope, and gave him about fifty blows with the bamboo. But the prisoner still made the same statement as before. The magistrate was apparently aware that the prisoner really did not know anything about the murder but as he wanted to rescue Song Jiang, he could not set Tang Niu-er free, so he gave an order that he was to have a cangue fixed round his neck, and be sent to the prison for further detention.

Zhang Wenyuan, the clerk of the court, then spoke to the magistrate. "But the knife found belonged to Song Jiang, and he used it to keep down his loose gown. If we brought him here we might get some information from him."

The magistrate wished to screen Song Jiang but after Zhang Wenyuan's frequent pleading he at last agreed to send a man to arrest Song Jiang. Upon reaching Song Jiang's home the police found that he had escaped so they detained a number of the neighbours for questioning. But on arrival at the yamen the neighbours all protested that they did not know where the murderer Song Jiang had gone to.

Zhang Wenyuan now urged that the father and brother of Song Jiang should be arrested, and cross-examined under torture as to where Song Jiang was. But the magistrate was averse to taking such extreme measures and preferred to throw all the blame on Tang Niu-er. He considered that by and by he could set Tang Niu-er free.

So Zhang Wenyuan then went to Madame Yan and advised her to go to the yamen and repeat her accusation. She did this, and the magistrate saw that he could not hush the case up any further so he at last issued a warrant for the arrest of the father and brother of Song Jiang. Upon reaching the Song Family Village the police were received by Song Jiang's father and taken by him into a room. They then handed him the warrant, and when he had read it he said, "Please be seated, and listen to what I have to say. For many generations my ancestors have cultivated the soil here, and have been models of propriety. But Song Jiang has been an unfilial son and disobedient since childhood, and although we urged him also to take up agriculture yet he would always insist on becoming an official. When he at last went to the yamen as a clerk I complained to the magistrate about his lack of filial piety and disobedience and disowned him, and he has nothing to do with me now. He lives in the town, and his brother Song Qing stays with me here cultivating the fields for a living. We have lived quite independently of each other so that I now know nothing whatever of his affairs. I was afraid that he would do some bad thing so I did not care to have anything to do with him, and so informed the magistrate a long time ago. The magistrate gave me an official document confirming that arrangement, and I will go to get it, and show it to you."

The policemen were all on good terms with Song Jiang and were well aware that such a document had been issued in anticipation of such a situation in order to prevent harming him. They did not wish to offend Song Jiang so they asked Old Song to let them make a copy of the document which they could then produce at the yamen.

Old Song agreed to this, and gave them the document to copy. While this was being done he ordered a meal with chicken, and duck, and wine for them, and also presented them with more than ten taels of silver.

When the policemen got back to the yamen they reported to the magistrate that they had not arrested Old Song because of the document he held, of which they presented a copy. To this the magistrate replied, "As there is such a document, and as Song Jiang has no other relatives, the only thing I can do is to offer a reward for his arrest."

Zhang Wenyuan however went to Madame Yan and told her of this, and advised her to go again to the court with disheveled hair, and state that Song Jiang was really hidden at home by his brother Song Qing. She was also to ask why the magistrate had not had Song Jiang arrested for her. She did this.

The magistrate replied that three years ago, Song Jiang had been officially disowned by his father so that it was not possible to hold them as in any way responsible for what had happened.

Madame Yan stated, "But does not everybody know that he was called the 'Filial and Just Son'? The document must be false, and I request that you have them arrested."

"Nonsense!" said the magistrate. "The document was duly issued by my predecessor so how can it be false?"
Madame Yan sobbed, and cried for being wronged. She exclaimed, "Murder is a crime as high as the Heaven! If you will not administer justice then I must appeal to the Prefectural court. I am in great sorrow through the murder of my daughter."
At this point the clerk of the court, Zhang Wenyuan, spoke to the magistrate, "If you do not issue the warrants Madame Yan may appeal to the Prefectural court, and if she does so it will be awkward. When the Prefectural officials go seriously into the matter I do not know what replies I can give to their questions."
The magistrate was aware of the reasonableness of this argument, and at once ordered a warrant to be issued for the arrest of Song Jiang. He summoned the two Inspectors Zhu Tong and Lei Heng, and spoke to them, "I want you to take many men to the Song Family Village, and arrest Song Jiang there."
The two Inspectors took more than forty policemen, and soon reached the village. They were received by Old Song who invited them inside. The two Inspectors said they hoped that he would not be offended at their arrival. It was not their own intention, and they were only obeying orders. They asked where his son Song Jiang was.
"You Inspectors, please listen to me," said Old Song. "I have disowned my unfilial son, Song Jiang, and this was duly registered by the former magistrate. During the last three years we have lived separately, and he never came here."
Inspector Zhu Tong said, "Notwithstanding what you say, our order is quite definite, and we cannot go back before we have carefully searched everywhere." He then ordered the policemen to conduct a close search for the accused. He said, "I will stand at the front door and guard it. You, Inspector Lei Heng, go inside with a search party."
Inspector Lei Heng went inside and after searching in all directions came back and said to Inspector Zhu Tong, "He is certainly not here."
"I do not believe that," said Inspector Zhu Tong. "You stay here while I go and have a very careful search."
"As you know," said Old Song, "I am familiar with the laws of the court, so how dare I hide any criminal?"
"You need not be offended with our search," said Inspector Zhu Tong, "because it is a serious murder case."
"You may do as you wish," said Old Song. "Please go and make a careful search."
"Inspector Lei Heng will look after Old Song, and see that he does not leave here," said Inspector Zhu Tong.
Inspector Zhu Tong then placed his halberd on one side and after entering the house fastened the door behind him. Then going into the ancestral shrine he pushed the altar to one side. In the ground under the altar he found a loose board which he raised. Underneath was the entrance to a cellar and hanging there was the end of a rope which Zhu Tong pulled and heard a bell ring down below. Presently he saw Song Jiang emerge from the celler who startled when he saw the inspector.
"Do not be surprised at my being sent here to arrest you," said Inspector Zhu Tong. In the past we have always been on good terms with each other, and you confided in me with everything. You will perhaps remember that once when we were drinking wine together you told me of this hidden cellar with the entrance under the altar in front of the shrine. You also said that if I got into trouble I could always find a safe refuge there. When the magistrate ordered me and Inspector Lei Heng to come here and arrest you I remembered what you had told me before but I took care not to let anyone know about it. The magistrate himself wanted to hush the matter up but Madame Yan and the clerk of the court Zhang Wenyuan both threatened to appeal to the Prefectural court if something definite was not done and therefore the magistrate reluctantly issued this warrant for your arrest. I was afraid that Inspector Lei Heng would not have the tact to let you go when he sees you but would arrest you according to the literal meaning of the warrant. So I induced him to stay at the front gate while I could come here, and have a talk with you. This cellar is a good hiding place but not quite safe enough for you. If any one knows about it, and come here to search for you what escape have you?"
"I have been thinking about that myself," said Song Jiang. "If it had not been for your great tact I should have been arrested, and bound as a prisoner."
"You should not talk like that," said Zhu Tong. "But have you thought of any place where you can go to?"
"I have thought of three places which would be safe for me to go to," said Song Jiang. "The first would be at Chai Jin, the 'Small Whirlwind's' house at Henghai County, in Cangzhou. The second would be with Hua Rong, nicknamed 'Little Li Guang' at the Qingfeng Fortress on a mountain in Qingzhou. The third would be at Old Grandfather Kong's village near the Baihu Mountain. He has two sons—the eldest called Kong Ming, nicknamed 'Restless Star,' and the second called Kong Liang, nicknamed 'Fiery Star'—and I once met both of them in the town. Of these three places I cannot make up my mind which to go to."
"Then you must make up your mind at once," said Zhu Tong, "because you must get away from here this night."
"I hope that you will do your best to settle the case for me," said Song Jiang. "You can come here again, and take whatever money you require for making arrangement with the officials."
"You need not worry about that," said Zhu Tong, "because I will be responsible for everything. You had better now get things ready for your departure."
Song Jiang thanked Zhu Tong, and then descended into the cellar.
Zhu Tong replaced the board over the entrance, put back the altar in its former position, opened the door, took up his halberd, and said, "He is not in the farmhouse. How would it be if we arrest Old Song instead?"
Inspector Lei Heng thought, "How is it that he wants to arrest Old Song when he is on very good terms with Song Jiang? He evidently means the contrary. So if he says that again I shall speak in favour of Song Jiang." The two Inspectors then summoned the soldiers and went to the main hall. Old Song prepared the wine and served all the men. But Inspector Zhu Tong said, "Do not serve us with wine and food but instead I think it would be better if you and your son Song Qing would have a visit with us to the yamen."
"But why have we not seen Song Qing?" asked Inspector Lei Heng.
"I sent him to a neighbouring village to get an agricultural implement made," said Old Song. "As you know, I have the official document confirming that I disowned my son, Song Jiang, three years ago."
"What is the use of telling us that again?" asked Inspector Zhu Tong. "We have to carry out the orders from the yamen, and we must therefore arrest both you and your son Song Qing."
"Inspector Zhu," said Lei Heng, "listen to me! It is very probable that Song Jiang had some reason for murdering the girl, and his punishment may not necessarily be death. Now we have the undoubted official document that Song Jiang was disowned by his father, and we both knew Song Jiang very well, we should not be so strict in our duty but should make a copy of the official document, and report the matter at the yamen."
"That is my own idea," thought Zhu Tong, "but I do not want him to suspect it." He therefore said, "As you like that I shall have to let you have your own way."
"I shall be greatly indebted to you two Inspectors for your generous treatment," said Old Song. He then spread food and wine on the table, and invited all present to partake of a meal. He also got twenty taels of silver, and presented them to the Inspectors. But the Inspectors refused to accept the money, and gave it to be divided among the forty soldiers.
When they had made a copy of the document referred to, the two Inspectors took leave of Old Song, and returned to the yamen with their soldiers.
The magistrate was sitting on the bench when they arrived, and he asked them at once for the result of their search.
The Inspectors reported that they had made two searches in every part of the house and also the village without finding any trace of the criminal. Old Song was seriously ill on his bed and could not get up. His son, Song Qing, had gone last month to some other place, and had not returned yet. Therefore they had made this copy of an official document.
Having heard this, the magistrate wrote a dispatch to his superior official reporting the case, and giving all particulars. He also issued orders to all in his district to arrest Song Jiang.
Now Song Jiang had many friends, and they called on Zhang Wenyuan, and urged him to let the matter drop. Yan Poxi was dead and Zhang Wenyuan remembered that Song Jiang had previously helped him in many ways, and now that many people pressed him to let the matter drop, he at last agreed to do so.
Inspector Zhu Tong also collected together quite a lot, of money and things and presenting them to Madame Yan asked her not to appeal to the Prefectural court but to let the matter drop. To which Madame Yan at last agreed as she saw nothing would be gained by proceeding further. Inspector Zhu Tong also got a lot of money and sent it by one of his men to Jizhou Prefecture to bribe the officials there to allow the case to pass.
The magistrate also offered a reward of a thousand strings of cash for the arrest of Song Jiang and then delivered his judgment that Tang Niu-er had committed a serious offence in helping Song Jiang to escape, and ordered that he should receive twenty blows with the bamboo, should be branded, and banished to some place more than one hundred and fifty li from his home. He then released all the witnesses.
Now why had they the hidden cellar at the Song family residence? During the Song Dynasty (A. D. 960–1127) the official duties were easy but the clerical work in the yamens was accompanied with difficulties. Why were the official duties easy? This was because the Emperor's ministers were corrupt, villainous, and crafty. If an official had no friend at court and was poor, there was no prospect of promotion.
But why were the clerical duties so difficult? Because for the slightest fault one was to be branded, and banished to distant military post. If the crime was serious not only was the man executed but all his family's property would be confiscated. Because of this many yamen clerks had such hiding places for refuge from the officials. Being afraid that some fault of the sons at the yamen might bring disaster on the whole family it was a common practice for parents to disown their sons who were clerks in the yamens. But although the clerk lived by himself he always kept his money secretly at home.
When Song Jiang at last emerged from his hiding place he spoke to his father and brother, "If it had not been for the protection of Inspector Zhu Tong I should have been arrested. We must not forget to repay him for his benevolent action. I must now escape and take my brother with me. If Heaven is gracious perhaps the Emperor will grant an amnesty, and then we can return home to meet our father again. I hope, father, that you will secretly send money to Zhu Tong, and ask him to bribe all the yamen officials to let the matter drop, and also send smaller amounts to Madame Yan and suggest that it would be better for her to withdraw the accusation."
"You need not be anxious about such matters," said Old Song. "You and your brother Song Qing must be careful when traveling. When you reach your destination you must find a reliable man to bring a letter here."
The two brothers packed up what they wished to carry with them, and arising from their beds about 3 A.M. they washed their mouths and faces, took breakfast, and prepared to start. Song Jiang wore a broad brimmed felt hat, a white silk gown, a plum-coloured girdle, puttees round his calves, and hempen shoes. Song Qing was dressed as a servant, and carried the bundles for both. Upon leaving the grass hut they saluted their father.
Old Song burst into tears unceasingly, and he said, "You two have now a very long road in front of you but you must not grieve on the way."
Song Jiang and Song Qing addressed the farm servants, "You must always diligently attend to our father, and see that he always has plenty to eat and drink." They then placed swords in their belts, and carrying halberds in their hands they left the Song Family Village. The two brothers then started. Now it was just between the end of autumn and the beginning of winter. When they had travelled some distance Song Jiang asked, "From whom shall we find refuge?"
"I have heard people say that Chai Jin, of Henghai County in Cangzhou, is a descendant of an Emperor of the Later Zhou Dynasty but we do not know him. Yet I see no reason why we should not go and seek refuge with him. Everybody says that he distributes wealth in good cause and is always assisting good men from all over the empire. He even assists criminals and is very similar to Meng Changjun (B. C. 279). We had better go and seek refuge with him."
"I have also had that idea," said Song Jiang. "I kept up correspondence with him, yet I had no opportunity of meeting him before."
They therefore took the road to Cangzhou. They travelled through prefectures and districts; traversed mountains and waded through rivers. They rested at inns on the way but there were two objectionable things which they, as well as other travellers, had to put up with—they had to use cups and bowls that might have been also used by lepers, and second they sometimes had to sleep on beds where some person might have died some time before.
The brothers however at last reached the border of Cangzhou where they inquired where Squire Chai lived. Upon arriving at Chai's village, they inquired if Squire Chai was at home, and were informed that he was at the eastern estate collecting some grain rents. They were also informed that the eastern estate was thirteen li from there. When Song Jiang asked to be shown the way the informant inquired for his "elevated" name.
"I am Song Jiang and come from Yuncheng County," he replied.
"Are you the Chief Clerk known as the 'Welcome Rain'?" inquired the servant.
When he admitted this the servant said, "Squire Chai often talked about your great reputation, and was very sorry that he had never had the opportunity of meeting you. But as you have now arrived I myself will conduct you to Squire Chai at the other estate." They all three started off at once, and in about six hours reached the eastern estate. The servant asked the two brothers to sit down in an arbour while he went to announce their arrival. The servant had not been gone long when the central gate of the farmstead was opened, and the squire emerged accompanied by about five servants. They hurried to the arbour and saluted the two brothers.
"I have thought of you a very great deal," said Chai. "But what favourable wind has blown you here. I am exceedingly pleased to meet you. What great luck! How fortunate!"
Song Jiang kowtowed and replied, "I am only a common clerk, and I have come to seek a refuge with you."
Chai Jin raised up Song Jiang, and spoke softly, "Last night the lamplight was bright, and this morning the magpies were calling but it never occurred to me that you were so near." While he said this his face was wreathed with smiles.
Song Jiang saw that Chai Jin wished to treat him very liberally, and was much pleased at this. He then introduced his brother.
Chai Jin then ordered the servants to prepare a guest chamber for the brothers, and take their baggage there. Then taking Song Jiang by the hand he conducted him to the hall where they sat down as host and guest. Chai Jin then said, "I do not wish to appear impertinent but what has led you to leave your duties, and come to such a desolate place as this?"
"Your fame has long resounded in my ears like thunder," replied Song Jiang. "I was the mean recipient of your letters but I never had the leisure to come and visit you. I have no ability but I did a thing which caused me to come here with my brother. We hope to find a shelter here as we have heard that you distribute wealth in good cause."
"Sir, never mind that," laughed Chai Jin. "You need not be sorry. But what was this great crime which forced you to flee to this place? I will not boast but whatever official Inspector comes here he dare not act as a spy."
Song Jiang then told Chai Jin all the particulars of his murder of Yan Poxi.
Upon hearing this Chai Jin laughed and said, "Never mind, sir. Because even if a man has killed a high official, or stolen things from the Imperial treasury I would dare to conceal him here." He then invited both brothers to take a bath, and also presented them with two new suits of clothes, new caps, new silken shoes, and new socks, and asked them to leave their old clothes in the bathhouse. They did this, and the bath attendant sent their old clothes to their room. This done, Chai Jin asked the brothers to dine with him in a private room at the back, and they took their seats there according to the rules of etiquette. At the meal the three were waited upon by about ten of the chief stewards who kept them supplied with wine and food. Chai Jin many times pressed Song Jiang to take wine, and the latter thanked him repeatedly. All three expressed their pleasure at meeting, and stated how many times they had looked forward to this.
When it was getting dark Song Jiang pointed out that they had drunk enough wine but Chai Jin would not agree to this. So they went on until it was about 8 P.M. when Song Jiang withdrew to the toilet. Chai Jin sent a man with him bearing a lamp. But as Song Jiang had had quite enough wine he intentionally walked very slowly, and went by the longest way. He was nearly tipsy and walked unsteadily. He was going to the eastern veranda but there was a man there who had the ague, and being afraid of cold, had a charcoal brazier to keep him warm. The man was stooping over the fire, and as Song Jiang staggered along the veranda he trampled upon the handle of the brazier and this threw the burning charcoal in the face of the sick man. The man was startled, and perspired freely. He was very angry, and seizing hold of Song Jiang's collar shouted out, "You son of a bitch! But who are you trying to play with?" Song Jiang too, was surprised and fuddled to speak but the servant carrying the lamp spoke to the man, "You must not talk like that as this gentleman is the honoured guest of our master."
The man replied, "Honoured guest! Honoured guest! And wasn't I also an honoured guest at one time? Our master treated me well then but now he listens to all the tittle-tattle of the servants who have turned him against me. The saying puts it, 'Men cannot be friends for very long.' The man attempted to strike Song Jiang but the servant threw down his lamp and interposed. He did not succeed in separating the two men but just then three lamps came flying along the veranda. They accompanied Chai Jin who rushing up asked what the row was about. The servant explained how Song Jiang had accidentally trodden over the charcoal brazier, and this made Chai Jin laugh. He said, "Man, don't you know this celebrated chief clerk?"
"A celebrated chief clerk, hey?" replied the man. "Then perhaps you will ask him how he compares with Song Jiang, the magistrate's secretary, at Yuncheng County?"
"Do you know Song Jiang?" asked Chai Jin laughingly.
"I have not met him," said the man, "but all people talk about him, and call him Song Gongming, the 'Welcome Rain.' He is the most famous man in the whole country."
"But how do you know he is a good man?' asked Chai Jin.
"I cannot recite all the details," said the man. "but he is a celebrated person because everything he does is well done from start to finish. When I am better I intend to go and seek refuge with him."
"Would you like to see him then?" asked Chai Jin.
"If I did not want to see him why should I talk like this?" said the man.
"Man," said Chai Jin, "instead of being six hundred li away, he is here now." He pointed at Song Jiang and said, "This is Song Gongming, the 'Welcome Rain.'"
"Is this really true?" asked the man.
"I am that man," replied Song Jiang.
The man looked at him closely, and then kowtowed and saluted saying, "I did not expect to meet you, my elder brother, today."
"You must have made a mistake in holding such an opinion about me," said Song Jiang.
"I have blundered seriously," said the man, "and must ask for your forgiveness. Although I have eyes yet I failed to recognize a great man."
Thereupon he knelt on the ground, and would not get up. Song Jiang hurried to raise him up saying, ""Honoured sir, what's your name?"

A man who frightened tigers
Made brigands' hearts to throb.
If this man's name was mentioned,
The stars and moon grew dim.
If only seen in distance,
The rivers changed their course.

023
Lord Chai Jin Detains a Guest, Accommodates other Guests in Henghai County & entertains his guests with class; Wu Song Fights & Kills the Tiger of Jingyang Ridge on Jingyang Pass & the Brotherhood of Rascals

Lord Chai supplied the answer. "He is called Wu Song. He's from Qinghe County, and is the second son in his family. He's been here a year."
"I've heard his name many times in the gallant fraternity. I never thought I'd run into him today. How fortunate!"
"Truly a happy circumstance when men of courage meet," said the lord. "Let's sit inside, shall we, and talk."
Song Jiang, very pleased, walked hand in hand with Wu Song to the rear hall, where the clerk introduced him to his brother. Chai Jin asked Wu Song to be seated. Song Jiang requested him to sit at the head of the table but Wu Song refused. After some minutes of polite argument, Wu Song took the third seat. Chai Jin called for wine and urged his three guests to drink without restraint.
In the lamplight Song Jiang noted with pleasure what a fine figure of a man Wu Song was, and he asked: "How do you happen to be here?"
"I was drunk one day back in Qinghe County and got into a brawl with the keeper of confidential documents in the local government office. With one blow of my fist I knocked him senseless to the ground. I thought I'd killed him, and ran away and took refuge here in Lord Chai's manor. That was over a year ago. Later I learned that the fellow hadn't died, that he revived. I intended to go home and see my older brother but then I caught this malaria and was unable to leave. I'd the chills and was warming myself by a fire when you stepped on the handle of that shovel. You gave me such a start that I broke into a sweat. It seems to have cured my illness!"
Song Jiang was very glad, and the four men drank until the third watch. The clerk asked Wu Song to live with him and his brother in the west wing. When they arose the next day, Lord Chai had a sheep and a pig slaughtered and gave a feast for Song Jiang. Of that we'll say no more.
Several days later Song Jiang gave Wu Song money so that he could make some clothes. Lord Chai heard about it, and absolutely refused to let the clerk spend anything. He took fine silk material from his own stores and had his private tailor make garments for each of his three guests.
Why, incidentally, had Chai Jin cooled toward Wu Song? When he first arrived, he was treated with the same hospitality as any other guest. But he often got drunk, and he had a bad temper. When he didn't like the service, he would beat the vassals. None of them had a good word to say for him, and they frequently complained about him to Chai Jin. Although the lord didn't ask him to go, his manner grew distant. But after Song Jiang took him in hand, and they drank together everyday, Wu Song no longer indulged in his former failings.
The two were constantly in each other's company for a dozen or more days. But Wu Song was homesick. He wanted to go back to Qinghe County and see his older brother. Chai Jin and Song Jiang urged him not to hurry away. But Wu Song said: "I'm concerned about my brother. I haven't heard from him in a long time."
"If you must go," said Song Jiang, "we won't keep you. Come and see us again, if you have the chance."
Wu Song thanked him. Chai Jin gave the young man some money.
"I have caused you a great deal of trouble, my Lord," said Wu Song.
He wrapped his belongings into a pack, tied on his staff and got ready to leave. Chai Jin gave him a farewell feast. Wu Song was wearing a new red silk robe and a broad-brimmed hat of white felt. He shouldered his pack, took up his staff, and bid his friends goodbye.
"Wait a moment, brother," said Song Jiang. He went back to his quarters, got some silver, and hurried with it to the manor gate. "We'll see you down the road a piece," he said.
He, his brother Song Qing, and Wu Song took their leave of Lord Chai. "I'll be back soon, my Lord," said Song Jiang. The three men left the eastern manor.
"This is far enough, brother," said Wu Song, after they had travelled six or seven li "Please go back. Lord Chai is waiting."
"Just a bit more," said Song Jiang.
They chatted as they walked, and covered another three li before they knew it. Wu Song took Song Jiang's hand.
"Don't come any further, brother. 'Though you see a friend off a thousand li, sooner or later you must part.' Isn't that how the saying goes?"
"Only a few steps more. On the highway ahead there's a little tavern. We'll have a couple of cups and then separate."
The three entered the tavern, and Song Jiang sat at the head of the table. Wu Song, resting his staff, sat opposite. Song Qing took a seat on the side. The clerk ordered wine and some food to go with it. By the time they had downed several cups, the sun was in the western sky.
"It's getting late," said Wu Song. "If you don't scorn me, please receive my four kowtows and accept me as your blood brother."
Song Jiang was delighted. Wu Song made four obeisances. The clerk had Song Qing present him with ten ounces of silver. Wu Song tried to refuse.
"You need that money yourself."
"Don't give it a thought. If you don't take it, I won't acknowledge you as my brother."
Wu Song had no choice but to accept with thanks. He put the money in his purse. Song Jiang paid the bill, Wu Song took up his staff, and the three left the tavern. There were tears in Wu Song's eyes when they parted. Song Jiang and Song Qing watched from the door of the tavern until he was out of sight, then they started back.
They were met by Chai Jin, riding his horse and leading two other animals, before they had gone five li. Gratefully, they mounted and returned together. Chai Jin invited them into the rear hall for wine. Thereafter, they continued staying at his manor.

We'll divide our story in two and talk now of Wu Song after he left Song Jiang. That night he put up at an inn. The next morning he rose and had breakfast, paid the bill, tied his pack, took up his staff and set forth.
"Song Jiang is known in the gallant fraternity as Timely Rain," he thought. "He certainly deserves his name! I'll never regret becoming friends with a brother like that!"
He travelled for several days and came to Yanggu County. It was noon and he was a good distance from the county town, and he was hungry and thirsty from walking. Further up the road he saw a tavern. By the doorway hung a pennant reading: Three bowls and you can't cross the ridge.
Wu Song went inside, sat down, and rested his staff. "Wine, quickly, host," he called.
The tavern keeper brought three bowls, a pair of chopsticks and a plate of tidbits, placed them on the table, and filled one of the bowls to the brim with wine. Wu Song raised the bowl and drained it.
"This wine has a kick in it! If you've got anything filling, host, I'll buy some to go with the drinks."
"We only have cooked beef."
"Slice me two or three catties of the best part."
The host went back inside and came out with two catties of beef on a large platter that he placed before Wu Song. Then he filled another bowl. Wu Song drank it.
"Very good wine!" he said. And he downed another. That was his third bowl. The host poured no more. Wu Song rapped on the table.
"Host, where's the wine?"
"More beef sir? Coming right up."
"I want beef and wine, both."
"I'll slice some beef for you but I can't give you any more wine."
"That's screwy! Why not?"
"Didn't you see that pennant hanging by my door Three bowls and you can't cross the ridge!" queried the tavern keeper.
"What does it mean?"
"Although our wine is just a village product, it's as fragrant as the old brews. Any traveller who drinks three bowls of it gets drunk and can't cross that ridge there. Hence, the name. No one who stops here ever asks for more than three bowls."
Wu Song smiled. "So that's it. I've had three bowls. Why aren't I drunk?"
"My wine is called 'Seeps Through the Bottle Fragrance.' It's also called 'Collapse Outside the Door.' You don't feel anything at first. But a little later, down you go."
"Poppycock! I'm paying, aren't I? Pour me three more bowls!"
Seeing that the wine had little effect on Wu Song, the tavern keeper again filled three bowls with wine. The big fellow drank them.
"Excellent," he cried, "Host, I'll pay you bowl for bowl. Just keep pouring."
"You'd better take it easy, sir. This wine really knocks people out! And there's no medicine that brings them around!"
"Bullshit! Even if you doped it, I've got a nose, haven't I!"
The tavern keeper couldn't convince him. Again he filled the three bowls.
"Bring me another two catties of beef," said Wu Song.
The host served the sliced meat and poured three more bowls of wine. Wu Song's appetite seemed to improve. He put some silver on the table.
"Look here," he called. "Is this enough for the wine and meat?"
"Plenty," said the tavern keeper. "In fact I owe you some change."
"I don't want any change. Just keep the wine coming."
"There are five or six bowls left. But I doubt that you can finish them."
"Five, six, or even more, I'll drink as many as you've got."
"You're a big hulking fellow. If you fall, how am I going to pick you up?"
"If you have to pick me up, I'm no real man!"
The host continued to stall. Wu Song grew irritated. "I'm paying for what I drink," he said. "Don't make me mad, or I'll smash up your place and turn it ass over tea kettle!"
"This rogue is drunk," thought the tavern keeper. "I'd better not provoke him!"
He served Wu Song six more bowls of wine, a total of eighteen in all.
Wu Song grasped his staff and rose to his feet. "I'm not a bit drunk!" He laughed as he went out the door. "Who says 'Three bowls and you can't cross the ridge'?" He started walking away.
The tavern keeper ran after him. "Where are you going, sir?" he shouted.
Wu Song halted. "What's it to you? I don't owe you anything, do I? What are you yelling about?"
"I mean well. Come back. I want to show you a government proclamation."
"What does it say?"
"There's a fierce tiger with a white forehead and bulging eyes on Jingyang Ridge. It comes out at night, and has already killed nearly thirty strong men. The authorities have ordered hunters to capture it, on pain of being beaten, and have posted this warning at every path leading to the ridge. It says travellers must go in groups and cross only between late morning and early afternoon. At all other times the ridge is closed. No one is permitted to travel alone. It's already late, and I saw you setting off without a word. I don't want you to kill yourself! Why not spend the night at my place, and then tomorrow you can gradually get together a band of twenty or thirty travellers and cross the ridge in safety."
Wu Song laughed. "I'm a Qinghe County man. I've crossed that ridge at least twenty times. I've never seen any tiger. Don't try to scare me with that crap. Even if there is a tiger, I'm not afraid."
"I'm only trying to save you. If you don't believe me, come in and have a look at the proclamation."
"Balls! I'm not scared of any tiger. You want to keep me here so that in the middle of the night you can rob me, kill me! That's why you're trying to frighten me with your tiger story!"
"All right! You take my good for evil and talk to me like that! Don't believe me, then! On your way!" The tavern keeper shook his head and went back inside.
Staff in hand, Wu Song strode off towards Jingyang Ridge. After walking four or five li he came to the foot of it. A piece of bark had been peeled from a large tree, and on the white patch words were written. Wu Song could read quite well, and he saw that it was a notice with this inscription: Of late a tiger on Jingyang Ridge has been killing people. Travellers must form bands and cross only between late morning and early afternoon. Do not take risks.
Wu Song grinned. "That host is a crafty one. Scares his customers into staying the night. Well, he can't scare me!"
He proceeded up the slope, holding his staff level. It was late afternoon by then, and the red sun was pressing on the mountains in the west. Still primed by all the wine he had consumed, Wu Song continued climbing the ridge. Before he had gone another half li he came upon a dilapidated Mountain Spirit Temple. A notice was posted on the door. It read:

Yanggu County Notice: Lately, a big tiger has been killing people on Jingyang Ridge. Although all township leaders, village chiefs and hunters have been ordered to capture the beast or be beaten, they have so far failed. Travellers are permitted to cross the ridge only between late morning and early afternoon, and only in bands. At other times, and to single travellers at any time, the ridge is closed, lest the tiger take their lives. Let this be known to all.

So there really was a tiger! The notice with its official seal confirmed that. Wu Song considered returning to the tavern. But then he said to himself: "If I do that, the host will laugh at me for a coward. I can't go back." He thought a moment. "What's there to be afraid of," he exclaimed. "Just keep climbing and see what happens."
He walked on. The warmth of the wine rose in him, and he pushed back the felt hat till it was hanging by the string on his shoulders. Clapping the staff under one arm, he plodded up the slope. When he looked back at the sun, it was almost gone. The days are short in late autumn, and the nights are long. It gets dark early.
"There isn't any tiger," he said to himself. "People just scare themselves and don't dare come up the mountain."
The wine was burning inside him as he walked. With his staff in one hand, he unbuttoned his tunic with the other. His gait was unsteady now, and he staggered into a thicket. Before him was a large smooth rock. He rested his staff against it, clambered onto its flat surface, and prepared to sleep.
Suddenly a wild gale blew, and when it passed a roar come from behind the thicket and out bounded a huge tiger. Its malevolent upward-slanting eyes gleamed beneath a broad white forehead.
"Aiya!" cried Wu Song. He jumped down, seized his staff, and slipped behind the rock.
Both hungry and thirsty, the big animal clawed the ground with its front paws a couple of times, sprang high and came hurtling forward. The wine poured out of Wu Song in a cold sweat. Quicker than it takes to say, he dodged, and the huge beast landed beyond him. Tigers can't see behind them, so as its front paws touched the ground it tried to side-swipe Wu Song with its body. Again he dodged, and the tiger missed. With a thunderous roar that shook the ridge, the animal slashed at Wu Song with its iron tail. Once more he swivelled out of the way.
Now this tiger had three methods for getting its victim—spring, swipe and slash. But none of them had worked, and the beast's spirit diminished by half. Again it roared, and whirled around.
Wu Song raised his staff high in a two-handed grip and swung with all his might. There was a loud crackling, and a large branch, leaves and all, tumbled past his face. In his haste, he had struck an old tree instead of the tiger, snapping the staff in two and leaving him holding only the remaining half.
Lashing itself into a roaring fury, the beast charged. Wu Song leaped back ten paces, and the tiger landed in front of him. He threw away the stump of his staff, seized the animal by the ruff and bore down. The tiger struggled frantically but Wu Song was exerting all his strength, and wouldn't give an inch. He kicked the beast in the face and eyes, again and again. The tiger roared, its wildly scrabbling claws pushing back two piles of yellow earth and digging a pit before it. Wu Song pressed the animal's muzzle into the pit, weakening it further. Still relentlessly clutching the beast by the ruff with his left hand, Wu Song freed his right, big as an iron mallet, and with all his might began to pound.
After sixty or seventy blows the tiger, blood streaming from eyes, mouth, nose and ears, lay motionless, panting weakly. Wu Song got up and searched around under the pine tree until he found the stump of his broken staff. With this he beat the animal till it breathed no more. Then he tossed the staff aside.
"I'd better drag this dead tiger down the mountain," he thought. He tried to lift the beast, lying in a pool of blood but couldn't move it. He was exhausted, the strength gone out of his hands and feet.
Wu Song sat down on the rock and rested. "It's nearly dark," he thought. "If another tiger comes I won't be able to fight it. I'd better get off this ridge first, somehow. Then, tomorrow morning, I can decide what to do."
He collected his broad-brimmed felt hat from beside the rock, skirted the thicket, and slowly descended the ridge. Wu Song had travelled less than half a li when two tigers leaped out of the tall dry grass.
"Aiya!" he exclaimed. "I'm a goner!"
But there in the shadows the two tigers suddenly stood upright. He looked closely and saw that they were men with tiger pelts bound tightly around them. Each held a five-pronged pitchfork. They stared at Wu Song in amazement.
"Have you eaten a crocodile's heart, or a panther's gall, or a lion's leg, that you're so full of courage?" they cried. "How dare you cross the ridge at dusk, alone and weaponless? Are you a man or a demon?"
"Who are you two?" Wu Song demanded.
"We're local hunters."
"What are you doing on this ridge?"
"Don't you know?" the hunters asked in surprise. "There's a big tiger up here! It comes out at night and preys on people. It's killed seven or eight of us hunters alone, and more travellers than we can remember! The county magistrate has ordered the township and village leaders and us hunters to capture it. But it's so powerful nobody dares go near it! We've been beaten time and again because of this but we still can't catch the beast. Tonight it's our turn to try. We've got a dozen peasants with us, and we've laid spring-bows with poisoned arrows all over the place. We were waiting here in ambush when we saw your big form moving down the ridge. You scared the life out of us! Who are you, anyway? Have you seen the tiger?"

"I'm a Qinghe County man. My name's Wu, a second son. I just met the tiger up there beside a thicket. I punched and kicked it to death."
The hunters gaped. "You're kidding!"
"Look at the blood on my clothes if you don't believe me."
"How did it happen?"
Wu Song told them the whole story. The two hunters listened, joyous and astonished, then shouted for their peasant band. The men soon crowded round, carrying pitchforks, snare-bows, knives and spears.
"Why weren't they with you?" Wu Song asked the hunters.
"The tiger was too fierce. They didn't dare come up." The hunters repeated Wu Song's story to the peasants. None of them believed it.
"Come along with me, then," said Wu Song, "and see for yourself."
They had flint and steel and struck a fire, and lit six or seven torches. They went with him up the ridge to where the tiger lay dead in a great heap. Everyone was delighted. A man was sent immediately to report to the village chief and the leading family in charge. Five or six peasants trussed up the tiger and carried it down the ridge slung from a pole.
When the party reached the foot of the ridge seventy or eighty people were already waiting, noisy and animated. They formed a procession, with the dead tiger in front, and Wu Song following on an open litter, and marched to the home of the leading family.
Both the head of the family and the village chief were waiting to welcome him at the entrance to the village. The tiger was placed in front of a hall. Another twenty or thirty men—hunters and the heads of prominent township families—also greeted Wu Song.
"What is you name, young stalwart," they asked, "and where are you from?"
"I'm from the neighbouring county of Qinghe. My name is Wu Song, and I'm a second son. On my way home from Cangzhou yesterday afternoon I got drunk in a tavern on the other side of the ridge. I climbed the ridge and met the tiger." He told in detail how he fought the beast with fists and feet.
"Truly, a hero," his listeners cried.
The hunters presented him with game and drank his health. Wu Song was exhausted from his battle with the tiger and wanted to sleep. The head of the leading family ordered his vassals to prepare a guest-room for Wu Song's use. He sent word to the county seat the following morning, and had a special litter built so that the tiger could be delivered there.
Wu Song got up at daybreak, washed and rinsed his mouth. His host and the others brought a cooked sheep and two buckets of wine to the front of the hall to feast him. Wu Song put his clothes on, adjusted his head kerchief, and went out and joined them. Raising their cups, they toasted him.
"That tiger killed countless people, and for that reason the hunters were beaten several times," they said. "But you came, young stalwart, and rid us of that calamity, bringing us luck and making the road safe for travel! We owe everything to you!"
"I have no talents. I was only borrowing from your predestined good fortune."
Everyone congratulated Wu Song, and they drank all morning. The tiger was placed upon the Utter. Members of the prominent families draped Wu Song with silks and flowers. His luggage was placed in safe-keeping, then everyone marched through the village gate. Emissaries of the magistrate had long since been waiting to escort Wu Song to the Yanggu County office. They greeted him, and ordered four vassals to convey him in an open sedan-chair. Decked with silks and flowers, he followed behind the tiger as the procession advanced on Yanggu County.
When the townspeople heard that a brave young fellow had killed the big tiger on Jingyang Ridge, they all turned out, cheering, and swarmed to the county office. From his sedan-chair, Wu Song looked at the noisy throngs crowding every street and lane. Everyone wanted to see the tiger. The magistrate was waiting in a hall inside the county office compound.
Wu Song descended from the sedan-chair, slung the great beast over his shoulders, walked up to the hall, and placed the tiger in the entrance way. The magistrate gazed at the strapping young man, then at the huge striped animal, and he thought: "No one else could have killed that tiger!"
He summoned Wu Song into the hall. Wu Song hailed him respectfully.
"How were you able to kill the beast?" the magistrate asked.
Wu Song told his story. Everyone listened in stupefaction. The magistrate gave him several cups of wine, and rewarded him with one thousand strings of cash contributed by the prominent families.
"It was only because I was basking in Your Excellency's lucky aura that I was able to kill the tiger. I have no ability of my own," said Wu Song. "How can I accept any reward? I've heard that, because of the tiger, Your Excellency punished the hunters several times. I'd like to give the thousand strings of cash to them."
"If that's how you feel, it's up to you."
Wu Song promptly distributed the money among the hunters. The magistrate, impressed by his generosity and honesty, decided to raise him in rank.
"Although you are from Qinghe, it's very close to our Yanggu County," he said. "I'm thinking of making you a constable here. How about it?"
Wu Song dropped to his knees. "If your Excellency favours me I'll be grateful all my life!"
The magistrate instructed his clerk to draw up the appropriate documents that very day commissioning Wu Song a constable in the police force. All the heads of the leading families came and congratulated him, and drank with him for four or five consecutive days.
"I wanted to go home to Qinghe and see brother," Wu Song said to himself. "Who would have thought I'd wind up a constable in Yanggu!"
Thereafter, he had the affection of his superiors and was famed throughout the countryside.
Two or three days later, he was leaving the county office in search of amusement when a voice hailed him from behind.
"You're fallen into luck, Constable Wu! Is that why you know me no more?"
Wu Song turned around. "Aiya!" he exclaimed. "What're you doing here?" If Wu Song had not met that man would bloody corpses have lain in Yanggu? And as a result, heads rolled as steel blades swished, and hot blood flowed as fine swords flashed.

Let me remind you now how Song Jiang, in order to miss a round of drinking at Chai Jin's manor where he was taking refuge after killing his mistress, had gone to wash his hands and, making a detour back to the gallery, had tripped over a shovel full of hot coals, greatly to the annoyance of a certain stranger, who leapt to his feet looking for a fight. And how his host came rushing to the rescue and how he happened to reveal Song Jiang's name, so that the stranger, hearing who he was, threw himself on his knees and refused to get up, saying: "Fool that I am, I couldn't see what was staring me in the face. I insulted you just now. Can you ever forgive me?" and then Song Jiang raised him up and asked: "But who are you? Won't you tell me your name?"
Chai Jin supplied the answer. "This gentleman is from Qinghe. His name is Wu Song, he is the second son in his family. He has been with us a year now."
"I have heard much talk of Mr. Wu among the rivers and lakes fraternity," said Song Jiang. "But I had no idea I was to meet him here today. What a pleasure this is!"
"It's a great thing when men of honour meet by chance like this," said Chai Jin. "We shall celebrate with a dinner, so we can have some talk."
Song Jiang was pleased to take Wu Song's hand and lead him into the inner hall. He called his younger brother Song Qing and introduced him to Wu Song. When Chai Jin invited Wu Song to sit down, Song Jiang immediately asked him to sit beside him in the place of honour. Wu Song naturally refused. This modest show of reluctance went on a long time until finally Wu Song was prevailed upon to take the third place. Chai Jin then ordered the cups filled again and invited them to drink deep. Song Jiang was now able by the light of the lamps to get a better look at his new friend:
His stature is awesome, his bearing deeply impressive; the eyes blaze like winter stars, the brows are an unbroken line drawn in lacquer; the chest so broad ten thousand foes could never throw him down, the speech forceful, evidence of a soaring ambition; the spirit so brave you'd think the lion which shakes heaven had descended from the clouds, the frame so powerful you'd imagine you were confronting the beast which shatters the world. Truly this seems a god walking the earth, a veritable Mars among men.
Song Jiang liked what he saw exceedingly, and he asked Wu Song: "Tell me, pray, what is the reason for your staying here?"
"I got drunk one day, back in Qinghe, and had a fight with a confidential secretary," the other replied. "He really riled me. I only hit him the once but I knocked him out cold. Well, I thought I'd killed him, so I cleared off and came here to Mr. Chai's, waiting for it to blow over. Since then I've heard the fellow isn't dead, they revived him. I was planning to go home to see my brother but then I suddenly came down with malaria, so I couldn't travel. Just now I had a shivering fit and I was sitting over those coals in the gallery when you walked into them and gave me such a shock I broke out in a cold sweat, and now I think I'm cured!"
Song Jiang listened delightedly. That night the drinking went on till the small hours. Afterwards Song Jiang insisted that Wu Song go and sleep with them in the west wing. Next day Chai Jin organized a big banquet and had goats and pigs killed to feast Song Jiang. Of this no more.
After a few days Song Jiang took out some money for Wu Song to make himself a new set of clothes. When Chai Jin learnt of this, of course he would have none of it. He went to a chest and took out some pieces of fine silk, and commissioned his own tailor just outside the gates to supply all three of them with suits of clothes made to measure.
Incidentally, Chai Jin was displeased with Wu Song. Why so? Well, when Wu Song first arrived he had received a grand welcome. But later he was always getting drunk and owing to his impetuous temperament he was inclined to get a stick and beat the servants whenever their ministrations failed to meet his standards. Consequently there was not one of them who looked on him favourably. In fact they all hated him, and invented all kinds of stories to tell Chai Jin about him. So although Chai Jin did not turn Wu Song out, his behaviour towards him had grown much cooler. However, now when Song Jiang adopted Wu Song and made him his constant drinking companion, the latter mended his ways.
After Song Jiang had been with them about ten days, Wu Song felt the urge to return home to Qinghe to see his brother. Chai Jin and Song Jiang both urged him to stay on a while but he said: "It's a long time now since I had news of my brother, I think I should go back and see him."
"If you really want to go," Song Jiang said, "we must not detain you. But if you have time later, do let us meet again."
Wu Song thanked Song Jiang and Chai Jin gave him some silver for which Wu Song thanked him, saying: "I am afraid, sir, I have given you a lot of trouble." Then he tied his bundle, took up his cudgel and was ready to depart. But first Chai Jin laid on a little send-off party. Wu Song was wearing a new robe of fine red silk and a white Fanyang hat. With his pack on his shoulders and carrying his cudgel he was finally on the point of leaving, when Song Jiang said: "Dear brother, wait one moment." He went to his room and got some silver and hurried back to the manor gate. "I shall accompany you on the first stage of your journey," he said to Wu Song.
Song Jiang and his younger brother waited while Wu Song said his last farewell to Chai Jin and then Song Jiang also told Chai Jin they would be back in a little and the three of them set off from Chai Jin's eastern manor together. After a couple of miles, Wu Song suggested it was time to part: "Dear friends, you should go back now. Chai Jin will be waiting."
"Just a little further, why not?" Song Jiang said.
They conversed as they went and without noticing it, they had covered another mile or so, when Wu Song stopped Song Jiang and said: "You really shouldn't accompany me any further. You know the saying, 'When you're seeing someone off, you may go with them a hundred miles but still you have to say good-bye!'" "Allow me to go just a little further," Song Jiang pleaded. "See that little inn on the highroad there, why don't we go in and drink a farewell cup together?"
They went in and Song Jiang seated himself at the head of the table. Wu Song laid down his cudgel and joined him, while Song Qing sat across the table from them. They told the waiter to bring wine and ordered some dishes and a variety of fruit and vegetables which were spread on the table before them. They drank some cups and watched the sun sinking in the west. "It's getting late," Wu Song said. "If you'll allow me, I want to prostrate myself four times so I can call myself your blood brother."
This pleased Song Jiang greatly. The ceremony completed, Song Jiang told his brother to take out ten taels of silver to give Wu Song. Wu Song refused it, naturally, saying: "When I was a guest at Mr. Chai's I received a generous allowance."
"Don't make a fuss about this, dear brother," Song Jiang said. "If you refuse I shall think you do not prize my friendship."
So Wu Song, after prostrating himself again, had to take the money that he put away in his purse. Then, Song Jiang having paid for the wine with some loose change, Wu Song took up his cudgel and the three men left the inn. There at the inn door they said their farewells, Wu Song saluting with tears in his eyes before he departed. Song Jiang and his brother stood there at the door and watched him out of sight. Then they set off on the return journey. They had covered little more than a mile when they saw Chai Jin approaching on horseback, leading two riderless horses. It was a welcome sight. They rode back together to the manor. When they had dismounted, Chai Jin invited them to drink in an inner chamber. For the time being, Song Jiang and his brother stayed at Chai Jin's.
Here our story divides.
Wu Song, after parting from Song Jiang, spent the night at an inn. Next morning, having breakfasted and paid for his room, he tied his bundle, grasped his cudgel and took to the road. As he went along, he mused: "Among the rivers and lakes, they talk all the time about Song Jiang, the Opportune Rain. And what they say is no exaggeration. It's a real privilege to know a man like that!"
After following the road for several days, Wu Song had reached the district of Yanggu but was still some way off the provincial capital. By noon that day, when he was feeling hungry and thirsty, he perceived in front of him a tavern, advertised by a sign with five characters that read: "Three bowls, forget the pass!"
Wu Song walked in and sat down. He laid his cudgel down and called out: "Landlord! Quickly, some wine!"
The innkeeper came with three bowls, chopsticks and a dish that he laid in front of Wu Song. He filled one of the bowls with wine. Wu Song picked it up and drained it in one gulp. "This wine's got a real kick!" he exclaimed. "Now then Landlord, how about something to line the stomach? I'll have something to go with this wine."
"Some boiled beef is all I've got," the man said.
"That'll do," said Wu Song. "Slice me two or three catties."
The innkeeper went in and cut two catties of beef and put it in a big dish which he then placed in front of Wu Song. Then he poured another big bowl of wine. Wu Song drank it off and said: "Now that's what I call good wine!"
One more bowl was poured. And that made exactly three Wu Song had drunk and the host wasn't going to pour any more.
Wu Song started to bang on the table. "Landlord!" he shouted. "Why don't you come and pour the wine?"
"Sir, more meat I'll bring you, if that be what you desire."
"I want more wine — but don't worry, you can cut me some more meat as well."
"If it's meat you want," the landlord repeated, "I'll bring it for you but no more wine."
"What's all this?" Wu Song said to himself. To the innkeeper he said: "Why don't you want to sell me any more?"
"Lord, sir!" said the man. "You seen our sign, haven't you? Says it clear enough, don't it? 'Three bowls, forget the pass!'"
"But what's that supposed to mean, 'Three bowls, forget the pass'?"
"Well, 'tis a local brew, I know that but this wine of ours has got more class than many a famous vintage. Everyone who comes to our inn here, they have just the three bowls and then they're drunk, see, they have to forget about climbing the pass up there! That's why we say, 'Three bowls, forget the pass!' All our guests, just three bowls you know, and after that they don't ask for no more."
Wu Song laughed and said: "Oh, so that's it! But I've had three bowls, how come I'm not drunk?"
The innkeeper said: "They calls her the Perfumed Glory but they also calls her The Knockout. Slips down like mother's milk, she does but she'll go off like a time bomb!"
"Balls!" said Wu Song. "Are you afraid I won't pay you? Bring me another three bowls."
Seeing that Wu Song was still entirely steady, the innkeeper brought him another three bowls.
Wu Song drank and said: "First-class wine. Landlord, whatever I drink, I'll pay for. Just keep me filled up!"
"Oh sir!" the man protested. "Don't go on drinking! When you're drunk on this wine there's no remedy."
"Enough of your bullshit! And if you're thinking of doctoring the wine, watch out, I've got a nose for that sort of thing!"
The innkeeper found it was no good arguing, so he poured another three bowls.
"Bring me another two catties of meat!" Wu Song shouted.
The innkeeper cut another two catties of beef, poured another three bowls of wine and for a long while Wu Song went on guzzling. Finally he took out some silver and called: "Landlord, come and count this silver, see if it's enough to pay for what I've drunk and eaten."
The innkeeper had a look and said: "More than enough, you'll get some change."
"I don't want your change, just give it to me in wine."
"But sir, if you want it in wine, that's another five or six bowls! I'll warrant you can't manage that."
"I don't care if it's more than six bowls, just bring it!"
"You're such a big man," said the innkeeper, "if you pass out, how are we ever going to carry you?"
"If I needed the likes of you to carry me, I wouldn't call myself a man at all!"
But the innkeeper still didn't want to bring the wine.
Wu Song began to lose his temper. "It's not as if I'm not paying you for it. If you don't stop trying to provoke me, I'll smash the place up, I'll turn your bloody house upside down!"
"The bugger's drunk, I'd better humour him," the innkeeper said to himself. And he brought another six bowls, all of which Wu Song drank.
Having consumed altogether no less than eighteen bowls, Wu Song now grasped his cudgel, rose to his feet and saying: "Who says I'm drunk?", marched out of the door. "And you can forget all that stuff about 'Three bowls, forget the pass'," he shouted back.
So off he went, brandishing his cudgel.
But then the innkeeper was chasing after him, crying: "Sir, sir, where do you think you're a-going to?"
Wu Song halted and said: "What are you shouting about? I've paid for everything, haven't I? Why all this song and dance?"
"I'm only trying to help," the innkeeper said. "You'd better come back inside and read the government notice."

"What government notice?"
"There's been this big tiger, see, recently, a monster with bulging eyes and a white forehead, up there in the Jingyang Pass. He comes out to attack people at night. Done for twenty or thirty good men already, he has. The hunters are under orders to trap him, there's a deadline set by the government. And there's signs posted up in all the approaches to the pass, warning travellers to form groups if they want to cross, and only to go morning, noon or afternoon. It's forbidden to cross at any other time. And what's more, single travellers are supposed to wait till there's a group. 'Tis late now, it'll soon be night, and when I saw you walk off like that, without a word to anyone, I said to myself, 'he's just throwing his life away.' You'd much better spend the night here. Tomorrow you can wait till a sufficient number's gathered, and then you all cross the pass together."
Wu Song laughed this suggestion to scorn. "I'm from the region," he said, "and I've crossed this pass a score of times. Who ever heard of a tiger there? It's no good thinking you can frighten me with that sort of shit. Anyway, even if there is a tiger, I'm not afraid of it!"
"I'm telling you what's good for you! If you don't believe me, come inside and take a look at the government notice."
"Balls! I tell you, if there really is a tiger, it doesn't scare me. What you want is to get me to stay in your house so you can come in the middle of the night and rob me of my money and my life. That's why you're trying to intimidate me with some tale of a fucking tiger!"
"Well I never! Here's me, out of the kindness of my heart, trying to help him, and all he does is twist my words around to give them a bad meaning. All right, if you don't believe me, just go ahead!" It was like this, you see:

Of those that went before, a thousand came to grief;
That the next will safely pass is surely beyond belief!
In pointing out the facts nothing but kindness is meant;
But the fool with his suspicions imagines an ill intent!

Shaking his head, the innkeeper stepped back inside.
Wu Song picked up his cudgel and strode off towards the Jingyang Pass. After little more than a mile, he arrived at the foot of the pass. Here he saw a big tree, with a white patch where the bark had been stripped off to make room for two lines of writing. Wu Song was a passable reader. He raised his eyes and read:
In view of the recent attacks by a tiger in the Jingyang Pass, travellers are advised to make the crossing only in the morning, at noon, or in the afternoon, and furthermore to organize themselves into groups for the said crossing. Ignore this advice at your peril!
Wu Song did not take it seriously. "It must be a trick by that scoundrel of an innkeeper to frighten travellers into staying at his inn. That sort of bullshit won't scare me!" he said, and with his cudgel at the slope he began to climb the pass.
By now the afternoon was drawing on and the sun's red disk was starting to sink behind the mountains. But Wu Song, spurred on by the wine he had drunk, was determined to conquer that pass. He had not gone more than a few hundred yards, however, when he came upon a tumbledown little temple dedicated to the spirits of the mountain. Approaching, he saw that there was a notice bearing an official seal fixed to the door. He paused to read it. It said:
Yanggu district office announces that due to the recent appearance of a fierce man-eating tiger and the fact that the local hunters commissioned to trap it have not yet succeeded in their objective, all merchants and travellers are accordingly advised not to attempt the crossing of the pass except between the hours of nine and three, and furthermore single travellers are not to attempt the journey alone, lest they perish in the process. Traveller take heed!
After reading this, Wu Song realized that there was indeed a tiger. At first he thought of turning back and going to the inn but then he said to himself: "If I go back there, I'll have to endure his mockery. It'll look as if I'm scared. So I can't very well turn back." He turned it over in his mind for a while and then concluded: "What the hell am I afraid of? I'll just go on and see what happens."
So on he went. And as the wine began to mount to his head, he took off his hat and strung it on his back, and tucked the cudgel under his arm. Step by step, he trudged on up the pass. Turning to look at the sun, he saw that it was slowly setting. This was real November weather, when the days are short and the nights long, and it's easy for nightfall to catch you unawares. "What's all this nonsense about a big tiger," Wu Song was muttering to himself. "People are scared of the mountain that's all, they don't have the guts to climb it."
He walked on a bit further and the wine began to make itself felt still more. He was feeling hot, so holding his cudgel in one hand he used the other to loosen his clothing and bare his chest. He was swaying and stumbling as he advanced towards a dense thicket. There happened to be a smooth black boulder here, so he laid his cudgel aside and sank down to rest upon the boulder. He was just drifting off to sleep when there came a fierce gust of wind. There's an old four-line verse that exactly describes this wind:

Formless and invisible, it strikes to a man's heart;
It comes in any season and it blows all things apart;
Sweeping through the autumn woods it strips the branches bare,
Whistling among mountain peaks, it fills with clouds the air.

For clouds, as we all know, originate with dragons, and wind is associated with tigers.
When the gust had passed, he heard something crashing through the trees and out sprang an enormous tiger, with bulging eyes and a white forehead. When Wu Song saw this a horrified "Aiya!" broke from his lips. He rolled off the boulder and grabbing his cudgel dodged behind it.
Now the tiger was ravenous. It struck the ground with two paws and sprang upwards, intending to land on its prey like a thunderbolt. Wu Song had such a shock that he felt all the wine start out of him in an icy sweat!
It's slow in the telling but happens in a flash. When he saw the tiger spring, Wu Song leapt out of the way, ending up behind it. That's exactly what the tiger didn't like, to have a man at its back. Thrusting upward off its front paws, it flexed its back and twisted round to pounce again. But again Wu Song dodged to one side. Failing to grasp its prey, the tiger gave a roar like half the heavens exploding, a roar that seemed to shake the very mountains, and lashed out at Wu Song with its tail, rigid as a steel bar. Once more Wu Song leapt aside.
Now when the tiger attacks a man, it generally has these three strategies: the spring, the pounce and the tail-swipe. When all these three methods failed, this tiger's spirit was half broken. After failing to catch Wu Song with its tail it gave a loud roar and turned away. Seeing the tiger had turned its back on him, Wu Song grasped his cudgel in both hands and brought it down with all the strength of his body. There was a resounding crash.
But what he had done was demolish a whole tree, branches and all. He looked for the tiger. His staff had not even touched it. He'd rushed his stroke and all he'd achieved was to bring down a dead tree. Now his cudgel was broken in two and he was left with only the broken half in his hand.
The tiger roared, it was enraged, it turned and sprang at him again. Wu Song leapt back, covering ten paces in a single bound. The tiger reared up on its hind legs and came at him with all its claws out. Wu Song threw away his broken stick and suddenly grabbing the tiger's striped neck with his bare hands began forcing it down to the ground. The beast tried to struggle but all Wu Song's strength was employed against it, not for a moment did he relax his grip. With his legs he delivered fearful kicks to its nose and eyes. The tiger roared furiously, and as it thrashed about under this onslaught its paws churned up two mounds of mud. Wu Song thrust the beast's head down into the mud and irresistibly its power began to ebb. Still gripping the striped coat tightly with his left hand, Wu Song managed to work his right hand free and began raining down blows with an iron fist, hammering the beast with all his might. He got in fifty or sixty blows, till from the tiger's eyes, mouth, nose and ears the red blood began to gush.
With all the power of the heroes of old, by the sheer force of his manly spirit, Wu Song was able easily to convert that savage monster into a senseless heap, for all the world like an embroidered bag. There's a traditional account of this:

On Jingyang Pass a sudden squall,
Day hides its face in a thick black pall;
Twilight cloaks the desolate wold,
And a deadly chill pervades the world.
A sound like thunder splits the ears
As the king of beasts on the slope appears.
He proudly bounds, teeth and claws on show,
Filling the antlered tribe with woe.
The Qinghe hero, still half tight,
Waits alone but ready to fight.
To watch that man-eater hunt a meal,
Crouch and spring ... it would make you squeal!
He falls on the man like an avalanche,
But the man's a cliff, he doesn't flinch;
He grips with the force of a missile crashing —
And the tiger's paws in the mud are thrashing.
Blows and kicks, a relentless flood,
Both hands soaked in the crimson blood.
Dreadful carnage! On the blood-soaked ground
Fur and whiskers are strewn around.
There it lies now, bright stripes fading,
Sprawled among weeds, the wild eyes clouding.

Now what Wu Song on the mountain provided for that savage tiger, in less time than it takes to eat a simple meal, was a surfeit of blows and kicks: he beat the beast senseless. For a moment it lay helpless, faintly panting. Then Wu Song let go and went to find the broken end of his cudgel. With this, fearing lest the tiger revive, he belabored it a while longer, till the breath was quite gone out of it.
"I might as well drag the carcass down the mountain," he decided. But when he thrust his hands into the bleeding mass and started pulling, he could not shift it. All he did was exhaust himself, till his arms and legs began to fail. So he went back to the black boulder and sat down to rest for a while. Presently he said to himself: "It's getting quite dark now. If another tiger should appear, I don't think I'd be able to cope. I'd better try and get down off the pass. I can come back and deal with this thing in the morning." He picked up his hat that had fallen beside the boulder, and skirting round the thickest part of the forest, set off at a steady pace down the mountain.
He had hardly gone half a mile when he saw, emerging from a thick patch of tall dry grass, two tigers! "Aiya!" he cried, "now I'm finished!" Then in the shadows the two tigers rose on their hind legs, and when Wu Song looked carefully, it was two men who had sewn themselves suits made out of tiger skins, fitting tightly to their bodies. They carried five-tined forks.
They were shocked to see Wu Song. "Have you the courage of a wild beast, a leopard's gall, a tiger's claws?" they said. "Have you a heart so big it won't fit in your body, that you dare, alone in the dark of night and unarmed, to cross the pass? Are you a man or a ghost?"
"Who are you?" Wu Song asked in return.
"We are the hunters," they replied.
"And why are you headed this way, up the mountain?"
They registered amazement. "Haven't you heard? There's a truly enormous tiger, right here in Jingyang Pass. Every night someone is attacked. Seven or eight of our fellows, hunters that is, have lost their lives already, and countless travellers, all devoured by this terrible monster. The Magistrate has made the local authorities and us hunters responsible for capturing it. But it's incredibly ferocious and dangerous to approach, no one dares get too near. We've had I don't know how many beatings on account of this but we just can't catch him. It's our turn again tonight. We've got a few dozen villagers here to back us up. We've put down traps everywhere, loaded with poisoned darts. We had just finished setting our ambush. Imagine our surprise when we saw you strolling down the mountain. Who are you? Did you see the tiger?"
"I'm from Qinghe, my name is Wu and I'm the second in my family. Yes, I ran into the tiger, in a pretty wild part of the mountain too, and I've just beaten it to death."
The hunters' jaws fell open. "Are you joking?" they said.
"If you don't believe it, look at all the blood on me."
"But how did you kill it?"
Wu Song recounted his exploit with the tiger. The hunters were as relieved as they were astonished. They called the villagers, who now came crowding forward, a dozen or more of them, carrying steel-tined forks, foot-bows, knives and spears.
"Why didn't these troops go with you up the mountain?" Wu Song asked the hunters.
"Catch them going up there, with a ferocious beast like that on the loose!" the latter replied.
When the hunters told the villagers that Wu Song had killed the tiger they didn't believe it.
"If you don't trust me, let's all go and have a look," Wu Song said. They had flints and tinder boxes with them, so they lit half a dozen torches and followed Wu Song back up the mountain. There was the dead tiger, sprawled in a heap. Immediately there was great rejoicing. One of the villagers was sent on ahead to inform the district authorities, while the others put a rope round the tiger and carried it down the mountain.
When they reached the bottom a crowd had already gathered. They proceeded on, the tiger going in front and Wu Song now being carried in a mountain palanquin, till they reached the house of a local bigwig. This personage, accompanied by the Magistrate, was waiting for them outside the gate. The tiger was carried to the main hall. Everyone of any standing in the district had come to see Wu Song, and so had all the local hunters, so there were twenty or thirty people all told.
"Won't you please tell us your name and where you come from?" they said to Wu Song.
"My name's Wu Song and I'm the second in my family. I was on my way home from Cangzhou. Last night I stayed at the inn on the other side of the pass and got rather drunk. When I climbed the pass there was this tiger." Once more he gave a detailed account of his pugilistic exploits with the tiger.
"My! This is a real hero!" the audience said.
Wu Song was now offered wine and the hunters produced dishes of game to go with it. Wu Song was exhausted from his fight with the tiger and the master of the house, after telling the servants to prepare a guest-room, urged him to go and lie down.
Next day at dawn the head of the household sent someone to the Magistracy with a report. A frame was constructed for carrying the tiger. As soon as it was fully light Wu Song got up and washed. The important people of the village brought a sheep and a barrel of wine that was served in front of the main hall. Wu Song dressed and put on his hat and came out to meet everyone. They toasted him and said: "Heaven knows how many people this beast injured, or how many hunters suffered floggings because of it. Now at last a hero has appeared and rid us of the menace. What a relief, both for the people of this village and for all travellers, who can now complete their journey in safety! We really owe you a lot!"
"It is not through any merit of my own," said Wu Song modestly. "I must have acted in the shadow of your good fortune."
Everyone had come to congratulate him. When they had breakfasted and drunk wine the tiger was carried out and placed on the frame, while Wu Song was garlanded with a piece of red silk. Wu Song left his bundle and other things in the village, and they all departed through the gate. Immediately some police officers from Yanggu appeared, with orders to escort Wu Song. After some introductions, four servants were instructed to carry Wu Song in an open sedan, while the tiger was borne along in front, draped in red cloth. Thus they proceeded to Yanggu.
The people of Yanggu, having heard about a hero killing the tiger of the Jingyang Pass, all turned out to cheer. The whole district was in an uproar. From his sedan Wu Song saw them pushing and shoving, packing every street and alley, everyone eager for a glimpse of the tiger. The procession reached the government offices and stopped at the entrance to the court. The Magistrate was already in the courtroom, waiting to receive them. Wu Song alighted and the bearers set the tiger down on a raised walkway. The Magistrate, having observed Wu Song's manly aspect and seeing the tiger was such a magnificent specimen, said to himself: "Who but such a fellow could have finished off that enormous animal?" When Wu Song had saluted, the Magistrate said: "Come now, do tell us all about how you killed such a mighty beast."
So Wu Song told his story all over again, in the courtroom. Everyone present heard him with amazement. Toasts were drunk in his honour and he was presented with some money collected by the local dignitaries as a reward, a thousand strings of cash in all. But Wu Song modestly said: "I am simply enjoying the reflection of your good fortune, Your Excellency. I was just lucky to kill the tiger, it was not through any merit of my own. How can I accept this money? I have heard that the hunters here suffered sanctions on account of the tiger. Might we not divide the money and give it to them?"
"If that is your wish," the Magistrate said. "I leave it to you to arrange it."
Wu Song distributed the money among the hunters, and the Magistrate, impressed by Wu Song's open-handedness and humanity, decided he would like to secure his advancement. "Although you are from Qinghe," he said, "that's right next to us here at Yanggu. I would like to offer you a commission in our forces. What do you say?"
Wu Song knelt to thank him. "I shall be forever in your debt for this, Your Excellency," he said.
Accordingly, the Magistrate called the registrar and had him write out the order appointing Wu Song with immediate effect a captain of foot. All the important members of the community came to offer their congratulations and there were celebrations lasting several days. Wu Song thought to himself: "Really, it's amazing. I merely wanted to go home to see my brother, and now here I am, an officer in the Yanggu militia!" From that day on he was honoured by all and his fame spread throughout the district.
Several days had passed, and then one day as Wu Song left the government offices in search of amusement, he heard someone call out behind him: "Captain Wu, you've made your fortune now, is that why you don't come to see me?"
When Wu Song turned and saw who it was, he let out a cry: "Aiya! what are you doing here?"
Had Wu Song not met this person, things would have turned out very differently, and Yanggu would not have witnessed a scene of terrible carnage. As a result of the meeting,

Blades will whistle and heads will roll,
Bright swords be drawn and the hot blood flow.

We have already related how Song Jiang, in order to avoid drinking more wine, went outside to the toilet and while on the veranda he upset the charcoal brazier, and burnt a man, and how this resulted in Song Jiang's name being disclosed to the man. When the man heard Song Jiang's name how could he get up after kowtowing? He said, "I failed to recognize your eminence and I hope that you will forgive me for that blunder."

Song Jiang raised him up and asked who he was.
"This man," said Chai Jin, "is Wu Song of Qinghe County, and he is a second son. He has lived here for a year."
"I have often heard of Wu the Second but I did not expect to meet him here today. What a good luck!" said Song Jiang.
"It is very unusual for heroes to meet in this way. I request you both to come and have some wine with me," said Chai Jin.
Song Jiang was much pleased at this and taking Wu Song by the hand conducted him to the hall where he summoned Song Qing and introduced him to Wu Song. Chai Jin then invited Wu Song to be seated, and Song Jiang strongly urged him to take the premier position at the table. But Wu Song was unwilling to take the place of honour, and after politely declining for a long time he at last took his seat in the third position. Chai Jin ordered the servants to spread a feast with wine, and when ready he strongly pressed his guests to partake the same.
Song Jiang was exceedingly pleased with the manner and bearing of Wu Song, and at last he asked him why he was staying there.
"While I was at Qinghe County I got drunk and had a fight with some official. I struck him with my fist while I was in a very hot temper, and knocked him nearly insensible. I thought I had killed him, so in order to avoid being arrested I ran away to this place for refuge where I have stayed for more than a year. Afterwards I heard that the man I had struck had not died—he was still alive. I would have liked to return home and find my elder brother but I felt ill and was unable to go. When you overturned the charcoal brazier on the veranda I was very much alarmed, and had a heavy cold perspiration but I think that had cured my sickness."
Song Jiang was much pleased upon hearing this. The feast lasted till nearly midnight. Then Song Jiang took Wu Song to a very comfortable room on the west side where they both slept that night. The next day Chai Jin arranged another feast at which a sheep and a pig were served.
After a few days Song Jiang gave Wu Song some money to buy clothing. When Chai Jin heard of this he wondered how he could let it be done. So he took some rolls of silk and satin, and told his own family tailor to make three suits for them. But Chai Jin had not made such a present before so why did he do it now?
The reason was that when Wu Song first came there for refuge he had been treated as a guest but he was often drunk. Whenever the servants did not treat him well he would become angry and beat them, and therefore there was not a single servant who had a good word for him. They all hated him, and often complained to Chai Jin about his conduct. But Chai Jin would not speak to him about this and only became more distant in his manner towards his guest. When Song Jiang came he sought out Wu Song, and they used to drink wine in each other's company everyday. Soon Wu Song's bad temper had vanished. After about ten days of this mutual friendship Wu Song thought of returning to Qinghe County to visit his elder brother. He was pressed not to go by Chai Jin and Song Jiang but after a little time he spoke to them saying," I have not heard from my elder brother for a long time so I must go and see him."
"As you want to go," said Song Jiang, "we do not wish to upset you by detaining you. But I hope that we shall meet again at some future date."
Wu Song expressed his thanks, and Chai Jin gave him some gold and silver. Wu Song again expressed his thanks, and regretted that he had given them so much trouble. After a parting cup Wu Song made up his bundle, and slung it on his back. He wore a red silk-quilted coat similar to those worn by monks, and had a white felt cap which was made in broad brimmed style. He carried a cudgel in his hand.
Just as he was about to depart Song Jiang asked him to wait a bit, and then went into his own room, and taking some silver met Wu Song at the gate saying, "I will accompany you for a short distance." Song Qing also came with his brother Song Jiang and as the three were taking leave of Chai Jin, Song Jiang said, "Sir, I shall be gone only for a short distance."
When the three had travelled about a couple of li Wu Song urged the brothers to return as Chai Jin would undoubtedly be getting anxious.
"What objection can there be for us to go a few steps further?" said Song Jiang.
So they went on for about a li more chatting on the way, and then Wu Song took Song Jiang by the hand and said, "You must not come any further. People often say, 'Even if you accompany a guest three hundred li you must at last come to the parting place.'"
"I will go a few steps further," said Song Jiang. "Just over there, there is a small inn where we can drink a few cups of wine before parting."
When they reached the inn Song Jiang took the seat of honour, and Wu Song took the lower position after placing his cudgel by his chair. Song Qing sat at the side of the table. They told the waiter to bring fruit and vegetables which were duly supplied. After they had been drinking wine for some time they noticed the red hues of sunset, and Wu Song said, "It is getting late and we had better separate and I will give you four salutations as my adopted elder brother." Song Jiang was much pleased. Wu Song kowtowed four times, and Song Jiang then told his brother Song Qing to take ten taels of silver and presented it to Wu Song. But Wu Song declined to accept it, and asked them to reserve it for they themselves were guests at another's home.
"You must not be so anxious about us, younger brother," said Song Jiang. "If you decline it I cannot recognize you as my younger brother."
So Wu Song took the money. He then shouldered his bundle, and taking his cudgel the three walked hand in hand to the door where they separated with tears in the eyes. The brothers stood at the door of the inn until Wu Song could no longer be seen, and then they departed for home. When they had gone less than two li they met Chai Jin riding a horse, and leading two spare ones to welcome them home. They were highly delighted at this, and mounted. They soon reached the village. Upon dismounting they all went into a hall at the back where they drank wine, and after this the two brothers stayed with Chai Jin.
When Wu Song left the brothers he travelled some distance, and then rested for the night at an inn. The next morning after an early breakfast he started on the road again. As he walked he ruminated that all men had said that the 'Welcome Rain,' Song Jiang, was truly a fine man, and he had certainly been well treated by him. After a few days he was approaching Yanggu County about noon when he felt very hungry and thirsty.
Just then he happened to see an inn with a signboard over the door with five characters, meaning, "If you drink three cups of our wine you will be unable to cross the mountain ridge."
Wu Song entered the inn, took his seat, placed his cudgel by his side, and called the proprietor to bring some wine. The proprietor put before him three cups, a tray with some cooked vegetables, and a pair of chopsticks. The proprietor then slowly fill a cup with wine. Wu Song picked up the cup and drank the wine off saying, "This wine is very strong. I wish to have some food, to take with more wine."
"I have some roast beef," said the proprietor.
"That is fine. Bring me about three jin of beef."
The proprietor soon brought in a plate of beef and setting it before Wu Song, he again poured out a cup of wine. Wu Song drank the wine and again praised it. The proprietor filled another cup, and then left him.
As the proprietor had not returned Wu Song banged the table and called out. "Proprietor, why do you not serve more wine?"
"If you want more beef I can let you have some," said the man.
"I want wine as well as beef."
"I can give you beef but no more wine," said the man.
"That is strange!" said Wu Song. "Why don't you give me wine while I can pay for it?"
"Did you not see the signboard over the door of this inn?" asked the man.
"What is the idea of such a signboard?" asked Wu Song.
"Although our wine is made here yet it has a very delicate flavour," said the man. "Whenever a guest arrives and drinks three cups of this wine he always gets drunk so that he cannot go over the mountain ridge, and that is why I put up that signboard. When guests stop here they never ask for more than three cups of wine."
"That is the case," said Wu Song laughingly. "But how is it that I am not drunk after three cups?"
"Our wine is called 'The Aroma Penetrates The Bottle,' and also has another name that means 'Upon Leaving The Door You Will Fall Down.' While drinking, it has a fine flavour but in a short time afterwards you will fall down."
"Don't talk nonsense," said Wu Song. "I won't cheat you; I'll pay you, so bring me three more cups of wine."
The proprietor saw that he was not in the least affected by the wine so he filled three more cups.
After drinking Wu Song said, "It is really very fine. I want you to keep on pouring out the wine, and I will pay you for each cup I drink."
"Sir, please give up the idea of drinking any more or you will undoubtedly be drunk, and there is no medicine to prevent it."
"You need not speak such rubbish," said Wu Song. "If you put some drug in the wine I should soon detect it."
The innkeeper could find no answer to this so he poured out three more cups of wine.
Wu Song ordered a further three jin of beef. The innkeeper brought in the cold beef and again poured out three cups of wine. Wu Song drank the wine but still wanted more. So he took out his silver and showing it to the innkeeper asked, "Look at this. Is it enough for your wine and beef?"
"More than enough!" said the innkeeper. "Let me have it and I will give you the balance."
"I do not want any change," said Wu Song. "You can pay me the balance in wine."
"Sir," said the innkeeper, "you have had a lot of wine but I still have five or six cups full left. But I am afraid that you will not be able to drink so much."
"As you have about five cups of wine more you can let me have the whole lot," said Wu Song.
"You are a very big man," said the innkeeper, "and how am I going to lift you up when you fall down dead drunk?"
"I should not be a man, should I want you to help me up," said Wu Song.
But the innkeeper was unwilling to pour and any more wine, so Wu Song spoke in an angry tone, "Have I not paid you for the wine! Do not provoke me to anger or I shall smash the whole room to pieces, and turn your inn upside down."
The innkeeper saw that Wu Song was drunk so he decided not to oppose him and poured out all the six cups of wine. Altogether Wu Song drank eighteen cups of wine, and then picking up his cudgel he got up and said, "I am not drunk yet!" He walked to the door laughing, and proceeded on his way.
The innkeeper however called after him, "Sir, where are you going?"
"Why do you call me?" replied Wu Song. "Have I not paid you for the wine?"
"I have a good intention for you," said the innkeeper. "I want you o come to my home and look at a copy of an official proclamation."
"What is the proclamation about?" asked Wu Song.
"Just now there is, on Jingyang Ridge, a large animal with a white forehead and protruding eyes. It comes out in the evening, and has already killed about thirty men, and injured many others. The magistrate has enjoined upon the hunters to catch the animal by a certain time. At all crossroads there is a notice warning travellers of the danger, and ordering them to band themselves together when crossing the ridge. Travellers must cross the ridge only between the hours of 9 A.M. and 3 P.M. and not at any other time. So that, as you are by yourself you must wait and join with some other travellers before you can cross the ridge. It is now well past three o'clock and yet I see you walking off without asking anyone to go with you, and evidently you are running the risk of your life. It will be better if you stay here for the night, and go over the ridge tomorrow in the company of about thirty men."
"I am a Qinghe County man," laughed Wu Song, "and although I have been across the Jingyang Ridge about twenty times I have never seen or heard of a big animal there. So you need not say shit like this just to frighten me. And even if there is a beast I am not afraid of it."
"I only wanted to save your life," said the innkeeper "If you do not believe what I say then come inside and read the official proclamation."
"Bullshit," said Wu Song. "Even if there is a tiger I shall not be afraid. I suppose if I pass the night at your inn you may try to get my money during the night, and perhaps kill me. That is why you now make up this story to frighten me and keep me here."
"Look here!" said the innkeeper. "I am taking good care of you, yet you think I have bad intention. If you do not believe what I say then go your own way." While saying this he shook his head with regret, and entered his inn.
Wu Song picked up his cudgel and started off for the Jingyang Ridge. After walking about two li he reached the foot of the ridge, and there he saw a large tree which had had its bark taken away, and on the white timber were two columns of characters written. It was to the same effect as the official proclamation.
On reading it Wu Song laughed and said, "That innkeeper is a clever one. Frighten travellers so that they will stay at his inn. But I am not afraid of that shit." Dragging his cudgel along the ground he proceeded on his way. It was about four o'clock, and the sun was slowly sinking behind the ridge, setting the sky in a red evening glow. The large quantities of wine he had drunk had driven all fear away so he proceeded on his way. He had only gone a little distance when he saw a ruined temple, and on the door was another notice so he went forward and read it. It warned travellers of the danger of crossing the ridge.
So Wu Song at last realized that there was a tiger to be faced, and his first thought was to return to the inn. But he saw in that case the innkeeper would only laugh at him, and regard him as a coward—so that would not do. But after a second thought, he said to himself, "Why be afraid? Why not face the danger?" He went on but soon vomited the wine he had taken. He then took his cap, and pushed it on his back suspended by the tapes. He put his cudgel under his arm, and slowly ascended the ridge. Turning his head he saw that the sun had now sunk to the west. It was now the tenth lunar month so that the autumn days were short, the nights long, and the sunset was soon followed by darkness.
He soliloquized, "Where is that tiger that men are so afraid of that they dare not cross the ridge?" He went a little further, and now felt the effect of the wine. So taking the cudgel in one hand he unloosened his coat with the other hand. Staggering along he entered the forest. He came across a large block of smooth green stone against which he put his cudgel. He then reclined on the stone with the intention of sleeping there. Just then a strong wind sprang up, and he heard a sound among the trees, and at the same moment a large tiger sprang out. With an exclamation he rolled off the stone, seized his cudgel, and slipped to one side of the stone. The tiger was both hungry and thirsty, and crouched on the ground ready for a spring. As the tiger sprang forward Wu Song was startled, and was covered with a cold sweat but slipping to one side he escaped. The tiger immediately turned round, and roared like thunder, so that the ridge almost quaked.
The tiger's tail was erect and stiff as a poker, and was lashed from side to side in rage. Wu Song did not keep still but kept moving about irregularly. In fact the tiger had only three methods of killing men, a crouch, a leap, and a blow with its tail. If these three failed, the tiger at once lost all courage or spirit. In such cases it always turned round, and gave a loud roar. When Wu Song saw it turning round he seized his cudgel with both hands, and using the utmost of his strength he whirled it aloft, and brought it down with a crash. There was a great noise followed by a fall of leaves and twigs from the dense undergrowth. Wu Song saw that he had missed the tiger, and simply in his haste had hit the undergrowth. As his long cudgel was broken in half, he threw a part away. The tiger roared again, crouched, and again leapt at Wu Song. Wu Song again swiftly stepped to one side. The tiger whirled round and came just in front of Wu Song and planted its forepaws on the ground. Wu Song threw the remaining half of the cudgel away, and seized the tiger's forehead skin with both hands, and pressed the tiger down on the ground. The tiger struggled to get up but Wu Song exerted all his strength, and would not let it go the least bit. He kicked it in the eyes. This made the tiger roar, and scoop out holes in the yellow soil with its front paws. Wu Song now pressed the tiger's snout into the hole in the ground, and it had to endure this disgrace as it was losing its strength. Wu Song now grasped the loose skin on the tiger's head in his left hand, and taking his right fist hit the tiger severely.
After about seventy blows blood streamed out of the tiger's eyes, mouth, nose, and ears, and the beast lay panting for breath. Wu Song left it for a moment, and went to get a part of his cudgel. As he was afraid that the tiger was not yet dead he dealt the tiger some blows for some time until he saw evidently that it was no longer alive. He thereupon threw away his cudgel and wondered whether he should drag the tiger down the mountain. The body lay in a pool of blood, and using both hands he tried to move it but he found that it was too heavy. He had used up all his strength so that he now felt weak in hand and foot. So he sat down on the green smooth stone for a short rest, and meditated that the night was quite dark now, and what could he do if another tiger were to attack him. So he decided to leave the ridge and return the following day for the tiger's body. He looked around and found his felt cap, and then started down the mountain.
He had not gone far when he saw two tigers emerging from the dry grass. "Ai Ya!" he said. "That's all gone now." But he noticed that the two tigers now stood up on their hind legs, and looking closely he saw that they were two men who had fastened tiger skins very closely on their bodies, and carried in their hands five-pronged forks.
They were surprised at seeing Wu Song, and said, "You... you ... you... , you must have eaten the heart of a wolf, the gall bladder of a leopard, and the legs of a lion so that your whole body becomes a mass of courage. How dare you to cross the ridge during the night without a single weapon in your hand. You... . you... . you... . are you a man or a demon?"
"But who are you?" asked Wu Song.
"We are hunters," replied the men.
"And what are you doing on this mountain?" asked Wu Song.
The men were surprised at such a question and asked, "Do you mean to say that you do not know? On this mountain there is a dangerous tiger which attacks men at night, and has already injured eight hunters, and numerous travellers have been killed. The county magistrate has ordered us, and also the village chief, to come here to catch the tiger. But its strength is so great that it is difficult to come near it. Who dare face it? The magistrate has beaten us repeatedly for not catching the tiger but it makes no difference. Tonight we have come here, accompanied by ten men from the villages, and we are all over the mountain, armed with poisoned arrows, waiting for the tiger. Just here we lay in ambush when we saw you coming from the mountain as bold as brass, and it gave us quite a start. Who are you? Have you seen the tiger?"
"I am a Qinghe County man, and my name is Wu Song. When I got up the mountain I met the tiger, and killed it with my fist and foot."
"It is impossible," said the hunters aghastly.
"You do not believe," said Wu Song. "But do you see the bloodstains on my clothes?"
"But how did you kill it?"
Wu Song then gave them all the details of his fighting with the tiger.
The hunters were both amazed and amused, and then summoned the ten villagers. The villagers soon arrived and armed with pronged forks, crossbows, broad swords, and spears.
"How is it that these men did not stay with you here?" asked Wu Song.
The hunters said, "The animal was very fierce, so how could they dare to come on the mountain?"
When the villagers had all assembled in front of them, the hunters asked Wu Song to recite to them how he had killed the tiger. He did so but they did not believe what he said.
"Well," said Wu Song, "if you do not believe then I will go, and show you the dead animal."
The villagers had flint and steel, and they then used them to strike lights and ignite torches. They went with Wu Song, and soon came to the top of the ridge where they were shown the dead tiger. They were highly delighted, and immediately sent men to report the matter to the chief of the district. The men who were left behind, tied up the carcass, and carried it on their shoulders down the mountain. At the foot of the mountain there were already about eighty men waiting for them, and they made an uproar when they saw the dead tiger. They carried the tiger in front and put Wu Song in a sedan chair. The whole party then started off to the nearest village reporting to the headman there.
Upon arriving there, there were two village heads waiting outside the village to welcome them. The party was conducted to the main room of a cottage where the other hunters of the village and about thirty other men all came to have an interview with Wu Song. He then told them in detail his recent adventure.
They all declared that he was a very brave hero, and brought him some food and wine. But Wu Song was very tired, and wanted to rest. So the servants were told to prepare a bedroom for him where he slept that night.
The next morning a messenger was dispatched to report the matter to the county magistrate and a litter was prepared to carry the tiger's body to the town.
When Wu Song got up and had washed his face, he found in front of the building a large number of men bringing a sheep and a jar of wine which they offered to him as their gifts. They said, "We do not know exactly how many people that beast has killed, or how many bamboo blows our hunters have received but now you have killed the tiger, and our trouble has come an end. We are very happy indeed. Moreover, the travellers can go without danger, and all this is due to your bounteous action."

"It was not due to my skill but was owing to your fortune," replied Wu Song.
The people all saluted him. After an exhilarating feast which lasted all the morning they placed the tiger's body on the litter which was ready. They made garland of silk and red flowers for Wu Song. They were about to start off from the village. A deputy of the county magistrate had already arrived to conduct Wu Song to the court. Four men were sent with a cool sedan chair to convey Wu Song to the court. The litter with the tiger's carcass was in front of the procession and it was also decorated with red flowers and pieces of silk. When the people of the town heard of the great hero who had killed a tiger on the mountain they all crowded to see him, and made such a noise that it could be heard all over the district. Wu Song in his chair saw all the streets were blocked with noisy crowds which were eager to have a look at the tiger. Upon reaching the yamen gate, he saw the county magistrate waiting in the hall. The litter and the sedan chair were carried to the court, and laid in the corridor in front of the door.
The magistrate noticed the manner of Wu Song, and also the size of the tiger. He thought that Wu Song was the only person who could kill such a tiger. He summoned Wu Song to come forward. Wu Song approached and called out "nuo." The magistrate invited him inside where Wu Song recited his adventure. There was a large crowd of men both inside and outside the hall. They all listened to Wu Song and were greatly astonished. The magistrate offered several cups of wine to Wu Song, and also a gift of one thousand strings of cash which had been subscribed by the wealthy families of the district.
"I am grateful to you for this blessing, sir," said Wu Song. "I was fortunate in killing the tiger, and as it was not due to my own abilities, how dare I accept such generous presents? I have heard that these hunters have been beaten with the bamboo, so why not compensate them with these strings of cash?"
"As you, the hero, suggest this, it can be done as you wish," said the magistrate.
So Wu Song took the strings of cash, and distributed them among the hunters.
When the magistrate saw the noble, virtuous, and benevolent character of Wu Song he wished to recommend him for an official post. So he said to him, "You are a Qinghe County man, and as that place is quite close here I offer you the position of Inpector in this yamen. What do you say about that?"
Wu Song knelt down and said, "As you wish to reward me in this way I shall be obliged to you for my life."
The magistrate instructed his secretary to make out the necessary papers, and Wu Song received his commission in the police as an Inspector.
The rich families saluted him, and offered their congratulations, and during the following five days they continually entertained him with wine.
Wu Song meditated that, at first, he had the idea to find his elder brother but it was detained by being made a Inspector at this place. The magistrate liked him, and his fame was widespread in every village.
One day when he was strolling outside the yamen he heard a voice behind him calling, "Inspector Wu! As you are an official now, can you not assist me?"
"Ai Ya!" exclaimed Wu Song when he turned round. "What are you doing here?"

If these heroes had not met,
Many men would not have died;
Swords would not have chopped off heads,
Nor blood have flown like water.

During the years of the Cheng-ho reign period[33] of Emperor Hui-tsung[34] of the Sung dynasty in Yang-ku district of Shantung Province, there was a man named Wu Chih who was the eldest sibling in his generation of the family. He had a younger brother, by the same mother, whose name was Wu Sung. This Wu Sung was more than six feet in stature and broad-shouldered as they come. From his youth he had cultivated his strength and become expert with the spear and quarterstaff. His brother, Wu the Elder, who was not quite three feet tall, was of a meek disposition and muddleheaded to a ridiculous degree. He was disposed to mind his own business and did not pick quarrels with anyone. Because of the hardship created by a famine in the locality, he decided that he would have to let his younger brother fend for himself, sold the house they had inherited from their forebears, and moved to the district town of Ch'ing-ho. Now at the time that this occurred Wu Sung, because he had beaten up the military affairs commissioner, T'ung Kuan, in a drunken brawl, found himself completely on his own. He had been forced to become a fugitive and had sought refuge on the manor of the Little Whirlwind, Ch'ai Chin that was located in the military prefecture of Heng-hai, in Ts'ang-chou. This Ch'ai Chin enjoyed patronizing the heroes and stout fellows of the world and was so chivalrous by nature and open-handed with his wealth that people called him Little Lord Meng-ch'ang. [45] In fact, Master Ch'ai was a direct descendant of Ch'ai Jung, Emperor Shih-tsung of the Later Chou dynasty. [46] When Ch'ai Chin saw what a fine fellow Wu Sung was, he offered him a place to stay on his manor. But who could have anticipated that Wu Sung would come down with a case of malaria that required him to recuperate on the premises for more than a year? Upon his recovery he bethought himself of his brother, Wu the Elder, bade farewell to his host, and set out for home. After spending several days on the road, Wu Sung arrived on the border between Yang-ku and Ch'ing-ho districts. At that time there was a ridge of hills on the border of Shantung Province called Ching-yang Ridge, and in these hills there was a bulging-eyed, white-browed tiger who had eaten so many people that travellers along that route were few. The authorities had ordered the licensed hunters of the locality, on pain of being beaten, to capture this tiger by a fixed deadline. There were public notices posted on either side of the road warning traveling merchants to form into bands and cross over only between the hours of 9:00 A.M. and 3:00 P.M., and prohibiting them from crossing the ridge at any other time. When Wu Sung heard about this he laughed out loud and stopped at an inn by the side of the road for a few bowls of wine to bolster his courage. Then, with his quarterstaff at the ready, he staggered off, proceeding straight up the ridge in large strides. Before he had gone so far as half a li he saw another public notice, stamped with an official seal, posted on the gate of a temple to the tutelary god of the mountain. When Wu Sung looked at this notice he saw that the message read as follows: There is a tiger on Ching-yang Ridge that has recently attacked many people. At present, the responsible persons of the relevant sub-districts and the licensed hunters of the locality have been ordered to capture it by a fixed deadline, and the authorities have offered a reward of thirty taels of silver for its capture. If there should be any traveling merchants who wish to use this route, they should first form into bands and cross the ridge only between the hours of 9:00 A.M. and 3:00 P.M. Passage over the ridge is prohibited at all other times, and unaccompanied travellers are forbidden to cross even during daylight hours. Be it known that anyone who disregards these instructions proceeds at his own risk. With a loud voice Wu Sung proclaimed, "What the hell's there to be afraid of anyway! I'll just go on up the ridge and see what kind of a tiger this is." Wu Sung tucked his quarterstaff under his arm and proceeded to stride up the ridge. He looked back and saw that the sun was slowly setting behind the mountains. It was the tenth month when the days were short and the nights long, so it got dark early. Wu Sung continued on his way for a while when he began to feel the effects of the wine. Looking into the distance he saw a tangled clump of trees. When he had made his way, at a fast clip, through this clump of trees he came upon a big, shiny, black rock, the shape of a reclining water buffalo. Propping his quarterstaff against the side of the rock, he laid himself down on top of it and prepared to take a nap. Just at this juncture, out of the blue sky, a strong gust of wind suddenly arose. What was this wind like? Behold, devoid of shape and form, it insinuates itself into men's chests; throughout the 4 seasons, it has the power to blow things into life. Touching the ground, it swirls away the yellow leaves; entering the mountains, it pushes out the white clouds. [47] It so happens that clouds arise in response to dragons; Winds arise in response to tigers.[48] As this gust of wind passed by, the yellow leaves from the clump of tangled trees fell to the ground with a rustling noise and, with a sudden roar, out jumped a ferocious striped tiger, as big as a water buffalo, with bulging eyes and a white forehead. When Wu Sung saw this he cried out, "Ai-ya!" rolled off the black rock, grabbed his quarterstaff, and made haste to put the rock between himself and his assailant.
The tiger was both hungry and thirsty. Pawing the ground with its front claws, it stretched itself and gave first one lash and then another with its tail. Then it gave a roar, like a dry clap of thunder out of the blue that made all the hills and ridges reverberate. Wu Sung's consternation had long since turned the wine in his stomach into cold sweat. The telling is slow; what happened was quick. When Wu Sung saw the tiger pounce at him, he dodged to one side so that the tiger overshot him. It so happens that this ferocious tiger had a short neck so that it was not easy for it to turn its head and look behind itself. Planting its front paws on the ground, it stretched its trunk and made a swipe at Wu Sung with its hindquarters. Wu Sung managed to jump to one side. When the tiger saw that it had failed to sideswipe Wu Sung it gave a roar that shook the ridge. But Wu Sung once again evaded it by dodging to one side. It so happens that when tigers attack people, if they fail to overcome them with a pounce, a sideswipe, or a lash of the tail, their powers are half-exhausted. When Wu Sung saw that the tiger's strength was failing, he turned around, swung his quarterstaff aloft with both hands, and brought it down with all the strength at his command. But the only thing he heard was a loud report and a thrashing noise as the branch of a tree, with all its leaves, came tumbling down in front of him. It so happens that he had not made contact with the tiger at all but had hit the branch of a tree so hard that his quarterstaff had broken in two, and only half of it was left in his hand. Wu Sung was more than a little disconcerted by this. The tiger gave vent to its wrath with a roar and, lashing its tail back and forth in a show of might, pounced at Wu Sung once again. With one leap Wu Sung leapt back some ten paces. The tiger's pounce fell short and its forepaws came to rest right in front of him. Wu Sung threw what was left of his quarterstaff to one side and took advantage of the inertia of the tiger's leap by stepping forward, grabbing hold of the skin on the crown of the tiger's head with both hands, and pressing its head down with all his might. The tiger tried to put up a fight but its strength was already failing. Wu Sung held on for all he was worth, not letting up to the slightest degree. Meanwhile, with his foot, he kicked viciously at the tiger's face and eyes. The tiger roared with pain and pawed so frantically that it heaped up two piles of brown dirt and dug a pit for itself. Wu Sung pressed its head down into the pit and, freeing his right hand, pummeled it with his fist, using all the strength at his command. In no time at all he had beaten the tiger to death. It lay on the ground like an embroidered bag, no longer able to move. There is an ancient-style poem describing Wu Sung's fight with the tiger on Ching-yang Ridge that goes:

On top of Ching-yang Ridge the wind blows wildly;
For ten thousand li dark clouds obscure the sun's light.
Flaming above the length of the river, the crimson sun is red;
Spreading everywhere over the ground, the grass has all turned brown.
Catching the eye, a sunset glow hangs over the woods;
Assailing the inhabitants, a cold fog fills the firmament.
Suddenly the sound of a thunderclap is heard;
From the side of the hill out flies the king of the beasts.
With head held high, flaunting its might, it bares its teeth and claws;
The deer in the valley all flee out of its way.
The foxes and rabbits in the hills keep out of sight;
The deer and gibbons by the stream are startled into panic.
If Pien Chuang[49] had seen it, his souls would have fled;
If Li Ts'un-hsiao[50] had met it, he would have lost heart.
The strongman of Ch'ing-ho while still in his cups,
Suddenly encounters it on the top of the ridge.
Searching high and low for its prey the tiger is famished;
Chancing on Wu Sung it pounces at him with ferocity.
The tiger's pounce at the man is like the fall of a mountain;
The man's response to the tiger is like the collapse of a cliff.
The fall of his arm is like that of a cannonball;
Its claws and teeth gouge a pit out of the earth.
The blows of his fist and foot descend like rain;
His two hands are splattered with fresh blood.
The stench of raw flesh suffuses the forest;
Tufts of fur and whiskers lie scattered over the mountain.
Even close-up, its thousand-stone might appears intact;
Though, seen from afar, its eightfold majesty is diminished.
Its body lies in the underbrush, the pattern of its stripes faded;
Tightly closed, its two eyes will glitter no more.[51]

In less time than it would take to eat a meal, Wu Sung had so beaten this ferocious tiger with his fists and his feet that it was no longer able to move. Panting hard, he let go of the tiger and went looking for his broken quarterstaff that had fallen by the side of a pine tree. He was afraid the tiger might not really be dead, so he hit it another ten blows or so with his stick. But the tiger had already breathed its last. Wu Sung thought to himself, "I might as well take advantage of this stroke of luck and drag the tiger down to the foot of the ridge." But when he approached the pool of blood in which it was lying and tugged at the tiger with both hands, he couldn't get it to budge. It so happens that he had exhausted his strength, with the result that his hands and feet had turned to jelly. Just as Wu Sung was sitting on the rock, resting, he heard a rustling noise in the underbrush on the slope of the hill. From his mouth, no word was uttered but in his heart, he was alarmed. "It's already dark! If another tiger were to jump out at me, how could I hope to overcome it?" Before he had finished speaking, lo and behold, two tigers emerged into view on the slope below. Wu Sung cried out in consternation, "Ai-ya! This time I'm done for!"
Before his very eyes, these two tigers stood up in front of him. When Wu Sung gave a closer look, he saw that they were 2 men, clothed in tiger-skins who were wearing tiger skulls on their heads and carrying 5-pronged spears in their hands. No sooner did they come up to Wu Sung than they bowed their heads in homage saying, "Strongman, are you a human or a god? You must've eaten the heart of an alligator, the liver of a leopard, and the leg of a lion, or be made out of gall! Otherwise, all by yourself, in the waning light, and without a weapon, how'd you've possibly slain this man-eating tiger? We've been on the lookout here for a long time. Tell us the truth, strongman, what's your name?"
Wu Sung replied, "I neither alter my given name when abroad, nor change my surname when at home. I'm a man of Yang-ku district, Wu Sung by name, and the second sibling in my generation of the family." Then he went on to ask, "And who are the two of you?"
"There's no reason for us to deceive you," the two men replied. "We're licensed hunters from this locality. Ever since this tiger appeared on the ridge, it's come out every night and attacked lots of people. We hunters alone have lost seven or eight of our number, and there is no telling how many travellers have suffered the same fate. His honour, the district magistrate, ordered us licensed hunters to capture it by a fixed deadline. He offered a reward of thirty taels of silver if it were captured beforehand but promised us a beating if the deadline expired. Unfortunately, the damned creature is so powerful that no one has dared to go near it. We have been lying in wait for it here, along with several tens of corvée labourers from the sub-district, and have set up spring-bows with poisoned arrows at a safe distance. Then we saw you come striding up the ridge, as cool as you please, take on the tiger and dispatch it, in no time at all, with three blows of your fist and two kicks of your foot. How could you be so strong! We will truss up the tiger for you and then invite you to come down to the foot of the ridge with us, to the district yamen, so you can meet the magistrate and claim the reward."
At this point the corvée labourers from the subdistrict and the licensed hunters, some seventy or eighty men in all, set off, bearing the dead tiger at the head of the procession and carrying Wu Sung in an open litter behind. They headed straight for the compound of a prominent householder in the neighbourhood. This householder and the village head came out to meet them. The tiger was carried into the main room of the house where all the community elders came to see it. They asked Wu Sung his name and he related the story of his conquest of the tiger. Everyone said, "He's really a hero and a stout fellow!"
The hunters provided game for a feast and toasted Wu Sung until he was quite drunk. Then a guest room was prepared for him and he retired for the night. Early the following morning the community elders went to the district yamen to report what had happened. At the same time, a litter was prepared for the tiger and a gaily decorated sedan chair for Wu Sung in which he was escorted to the yamen in appropriate state. The magistrate of Ch'ing-ho district sent runners out to usher him into the courtroom. The people of the whole district, on hearing that a strongman had killed the tiger on Ching-yang Ridge and was being given a formal welcome, all came out to see the show. The entire district was in an uproar. When Wu Sung arrived at the courtroom, he got out of the sedan chair and the tiger was carried in and laid down in front of him. The district magistrate looked Wu Sung over and thought to himself, "If he weren't such a hefty fellow, how'd he have overcome this fierce tiger?" Then he summoned him to come forward and Wu Sung, after having paid his respects, related the story of his conquest of the tiger from start to finish. The functionaries standing to either side were stupefied with amazement.
The magistrate offered him several cups of wine right in the courtroom and then presented him with the reward of thirty taels of silver that had been contributed by the prominent families of the district.
Wu Sung said respectfully, "It is only owing to Your Honour's benevolent deeds that I have had the accidental good fortune to kill this tiger. It is due to no merit of mine. How could I accept this reward? These thirty taels of silver ought to go to the licensed hunters who have suffered so much at your hands on account of this beast. Why not divide up the reward among them as a demonstration of Your Honour's graciousness and of my own public spirit?"
"If that's what you want," the magistrate said, "you may do as you wish." There and then Wu Sung proceeded to distribute the thirty taels of reward money to the licensed hunters, who went their way. When the magistrate saw that Wu Sung was a man of virtue, integrity, and a stout fellow to boot, it occurred to him that he might be able to do something for him, so he said, "Even though you come from the district of Yang-ku rather than Ch'ing-ho, they are right next to each other. If I were to appoint you to the post of police captain here in Ch'ing-ho with the responsibility for maintaining law and order throughout the jurisdiction, what'd you think?"
Wu Sung knelt down and thanked him, saying, "If Your Honour should deign to raise me up in this way, I'd be grateful to you for the rest of my life." The magistrate ordered his clerk to take care of the necessary paperwork immediately, and he appointed Wu Sung to the post of police captain that very day. All the village heads and prominent householders of the district came to congratulate him and the celebrations attendant upon his appointment lasted for 3 days. Wu Sung had intended to look up his elder brother in Yang-ku district and could hardly have foreseen that he would end up being appointed a captain in Ch'ing-ho. He was so delighted he could scarcely contain himself. The news of this event spread throughout the two districts that comprised the prefecture of Tung-p'ing so that the name of Wu Sung was known to everyone. A poem testifies to this:

The martial prowess of the strongman hero was highly esteemed;
Risking his life he marched straight up Ching-yang Ridge.
Even though drunk he slew the tiger on the mountain;
From then on his renown spread to the 4 quarters.

*

After parting company with his younger brother because of the hardship created by a famine in the locality, he had moved to Ch'ing-ho district where he rented a house on Amethyst Street. When people observed his meek disposition and unsightly appearance they gave him the nickname Three-inch Mulberry-bark Manikin, in vulgar allusion to his coarse exterior and cramped features. There were many who did not scruple to take advantage of his weakness and naïveté but Wu the Elder did not respond with anger, merely endeavoring to keep out of their way. Gentle reader take note: in this world, the heart of man alone remains vile.[53] It despises the weak while fearing the wicked. If it's too hard it's brittle; if it's too soft it's no use.[54] A poet of yore has left us some words of admonition that express this very well to the tune Moon on the West River*:*

Flexibility is the root of success;
Adamancy is the womb of misfortune.
Not to vie or contend is to show true worth;
If I lose out now and then, what's the harm?
History is but a succession of spring dreams,
Though the red dust spawns a profusion of talents.

There is no need to scheme or contrive;
It is those who abide by their lot who survive.[55]

To resume our story, Wu the Elder made his living by shouldering his carrying pole and peddling steamed wheat cakes on the street all day. Unfortunately, his wife died, leaving behind a daughter, named Ying-erh, who was just eleven years old. Father and daughter lived together as best they could but before half a year had gone by their resources were exhausted and they had to move into a storefront, on Main Street, belonging to a well-to-do merchant named Chang, where Wu the Elder continued to ply his trade. The servants in Mr. Chang's household, seeing that Wu the Elder was an honest man, looked out for his interests and often patronized his steamed wheat cakes and sat around in his shop when they had nothing better to do. Wu the Elder was always so obliging that everyone was partial to him and spoke up vigorously on his behalf in the presence of their employer whenever the opportunity arose. As a result of these good offices Mr. Chang even went so far as to forgive him his rent. Now this Mr. Chang had the equivalent of ten thousand strings of cash in capital and owned a hundred parcels of real estate. He was more than sixty years old and did not have so much as a foot or an inch's worth of progeny of either sex. His wife, whose maiden name was Yü, ruled the roost with an iron hand so that there was not so much as an attractive servant girl on the premises. One day Mr. Chang struck himself ostentatiously on the breast and gave vent to a sigh. "Your property and wealth are more than sufficient," his wife remarked. "Why on earth should you disturb your leisure with such a sigh?"

"Old as I am," her husband replied, "I still don't have any children. Even though I may be rich, what good does it do me?"

"If that's what's bothering you," said Mrs. Chang, "I'll have a go-between buy two servant girls for you. Once they've been taught to play and sing they ought to be able to look after you."

Mr. Chang was delighted by this and thanked his wife accordingly.[56] Some time later Mrs. Chang actually engaged a go-between to buy two servant girls, one of whom was called P'an Chin-lien and the other Pai Yü-lien. This P'an Chin-lien was the daughter of Tailor P'an whose shop was located outside the South Gate. She was the sixth sibling in her generation of the family. Because she had always been good-looking and possessed a pair of very small bound feet she was called Chin-lien, or Golden Lotus.[57] After the death of her father her mother was unable to make ends meet, and so, when Chin-lien was only eight years old, she sold her into the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang,[58] where she was taught to play musical instruments and to sing. She was adept at painting her brows and making up her eyes, applying powder and putting on rouge, combing her hair into a chignon, Wearing form-fitting gowns, putting on airs, and making a spectacle of herself.[59] Moreover, she was quick and clever by nature. Before she was fourteen she could draw phoenix designs and execute them in embroidery and perform on woodwind and string instruments, her favourite among which was the p'i-p'a, or balloon guitar. Sometime later Imperial Commissioner Wang died and Chin-lien's mother succeeded in extricating her from the Wang household only to resell her to the Changs for thirty taels of silver. She and Pai Yü-lien entered the household together where they continued to improve their skills as musicians and singers. Chin-lien concentrated on the p'i-p'a and Yü-lien on the cheng, or psaltery. Yü-lien was also just fifteen and was the daughter of a family registered as professional musicians. Because she had always had a fair complexion she was called Yü-lien, or Jade Lotus. The two of them shared the same bedroom. Initially the mistress of the household, Mrs. Chang, treated them very well, not requiring them to work in the kitchen or do any housework, and giving them presents of gold and silver jewellery with which to adorn themselves. Later Pai Yü-lien died unexpectedly, leaving Chin-lien all by herself. She was now seventeen years old and had developed into a slender and curvaceous beauty with cheeks like peach blossoms and eyebrows like the crescent moon. Mr. Chang had wished to take advantage of her for some time but fear of his wife's temper had prevented him from making a move. One day when the mistress of the household was out of the way on a visit to a neighbour, Mr. Chang surreptitiously invited Chin-lien into his room and had his way with her. Truly: the bea,utiful unblemished jade will one day be destroyed. How will the pearl ever regain its former perfection? Once Mr. Chang had had his way with Chin-lien, before he knew it he found himself afflicted with four or five ailments. Truly, what five ailments were these? His:

1: loins began to ache.
2: eyes began to tear.
3: ears began to grow deaf.
4: nose began to run.[60]
5: urine began to drip.

And there was still another ailment that doesn't even bear mentioning. In broad daylight he dozed off, and at night he couldn't stop sneezing. When the mistress of the household got wind of what was going on behind her back she quarreled for several days with her husband and gave Chin-lien a terrible beating. Mr. Chang realized that he wouldn't be able to keep her any longer but determined, in spite of his wife, to provide her with a dowry and marry her off to an appropriate person. The servants in the household reminded him what an honourable man Wu the Elder was and pointed out that he was not only currently unmarried but also resided on the premises that would make him a convenient choice. Mr. Chang had hopes of being able to continue his liaison with the young woman, and so, without demanding a candareen from Wu the Elder, he made him a present of her as his wife. After Chin-lien and Wu the Elder were married, Mr. Chang made it a point to look after him. If he were short of capital for his trade in steamed wheat cakes, he would slip him five taels of silver to make up the deficiency. While Wu the Elder was out peddling his wares, Mr. Chang would wait until there was no one about and then steal into their room for an assignation with Chin-lien. Although Wu the Elder occasionally happened upon them in compromising circumstances, he did not dare to make a fuss about it. Mornings and evenings succeeded one another, and this situation had prevailed for some time when Mr. Chang suddenly came down with a venereal chill and alas and alack, died. When the mistress of the household discovered what had been going on, without more ado she angrily ordered the servants to drive Chin-lien and Wu the Elder out of the house, so they no longer had a place to stay. Scarcely aware of the implications of what had happened, Wu the Elder once more found a house on the west side of Amethyst Street, belonging to a distaff relative of the imperial family named Wang, in which he rented an inner and an outer room and continued to peddle his steamed wheat cakes as before. It so happens that ever since Chin-lien had married Wu the Elder and had a chance to observe his guileless disposition and unsightly appearance she had taken a violent dislike to him and quarreled with him all the time. She resented what Mr. Chang had done to her and said to herself, "It's not as though there weren't another man in the whole wide world. Why did he have to marry me off to the likes of this? If you tug him, he won't move; if you hit him, he pulls back. The only thing he can be counted on to do everyday is to guzzle his wine. When you get right down to it, you could jab him with an awl without arousing him. What did I ever do in a previous incarnation to deserve such a fate? It's really intolerable." Whenever there was no one around she used to play a song to the tune Sheep on the Mountain Slope that testifies to this:

How did it all begin?
I was mismatched to him.
I thought he was a real man.
Not that I want to boast,
But how can a crow be a match for a phoenix?
I'm like buried gold,
He's only bogus brass;
How can his luster compare with mine?
He's just a hunk of rough stone;
What right's he got to my mutton-fat jade body?
I'm like a magic mushroom growing out of the muck.[61]
But what can I do?
No matter what he does,
I'll never be satisfied.
Just listen to me:
How can a gold brick be laid
On such a mud foundation?

Gentle reader take note: Most of the women of this world, if they are blessed with good looks and natural intelligence, will turn out all right if they are only married to a decent man. But as for the likes of Wu the Elder, even the best woman in the world might find it hard to avoid repining. It has always been true that Women of beauty and men of talent are seldom matched; just when you're in the market for gold you can never find a seller. Everyday Wu the Elder shouldered his load of steamed wheat cakes and went out to peddle his wares, not returning until evening. His wife had little to occupy her other than the preparation of three daily meals. After eating she would make herself up and stand behind the bamboo blind that hung over the front door. From that vantage point she was in the habit of provoking attention with her brows, and sending messages with her eyes. Now this fact was not lost on a number of dissolute young scamps in the neighbourhood who were seldom up to any good. When they saw the way that Wu the Elder's wife was dolling herself up so slickly, engaging the breeze and disturbing the foliage, they began to make riddling allusions to her in public and even to engage her in badinage with remarks like, "How did a piece of fine mutton end up in the mouth of such a dog?"[62] Everyone knew that Wu the Elder was a man of meek disposition but many were unaware that he had such a mismatched wife in his house, who was both romantically inclined and clever, in fact, good at everything but particularly adultery. A poem testifies to this:

Chin-lien's beauty is certainly worthy of remark;
When she laughs her eyebrows rise up like spring peaks.
If she ever encounters a dashing young gentleman;
She will make an assignation with him without more ado.[63]

Everyday after she had seen Wu the Elder out the door, this woman would stand inside the blind, cracking melon seeds with her teeth, and revealing her tiny golden lotuses for all to see. Such conduct attracted the aforesaid young gentlemen, who gathered on her doorstep day after day, strumming guitars and ukuleles,[64] and giving voice to every indecent suggestion their fertile imaginations could invent. As a result, Wu the Elder came to feel that he could no longer continue to live on that part of Amethyst Street and wanted to move somewhere else. When he raised this issue with his wife she said, "You lousy muddle-headed ignoramus! If you're content to rent such inadequate lodgings in somebody else's house, it's scarcely surprising that petty-minded people should abuse you. Why don't you get together a few taels of silver, look about for an appropriate place, and take out a mortgage on a house with at least a couple of rooms? If we lived in more presentable quarters nobody would take advantage of us. You're the man of the house but you're always so much at a loss that I end up taking the brunt of things on your account."

"And where'd I get the money for a mortgage?" Wu the Elder asked.

"Phooey!" his wife exclaimed. "What a nincompoop! You can sell my hairpins and combs to make up the sum. What's so difficult about that? They can always be replaced later on when we're better off than we are now."

Wu the Elder allowed himself to be persuaded by his wife. When he had scraped together something over 10 taels of silver, he took out a mortgage on a 2-story house near the gate of the district yamen. It was quite cozy, with three rooms on the ground floor, an upstairs room in the front, and two little courtyards. After moving to this new address, on that part of Amethyst Street that ran along the west side of the district yamen.[65] Wu the Elder continued to peddle steamed wheat cakes as before. One day as he was going along the street he heard the din of gongs and drums and noticed several contingents of soldiers with tasseled spears escorting a man in a gaily-decorated sedan chair. Who should this turn out to be but his own younger brother, Wu Sung. Because Wu Sung had killed the tiger on Ching-yang Ridge the district magistrate had elevated him to the position of police captain, and the community elders were participating in the celebration of this event by accompanying him on the way to his lodgings. When Wu the Elder caught sight of him, he grasped hold of him with his hand and called out, "Younger Brother, now that you're a captain, you've no time for me?"

In the mighty dynasty of Song when Huizong was Emperor, and in the Zhenghe period of his reign (1111-19), there lived at Qinghe, a city of the prefecture of Dongping in Shandong, a dissolute young man whose name was Ximen Qing. He was about twenty-seven years old, and the master of a fine estate. A gay, good-looking fellow, he was, unfortunately, flighty and unstable. His father, Ximen Da, had once travelled through Sichuan and Guangdong dealing in raw medicines, and later he opened a shop near the Town Hall of Qinghe. He lived in a splendid house that had a frontage of five rooms upon the street, and wings that went back even farther. He had a host of servants, and a very considerable number of horses and mules. Though, perhaps, he was not quite a millionaire, he was certainly one of the richest men in the whole district.

Ximen Da and his wife showered affection upon their only child, and allowed him to do exactly as he pleased. While he was still comparatively young, they died. The boy paid scant attention to his studies, idled about, and finally gave himself up entirely to dissipation. Indeed, after his parents' death, he was seldom to be found at home but spent all his time in the pursuit of forbidden pleasures. He learned to box, to wield the quarterstaff, and to play a good game of chess. He gambled a great deal, and became so skilled in the game of pai that he could distinguish the different pieces by simply touching them. In fact, so far as such accomplishments were concerned, there was very little he did not know.

His friends and acquaintances were wastrels and spongers who spent all their lives in amusing themselves at other people's expense. The chief among them was Ying Bojue, the son of a silk merchant. He had squandered the wealth his father had left him, and had sunk so low that he spent all his time waiting about the Town Hall, ready to go with anyone to the bawdy house, or to dine with the first-comer who would pay for a meal. People nicknamed him Beggar Ying. He was an expert at kickball, backgammon, chess and all sorts of other games.

Then there was Xie Xida. This man's grandfather had been a minor official at Qinghe, and his parents had died while he was still a youth. He wasted his time, and paid no attention to his duties, so he lost his position, and now led a life of leisure. He played the lute.

These two and Ximen Qing were as thick as thieves, and there were several more, of varying degrees of disreputability. One was Zhu Shinian; another Sun Tianhua, also known as Greedy Chops. Then there was Wu Dian'en, who had once been Master of the Yin Yang for the district. He had been dismissed, and now was always to be found hanging about the Town Hall in the hope of finding a job as witness for the officials in their money-lending transactions. In this way he made the acquaintance of Ximen Qing.

Other friends were Yun Lishou, a younger brother of Colonel Yun; Chang Zhijie; Bu Zhidao; and Bai Laiguang, who was also known as Guangtang. When people remarked that this was a strange name, he would become very indignant and enter upon a long explanation that, by reference to the Book of History, was supposed to show that his tutor, when he had conferred that name upon him, had made an admirable choice. "If there had been anything objectionable about it," he used to say, "I should have changed it long ago but, obviously, it has important historical associations, and I shall most certainly retain it."

There were, perhaps, ten of them in all, and, when they discovered that Ximen Qing was not only a very rich man but ready to throw his money about, they led him on to gamble, drink and run after women.

The House of Ximen had fallen upon evil days. It had given to the world an unworthy son, who chose his friends from among those destitute of every virtue. It was inevitably doomed to impoverishment.

Ximen Qing was reckless but when he took it into his head to bestir himself, he was capable of showing that he was no fool. He lent money to the officials and even had dealings with the four corrupt ministers, Gao, Yang, Tong and Cai. So he came to be mixed up in all kinds of official matters, acting as intervener for people at law, arbitrating in cases of dispute, and, sometimes, acting as stakeholder. The people of Qinghe stood in awe of him and spoke of him as "His Lordship Ximen." His first wife, a Miss Chen, died young, leaving him with a little daughter, and this daughter was now betrothed to Chen Jingji, a relative of Marshal Yang, the Commander of the Imperial Guard at the Eastern Capital.

After the death of his wife, Ximen found himself without a housekeeper, and married the daughter of a certain Captain Wu. This lady was about twenty-five years old. As she was born on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, her parents called her Yueniang ("Moon Lady"), and she was still known by that name after her marriage to Ximen Qing. She was gentle and quiet, a good wife, and faultlessly obedient to her husband. She had three or four maids and serving women to wait upon her, and Ximen Qing had taken his pleasure with all of them.

As a second wife, he married a girl from the bawdy house, called Li Jiao'er, and as his third, a young woman from South Street, who had been his mistress. She was not very strong, and suffered from so many different illnesses that Ximen Qing again went off to "fly with the wind and sport with the moon!"

One day, when Ximen Qing was at home with nothing to do, he said to his wife:

"It is the twenty-fifth day of the ninth month, and on the third of next month, I am supposed to be meeting my friends. I think I will entertain them here, and engage a couple of singing girls, so that we can have our amusement at home without needing to go elsewhere. Will you make the necessary arrangements?"

"I wish you wouldn't mention those horrible creatures to me," Wu Yueniang said. "There isn't a decent fellow among them. Day after day, they come here, like messengers of Hell, putting ideas into your silly mind and making an absolute fool of you. Never, since you've known them, have you spent a whole day in your own house. The Third Lady is anything but well, and I think you might give up these drinking parties, for a while at least."

"Generally," Ximen Qing said, "I find your conversation delightful but today your remarks are a little wearying. To hear you talk, all my friends might be beyond the pale. I don't mind so much what you say about the others but surely Brother Ying is an honest, entertaining fellow. If we ask him to do anything for us, he never raises any objection, and what he does, he does well. Then Xie Xida is clever as well as conscientious. But there is this much to be said. So long as our meetings are irregular and uncertain, we can never develop our friendship on the proper lines. The next time we all come together, the best thing we can do will be to form a brotherhood, and ever afterwards we shall be able to count upon receiving assistance, if we need any."

"I have nothing against this brotherhood idea," Yueniang said, "though I have no doubt whatever that the others will get more assistance out of you than you are ever likely to get out of them. They will be as much use to you as dancing dolls, and not half so lively."

Ximen Qing laughed. "If I find, by experience, that they are to be trusted, why shouldn't I trust them? As a matter of fact, I'm expecting Brother Ying any moment. When he comes, I'll see what he thinks of the idea."

At that moment an intelligent-looking boy with delicate eyebrows and charming eyes came in. This was Daian, Ximen Qing's body servant. "Uncle Ying and Uncle Xie are outside," he said. "They would like to speak to you."

"I was just talking about them," Ximen said. He hastened to the hall. Ying Bojue was dressed in a new black hat and a shabby blue silk gown. He was sitting in the place of honour with Xie Xida opposite. When Ximen Qing came in, they both jumped up and saluted him with great deference. "We are glad to find you at home, Brother," they said. "We have not seen you for some time." Ximen asked them to sit down, and called for tea.

"You are a nice pair," he told them. "I have had a very anxious time lately. I could not leave the house but I haven't seen even so much as your shadows."

"What did I say?" Bojue cried. "I knew our brother would be annoyed!" Then he turned to Ximen Qing. "I am not surprised that you are angry with us but, really, I have been so busy that I haven't known what to do. It is all very well for you to give your orders but it is not so easy for me to carry them out."

"Where have you been, these last few days?" Ximen asked them. "Yesterday, I went to the Li's to see a young lady called Li Guijie. She is Li Guiqing's younger sister, a niece of your Second Lady. I hadn't seen her for some time, and I must say she has become a very pretty girl. There's no telling what she will be like in the future. Her mother urged me to find a handsome young man to make a woman of her. Really, you yourself would not find her too bad."

"If she is so attractive," Ximen said, "I must go and have a look at her." "Brother," said Xie Xida, "if you don't trust him, you can at least take my word for it."

"Well," said Ximen, "that accounts for yesterday but what about the day before?"

"A little time ago, our friend Bu Zhidao died, and I have had to spend several days at his house in connection with the funeral arrangements. His wife asked me to tell you how grateful she is for the incense and things you sent her. Her place is so small and the only entertainment she can offer so unworthy, that she did not venture to invite you to the funeral."

"Alas!" Ximen Qing said, "it seems only a few days since I first heard he was ill. I never thought he would die so soon. He once made me a present of a gilded fan, and I was thinking of giving him something in return. Then I heard of his death."

Xie Xida sighed. "Once there were ten of us, now one has gone. By the way, the third of next month is the day for our meeting. We shall be troubling His Lordship to spend some small sum on the day's amusement."

"I have just been telling my wife," Ximen said, "that these meetings, at which we do nothing but eat and drink, do not represent the essential element in our friendship. We ought to decide upon some temple, have an appropriate document drawn up, and band ourselves into a definite brotherhood. Then we shall be pledged to help one another ever afterwards. When the day comes, I will buy the three offerings needed for the sacrifice. I presume you will all be ready to give something towards the expenses, each according to his means. I do not insist on this but it seems to me that, since we are forming a brotherhood, it will be much more satisfactory if every brother makes some little contribution."

"Certainly, Brother," Ying Bojue said hastily. "A man who never says his own prayers cannot expect to get credit for the incense his wife burns. We must all do something to show that we are in earnest but I'm afraid we're rather like the warts on a rat's tail, there is not much to be got out of us."

"Oh, you funny dog," Ximen said, laughing. "Nobody expects you to give very much."

"If the brotherhood is to be complete," Xie Xida said, "there should be ten of us. Brother Bu Zhidao is dead. Whom can we find to take his place?"
Ximen Qing thought for a while. Then he said: "My neighbour, Brother Hua, the nephew of Eunuch Hua, is the very man. He spends his money without stint, and goes regularly to the bawdy house. He lives next door, and we are very good friends. I will send a boy to invite him to join us."
Bojue clapped his hands. "Do you mean Hua Zixu, who keeps a girl called Wu Yin'er?"
"That is the man," Ximen Qing said.
"Ask him by all means," Bojue said. "If I can only make friends with him, it will mean another house of call for me."
"You silly rascal," Ximen said, laughing. "To hear you talk about eating, one would imagine you were always on the point of starvation."
They all laughed. After a while, Ximen called Daian, and sent him to Hua's house. "Tell him that we are going to form a brotherhood on the third of next month, and that I shall be honoured if he will join us. When you have heard what he says, come back and tell me."
"Shall we come here, or go to a temple?" Bojue asked.
"There are only two temples to go to," Xie Xida said. "One is the Buddhist temple of Eternal Felicity, and the other, the Daoist temple of the Jade Emperor. Either of them would do."
"Not at all," Ximen said. "This forming of a brotherhood is not a Buddhist practice, and, in any case, I don't know the priests of that temple very well. We must go to the Temple of the Jade Emperor. The abbot, Wu, is a good friend of mine; it is quiet there and we shall have room enough."
"You are right, Brother," Bojue said. "He only suggested the temple of Eternal Felicity because the monks there are on such good terms with his wife."
"You old villain," Xie Xida said, laughing. "Here we are, discussing a most serious matter, and you think it a suitable occasion to fart."
They were laughing and talking when Daian came back. "Master Hua was not at home," he said, "but I gave the message to his lady. She was very pleased. 'If Uncle Ximen is so kind as to invite my husband,' she said, 'I am sure he will not fail to come. He shall have the message as soon as he comes in, and when the day for the meeting comes, I will remind him.' She gave me two cakes for myself, and told me to give you her respects."
"Brother Hua's wife," Ximen said, "is not only a very pretty woman but she has intelligence."
They drank another cup of tea, and the two men rose to go. "We will tell the other brothers," they said, "and collect their share of the expenses. Will you make the arrangements with Abbot Wu?"
"Yes," Ximen Qing said, "I'll see to that. Don't let me keep you any longer." He took them to the gate. Before they had gone very far, Ying Bojue turned. "Don't you think it would be fun if we had some singing girls?"
"Yes, indeed," Ximen said, "it will be more amusing if the brothers have someone to laugh and joke with." Bojue made a reverence and went away with Xie Xida.
It was soon the first day of the tenth month. Ximen Qing rose early and was sitting in Yueniang's room when there came a serving boy whose hair had been dressed in grown-up style. He brought with him a gilded and polished card case. First he made a reverence to Ximen Qing; then he came forward and said: "My master, Hua Zixu, sends his compliments. Some time ago you sent your servant with an invitation but he was out on business and did not personally receive the message. He was told that you are arranging a party on the third of the month, and has sent this small gift that he trusts you will use as you think fit. Afterwards he hopes you will tell him what his proper share of the expenses amounts to, and he will make up what is lacking."
Ximen Qing took the packet, examined the label upon it, and wrote a receipt for one tael of silver. "This is more than enough," he said; "your master must certainly not send any more. Remind him to keep the day free. He will have to get up very early so as to be ready to go to the temple with the rest of us."
When the boy was going away, Yueniang asked him to wait a moment. She told Yuxiao, the elder of her two maids, to give him two pieces of fruit-cake. "This is instead of tea," she said to him. "When you get home, give my kind regards to your mistress, and tell her that one of these days I am going to ask her to come and have a talk with me." The boy took the cakes, made another reverence, and went out.
A few moments later, Ying Bao, Ying Bojue's boy, came. He, too, was carrying a visiting case. Daian introduced him. "My father has collected these presents from the others," he said, "and hopes you will accept them." Ximen Qing looked at the packets, saw that there were eight in all, and handed them to his wife without opening them. "Use them," he said to her, "to buy something for our visit to the temple." He dismissed Ying Bao.
Soon afterwards he got up and went to see his third wife, who was ill but he had only just reached her room and sat down when Yuxiao came to tell him that her mistress would like to speak to him again. "Why didn't she say all she had to say before?" Ximen Qing said. He got up and went back to her, finding her with all the packets opened and spread out before her.
"Look here!" she said, laughing. "Ying sends a qian and two fen of bad silver, and the rest, three or five fen apiece. Judging by the colour, some red, some yellow, it might be gold. Certainly, I've never seen anything like it in this house before. If you accept it, our reputation will be gone forever. You must send it back at once."
"What a fuss about nothing!" Ximen said. "This is all right. Don't let me hear any more about it." He went out.
The next day, he weighed four taels of silver and told his servant Laixing to buy a pig, a sheep, five or six jars of Jinhua wine, some chickens and ducks, candles and paper offerings. He put five qian in an envelope and told his man Laibao to take it and the other things, and go with Daian and Laixing to the temple of the Jade Emperor. They were to say to the abbot: "Tomorrow, our master proposes to form a solemn brotherhood, and he takes the liberty of asking you to compose an address suitable to the occasion. He would like to take dinner at your temple in the evening, and would be very grateful if you would make the necessary preparations. He will arrive in the morning."
Daian soon returned. He said that he had given the message, and that the abbot agreed.
The day soon passed. The next morning, Ximen Qing washed and dressed, and told Daian to go and ask Hua Zixu to come for breakfast before they joined the others on the expedition to the temple. Soon afterwards, Ying Bojue and the others arrived. They came in, and forming a circle, made reverence together.
"It is time to start," Bojue cried.
"No, breakfast first," Ximen Qing said. He called for tea and refreshments. Afterwards, he changed his clothes for brighter and more handsome attire, and they all set out together for the temple of the Jade Emperor.
Before they had gone very far, they could see the temple gateway. It was lofty and imposing but the sanctuary, with walls reaching almost to the skies, was more commanding still. It was approached by a gate in the shape of the character ba, covered with a red wash. Within the precincts were three paths, like the character chuan. The buildings were of marble with wave-like markings. The sanctuary, its lofty eaves glittering in green and gold, was in the centre. Images of the Three Pure Holy Ones stood in due order in the middle, and at the far end was Laozi, the Old Lord of the Most High, riding upon his black ox.
They entered the second sanctuary, went around, and passing through a side door, came to the abbot's quarters. On either hand grew grasses as green as jasper and flowers as red as coral. There were pine trees and bamboos. On either side of the door hung scrolls. One bore the inscription: "In Paradise, unending are the months, the years," and the other, "In the Vessel of Heaven there lies another world." On the north was a hall the size of three rooms, where the abbot officiated everyday at morning and evening prayer.
The temple had been specially decorated for the occasion. In the middle of the north wall hung a picture of the Jade Emperor in the Golden Palace of Paradise, and on both sides were the nobles of the Purple Palace. The four generals, Ma, Zhao, Wen and Guan were there too.
Abbot Wu was standing outside the Hall of the Sacred Scriptures. He welcomed them with a priestly reverence, and Ximen Qing and his friends went in. After taking tea, they all got up and began to look at the pictures. Bai Laiguang took Chang Zhijie by the hand, and they examined the portrait of General Ma. He looked very brave and fierce but he had three eyes. "I don't understand this," Bai Laiguang said. "We mortals find that with only two eyes it is well to keep one closed. Can he need an extra eye to keep a watch on us and on our misdeeds?"
Ying Bojue overheard him and went over to them. "You silly fellow," he said. "It is on your account alone that he needs an eye more than anybody else."
Everybody laughed, and Chang Zhijie pointed to the picture of General Wen. "Now here," he said, "there really is something out of the ordinary. He is blue from top to toe. I suppose he must be one of Lu Qi's ancestors."
Bojue burst out laughing. "Come over here, Father Abbot," he cried, "and I'll tell you a story.
"Once upon a time, a priest died and came before the Prince of Hades. The Prince bade him give an account of himself. 'I am a priest,' he said quite simply. Then the Prince ordered one of his officers to search the records and find out what was known of the man. They discovered that he was indeed a priest and a man of excellent character. So the Prince of Hades reprieved him and sent him back to earth.
"When he was once more in the land of the living, he met a man he knew, who worked at a dye works. 'However did you succeed in getting back, Father?' this man said to him. 'I only said I was a priest and they sent me back again,' his friend answered. The man remembered this, and when his time came to go before the Prince of Hades, he too declared that he was a priest. The Prince told his officials to examine the man's body. When they came to his hands, they found them both bright blue. 'What does this mean?' he was asked. 'That comes from the work I have done on General Wen's thing.' "
They laughed. Then they went to the other side to look at the pictures of red-faced Guan and Zhao. Zhao was a black-faced warrior, with a great tiger standing beside him. Bai Laiguang pointed to the tiger, and cried: "Look at that tiger! He must be one of the kind that don't eat meat, or he wouldn't be going about with a man so amiably."
"What!" said Ying Bojue. "Don't you know the tiger is his most trusted servant?"
Xie Xida, who had been listening, said, "If I had a servant like that, a quarter of an hour of his company would be quite enough. I should always be afraid he might take it into his head to eat me."
Bojue laughed: "That's a nice thing to say," he said to Ximen Qing.
"What's that?" said Ximen.
"Well," Bojue said, "Xie here says he would be afraid a trusted comrade might eat him. You certainly ought to go in fear of your life, for there are seven or eight of us, all trusted comrades, and all ready to feed at your expense at any time."
At that moment the abbot came back to the hall. "Do I hear you speaking of tigers, Gentlemen?" he said. "In this very district of Qinghe, one has recently caused very serious trouble. Scores of travellers, and more than a dozen hunters, have found that to their cost."
"Really?" Ximen Qing cried.
"Yes," said the priest. "I am surprised you gentlemen have not heard about it. I should not have known myself but a little while ago, one of my young novices went to ask alms at Master Cai's house in Cangzhou, and he had to stay there several days before it was safe to return. Between Qinghe and Cangzhou there is a ridge called Jingyang, and it seems that a dragon-eyed, white-headed tiger has recently been making raids from there in search of human prey. Travellers have been afraid to pass the hill, and have had to form parties when they went that way. The local authorities are now offering a reward of fifty taels to anyone who kills the tiger but so far, though several attempts have been made, they have all come to nothing. Indeed the hunters have been most unfortunate: they have had nothing but maulings for their pains."
Bai Laiguang jumped up. "We are too busy today, since we have this brotherhood to form but tomorrow we will go and catch the tiger. It will be one way of putting a little money in our pockets."
"Evidently you don't value your life very highly," Ximen Qing said. The other laughed. "Let me get hold of something to spend, and I don't care what happens."
"That reminds me of another funny story," Ying Bojue said. "Once a man fell into a tiger's clutches, and his son, who wished to rescue him, took a knife and went to kill the beast. But the man, though the tiger had him actually in his jaws, cried out anxiously: 'Son, mind where you stick that knife. For goodness' sake, don't spoil the tiger's skin.' "
Abbot Wu was now preparing the offerings for sacrifice. When everything was ready, he came forward and said: "Gentlemen, it is time to burn the sacred papers." Then he produced a document. "I have already written the address," he said, "but I should be glad if you would tell me which of you is the elder brother and in what order I am to put the others. If you will kindly arrange yourselves in your due rank, I shall find it easier to write down your honourable names."
At this there was a chorus: "His Lordship comes first, of course," but Ximen Qing held back. "We should rank according to our age," he said. "Brother Ying is older than I am, and it is for him to take the first place." This was not at all what Ying Bojue wished. "Oh, no, Father!" he cried, I should be ruined. In these days, a man is judged by his wealth or by his position, and since there is no getting away from that, there is no point in taking age into consideration. Besides, there are others older than myself. And there are many other reasons why I should not be made elder brother. Both in dignity and moral standing, I do not rank so high as his Lordship. He is a paragon to the whole world. Then again, I have always been called Ying the Second, and if I were made elder brother I should have to be called Ying the Elder. If I met two acquaintances, and one addressed me as Ying the Elder and the other as Ying the Second, I shouldn't know which of them I ought to answer."
Ximen Qing laughed. "You talk such nonsense, anybody might die of laughing," he said. Xie Xida urged him not to decline but Ximen continued modestly to prefer the others. Finally, after further pressure from Hua, Ying and the rest, he could hold out no longer and took the place of honour. He was followed by Ying Bojue and Xie Xida, and Hua, out of respect for his wealth, was allotted the fourth place. The others arranged themselves in the lower positions. The abbot then filled up the document, lighted candles, and, with all the men standing shoulder to shoulder in their due order, the address was solemnly unfolded and read aloud.

IN THE EMPIRE OF THE GREAT SONG, THE PROVINCE OF SHANDONG, PREFECTURE OF DONGPING AND DISTRICT OF QINGHE

The faithful, Ximen Qing, Ying Bojue, Xie Xida, Hua Zixu, Sun Tianhua, Zhu Shinian, Yun Lishou, Wu Dian'en, Chang Zhijie and Bai Laiguang, here assembled, do wash their hands and burn incense to ask a blessing.
The oath of fidelity sworn within the Peach Orchard is the model of all loyalty; with humble hearts we seek to take it as our example, and strive to emulate the spirit that inspired it.
The love of Bao and Guan was as the depth of the ocean, and animated by the same spirit, we hope to imitate their solemn purpose.
The peoples of the four oceans may yet be as brethren and they of different names as of the same blood.
Therefore
In this period of Zhenghe—Year—Month—Day, devoutly offering meat offerings of pig and sheep before the phoenix chariot, we humbly bow before this holy altar and make our supplications.
We make our obeisance unto the Highest Heaven, where in a golden palace dwell the Jade Emperor, the Guardian Angels of the Five Directions, the Tutelaries of City and Village, and all the spirits who come and go.
We beseech them to accept the incense of our sincerity. May they deign to protect us in all our doings.
We, Qing, etc....., though born each at a different hour, pray that death may find us united. May the bond between us remain ever unbroken. Our pleasures will we take together, and in time of need will we succor one another. The memory of our friendship shall be ever green, and in our wealth will we remember the unfortunate. Thus, at the last, shall our confidence be confirmed: thus, coming with the sun and going with the moon, shall our fellowship be established as high as the heavens and as firm as the earth.
Henceforth, from this our solemn act of friendship, may our love be eternal and our peace unending. May each of us enjoy length of days, and his household unceasing felicity.
In Heaven alone do we place our trust, until our lives' end. In token whereof, we diligently set this down.

REIGN PERIOD OF ZHENGHE.
YEAR.
MONTH.
DAY.

When the abbot had finished the reading of this declaration, the men worshipped, bowing together eight times before the shrine. One last time they bowed, and when the paper money had been consumed, the sacred utensils were removed. The abbot told his acolytes to remove the sacrificial animals and cut them up. Chicken, fish and fruits of every kind were set out in profusion upon two tables. Ximen Qing took the seat of honour, and the rest seated themselves in accordance with their rank. The abbot presided over the feast. Soon the wine had been passed around several times, and the men began to amuse themselves telling riddles and guessing fingers, making the hall ring with noisy laughter.

They saw the sunrise in the distant east
They watched it set behind the mountains.
Deep have they drunk, and now unsteadily go forth
While o'er the trees there hangs the tiny crescent moon.

In the midst of their enjoyment, Daian suddenly came in. He whispered to Ximen Qing, "Mother has sent me to take you home. She says the Third Lady has had a fainting fit, and you must not be late." Ximen rose at once.
"I don't wish to disturb the party, or to be the cause of its breaking up," he said, "but my third wife is ill, and I am afraid I must leave you."
"I go the same way as Brother Ximen," said Hua Zixu. "We will go together."
"If you two rich men both go away," Ying Bojue cried, "how can we stay? Brother Hua, you really must not go."
"There is no man in his house," Ximen said. "We must go back together and set his wife's mind at rest."
"Just as I was coming away," Daian said, "Mistress Hua was telling Tian Fu to saddle a horse and come here."
At that moment the boy arrived. He went to Hua and said, "Your horse is here, and Mother would like you to return."
Before leaving, they thanked Abbot Wu for his kindness, and saluted Ying Bojue and the others. "We are compelled to go now," they said, "but you must stay and have a good time." They went out, jumped on their horses, and rode away. Those who remained were indeed so ravenous that they would have devoured Taishan without leaving a particle of earth. They lingered in the temple and drank deep, and there we may leave them.
When Ximen Qing reached home, he said good-bye to Hua Zixu, and went at once to ask Yueniang how his third wife was.
"I only said she was ill," said Yueniang, "to get you away from those fellows. That is why I made Daian tell you that story. But in truth she has been steadily getting worse, and you ought to stay at home and devote a little of your time to her."
Ximen went to the other side of the house to visit his third wife, and for a few days continued to pay her some attention. On the tenth day of the tenth month, when Ximen Qing had just dispatched a boy to summon the doctor, he was still in the hall when Ying Bojue came in, smiling. Ximen greeted him, and asked him to sit down.
"How is my sister-in-law?" Bojue asked.
"I'm afraid she will never get any better," Ximen said, "it is very doubtful indeed whether anything can be done for her. What time did the party break up the other day?"
"Abbot Wu kept urging us to stay, and it was nearly the second watch before we left. I was very drunk. It was a good thing for you that you came home so early."
"Have you had dinner yet?" Ximen Qing said.
Ying Bojue could not make up his mind whether to say "Yes" or "No," so he asked Ximen to guess.
"I should say you have."

Ying politely put his hand before his mouth, laughed, and said, "You silly man, you've guessed wrong."
"Well, if you haven't, why didn't you say so, you greedy beast?" Ximen said, laughing. "I can't imagine what makes you such a donkey." He told a servant to prepare a meal for Bojue and himself.
"I should have dined," Bojue said, "but I have just heard a most extraordinary piece of news, and I had to come and tell you all about it. We can go and see for ourselves."
"What is this marvelous piece of news?" said Ximen.
"You remember the abbot telling us about the tiger of Jingyang Ridge?" Bojue said. "Well, yesterday a man killed that tiger with his bare fists."
"Don't talk such nonsense," Ximen said. "I don't believe a word of it."
"You say you don't believe me but wait till I've told you all about it." Bojue went on, waving his arms and stamping his feet in his excitement. "The hero is a certain Wu Song, who some time ago got into trouble at Master Chai's house, and had to run away. He fell ill, and, when he recovered, thought he would like to come and see his brother again. On the way here, he had to pass Jingyang Ridge. There he came upon the tiger and killed it with no weapons but his hands and feet." Ying Bojue told this story in such minute detail that he might himself have been an eyewitness. Ximen Qing shook his head.
"In that case," he said, "as soon as we have finished dinner, I'll go with you and see what the tiger looks like."
"Don't let's wait for dinner, or we may be too late," said Bojue. "Let's go to the High Street, and spend an hour or two in the tavern there."
Laixing was setting the table but his master told him not to trouble about the meal, and to ask Yueniang to have some clothes set out for him to wear. In a few moments he had changed, and set off arm in arm with Bojue. In the street they ran into Xie Xida. "Hullo, Brothers," he said, laughing, "are you coming to see the man who killed the tiger?"
"We are," said Ximen.
Xie Xida told them that the crowd was so great as to make the roadway almost impassable, and they went to a tavern overlooking the street. They had not long been there when they heard the sound of drums and gongs. The people were all craning their necks to see. Hunters, marching two by two, carrying their tasseled spears, went before the tiger's body. It was so huge that four men could hardly carry it, and it looked like a great embroidered sack. Then, riding upon a splendid white charger, came the bold fellow who had killed it. Ximen Qing gazed at him, bit his nails, and said, "Just look at that man. He must have the strength of a hippopotamus, or he could never have vanquished that great beast." They drank their wine and discussed the heroic deed.

Full seven feet tall is this majestic figure
A hero striking terror into all beholders
With stern and rugged face, and sparkling eyes that blaze like glittering stars Clenched fists like sledgehammers.
If he but raise his foot, the tigers in their mountain lair feel their courage wane
One blow with that fist, and the great bear trembles in his lonely valley.
He wears a magic cap with silver flowers
And his long-sleeved gown is soaked with his victim's blood.

This was the man of whom Ying Bojue had spoken. His home was in the district of Yanggu, and it was only because he had taken a sudden fancy to pay a visit to his elder brother that the opportunity of killing the tiger had come to him.
The magistrate had summoned the hero to his presence, and a host of people were waiting to see him arrive at the Town Hall. As Wu Song dismounted, the magistrate took his place in the Hall of Audience, and the people carried the great beast to the front of the Hall. His Honour was greatly impressed by the hero's bearing, and reflected that a man must be strong indeed to kill such a tiger. He called Wu Song forward.
The hero paid his respects, and then told the story of his prowess so vividly that the officials were half paralyzed by fright. Then, in the Hall of Audience, the magistrate solemnly offered him three cups of wine, and from the public treasure that was stored there took fifty taels of silver.
"By your Honour's leave," said Wu Song, "I owe my victory over the tiger more to good fortune than to ability. I have no right to this reward. The hunters here have incurred your Honour's displeasure on account of this same brute, and I shall be grateful if you will give them the silver rather than myself."
"I will do so if you wish it," said the magistrate, and the money was distributed among the hunters. Seeing that Wu Song was generous-hearted and honest as well as a hero, he thought it would be a good idea to offer him a position. "You are a native of Yanggu," he said; "but that is not a great distance from here. I should like to offer you the appointment of captain of my police, and entrust to you the task of sweeping out the brigands that infest the neighbourhood. What do you say?"
Wu Song knelt down. "I shall be eternally grateful to your Honour." The magistrate called his secretary, told him to prepare the necessary papers, and they were sent forward the same day. The notabilities of the district all came to offer their congratulations, and there was feasting for several days.
So Wu Song, who had only thought of his desire to see his elder brother, secured the appointment of police captain in Qinghe. He was delighted with the way things had turned out, and in all the prefecture of Dongping there was none who did not know the name of Wu Song.

A hero this! A mighty hunter
Who climbed the Jingyang Ridge with eager tread.
With strong wine firing his veins he slew the terror of the mountain
And now his fame is spread to every corner of the earth.

One day, as Wu Song was strolling along the street, he heard a voice behind him, crying, "Brother, Brother! Are you too proud to know me, now that you have become captain of the police?" He turned, and to his surprise, recognized the speaker.

For Money, Grandma Mrs. Wang Being Covetous Spoke Seductively, Arranges a Seduction, & does brisk trade in sin; In Anger, Yunge/Yun Ge's miffed, barges in, Makes a Row, & Riots in the Teashop; the Brotherhood of Rascals, P'an Chin-Lien disdains her mate, plays the Coquette, beneath the Blind Hsi-men Ch'ing Meets Chin-lien; Inspired by Greed Dame Wang Speaks of Romance, the Old Procuress Dame Wang Proposes a 10-part Plan for Garnering the Glow, Hsi-men Ch'ing Flirts with Chin-lien in the Teahouse, the Hussy Commits Adultery behind Wu the Elder's Back; Qiao Yün-ko in his Anger Raises a Rumpus in the Teashop, & Ximen Qing Attains his End

Constable Wu fell to his knees and kowtowed, for it was none other than his brother, Wu the Elder. "I haven't seen you for over a year," said Wu Song. "What are you doing here?"
"You were gone a long time. Why didn't you write? Sometimes I reproached you in my heart, and yet I missed you."
"How is that?"
"When I remembered how you used to get drunk in Qinghe Town, and brawl and be hauled into court, and how I used to suffer, waiting for the judge's decision, with never a moment's peace, I thought of you with reproach. Recently I took a wife but the men of Qinghe are bold, and they kept trying to take advantage, and I've had no one to protect me. If you were home that of them would have dared to so much as fart? Things got so bad I had to move here to Yanggu and rent a house. That was when I missed you."
Reader, please note, these two were born of the same mother. But Wu Song was tall and handsome and enormously strong. Otherwise, how could he have killed the fierce tiger? Wu the Elder was very short, with an ugly face and a ridiculous head. He was known in Qinghe as Three Inches of Mulberry Bark.
Now, it happened that a wealthy family there had a maidservant by the name of Pan Jinlian. In her early twenties, she was quite pretty, and the master of the house began pestering her. Jinlian, or Golden Lotus, didn't want him, and told his wife. He hated her so much for this that he personally provided her with a dowry and married her off to Wu the Elder, free of charge.
Several of Qinghe's dissolute idlers began visiting Wu's house and behaving provocatively. Since nothing about her husband pleased the girl—he was short and grotesque, and had no flair for merry-making whatever—Golden Lotus was quite ready to take a lover. It got so that dandies hanging around outside the door would say openly in front of the timid, law-abiding Wu: "Imagine that luscious piece of meat landing in a dog's jaws!"
The couple couldn't remain in Qinghe. He and Golden Lotus moved to Yanggu Town, and rented a house on Purple Stone Street. Everyday, Wu went out and peddled buns. He was doing this in front of the county office when he saw Wu Song.
Now he said: "The other day I heard people talking on the street, all excited, about how some stalwart named Wu had killed a tiger on Jingyang Ridge, and how the county magistrate appointed him constable. I was pretty sure it was you. Today, at last, we've met. I won't bother selling any more buns. I'll take you home."
"Where is your house, brother?"
Wu the Elder pointed. "On Purple Stone Street, up ahead."
Wu Song carried his brother's shoulder-pole and hampers and Wu the Elder led the way. They wound through several lanes until they came to Purple Stone Street. The house was beside a teashop.
"Wife, open the door," Wu the Elder shouted.
A bamboo curtain was raised, and a woman appeared. "What are you doing home so early?" she asked.
"Your brother-in-law is here. I want you to meet him." Wu the Elder took his carrying-pole and wares inside, then emerged again and said: "Come in, brother, and meet your sister-in-law."
Wu Song raised the curtain and entered. Wu the Elder said: "This is my younger brother. And what do you think—he's the one who killed the tiger on Jingyang Ridge and was made a constable!"
Golden Lotus clasped her hands in greeting. "I wish you every good fortune."
"Please be seated, sister-in-law." Wu Song dropped to his knees like a collapsing mountain of gold, like a falling pillar of jade, and kowtowed.
Golden Lotus raised him up. "You embarrass me," she courteously protested.
"My respects, sister-in-law."
"I heard from Grandma Wang, next door, that a hero who had killed a tiger was being welcomed at the county office. I wanted to go and see but I was delayed and got there too late. And all along it was you, brother-in-law! Please come upstairs and sit a while."
The three mounted the stairs and sat down. Golden Lotus looked at her husband. "I'll keep brother-in-law company. You prepare some food and drink so that we can entertain him."
"Fine," said Wu the Elder. "Sit a while, brother. I'll be back soon." He went downstairs.
Golden Lotus gazed at the handsome figure of Wu Song. "He's so big," she thought. "You'd never know they were born of the same mother. If I could have a man like that I wouldn't have lived in vain! With the one I've got I'm cursed for good! Three Inches of Mulberry Bark—three-tenths man and seven-tenths monster. What filthy luck! Wu Song beats up tigers. He must be very strong … And I hear he's not married. Why not get him to move in? Why would have thought I was fated to meet my love here!"
Her face wreathed in smiles she asked: "How long have you been in town?"
"Ten days or more."
"And where are you staying?"
"For the time being in the county office compound."
"That can't be very convenient."
"I live alone. My needs are simple. I have a soldier orderly."
"A man like that can't do things properly. Why don't you move over here? Anything you want to eat or drink I'll be glad to make for you. Much better than having some dirty orderly do it. Even if it's only clear water, when you drink it in this house you have nothing to worry about."
"That's very kind of you."
"Do you have a wife? I'd like to meet her."
"I've never married."
"How old are you?"
"Twenty-five."
"Three years older than me. Where were you before coming to this town?"
"I lived in Cangzhou for over a year. I thought brother was still in Qinghe. I didn't know he had moved here."
"I can't begin to tell you! That man is too honest. I've seen it ever since I married him. People tried to take advantage. We just couldn't remain in Qinghe, so we moved here. If we had a big strong fellow like you staying with us, no one would dare abuse us."
"Brother has always been well-behaved. He's not a rowdy like me."
"Why turn things upside-down?" the girl smiled. "As the old saying goes: 'There's safety only in a stiff backbone.' I make up my mind fast, and act. I hate the slow dawdling types who never give you a direct answer."
"At least he doesn't get into trouble and worry you."
While they were talking, Wu the Elder returned with the food and wine he had bought and put them in the kitchen. He went to the foot of the stairs and called: "Wife, come down and get thing ready."
"Where are your manners?" Golden Lotus retorted. "I can't leave brother-in-law just sitting here."
"Don't bother about me," said Wu Song.
"Get Grandma Wang from next door to do it," the girl said to her husband. "Can't you manage even a simple thing like that!"
Wu the Elder asked Grandma Wang over. When the food was ready he carried it up and put it on the table. Besides Fish, meat, fruit and vegetables, there was also heated wine. Wu the Elder placed his wife at the head of the table and Wu Song opposite. He himself sat at the side and poured the wine. Golden Lotus raised her cup.
"Forgive our poor fare," she said to Wu Song. "Please drink this one with me."
"Thank you, sister-in-law. No need to be polite."
Wu the Elder was so busy warming the wine and refilling the cups he had no time for anything else. Golden Lotus was all smiles.
"You haven't touched the fish or meat," she cried. She picked choice morsels and put them on Wu Song's plate.
Wu Song was a straightforward fellow who thought of her only as a sister-in-law. She, from her years as a maidservant, had learned how to please in small ways. Wu the Elder, a timid person, knew little about entertaining guests.
After they had downed several cups, Golden Lotus frankly ran her eyes over the younger man's body. Embarrassed, Wu Song kept his head down and avoided her gaze. They finished a dozen or so cups, and he rose to leave.
"Have a few more first," Wu the Elder pleaded.
"This is quite enough," said Wu Song. "I'll be coming to see you again."
His hosts walked with him down the stairs. "You must move over here," Golden Lotus said. "Otherwise, people will laugh at us. After all, you're our own brother." She turned to her husband, "We'll clean out a room for him and have him move in. We don't want the neighbours criticizing."
"You're right," said Wu the Elder. "Move in with us, brother, and I'll be able to hold up my head."
"If that's what you both want, I'll bring my things over tonight."
"Don't forget," said Golden Lotus. "I'll be waiting."
Wu Song said goodbye, left Purple Stone Street and returned to the county office. The magistrate was holding court. Wu Song made a request.
"I have a brother on Purple Stone Street. I'd like to sleep at his place. I could be here the rest of the time, awaiting orders. But I don't want to move without Your Worship's permission."
"Naturally I won't hamper fraternal devotion. Just make sure you get here every morning."
Wu Song thanked the magistrate and went to pack his belongings—his new clothes and the reward money. He had a soldier carry them to his brother's house. Golden Lotus greeted him with such smiling joy you'd think she'd found a treasure in the middle of the night!
Wu the Elder had a carpenter partition off a room for him downstairs, and put in a bed, a table, two stools and a charcoal brazier. Wu Song arranged his belongings and let the soldier go. After a night's sleep, he rose early the next morning. Golden Lotus got up quickly and brought him water to wash and rinse his mouth with. Wu Song performed his ablutions, tied on his head kerchief and left to sign in at the magistracy.
"Come home early for lunch," his sister-in-law called. "Don't eat any place else."
"I'll be back soon," said Wu Song. He attended all morning to business, then returned to the house.
Golden Lotus had washed her hands and done her nails. She looked very neat and trim. She served the food, and the three of them ate at the same table. After the meal Golden Lotus ceremoniously, with both hands, gave Wu Song a cup of tea.
"I'm too much trouble to you," he said. "I don't feel right about it. I'll get a soldier from the county to help."
"How can you treat us like strangers?" the girl protested. "You're not just anyone, you're our own flesh and blood! With a soldier the kitchen would never be clean. I couldn't stand having that kind of lout around!"
"In that case I'll just have to impose on your kindness."

Enough of idle chatter. After Wu Song moved in, he gave his brother silver to buy tea and tidbits and invite the neighbours. They in turn chipped in and bought gifts for Wu Song. Wu the Elder, then felt constrained to invite them to a meal. All of this is by the way. A few days later Wu Song presented his sister-in-law with a piece of silk of beautiful hue suitable for making clothes. She smiled gaily.
"You shouldn't have done it! But since you already have, I suppose I can't refuse. I'll just have to accept."
From then on Wu Song lived in his brother's house, and Wu the Elder continued to peddle buns on the street. Every morning Wu Song signed in at the magistracy and performed his duties. Whenever he returned home, whether early or late, Golden Lotus had food ready. She served him with obvious pleasure. It rather embarrassed him. She was always dropping subtle hints. But Wu Song was a man of solid virtue, and he paid no attention.
To make a long story short, a little more than a month had gone by, and winter was setting in. The wind blew for days, heavy clouds gathered. Then one morning thick snowflakes began to fall. It was still snowing at the first watch that night.
Wu Song left early the next morning to sign in at the magistracy. By noon he still hadn't returned. Golden Lotus sent her husband out to peddle buns, and asked her next-door neighbour Grandma Wang to buy some wine and meat for her. The girl lit the charcoal brazier in Wu Song's room.
"I'm really going to tempt him, today," she said to herself. "I don't believe he can't be aroused ..."
She stood alone by the door curtain watching the snow till she saw him coming through the falling flakes of white jade. She raised the curtain and greeted him with a smile.
"Cold?"
"Thanks for your concern." He entered and removed his wide-brimmed felt hat. She took it from him with both hands. "Don't trouble," he said. He took it back, shook the snow from it and hung it on the wall. He untied the sash from around his waist, divested himself of his outer tunic of parrot-green silk, went into his room and hung it up to dry.
"I've been waiting for you all morning," the girl said. "Why didn't you come home for lunch?"
"A man in the county office invited me. Just now another fellow suggested we drink. But I wasn't in the mood, and come straight home."
"Oh. Warm yourself by the fire."
"Right." He took off his oiled boots, put on a pair of socks and warm shoes, pulled a stool over beside the fire and sat down.
Golden Lotus bolted the front door, closed the back door, brought in wine and food and tidbits and placed them on the table.
"Where has brother gone that he's not back yet?" Wu Song asked.
"Out selling buns, as he does everyday. We can have a few cups of wine, just the two of us."
"Hadn't we better wait for him?"
"Why should we?" The girl picked up the cylindrical container that the wine was heating in.
"Don't bother, sister-in-law," said Wu Song. "I'll do it."
"Thank you," said Golden Lotus. She too pulled a stool over to the brazier and sat down. On the table that was near the fire was a tray with wine cups. The girl raised one and looked at Wu Song.
"Drink it down."
He took the cup from her and drained it. She refilled it. "It's cold today. You'd better have a double."
"As you say." Wu Song finished this one off, too. He poured a cup and handed it to the girl. She drank it, poured more wine from the heating container and placed it in front of him.
Her swelling bosom slightly exposed, her hair hanging down in a soft cloud, Golden Lotus smiled bewitchingly. "Someone told me you're keeping a girl singer in the east part of town. Is it true?"
"You shouldn't listen to such nonsense. I'm not that kind of person."
"I don't believe you. I'm afraid you say one thing and do another."
"Ask my brother, if you don't believe me."
"What does he know? If he knew about things like that, he wouldn't be a seller of buns. Have another drink."
The girl poured him three or four cups in succession, and had the same number herself. Warmed by a rising, uncontrollable passion, she talked more and more freely. Wu Song understood most of what she said. He kept his eyes down.
Golden Lotus went out to get some more wine. When she came back, Wu Song was poking up the fire in the brazier. Holding the container in one hand, she placed the other on his shoulder and squeezed.
"Is that all the clothing you're wearing in this cold weather?"
Annoyed, he said nothing. She took the poker from him.
"You don't know how to stir up a fire. I'll show you. The idea is to get it good and hot."
Wu Song was frantic with embarrassment. He didn't reply. But the girl was blinded to his state of mind by the urgency of her desire. She put down the poker, poured a cup of wine, drank a mouthful and offered Wu Song the rest.
"Finish this, if you have any feeling for me."
He snatched the cup and flung its contents on the floor.
"Have you no shame!" he cried. He gave her a push that nearly knocked her off her feet. Wu Song glared.
"I'm an upstanding man with teeth and hair who holds his head high, not some wicked immoral animal! Stop this indecent behavior! If I hear any whispering about you, watch out! My eyes may recognize you as a sister-in-law but my fists won't! Let's not have any more of this!"
Crimson, the girl pulled her stool away. "I was only joking! Why are you making such a fuss? Have you no respect!"
She removed the cups and plates to the kitchen and left Wu Song fuming in his room.
Early in the afternoon Wu the Elder came home, carrying his shoulder-pole and hampers. He pushed the locked door a few times, and Golden Lotus hurriedly opened it. He set down his equipment and followed her into the kitchen. Her eyes were red from weeping.
"Who did you quarrel with?" he asked.
"It's all your fault for being such a softy! Letting people pick on me!"
"Who would dare?"
"You know very well! That nasty brother of yours! He came back in the big snow and I served him wine. When he saw no one was around, he tried to get fresh!"
"My brother isn't like that. He's always been very well behaved. And keep your voice down! If the neighbours hear, they'll laugh at us!"
Wu the Elder turned away from his wife and went to Wu Song's room. "Brother," he said, "you haven't eaten yet. We'll have something together."
Wu Song didn't reply. He thought for several minutes, then removed his shoes and socks, put on his oiled boots, his outer tunic and broad-brimmed felt hat, fastened his waist sash and headed for the door.
"Where are you going?" Wu the Elder called.
Wu Song silently continued upon his way.
Wu the Elder returned to the kitchen. "He wouldn't talk to me. He just went off down that street to the magistracy," Wu the Elder said to his wife. "What's wrong with him?"
"You dolt," cried Golden Lotus. "Is that so hard to figure out? He's ashamed, he can't face you, so he left! I forbid you to let that knave live in this house ever again!"
"We'll be scoffed at if he moves out."
"Idiot! I suppose we won't be scoffed at if he makes passes at me! Live with him if you like! I'm not that kind of a woman! Just give me an annulment paper and you can have him all to yourself!"
Wu the Elder didn't dare open his mouth.
At that moment Wu Song arrived with a soldier and a parrying-pole. He went into his room, packed his belongings, and left again. Wu the Elder ran after him.
"Brother," he said, "why are you moving?"
"Don't ask. If I spoke, it would only be hanging out the sign-board of just what kind of merchandise you've got in there! Let me go!"
Wu the Elder was stricken dumb. Wu Song departed, while Golden Lotus cursed.
"Good riddance! Everyone thought how nice to have a constable who looked after his brother and sister-in-law. Little did they know what a traitor he was! 'The prettiest papayas are emptiest inside.' There never was a truer word. He's moved, thank Heaven and Earth! Now at least we don't have an enemy right under our noses!"
Her husband couldn't understand her rage. Unhappiness began to gnaw at his heart with nagging persistence.
Thereafter Wu Song maintained quarters in the county office compound. Wu the Elder peddled his buns on the street as usual. He wanted to go and see Wu Song but his wife issued strict injunctions against "provoking" him, so in the end Wu the Elder abandoned the idea.
Time flowed by, and soon the snow was gone. Another ten days or so passed. The county magistrate in the two and half years since he had assumed office had accumulated a large hoard of gold and silver. He wanted to send it to a member of his family in the Eastern Capital to hold for him, using part to buy him a higher post. But he needed an able, trustworthy person to deliver the money, so that it wouldn't be robbed in transit. Suddenly, the magistrate thought of Wu Song.
"The very man. A hero like that would be ideal."
He summoned Wu Song and said: "I have a load of gifts and a letter I want to send to a relative in the Eastern Capital. But I'm afraid there may be trouble on the road and need a hero like you to bring them. Do this for me, and don't be afraid of the difficulty. I'll reward you well when you return."
"Your Excellency has raised me in rank. I can't refuse. If you give me this task, of course I'll go. Besides, I've never been to the Eastern Capital. I'd like to see it. Get the things ready, Your Excellency, and I'll leave tomorrow."
The magistrate was very pleased. He favoured Wu Song with three cups of wine. Of that we'll say no more.
Wu Song went to his quarters, took some silver, got a soldier, bought a bottle of wine and food and tidbits, and proceeded to Wu the Elder's house on Purple Stone Street. When the older brother returned from bun selling, he found Wu Song sitting outside his door. He told the soldier to go into the kitchen and prepare the meal.
Golden Lotus still had a yen for Wu Song. She saw him arrive with food and wine, and she thought: "The knave must have me on his mind, so he's come back! I'm too much for him! I'll get the story out of him gradually."
She went upstairs, put on fresh make-up, fixed her hair, and changed into more alluring clothes. She greeted Wu Song at the door.
"Have we offended you in some way? You haven't been here for days! I don't understand it. I told your brother to go to you in the county office and apologize but he couldn't find you. Now, happily, today you've come! But you shouldn't spend money like this!"
"I've something to say," replied Wu Song. "I've come specially to speak to you both."
"Well, then, come upstairs and sit."
The three mounted the stairs and entered the parlour. At Wu Song's insistence, his brother and sister-in-law sat at the head of the table. He moved a stool over and sat at the side. The soldier brought up the meat and wine and placed it before them. Wu Song urged Wu the Elder and Golden Lotus to drink. She kept giving him coy glances but he concentrated on his wine.
After five rounds, Wu Song had the soldier fill a pledge cup with wine. Holding it, he faced his brother.
"I've been given a mission to the Eastern Capital by our magistrate. I'm leaving tomorrow. I'll be gone for forty or fifty days, maybe two months. There's something I must say, first. You've always been weak and timid, and people may try to take advantage when I'm not around. If you sell ten trays of buns a day usually, from tomorrow on don't sell more than five. Leave the house late and come back early. Don't drink with anybody. And when you get home, lower the curtain and bolt the door. In that way you'll avoid arguments. If anyone insults you, don't quarrel. I'll take care of him when I come back. Pledge me this, brother, with this cup."
Wu the Elder accepted the cup from Wu Song's hand. "What you say is right, and I agree." He drank the wine.
Wu Song poured a second cup and turned to Golden Lotus.
"Sister-in-law is clever. There's no need for me to say much. My brother is a simple, honest fellow. He needs you to look after him. 'Inner force counts more than outward strength,' as the saying goes. With you running the house properly, he'll have nothing to worry about. As the ancients put it: 'When the fence is strong no dogs get in.' "
A flush crept from the girl's ears till her whole face was suffused. She shook her finger at Wu the Elder.
"You filthy thing! What rumours are you spreading—slandering me? I'm as tough and straightforward as any man! A man can stand on my fist, a horse can trot on my arm! I can show my face proudly anywhere! I'm not one of those wives you need be ashamed of. Ever since I married you, not so much as an ant has dared enter your house! What's this about fences not being strong and dogs getting in? Before you talk wild, you'd better be able to prove it! Every dropped brick or tile must come to earth!"
Wu Song smiled. "Since that's how you feel, sister-in-law, that's fine. Just make sure your deeds correspond to your words. I'll remember what you've said. I ask you to drink to it."
Golden Lotus thrust the cup aside and ran out of the room. Halfway down the stairs she shouted: "You're so smart. Haven't you heard 'An elder brother's wife deserves the respect you give a mother'? When I married your brother I never even heard of you. You come here, I hardly know you, and you try acting like a father-in-law! Just my luck to run into all this shit!"
Weeping, she went downstairs, putting on a big show of injured innocence.
The brothers drank several more cups of wine, then Wu Song rose to leave.
"Come back soon," said Wu the Elder. "I want to see you again." There were tears in his eyes. Wu Song saw them.
"Don't go out selling buns, brother," he urged. "Stay home. I'll send you money for your expenses."
Wu the Elder walked down the stairs with him and saw him to the door.
"Don't forget what I've told you, brother," Wu Song said.
He returned to the county office compound with the soldier and prepared for the journey. Early the next morning he tied up his pack and went to see the magistrate. The official's cases were already loaded on a cart. The magistrate selected two strong intelligent soldiers, plus two trusted servants to go with Wu Song, and gave them private instructions. Then all bid farewell to the magistrate. Wu Song buckled on his armor and took his halberd. The five of them, guarding the cart, left Yanggu Town for the Eastern Capital.
Our story now divides in two parts. We'll talk of Wu the Elder. His wife reviled him for four full days after Wu Song departed. Wu the Elder took her abuse in silence, and remembered his brother's words. He sold only half as many buns as before and came home early. No sooner did he rest his carrying-pole than he lowered the bamboo curtain, bolted the front door and sat himself down. Golden Lotus fumed with resentment. She shook her finger at him.
"Wretched imbecile! I've never seen a house where they close the bloody door when the sun is only halfway across the sky. People will jeer that we're warding off demons! You just listen to your brother's dirty mouth. You don't care that others may laugh!"
"Let them laugh, let them say what they like. My brother's advice is good. It will prevent all sorts of trouble."
"Dolt! You're a man. Why can't you make up your own mind instead of listening to someone else?"
Wu the Elder waggled his hand firmly. "I'm going to do what Wu Song said. His words are pure gold."
For another two weeks she rowed with him about his unvarying schedule. But then she became accustomed to it, and when he was due to come home she lowered the bamboo curtain and bolted the door herself. Wu the Elder was relieved. "It's much better this way," he said to himself.
Another two or three days passed, and winter was nearly over. There was more sunlight, the weather was slightly warmer. Golden Lotus, expecting her husband home shortly, went to the door with a forked pole to lower the curtain over the entrance way.
But then something happened. A man was passing by. As the old saying goes: "Without coincidence there would be no story." The pole she was holding slipped and landed right on the man's head. Angrily, he halted and turned around, ready to blast. But when he saw the lissome creature standing there, he promptly cooled down. His rage went sailing off to Java, and he smiled.
The girl clasped her hands and curtsied apologetically. "I was careless and you've been hurt!"
Adjusting his head kerchief, the man bowed. "It doesn't matter. Think nothing of it."
Grandma Wang, the girl's neighbour, observed all this through the screen of her teashop door. She laughed. "Who told you to walk so close to the eaves of the house," she called. "Serves you right!"
The man smiled. "It's my own fault. I bumped into the lady. I hope she'll forgive me."
Golden Lotus also smiled. "Then you're not angry?"
Again the man laughed. He gave her a sweeping bow. "I wouldn't dare." His eyes roved over her boldly, then he swaggered off with measured pace.
Golden Lotus let down the curtain, took the pole inside, bolted the door, and waited for Wu the Elder's return.

Do you know who that man was? Where he lived? Originally from one of the wealthier Yanggu families, he had come down in the world and opened a drug and medicine shop in front of the county office. He was smooth and cunning, and skilled with fists and stave. Recently, he had grown quite rich again, acting as a go-between in litigation making deals, passing money, corrupting officials. The whole county treated him with careful deference. His family name was Ximen, his given name Qing.
Being a first son, he had been known as Ximen the Elder. But when he again became wealthy, people called him the Right Honourable Ximen.
Shortly after his encounter with Golden Lotus, Ximen returned, entered Grandma Wang's teashop and sat down by the screen.
"Right Honourable," grinned Grandma Wang, "that was quite a bow you gave out there."
Ximen chuckled. "Tell me, godmother, whose woman is that pullet next door?"
"She's the King of Hell's kid sister, daughter of his commanding general. Why do you ask?"
"I'm serious. Give me a straight answer."
"You mean to say you don't know her husband? He peddles food outside the county office everyday."
"Not Xu San who sells date pudding?"
Grandma Wang waved her hand negatively. "No, though they'd make a good pair. Guess again."
"Li Er the silver carrier?"
"No, though they also would be well matched."
"It couldn't be Lu Xiaoyi with the tattooed arms?"
Grandma Wang grinned. "No. They'd be a fine team, though. Guess again, Right Honourable."
"Godmother," said Ximen, "I really can't imagine."
Grandma Wang laughed. "This'll kill you. Her old man is Wu the Elder who sells hot buns!"
Ximen howled and stamped with laughter. "Not Three Inches of Mulberry Bark?"
"The very same."
Ximen groaned. "Such a delicious morsel landing in a dog's mouth!"
"A real pity," Grandma Wang agreed. "But life is like that. 'A magnificent steed gets a dolt for a rider, a charming wife sleeps with an oaf of a husband,' as the saying goes. The marriage god makes some crazy matches."
"What do I owe you for tea?"
"Not much. Let it go. We'll add it up some other time."
"Who is your son working for these days?"
"I hate to tell you. He went up the Huaihe River with a merchant and still hasn't returned. Who knows whether he's alive or dead!"
"How would you like him to work for me?"
Grandma Wang smiled. "If Your Honour were willing to raise him up, that would be fine."
"Wait till he gets back. We'll figure out something."
They chatted a while longer. Ximen thanked Grandma Wang and left. Less than half a watch later, he was sitting by her door screen again, gazing at Wu the Elder's house. Grandma Wang came out from the back of the shop.
"A mei plum drink, Right Honourable?"
"Excellent. Make it good and sour."
She soon placed the drink before him respectfully, with both hands. He slowly sipped the concoction, then set the cup down on the table.
"You make very good sour plum drinks, godmother. Do you have a lot in stock?"
Grandma Wang laughed. "I've been making mei[*] all my life but I don't keep anyone here!"
"I was talking about sour plum drinks and you're talking about making matches! There's a big difference."
"Oh. I thought you wanted to know whether I was a good matchmaker."
"Since that's your line, godmother, I like you to make a match for me, a first-rate one. I'll reward you well."
"If your wife hears about this she's liable to box my ears!"
"My wife is very tolerant. I already have several concubines at home but none of them please me. If you know someone suitable, don't hesitate to speak. Even a woman who was married before will do, as long as I find her to my liking."
"I came across a good one the other day but I'm afraid you won't want her."
"If she's really good, you arrange it for me, and I'll thank you."
"A very handsome woman but a bit mature."
"A year or two's difference in our ages won't matter. How old is she?"
"She was born in the year of the tiger. At New Year's she'll be exactly ninety-three!"
Ximen laughed. "You're mad! Always joking!"
Still chuckling, he stood up and left. Day was drawing to a close. Grandma Wang had just lit the lamp and was getting ready to lock up for the night when Ximen again flitted in and sat down by the door screen, facing the house of Wu the Elder.
"How about a nice 'get together' drink, Right Honourable?" suggested Grandma Wang.
"Fine. I'd like it a bit sweet."
She brought the beverage and handed it to him. He sat a while, drinking, then rose once more.
"Put it on my bill, godmother. I'll pay you tomorrow."
"No hurry. Rest peacefully, and drop in again soon."
Ximen laughed. Nothing further happened that night.
Early the next morning when Grandma Wang opened her door and looked outside, there was Ximen, walking back and forth in front of the shop.
"That stud sets a fast pace," she said to herself. "I'll spread a little sugar on the tip of his nose, just out of reach of his tongue. He's great at wheedling favours in the county office but I'll show him that he can't get anything from me on the cheap!"
She opened the door wide, started the fire, put the kettle on. Ximen entered immediately and sat down by the door screen, his eyes on the bamboo curtain before Wu the Elder's door. Grandma Wang pretended not to notice, and remained in the rear, fanning the fire.
"Godmother," Ximen called. "Two cups of tea, please."
"So it's you, Right Honourable," Grandma Wang grinned. "Haven't seen you in days. Have a chair."
She set two cups of strong ginger tea on the table before him.
"Have one with me," Ximen invited.
"I'm not your dearie," the old woman cackled.
Ximen also laughed. "Godmother," he queried, "what do they sell next door?"
"Steaming, dripping, hot, spicy, delicious goodies."
Ximen grinned. "You really are a mad woman!"
"Not a bit of it," laughed Grandma Wang. "But she has a husband."
"I'm serious. They say he makes very good buns. I'd like to order forty or fifty. Do you know whether he's home or not?"
"If it's buns you want, wait till he returns. No need to go to his house."
"You're quite right." Ximen sat a while, drinking his tea. He stood up. "Put it on the bill, godmother."
"Don't worry. I'll do that all right."
Ximen smiled and departed.
Soon afterwards, Grandma Wang, tending her shop, glanced outside. Ximen was again pacing in front of the door. He walked to the east, and gave a look. He walked to the west, and looked again. Seven or eight times he did this, then once more entered the teashop.
"A rare visit, Right Honourable!" Grandma Wang hailed him. "It's been a long time!"
Ximen smiled. He took out a piece of silver and handed it to her. "This is for the tea, godmother," he said.
"It doesn't amount to all this much."
"Just hang on to it."
"Got him!" the old woman thought with inner satisfaction. "The stud is really hooked." She put the money away and said: "You look thirsty. A cup of steeped broad-leafed tea—now, that's what you want."
"How did you guess?"
"Easy. I could see it in your expression. 'One look at a man's face tells you whether he's prospering or suffering,' as the old saying goes. Not even the strangest things get by me."
"I have something on my mind this minute. I'll give you five pieces of silver if you can guess what it is."
Grandma Wang grinned. "I don't need three or four guesses. One is enough. Right Honourable, bring your ear down to me. All your coming and going these last two days is because of that person next door. Right?"
Ximen smiled. "Godmother, you're a shrewd woman. To tell you the truth, ever since she beaned me with the pole and I got a good look at her that day, I've been entranced! But I don't know how to get to her. Have you any ideas?"
Grandma Wang laughed uproariously. "Right Honourable, I'll give it to you straight. This teashop is just a front—'the devil playing night watchman.' From the snowy morning on the third day of the sixth month three years ago when I sold my first cup of steeped tea, I've never done much business here. My real trade is in the 'mixed market.' "
"What do you mean 'mixed market'?"
"Mainly, I'm a match-maker. But I'm also a broker, a midwife, a lovers' go-between, and a bawd."
"Godmother, if you can bring this off for me, I'll give you ten pieces of silver to pay for your coffin."
"Listen to me, Right Honourable. These seduction cases are the hardest of all. There are five conditions that have to be met before you can succeed. First, you have to be as handsome as Pan An. Second, you need a tool as big as a donkey's. Third, you must be as rich as Deng Tong. Fourth, you must be as forbearing as a needle plying through cotton wool. Fifth, you've got to spend time. It can be done only if you meet these five requirements."
"Frankly, I think I do. First, while I'm far from a Pan An, I still can get by. Second, I've had a big cock since childhood. Third, my family has a bit of change. Maybe not as much as Deng Tong but enough. Fourth, I'm very forbearing. Even if she struck me four hundred blows, I'd never return one. Fifth, I've plenty of time. Otherwise, how could I keep hanging around here? Godmother, you must help me. If we succeed, I'll pay you heavily."
"Right Honourable, although you say you meet the five requirements, there's still another stumbling block."
"What's that?"
"Forgive me if I'm blunt but these seduction cases are very tricky. Every bit of the money needed must be provided. You mustn't hold back even one penny out of a hundred. You've always been a little tight-fisted. You don't like to throw your money around. That's going to stand in our way."
"We can cure that easily enough. I'll simply do what you say."
"If you're willing to spend the money, Right Honourable, I can arrange a meeting between you and the pullet. But you have to promise me something."
"Anything you want. What's your plan?"
"It's late, today. Come back in three months or half a year and we'll discuss this some more."
Ximen knelt at her feet. "Quit kidding around, godmother," he begged. "You've got to do this for me!"
Grandma Wang chuckled. "Impatient, aren't you? I have a plan, and it's a good one. It may not be foolproof but it's ninety per cent sure. Now here's what we do: This girl was the goddaughter of a wealthy Qinghe family, and she's a fine seamstress. You go out and buy me a bolt of white brocade, a bolt of blue silk, a bolt of white silk gauze, and ten ounces of good silk floss and have them delivered here. I'll go over to the girl's house and have a cup of tea with her. I'll say: 'A kind gentleman has given me some material for burial garments. Would you please look in your almanac and see what's an auspicious day for me a hire a tailor?' If she doesn't respond, then that's the end. If she says: 'I'll make them for you,' and tells me not to bother about a tailor, then we've scored one point out of ten. I'll ask her over to my place. If she won't come and says: 'Bring the material here,' then that's the end. If she's pleased, and agrees, we've scored point two.
"When she comes, the first day, I'll have some wine and tidbits for her. You stay away. The second day, if she says it's not convenient here, and insists on taking the work home, we're finished. But if she's willing to come again, we've won point three. You stay away that day, too.
"Around noon the third day, I want you to arrive, neat and clean, and stand outside the door and cough as a signal. Then you call: 'Godmother, why haven't I seen you these days?' I'll come out and invite you into the rear room. If when she sees you she runs home, I won't be able to stop her, and that will be the end of it. If she stays put, then we've won point four.
"You sit down, and I'll say to the pullet: "This is the benefactor who has given me the material. I'm terribly grateful!' I'll praise your many good qualities, and you compliment her on her needlework. If she doesn't respond, it's over. If she replies, that's point five.
"Then I'll say: 'I'm lucky to have this lady do the sewing for me. I'm very grateful to both of you benefactors. One gives money, the other gives skill. This lady wouldn't even be here if I hadn't gone out of my way to beg her. Won't you help me, Right Honourable, to show her my thanks?' You take out some silver and ask me to buy her something. If she turns and leaves, I won't be able to stop her, and that will be the end. If she remains, we've won point six.
"I'll start for the door with the money and say to her: 'Please keep this gentleman company for a while.' If she gets up and goes home, there's nothing I can do about it. That will be the end. If she doesn't leave, we'll still be winning. Point seven will belong to us.
"When I return with the things I've bought and put them on the table, I'll say to her: 'Rest a while and have a cup of wine. We can't refuse this gentleman's treat.' If she won't drink with you at the same table and leaves, that's the finish. If she only says she wants to go but doesn't, that's fine. Point eight will be ours.
"After she's had plenty to drink and you've started a conversation with her, I'll claim there's no more wine, and tell you to buy some more. You ask me to do it. I'll pretend to go, and close the door, leaving you two alone inside. If she gets upset and runs home, that will be the end. But if, after I close the door, she doesn't make any fuss, we've won point nine. We'll need only one point more for the game.
"But that's the tough one, Right Honourable. You'll have to speak to her sweetly. Take it easy. If you make any sudden moves and spoil everything, there's nothing more I can do for you. Brush one of the chopsticks off the table with your sleeve. Bend down as if to pick it up and pinch her foot. If she screams, I'll come charging in to the rescue, and you will have lost, probably for good. If she doesn't make a sound, that will be point ten. Then, and then, she will be all yours! How do you like my plan?"
Ximen was delighted. "Maybe it couldn't get into the emperor's Hall of Fame but it's excellent!"
"Don't forget my ten ounces of silver!"
" 'Can one forget Dongting Lake while eating its fragrant tangerine peel?' When do we start?"
"I'll have news for you by tonight. I'm going to sound her out today before Wu the Elder gets back. You buy those silks and send them over."
"Put this through for me, godmother, and I won't disappoint you!"
Ximen bid farewell to Grandma Wang, went to the market, bought the brocade, silk, gauze and ten ounces of pure silk floss. He had a family servant wrap and deliver them to the teashop, together with five pieces of silver.
Grandma Wang received the silks and money and sent the servant back. Leaving her place via the rear door, she went to Wu's house. Golden Lotus invited her upstairs to sit a while.
"Why don't you ever come over to my place for a cup of tea?" the old woman asked.

"I haven't been feeling well these last few days. I just don't have the energy," the girl replied.
"Do you have an almanac here? I want to pick a good day to hire a tailor."
"What sort of clothes are you making?"
"I'm getting all kinds of aches and ailments in my old age. If anything should happen, I'd like to have my burial garments ready. Fortunately, a wealthy gentleman, seeing my condition, has given me some fine silks and good floss. I've had them at home for over a year but I can't get them made up. Lately, I've been feeling that my days are numbered. Because it's leap year I wanted to use this extra month to get them done. But my tailor keeps stalling. Says he's too busy, can't come. It's simply awful!"
Golden Lotus laughed. "Maybe you wouldn't like my work but I'd be glad to make them for you, if you'll let me."
The old woman's face was wreathed in smiles. "If you'd apply your precious hands to them, I would be the gainer, even after death! I've heard of your skill with the needle but I never had the courage to ask you."
"Why not? I've said I'd do it, and I will. We must get someone to choose a lucky day for you from the almanac, and I'll start."
"You're my lucky star! As long as you'll do it, we don't need any special day. I recall now I asked someone the other day, and he said tomorrow would be a Most Auspicious Day. I forgot, because you don't really need a Most Auspicious Day to cut materials."
"How can you say that? You do for burial garments."
"In that case, fine. Tomorrow's the day. I'll trouble you to come to my humble home."
"That won't be necessary, godmother, just bring the materials here."
"But I'd love to see you work. Besides, I have no one to watch the shop."
"All right, then. I'll come over after breakfast."
"Grandma Wang thanked Golden Lotus profusely and left. That evening she told Ximen what had transpired, and instructed him to return the day after tomorrow.
Nothing happened that night. Early the next morning Grandma Wang cleaned her house, bought some thread, put on the tea kettle, and waited.
Wu the Elder finished his breakfast, took his carrying-pole and hampers of buns, and went out on the street. Golden Lotus rolled up the front door curtain and proceeded through the back door to the house of Grandma Wang. The old woman greeted her with unrestrained joy. She led the girl into the rear room, poured her a cup of strong tea, spread before her shelled pine nuts and walnuts, and urged her to eat. First wiping the table clean, Grandma Wang laid out the silks. The girl measured them, cut the appropriate lengths and began to sew.
"What technique," marvelled the old woman. "In my nearly seventy years I've never seen such fine needlework!"
Golden Lotus continued sewing until noon, when Grandma Wang served her wine and noodles. The girl resumed sewing until it was nearly dark, then gathered the materials together and went home. Wu the Elder was just entering the door with his carrying-pole and empty hampers. The girl opened the door for him and lowered the screen. As he came into the room he noticed that his wife's face was flushed.
"Where have you been drinking?"
"Grandma Wang, next door, asked me to make some burial garments for her. She served me a snack at noon."
"Aiya!/You mustn't eat her food. We may be wanting a favour from her some day. Come home when it's time to eat. Don't trouble her. Take some money with you, if you go again tomorrow, and treat her to wine in return. 'A close neighbour means more than a distant relative.' Don't forget your manners. If she won't let you treat her, take the materials home and work on them here."
The girl listened. Nothing more was said on the subject that evening.
Grandma Wang's plan for getting Golden Lotus over to her house was set. The next morning after breakfast, Wu the Elder departed, and the old woman promptly called for her. She brought out the materials and, as the girl sewed, served her tea. Of that no more need be said.
When noon approached, Golden Lotus handed Grandma Wang a string of copper coins. "Let's have some wine together, godmother."
"Aiya!/Who ever heard of such a thing? I've asked you here to do some work for me. I can't let you spend any money!"
"My husband said if you insist on being polite, I'm to take the work home and do it for you there."
"Wu the Elder is too polite," the old woman said quickly. "Since that's how it is, I suppose I'll have to agree." The last thing she wanted was to disturb the arrangement.
She added some money of her own to what the girl had given her, bought some top quality wine and food, and fruits out of season, and served them solicitously to Golden Lotus. Good reader, observe: Nine out of ten women, no matter how clever they may be, invariably are taken in by small attentions and flattery.
The girl ate and drank, and sewed a bit longer. When it began to grow dark, showered with the thanks of her hostess, she returned home.
To skip the idle chatter: The moment Grandma Wang saw Wu the Elder leave after breakfast the third morning, she went to his rear door and called: "I'm here to bother you again ..."
Golden Lotus came down the stairs. "I was just coming over."
The two went to the old woman's rear room, sat down, got out the materials, and the girl commenced to sew. Grandma Wang poured tea that they both drank.
It was nearly noon. Ximen, unable to wait another day, arrived at the door of the teashop on Purple Stone Street. He wore a new kerchief on his head, was smartly dressed, and had brought four or five ounces of silver.
He coughed. "Godmother, where have you been these days?"
The old woman glanced out. "Who's that, calling godmother?"
"It's me."
Grandma Wang hurried into the shop. She smiled. "I had no idea. So it's you, Right Honourable. You're come just at the right time. Please step inside. I want to show you something." She took him by the sleeve and led him into the rear room. To the girl she said: "This is the gentleman I told you about. The one who gave me the materials."
Ximen greeted Golden Lotus respectfully. She quickly put down her work and curtsied.
"I've had the silks you gave me for a year," Grandma Wang told Ximen, "but I couldn't get them made up. Fortunately, this lady is now doing them for me. Her stitches are as fine as any machine weave! So close and exact! A rare skill! See for yourself, Right Honourable."
Ximen picked up the unfinished garment and gazed at it admiringly. "Remarkable. A fairy touch!"
The girl smiled. "The gentleman is making fun of me."
"Godmother," said Ximen, "may I ask? Whose wife is this lady?"
"Guess."
"How can I?"
Grandma Wang laughed. "She's married to Wu the Elder, next door. Did that pole hurt your head the other day? You've forgotten."
Golden Lotus blushed. "It slipped. I hope the gentleman won't hold it against me."
"Of course not," exclaimed Ximen.
"The Right Honourable is very amiable," Grandma Wang interpolated. "He's not the kind to bear a grudge. A very nice man."
"We hadn't met before the other day," said Ximen. "So she's Wu the Elder's wife. I know him. A competent manager. He conducts his business on the street and never offends anyone, old or young. He earns money and has a good disposition. An unusual person."
"That's Wu the Elder," cried Grandma Wang. "And this lady is the most dutiful of wives."
"He's a useless fellow," said Golden Lotus. "You're laughing at us, sir."
"Not at all, madam," protested Ximen. "The ancients say: 'The pliant rise in the world, the hard invite disaster.' An excellent man like your Wu the Elder 'doesn't lose a drop in ten thousand tons of water.' "
"How true," gushed the old woman, beating the drum from the sidelines.
Still uttering compliments, Ximen sat down opposite the girl.
"Do you know who this gentleman is?" asked Grandma Wang.
"No, I don't."
"He's one of the wealthiest men in the county, a friend of the magistrate. He's called the Right Honourable Ximen. He's very rich. He has a medicinal drug shop opposite the county office. His money would overflow the Big Dipper. Rice rots in his granaries. Whatever of his that is yellow is gold, what's white is silver, what's round is pearls, what glitters is jewels. He has rhinoceros horns and elephant tusks ..."
With wild exaggeration, Grandma Wang praised Ximen. The girl listened, her head bent over her sewing. Ximen gazed at her, consumed with desire. He couldn't wait to get her alone. The old woman poured tea and put a cup in front of each of them.
"Have some tea with the gentleman," she said to Golden Lotus.
There was a touch of provocation in the girl's glances. Grandma Wang looked at Ximen significantly and touched her face with five fingers of her hand. He understood. Five-tenths of the battle was won.
"If you hadn't come, I wouldn't have presumed to call on you and invite you," Grandma Wang said to him. "But you two were fated to meet, and here, by lucky coincidence. Although 'One person shouldn't impose on two patrons,' as the saying goes, you have spent money, Right Honourable, and this lady is giving her skill. I hate to bother you any further but don't you think, since she's kind enough to come here, that you might treat her to a little something, on my behalf?"
"How could I be so slow! Here is some money." Ximen took out some pieces of silver and handed them wrapped in a kerchief, to Grandma Wang.
"I can't allow you to do that," said the girl. But she remained seated.
The old woman took the money and went to the door. "Keep Right Honourable company a while," said Grandma Wang.
"You mustn't go to any trouble, godmother," said the girl. She didn't budge.
Ximen and Golden Lotus were strongly drawn to each other. He was frankly staring at her. She, glancing at him from under her lashes, thought him a fine figure of a man, and was already more than half willing. But she kept her head down over her work.
Soon Grandma Wang returned with a cooked fat goose, stewed meat and delicate tidbits. She placed everything on platters and set them on the table.
"Put your sewing away," she said to the girl, "and have a cup of wine."
"You go ahead, godmother. It's not proper for me to join the gentleman," said Golden Lotus. But she didn't leave her seat.
"We're doing this to express my thanks, especially to you. How can you say such a thing?" Grandma Wang laid the dishes on the table. The three sat down, and she poured the wine. Ximen raised his cup.
"Drink hearty, madam," he said to Golden Lotus.
"Thank you, sir," the girl smiled.
"I know you have a real capacity," Grandma Wang said to her. "So don't stint on your drinking."
Ximen picked up his chopsticks. "Godmother, please serve this lady for me."
The old woman selected choice pieces and placed them on Golden Lotus's plate. She poured three rounds of wine in succession, then went out to heat some more.
"May I ask how old you are?" Ximen said to the girl.
"Twenty-three."
"Five years younger than me."
"You're comparing the earth and the sky, sir," the girl said politely.
Grandma Wang came back into the room. "This lady is remarkably clever," she gushed. "Not only does she sew beautifully but she's read all the classics."
"Where can you find such a girl these days?" said Ximen. "Wu the Elder is certainly fortunate."
"You mustn't think I'm trying to provoke anything," said Grandma Wang, "but with all the women in your household, there isn't one who can compare.
"That's quite true. I can't tell you how hard it's been. I guess I was born unlucky. I've never been able to find a really good one."
"There was nothing wrong with your first wife."
"You can say that again. If she were still alive, my household wouldn't be in such a state. Those women are just mouths waiting to be fed. They don't look after a thing."
"How long ago did your wife die, sir?" the girl asked.
"It's sad story. Though she came from a poor family, she was very skilful. She did everything for me. She's been gone three years now. My household is in a mess. That's why I spend so much time outside. It only aggravates me when I'm home."
"Do you mind if I'm frank?" said Grandma Wang. "Your first wife wasn't as handy with a needle as this lady is."
"She wasn't as good-looking, either."
Grandma Wang laughed. "Why haven't you ever invited me to tea in that house you have on East Street?"
"You mean where I'm keeping Zhang Xixi, the ballad singer? She's just a singsong girl. I don't care for her much."
"You've had Li Jiaojiao for quite a while."
"Yes. I keep her at home. If she were like this lady here, I'd have raised her to the status of wife long ago."
"If you could find such a girl, would you have any trouble bringing her into the family?"
"Both my parents are dead. I'm my own master. Who would dare to object?"
"I'm only joking. The problem is, there isn't any girl who would please you."
"Who says there isn't? It's just that my marriage luck has been bad. I've never met the right one."
Ximen and the old woman talked for a while in this manner, then Grandma Wang said: "I'm afraid the wine is nearly finished. Can I trouble you to buy another bottle?"
"There are five ounces of silver in my purse. You can have them all. Take what you need and keep the change."
Grandma Wang thanked him and got up, glancing at Golden Lotus. The dram of wine inside the girl was stirring her passions. She and the man were talking freely. Both were aroused. Golden Lotus kept her head down but she didn't leave. Grinning, Grandma Wang addressed her.
"I'm going out to buy another bottle. Please keep Right Honourable company. There's still some wine in the heating tube. You and he can each have a cup. I'm going all the way down to that shop opposite the county office to get some good wine, so I won't be back for quite a while."
"You needn't go to so much bother," the girl murmured. She remained where she was.
Grandma Wang went out, close and tied the doors of the rear room, then sat herself down on guard.
Ximen poured wine for Golden Lotus. With his wide sleeve, he swept a pair of chopsticks from the table to the floor. Fate was on the side of his amorous quest—they landed right beside the girl's feet. He bent down as though to pick them up and instead squeezed one of her embroidered satin shoes. Golden Lotus laughed.
"Sir, you mustn't! Are you trying to seduce me?"
Ximen knelt before her. "I want you so!"
Golden Lotus raised him to his feet and threw herself into his arms. There in Grandma Wang's room the two hastily undressed. Sharing the same pillow, they revelled joyously.
After the clouds had spent their rain, and Golden Lotus and Ximen were about to put on their clothes. Grandma Wang pushed open the doors and came in. She pretended to be very angry.
"Pretty tricks you two have been up to," she cried, startling the lovers. "A fine thing! I asked you here to make me garments," she said to Golden Lotus, "not to play adulterous games! If Wu the Elder finds out, he'll surely blame me! It would be better for me if I told him about it first!"
She started for the door. The girl grabbed her by the skirt. "Godmother, spare me!"
"Not so loud, godmother," Ximen pleaded.
Grandma Wang chuckled. "I'll spare you both on one condition."
"One or a dozen," said Golden Lotus. "I'll promise you anything!"

"From now on, you must fool Wu the Elder and entertain Right Honourable everyday without fail, in which case I'll spare you. But if you miss a single day, I'll tell your husband!"
"Whatever you say, godmother."
"And you, Right Honourable Ximen, you know what I want. The matter is a complete success. Don't forget your promise. If you do, I'll tell Wu the Elder!"
"Never fear, godmother. I won't forget."
The three drank until afternoon. Golden Lotus rose. "My husband will be home soon. I have to go."
She returned through the back door and was lowering the front door curtain when Wu arrived.
At that moment Grandma Wang was saying to Ximen: "Well, what do you think of my method?"
"Marvellous! I'm sending you a bar of silver as soon as I get home. You shall have everything I promised!"
" 'My eyes watch for the banners of royal reward, my ears are cocked for the sound of glad tidings.' Don't fail me! I don't want to be 'a funeral singer demanding payment after the burial'!"
Ximen laughed and departed. Of that no more need be said.
From then on, Golden Lotus slipped over to Grandma Wang's house everyday to meet Ximen. They were as close as lacquer, as thick as glue. As the old saying has it: "News of good behavior never gets past the door but a scandal is heard of a thousand //away." In less than half a month, all the neighbours knew. Only Wu remained in ignorance.
There was a boy of fifteen or sixteen in the county town whose family name was Qiao. Because he was sired by an army man in Yunzhou Prefecture, he was given the name Yunge. All that was left of his immediate family, besides himself, was his old father. A clever youngster, he earned a living selling fresh fruit in the various taverns outside the county office. Sometimes Ximen gave him a bit of money.
One day, carrying a basket of snowy pears, he wandered along the streets looking for Ximen.
"I know a place where I think you can find him," a gabby fellow said to the boy.
"Please tell me, uncle. I can earn forty or fifty coppers from him. I need them for my old pa."
"He's hooked up with the wife of Wu the Elder, the bun seller. He's with her everyday in Grandma Wang's teashop on Purple Stone Street. You'll probably find him there. You're only a child, so go right in."
Yunge thanked the man, went with his basket to Purple Stone Street and entered the teashop. Grandma Wang was sitting on a little stool, hand-spinning hemp thread. The boy put down his basket and greeted her.
"My respects, godmother."
"What do you want, Yunge?"
"I'm looking for Right Honourable. I can earn forty or fifty coppers for my old pa."
"Which Right Honourable?"
"You know which one, godmother. He's the one I mean."
"Even if he's a Right Honourable, he must have a name."
"His name has two syllables."
"What are they?"
"Are you kidding? Right Honourable Ximen. I have to speak to him."
The boy started for the rear of the shop. Grandma Wang grabbed him. "Where are you going, young jackanapes? There's such a thing as privacy in a person's home."
"I only want to call him out a minute."
"Frigging monkeyshines! Who says I have any Right Honourable Ximen in there!"
"Don't hog him all to yourself. Let me have a lick of the juice too. Think I don't know?"
"Little ape! What do you know!"
"Stingy as cutting vegetables with a hoof-paring knife in a wooden spoon, aren't you? Don't want to miss a bit. Well, all I have to do is speak out, and that bun-selling man is liable to lose his temper!"
The old woman realized he was on to her, and she flew into a rage. "You young scamp! How dare you come in here farting and blowing!"
"A young scamp is better than an old bawd any time!"
Grandma Wang seized him and gave him two lumps on the noggin.
"What are you thumping me for?" yelled the boy.
"Thieving ape! If you don't keep your voice down, I'll slap you right out of here!"
"Dirty old whore-monger! Hitting me for no reason at all!" Grandma Wang held Yunge by the back of the neck with one hand and pounded his skull with the other, while she rushed him through the door. She threw the basket after him, sending the pears rolling all over the street. The boy was no match for her. Cursing and weeping, he picked up his pears. Angrily, he pointed at her shop. "Just wait, old bawd, I'm going to tell him! You'll see if I don't!" He set out in search, basket on his arm. Because of what had gone before, all sorts of misfortune followed. As a result, the grass in the dens of foxes and rabbits was disturbed, and loving ducks on the sand were startled from their slumber.

Now when Wu Song turned round that day and saw who it was that had called him, he threw himself down in respectful greeting, because this person was none other than his elder brother, Wu Da. So Wu Song prostrated himself and said: "I haven't seen you for over a year brother. What're you doing here?"
"You were gone so long," Wu Da said. "Why didn't you write to me? You know, I was furious with you but I missed you!"
"What's that supposed to mean, you were furious with me but you missed me?" asked Wu Song.
"Well, you used to make me so angry in those days, always getting drunk, always getting into fights, always in trouble with the authorities and obliging me to go the court on your behalf. Never a moment's peace, always some headache because of you! That's why I was furious with you. But I missed you when I got spliced recently. People treated me dreadfully, there was no one to stand up for me. If only you'd been there we wouldn't have heard a fart out of them, you can bet your life on it. It got so I couldn't stand it any more, so I've had to move to this place and rent a house. That's why I missed you."
What you must know, friends, is that although Wu Song and Wu Da were born of the same mother, Wu Song was a tall, impressive figure of a man, immensely strong — of course, how else would he have killed the tiger? — but Wu Da was barely four foot and ugly as sin; his appearance provoked nothing but ridicule. The people of his town, on account of his dwarfish stature, had nicknamed him "The Three-Inch Poxy Midget."
Now in Qinghe there was a family who had a maid called Pan Jinlian, or Golden Lotus. At the age of twenty she was rather pretty. Because the master was trying to force his attentions upon her (and she unwilling to accede to his demands), she had gone to complain to her mistress. The master was furious, and after giving her a small trousseau, married her off to the Midget, free, gratis and for nothing. After Wu Da married the girl, certain cheating and dissolute young men of the town began to swarm round his house and disturb the peace. The girl herself, naturally enough in view of Wu Da's lack of inches and unimpressive character, was eager for something better and she made it her prime objective to find herself a lover, as the poem about her says:

She's not the kind to be passed over,
With charms galore to please a lover.
Just wait till a nice young man she meets;
There'll soon be games between the sheets!

Now once this girl had entered his home, the Midget, who was a timid conventional kind of man, was continually pestered by the shameless gang of good-for-nothings who camped at his gate, making lewd comments like: "What a juicy piece of mutton to fall into the mouth of a dog!" It became impossible for him to go on living in Qinghe, so he moved to Yanggu, where he rented a house in Redstone Road. Here he continued in his old trade, going out everyday to sell bread on the street.
He had been carrying on his business outside the government offices on the morning he met Wu Song. "Well, brother," he said, "the other day the streets were buzzing with the news of a great tiger-killer named Wu, who'd eliminated the monster on Jingyang Pass and been appointed captain by the Magistrate. I wasn't sure but something told me it must be you. Anyway, now that I've found you, I'm going to knock off work and take you home with me."
"Where do you live?" Wu Song asked.
His brother pointed. "Just round the corner in Redstone Road."
Wu Song picked up his brother's carrying-pole, and the Midget guided him past several turnings till they reached Redstone Road. They continued down it and after rounding two more bends came to the house, adjoining the compound of a teahouse.
"Open the door, dear," the Midget called. The bamboo curtain was raised a little, and a woman's face appeared beneath it. "Why are you back so early?" she said.
"Your brother-in-law is here, I want you to meet him." He took his carrying-pole and deposited it inside. Then he came out again and said: "Come on in and meet your sister-in-law."
Wu Song parted the curtain and entered. He greeted the woman. The Midget said to her: "You heard about the person who killed the tiger, dear, on Jingyang Pass? And who was made a captain by the Magistrate? Well, it's my little brother!"
The woman crossed her hands and wished her brother-in-law a thousand happinesses. Wu Song said: "Please stay seated, sister-in-law," and made a most gracious obeisance. The woman darted forward to raise him up, saying: "Please, brother-in-law, this is too much."
Wu Song said: "I am your most humble servant, sister-in-law."
"I heard them saying that a very brave man who had killed a tiger was coming to town," she said. "I planned to go and see but unfortunately I got there late and missed my chance. I never got to see him but now, well, so it's you! Do please come upstairs and sit down."
Here's what Wu Song saw when he looked at his sister-in-law:
Brows like willow-leaves in early spring but oft-times clouded with the sadness of showers; a face like third month peach blossoms, hinting at romantic desires and amorous thoughts; a slender figure, full of indolent grace and feminine allure; lips red enough to tantalize the bees and butterflies; bewitching beauty, arousing every sense with its soft fragrance.
She now told the Midget to take his brother upstairs to the sitting-room. When they were all seated she gave the Midget a look and said: "I will take care of your brother. You go and order food and wine for him."
"All right," the Midget said. "You sit here brother; I'll be back in a moment."
When the Midget was gone, the woman covertly examined Wu Song. "They're brothers with the same mother but how well-built this one is!" she was thinking. "If only I'd married this one instead, life would really seem worth living! There's absolutely no comparison with my Three-Inch Poxy Midget, who's only three parts man and seven parts ghost! Oh, how unlucky I am! Judging by the way he killed the tiger, Wu Song must be terrifically strong. Apparently he isn't married yet, so why not get him to come and live here? Surely it's fate that brought him to me!"
Smiling her most winning smile, she asked Wu Song: "How long have you been here, brother-in-law?"
"About ten days," he answered.
"And where are you staying?"
"I doss down at the government offices."
"That doesn't sound very comfortable."
"I'm on my own. I don't need much. And I've got the soldiers of the militia to serve me."
"Soldiers? How can they look after you properly? Why don't you come and live here? Then whenever you wanted something to eat or drink, I'd prepare it for you with my own hands. You wouldn't have to depend on dirty people like that. I'd give you some nice soup for instance, and you'd know it was safe to eat."
"That's very kind of you."
"Or perhaps you have a wife somewhere? You could bring her here to look after you."
"I'm not married."
"Can I ask how old you are?"
"I'm twenty-five."
"That's just three years older than me. Where were you before you came here?"
"I was in Cangzhou for just over a year. I thought my brother was in Qinghe, I didn't know he had moved here."
"Well, you can't imagine the trouble there's been since I married your brother! He's too good you see. People were horrible to him and we couldn't stand to live in Qinghe any more, so we came here. Of course, if you'd been around, a hero like you, no one would have dared to say a word, that's for sure!"
"My brother has always been very correct. He never went around getting into scrapes like me."
"How can you say that? You're twisting things around. Have you forgotten the proverb, 'If you can't stand up for yourself, you'll never live in peace'? Personally, I always like to speak my mind, I can't bear the kind who, you know, ask 'em three times and still they won't tell you what they think!"
"You ought to be thankful my brother keeps out of trouble."
They were still talking when the Midget returned with the meat and fish and fruit and nuts he'd bought. "Come down and cook the meal, dear," he called out as he was coming upstairs.
"What a fool you are!" the girl said. "You're asking me to go downstairs and leave my brother-in-law here all alone?"
"There's no need to worry about me," Wu Song said.
"Why don't you go and get old Mother Wang next door to come and cook for us? Can't you ever organize anything properly?"
So the Midget went and got their neighbour, Mrs. Wang, to prepare and cook the food that he then brought upstairs and arranged on the table. There was no lack of fish and meat dishes, and of course all kinds of fruit and vegetables, and it was not long before the wine was warmed and brought up too. The Midget made his wife sit in the host's place whilst his brother sat opposite and he himself on one side. He then poured wine for each of them. Taking her cup the woman said: "Please drink, brother-in-law, and pardon us for not providing you with better fare."
"Nonsense, sister-in-law. This is a feast," said Wu Song.
The Midget busied himself warming the wine and filling the cups and paid no attention to anything else. Jinlian smiled her most dazzling smile and said: "Why aren't you eating, brother-in-law? You must try a little fish. And some meat." She chose the best pieces and put them in his bowl.
Wu Song was a straightforward fellow and he simply put her attentiveness down to the fact that he was one of the family. But she had been in service and knew how to make the most of these little attentions. The Midget, on the other hand, was a good but ineffectual man, unskilled in the art of entertaining.
After several cups of wine, the woman could no longer take her eyes off Wu Song's body. Wu Song grew embarrassed and lowered his head, no longer liking to look at her. After some twenty cups, he rose to his feet.
"Have some more," the Midget said.
"I've had enough," he replied. "I'll come and see you another day."
They both went downstairs with him and Jinlian said: "You really ought to move in with us, brother-in-law. Otherwise people will laugh at us, they'll say you prefer strangers to your own brother. Husband, why don't you prepare a room and ask him to come and live here? If you don't the neighbours will start making up stories."
"You're quite right," said the Midget. "You must come and live with us, brother, and give us face."
"If that's what you both want, I'll go and get my luggage and bring it here tonight."
"Don't forget," the woman said. "I shall be expecting you."
The woman's interest was decidedly engaged. It was like this:

A brother's wife, that's a taboo relation,
Though mutual help is an obligation.
The hero thinks only of family ties,
But the wanton sees him in lustier guise.

When Wu Song left his brother's in Redstone Road and went back to the government offices, he found the Magistrate was in session, so he went straight in and made his request: "I have a brother, sir, who's come to live here in Redstone Road. I'd like to move in with him. Naturally I'd always be here for the morning and evening sessions. But I thought I should ask you first. May I have your permission?"
"It's only natural you should want to be with your brother," the Magistrate replied. "Of course I've no objection. It needn't prevent you coming in to work each day."

Wu Song thanked him and went to get his luggage and bed-roll. There was also the new suit of clothes and the other things he'd been given with the reward. He found an orderly to carry all this, and they made their way to his brother's house. When the woman saw him coming she was as pleased as someone who's stumbled on a treasure trove. She couldn't hide her delight. The Midget got a carpenter to come and put up partitions upstairs and make a bed. A table was also put in there, with two chairs and a stove. Wu Song unpacked his things and sent the orderly away. That night he slept at his brother's.

Next morning he was up at dawn. The woman quickly got up too, to heat water for washing and provide him with water to rinse his mouth. When he had completed his toilet, he put on his cap and was ready to report back to work. As he went out, she called after him: "When you finish work, be sure to come straight back here to eat, don't go and eat somewhere else."

"I'll come straight back," he promised.

After the morning's work at the office he returned to the house. Jinlian had washed and manicured her hands and dressed herself up. She served the food and the three of them sat down to eat. But when she offered Wu Song a bowl of tea with her own hands, he protested: "Sister-in-law, it's too much trouble for you. I feel embarrassed about staying here and eating with you. I must get one of the soldiers to come and serve you."

She said quickly: "You're one of the family, you shouldn't treat me like an outsider. With one's own flesh and blood it's not at all the same as serving other people. If you give one of your soldiers charge of the pots and the stove nothing will ever be clean. I just can't stomach those kind of people."

"But really, I must be giving you too much trouble," said Wu Song.

Well, enough of all that. After he came to live with them, Wu Song gave his brother money to buy cakes and pancakes, and tea and fruit, to invite the neighbours for tea. The neighbours got together to return the compliment, and after that the Midget organized another party for them. We say no more of this.

A few days later, Wu Song gave his sister-in-law a fine piece of coloured silk to make a dress. She was delighted with the gift. "You really shouldn't have," she said. "But since it's from you I can't very well refuse, can I? I'll have to accept it."

So now Wu Song was established in his brother's house, and his brother went out everyday as usual to sell his bread on the street. Wu Song went everyday to the office, where he performed a variety of tasks. When he returned, early or late, it made no difference, his sister-in-law had soup and rice ready for him, and counted herself happy to be able to serve him. He was sometimes embarrassed by it. Sometimes, moreover, she made suggestive remarks. But Wu Song was of an innocent, straightforward nature, and he saw nothing in them.

Well, let's concentrate on what's important, and pass over the time when nothing happened. Imperceptibly a month or more had slipped by. It was mid-winter weather: for days a bitter wind had been blowing and reddish clouds filled the sky. Then the snow began to fall, a myriad whirling, dancing flakes.

It went on snowing till evening, by which time it was a world of white, a universe of powdered jade. The next day, Wu Song went to work early, and had not returned by midday. Jinlian pushed her husband out of the house to pursue his trade and then sent the neighbour, Mrs. Wang, off to buy wine and meat. She herself, meanwhile, installed a charcoal stove in Wu Song's room. "Today's my chance," she was thinking, "to get him excited. I really don't believe I can fail to have an effect on him."

So there she stood by the curtain all alone, waiting composedly till the moment she saw Wu Song striding home, crunching through the jade-like snow. She raised the curtain and said, with her most captivating smile: "You must be frozen!"

"Thank you for your concern," he replied politely. Entering, he removed his hat that she took with both hands. "Please don't trouble," he protested, taking it back and brushing off the snow, before hanging it on the wall. Then he took off his belt and his parrot-green robe that he put away in his room.

"I waited for you all morning," she said, "why didn't you come back for lunch?"

"A colleague at the office invited me," he answered. "And then just now someone else wanted me to go and drink with him but I preferred to come straight home."

"Well, then, come closer to the fire," she said.

"Good," he said. He took off his oiled boots and changed his socks and put on warm slippers. Then he moved a chair up to the fire and sat down. She went to fasten the front door, and then the back door, and then fetched some fruit and vegetables to accompany the wine, all of which she took into Wu Song's room and put down on the table.

"Where's my brother?" Wu Song asked. "Why isn't he back?"

"He always goes out to sell his stuff at this time," she said. "You and I are going to enjoy a cup or two together."

"We may as well wait till he comes back and all drink together."

"Why ever should we wait for him? I don't intend to wait!" Before she even finished speaking she had begun to warm the wine.

"You sit down and let me do it," Wu Song said. "I know how to warm it properly."

"If you say so," she said. She moved a chair up and sat down beside the fire. The cups and dishes were laid out on a table near the fire. She took a cup of wine, held it out and looking directly at Wu Song, said: "Drink this cup, brother-in-law."

He took it from her and emptied it. She filled another and said: "It's such a cold day, you should drink this one too, to make a pair."

"If you say so," he answered, taking the second cup and emptying it. Then he filled a cup and handed it to her. She drank, then took the jug and poured again and placed the cup in front of him.

There she was, her bosom half revealed, her raven tresses in partial disarray, wearing the sweetest of smiles. She said: "I have heard some gossip about you. They say you keep a singer, somewhere behind the government offices. Can it be true?"

"You shouldn't believe such rubbish," he replied. "I'm not at all that kind of person."

"How can I trust you? Maybe your heart and your words don't tally!"

"If you don't believe me, ask my brother."

"What would he know about it? If he had any knowledge of the world he'd be doing something better than selling bread. Come on, have another cup."

Another three or four cups were poured and drunk. With three cups of wine inside her, lustful thoughts began to surface, she simply couldn't repress them. Her talk grew more and more suggestive. Wu Song, who could more or less see what she was getting at, dared not even raise his head.

When she went to warm more wine, Wu Song picked up the tongs and began to poke the fire. When she came back with the warmed wine, carrying the carafe in one hand, she rested the other hand on his shoulder. She rubbed the cloth between her finger and thumb and said: "Aren't you cold, with such thin clothes?"

Wu Song, desperately embarrassed, gave no answer. Seeing that he remained silent, she took her hand away. She seized the tongs and said: "You don't know how to make up a fire. I shall poke it for you. We want it to be as hot as a brazier."

Wu Song, now thoroughly alarmed, still remained silent. But she was burning with desire and she didn't notice Wu Song's repugnance. She put down the tongs and poured another cup of wine. She took a sip and then, looking Wu Song straight in the eyes, she held out the cup to him and said: "If your heart responds, drink the rest."

Wu Song seized the cup and dashed it to the ground. "Don't be so shameless!" he said, giving her a push that almost knocked her down. Glaring ferociously, he said: "I am a man of honour, not a wild animal. I don't go in for that kind of disgusting stuff, that's fit only for pigs or dogs. Don't ever dare behave in that disgusting manner again, or start any of that business. If there's the least breath of suspicion, even just enough to stir the grass, I swear to you this: even though my eyes tell me you're my sister-in-law, my fists won't care. So don't ever let that happen again!"

She blushed scarlet. Collecting up the cups and plates, she said: "I was only joking, why do you have to take it so seriously? You really are uncouth!" Carrying the things she took herself off to the kitchen.

The poem says:

Drink's a bawd to goad desire;
Lust emboldened knows no shame.
Aiming to kindle passion's fire
All she gets is bitter blame.

So Jinlian failed to seduce Wu Song and earned herself a scolding instead, while Wu Song remained in his room, fuming.

It was still early, only mid-afternoon, when the Midget returned with his carrying-pole. As he pushed the door, his wife hurried to open it. He came in and put down the carrying-pole. Then he went into the kitchen. Noticing that Jinlian's eyes were red from crying, he asked her: "Have you been quarrelling with someone?"

"It's all your fault," she said. "You're so weak, you allow people to insult me."

"Who's had the nerve to insult you?"

"Who do you think? Who else could it be but that brother of yours? I went to all the trouble of getting him some wine to drink when he came home, because it was snowing so hard, and then because there was no one else around he tried to make a pass at me."

"My brother's not like that. He's the most honourable person. Anyway, keep your voice down or the neighbours will laugh at us!"

The Midget abandoned his wife and went to Wu Song's room. "You haven't eaten yet, have you brother?" he said. "Come and eat with me."

Wu Song was silent. After hesitating for a long time, he finally took off his slippers and put on his oiled boots again, his coat and his hat, and started for the door.

"Where are you going?" his brother shouted after him but Wu Song went out still without answering.

The Midget went back into the kitchen. "He didn't answer when I called him," he said. "He just went off in the direction of the government offices. I really don't understand what's going on."

"You stupid idiot!" Jinlian said. "Can't you see? He's too ashamed of himself. He daren't look you in the face so he's left! I bet he's sending someone to move his luggage. He won't want to live here any more."

"If he does that the neighbours will laugh at us," the Midget complained.

"You stuffed dumpling! If he stays here and seduces me the neighbours will laugh even more. You can live with him if you like but I'm not going to put up with that kind of thing. Or you can write me out a divorce, if that's what you want, then you can keep him here."

The Midget didn't dare open his mouth again.

At this point Wu Song returned, accompanied by a soldier equipped with a carrying-pole. They went straight to the room, collected Wu Song's things, and came out again. The Midget chased after them. "Why are you moving out, brother?" he asked.

"Don't ask me that. Best to let sleeping dogs lie. Just let me go, it'll be best."

The Midget didn't dare ask again or try to prevent his brother from leaving. All the time the woman was muttering to herself within: "That's nice, that's fine! Everyone thinks you're so lucky if your brother's made up to captain. They think he'll help you. When all he does is go and stab you in the back! Well, like they say, 'Don't judge a crab-apple by its looks!' Thank heaven he's gone. Good riddance to bad rubbish!"

The Midget heard her cursing but he didn't know what to do. This business had unsettled him and he couldn't get it out of his mind. However, he continued to go out each day to sell his bread in the street, after his brother had moved back to the government offices. At first he wanted to go and look for his brother but his wife ordered him not to with such fierce insistence that he dared not. So the two brothers did not see each other.

Time passed in a flash and imperceptibly the snow had melted away. One day — it was about ten days later — the Magistrate, who had been at his post for over two and a half years and had amassed quite a fortune, decided he wanted to send some of his funds back to a relative in the Eastern Capital for safekeeping, and also to buy him a promotion. But he was afraid it might get stolen en route. He needed a capable and trustworthy person to send with it. He bethought himself of Wu Song. "Of course, he's the one to send! He's absolutely fearless!"

He summoned Wu Song that very day. "I've got a relative in the Eastern Capital," he told him. "I want to send a load of gifts to him and a letter. But here's the problem. The roads are dangerous and it needs someone with your strength and courage to bring this mission off. Would you be prepared to render me this service, regardless of any difficulty or hardship? You can be sure I will reward you handsomely when you return."

"Your Excellency, I owe my position to you," said Wu Song, "so of course I shall do whatever you tell me, I couldn't possibly refuse. If it is your wish, I shall go. I have never been to the Eastern Capital and it will be a good chance to see the sights. I shall leave straight away tomorrow, if you will have the things ready."

The Magistrate was most satisfied with this answer and offered Wu Song wine. Of this no more.

Having received his instructions from the Magistrate, Wu Song went back to his room, got some silver, and sent an orderly off to buy a bottle of wine, some fish and meat and some dried fruit. With these provisions they went to the Midget's in Redstone Road. About this time the Midget returned after selling his bread and saw Wu Song sitting outside his gate. The orderly was sent into the kitchen to prepare the food. When Jinlian, who secretly still had a soft spot for Wu Song, saw him coming with wine and food, she said to herself: "Can it be he's still thinking of me? Is that why he's come back? Anyway, it looks as if he knows he can't get the better of me. I'll sound him out but I'd better tread carefully."

She went upstairs, powdered her face with care, rearranged her raven tresses and changed into her most glamorous dress. Then she went downstairs again to receive him. "I can't think what we've done wrong, brother-in-law," she said. "You haven't been to see us for days. I really wondered what was going on. Everyday I told your brother to go and see you at the office but he always came back and said he couldn't find you. I'm so glad you've come now. Only what's the reason for all this extravagance?"

"There's something I want to say to both of you," Wu Song said. "That's why I've come."

"In that case we'd better go upstairs and sit down," she said.

They went upstairs to the sitting-room. Wu Song made them sit in the place of honour, while he pulled up a chair and sat down to one side. The orderly brought up more wine and meat and laid them on the table. Wu Song urged his brother and sister-in-law to drink. Jinlian did not take her eyes off Wu Song but he just drank his wine and seemed not to notice. Five cups were drunk in rapid succession. Then Wu Song told the orderly to pour another cup. He took it in his hands and looking fixedly at his brother, said: "Hear what I have to say. I have been entrusted by the Magistrate with a mission to the Eastern Capital. I am leaving tomorrow. It could take two months and won't be less than forty days. Here's what I came to say to you: you've never been a strong kind of man and I'm afraid other people may try to make trouble for you while I'm gone. Now then, let's suppose you usually sell ten baskets of bread a day; from tomorrow on, I want you to sell only five. Start late and come back early. Don't stay out drinking with anyone. Lower the blind as soon as you get home, and bolt the door as early as possible. That way you'll avoid trouble. If anyone tries to provoke you, don't get into a fight, just wait till I come and I'll deal with them. To show you accept my advice now, please drink this cup."

The Midget took the cup and said: "You're absolutely right, I'll do just as you say." And he emptied the cup.

Wu Song poured another two cups of wine and turned to his sister-in-law. "You're a clever woman," he said, "so I don't need many words. My brother's always honest and straightforward with people so he needs you to look after him. A strong character is worth more than muscles, so they say. If you keep the house well, there's no reason why he should have any trouble. You know the old proverb, 'If the fences are strong, the dogs can't get in'."

These words, this lecture from Wu Song, made Jinlian blush from ear to ear. Scarlet with mortification, she pointed at the Midget and screamed: "You stupid idiot! What sort of rumours have you picked up in the street and brought back to persecute me with? I tell you, I may look like a woman but I've a man's spirit! I'm not some useless flibbertigibbet! You could stand firm on this fist, you could race horses up this arm, do you hear? I can hold up my head anywhere. I'm not that kind of woman! Since I married you not so much as an ant has got into this house, so what's all this about bad fences and dogs sneaking in? You've got your facts wrong! You ought to find out what's what before you start flinging accusations!"

Wu Song laughed and said: "Good, I'm glad you've got such confidence. But make sure your heart and your words agree. I shall remember what you say. And now I ask you to drink this cup as a pledge of faith."

She brushed the cup aside and ran to the stairs. Halfway down she paused to shout: "You're so clever but haven't you heard that an elder brother's wife is like a mother? When I got married nobody told me anything about a younger brother. Why should you turn up here to order us all around, even if you are one of the family? It's just my bloody luck to get caught in a mess like this!" And with that she burst into tears and ran downstairs. As the poem says:

For good advice she doesn't give a rap;
Her smiles and tears are all on tap.
She knows what she wants,
These are just tricks to get it.
If you think she's tragic or feels shame,
Forget it!

Of course it was all pretence, she was just putting it on!

The two brothers remained there drinking for a while, and then Wu Song said he had to leave. "Take care," said his brother, "and come back as quickly as possible!" As he spoke the tears sprang to his eyes. When he saw this, Wu Song said: "I really think it would be best if you stop work completely and stay home. I can send you money."

The Midget accompanied his brother downstairs. Just before he went out, Wu Song said: "Don't forget what I told you, brother."

Wu Song and the orderly returned to the government offices to prepare his luggage. Next day he rose early, tied his bundle, and went to see the Magistrate. The latter had already commandeered a wagon and had it loaded with boxes and cases. Two sturdy soldiers had been appointed as escort and two trusted servants from his own staff. They all assembled in front of the government offices to bid farewell. Then Wu Song strapped on his armour and took up his pike and together with the cart and its escort left Yanggu and took the road to the Eastern Capital.

Now our story divides in two again. After his brother left, the Midget had to put up with three or four days of recriminations. He bore it in silence. He just let her scold and concentrated on following his brother's advice, only going out to sell half the usual amount of bread each day and coming home early. As soon as he had put down his carrying-pole he would lower the blind and lock the door. Then he would sit down. This infuriated Jinlian. Waving her finger in his face, she would say: "You imbecile! You moron! What do you want to lock the flaming door for when the sun isn't halfway across the sky? The neighbours are going to think we're afraid of our own shadows or something. I know, you have to listen to that blessed brother of yours. You don't care if everyone's laughing at you!"

"Let them. My brother's advice was good. It'll keep us out of disputes."

"Bah! You moron! Can't you decide anything for yourself, do you always have to follow someone else's instructions?"

The Midget merely waved his hand and said: "I don't care what anyone says. My brother's advice is golden."

For the first ten days after Wu Song left, the Midget continued to go out late and return early, locking the door as soon as he got home. His wife kept on reviling him but he got used to it and paid no attention. Finally she herself would go and lower the blind, around the time of his return, and lock the front door. This greatly pleased the Midget. "Now things are really going well!" he said to himself.

Two or three days later — winter was nearly over and the weather was beginning to warm up again — Jinlian went to lower the blind with the forked pole, as it was now her custom to do, just before the Midget's return, and it just so happened that a man walked past. There's an old proverb which says: "It's chance that keeps the story going." She was not holding the pole securely enough: it slipped from her hands and fell, as luck would have it, precisely on top of the man's headdress. He stopped in his tracks, intending to kick up a tremendous fuss. But when he turned to see who was responsible, and saw that it was a devilishly pretty young woman, his heart was softened at once and his anger fled to the Isle of Java, as they say. A smile spread right across his face.

When she saw he was not complaining, Jinlian crossed her hands, curtsied profoundly, and said: "It was an accident. Please forgive me."

The man rearranged his headdress, bowed and said graciously: "It's nothing. Think no more of it."
Now all this was seen by the neighbour, Mrs. Wang. who had been standing in the doorway of her teashop. Mrs. Wang laughed and said: "Who told you to walk so close to the house, anyway? It was a direct hit!"
The man smiled too and said: "Yes, really, it was my own fault. Now I have inconvenienced a lady. I beg you to forgive me!"
Jinlian also smiled and said: "All the same, I'm afraid you must blame me."
He gave the deepest of bows and replied: "How could I do that?" All this time his eyes were devouring her. He made as if to depart. But six or seven times he turned back to look at her. Eventually he swaggered off, stepping jauntily for her benefit.
She collected the pole and put it by the door, and finished lowering the blind. Then she shut the front door and waited for the Midget. As the poem says:

The fence is broken, the dog sneaks in;
That blind afforded the chance to be seen.
To seduction's course Mrs. Wang gives a prod:
The pole you might say was a fishing-rod.

Now just who exactly was that man? And where did he live? Well, he was the scion of an impoverished gentleman's family of Yanggu, who had set up a medicinal herbs shop opposite the government offices. From his childhood days he'd always been a bit of a crook, good with his fists and with the staff. Recently he'd suddenly become rich. He had good connections in the government and went around brow-beating ordinary people. For a fee, though, he would help them with applications, just like a government official, so everyone in the town kowtowed to him. He had the double surname of Xi-men and his given name was simply Qing. He was a first son and people called him his Nibs. Recently since he'd made his name and fortune they'd taken to calling him Your Honour, as if he was a real government official.
Well it wasn't more than a few moments before his Nibs, Mr. Xi-men Qing, appeared in Mrs. Wang's teahouse and sat himself down beside the entrance curtain.
"That was a fine greeting you gave just now," Mrs. Wang said with a grin.
"Come over here, old woman," he replied, also smiling. "Tell me, that young woman next door, who's her husband?"
"She's the King of Hell's younger sister and daughter of the God of Calamities! Why do you want to know?"
"I'm serious, so stop teasing."
"Then how come you don't know? Her old man's outside the government offices everyday, selling something to eat."
"She's not married to Third Brother Xu, is she, the one who sells date cakes?"
Mrs. Wang shook her head. "No, if it was him they wouldn't make such a bad pair. Guess again."
"Is she the wife of Second Brother Li, the silver carrier?"
Mrs. Wang shook her head again. "No, that wouldn't be such a bad match either."
"Then I suppose it must be young Lu, with the tattooed arms?"
Mrs. Wang laughed. "No, it's not. If it were him they'd make a pair. Have another go."
"Mother Wang, I give up."
Mrs. Wang was laughing her head off. "This is going to kill you," she said. "Her old man's the one who sells bread. He's Wu Da, the Midget!"
His Nibs almost fell over laughing. "You don't mean the one they call the Three-Inch Poxy Midget?" he said. "Not that Wu Da?"
"That's the one," she said.
"Well!" he exclaimed, as the horror of it dawned on him. "What a juicy piece of mutton to fall into the mouth of a dog!"
"That's about the size of it," she said. "Like they always say, 'a lovely woman in the hands of a stupid oaf, that's like a sensitive horse ridden by a clumsy rider.' What was the God of Marriages thinking of when he coupled those two?"
"How much do I owe you for the tea, Mother Wang?" his Nibs asked.
"It's hardly anything," she said. "Leave it, we can settle up another time."
"By the way, who's your son with at the moment?"
"I can't tell you. He went off with someone to the River Huai and since then I've not had a word, not so much as to say if he's dead or alive."
"Why don't you send him along to me?"
"If Your Honour would take him, I'd really like that."
"Wait till he comes back and we can talk about it again."
After some more idle talk of this kind he said good-bye and left.
In something less than an hour he was back at Mrs. Wang's teahouse, sitting by the entrance curtain where he could watch the Midget's front door. Mrs. Wang left him alone for a moment, and then went over and said: "How about some plum soup, Your Honour?"
"All right," he said. "But don't make it too sweet."
Mrs. Wang prepared the bowl of plum soup and gave it to his Nibs with both hands.
His Nibs drank slowly and then put the bowl down on the table. "Excellent," he said. "Mrs. Wang you can certainly pick your plums. Do you have a good supply?"
"A good supply? With all the years I've been in business, I think I can supply any need you might have!"
"I ask you about plum soup and you answer about supplying my needs — are we at cross-purposes?"
"You asked about a supply of plums. I'm just telling you I've got plenty," she said.
"Mother Wang, I know you can move mountains. Suppose I should want you to arrange a little affair for me, a little personal affair? I should certainly know how to show my gratitude."
"And supposing, Your Honour, the lady of your house should get to hear of it, wouldn't I run the risk of getting my face slapped?"
"My wife's a kind and accommodating sort of woman. I've already got several companions at home, the trouble is not one of them exactly suits my taste. If you had the right sort of thing and could arrange it all for me, there wouldn't be any problem — even a widow would do, so long as she was to my taste."
"Well, now, something did turn up just the other day. But I'm not quite sure you'd want her."
"If she's the right thing and you can arrange it for me, I should be most grateful."
"I'd give this one ten plus, except there's a little problem with her age."
"A year or two more or less doesn't make a lot of difference. How old is she, actually?"
"Well, her birth year is the Tiger, so come the new year she'll be just ninety-three."
His Nibs burst out laughing. "Just listen to the woman, she's mad! One just can't have a serious conversation with her!" Still laughing, he got up and left.
As it was getting dark, when Mrs. Wang had just lit the lamp and was about to lock up, the door opened and in walked his Nibs again. He sat down in the same seat beside the door and fixed his gaze on the Midget's front door.
"What do you want to drink, Your Honour?" the old woman cried. "Some wedding soup?"
"All right," he replied. "But make it sweet, Mother Wang."
She prepared a bowl of soup and gave it to him.
After sitting there all evening, he rose and said: "Put it down on my account, Mother Wang, and I'll pay it all together tomorrow."
"That's all right," she said. "Just go and have a good night's rest and tomorrow I hope you'll honour me with another visit." He left with a smile on his face and nothing further occurred that night. Early next morning when Mrs. Wang opened up the teahouse and went to look outside, there was his Nibs pacing up and down in front of the door. "Well, now," she said to herself, "this fellow's properly worked up. I'm going to put something sweet in front of his nose, just where his tongue won't reach. The pig thinks he can get the better of everyone in this town but wait till I get a hold on him, he won't wriggle out of that!"
Indeed there was more to this Mrs. Wang, this teashop owner, than you might suppose. As the poem says:
She'd deceive a politician when she speaks; her words would defeat the cunningest statesman. Two lone phoenixes, male and female, she'd have them pairing on the spot; a widow and a single man, with just a word she'd get them mating. Always scheming, she'd make a Lohan embrace a mendicant nun; a little calculation, and she'd have Lord Li make love to a she-devil. With sweet words and flattery, she'd win over the most resolute of men; with soft speech and cooing tones she'd arouse the purest of girls. She could move the Weaver Maid to lustful longings or provoke the Moon Goddess to copulation.
Now as we were saying, Mrs. Wang had just opened up and got the fire going and arranged the tea things and there was his Nibs already at this early hour hanging about in front of the door. He now rushed inside and took up his customary position by the entrance, gazing at the Midget's front door. Mrs. Wang pretended not to see him and instead of going over to ask what tea he wanted, busied herself blowing up the fire.
"Mother Wang!" he called. "Bring me two bowls of tea."
"Oh, it's you, Your Honour!" she replied. "What a long time since we saw you!" She made two bowls of good strong tea and put them on the table.
"Come and drink a bowl of tea with me, Mother Wang," he said.
She cackled. "I'm not your secret lover," she said.
He smiled briefly, then said: "What do they sell next door?"
"All kinds of sweet and delicious stuff, that's what they sell, all hot and spicy it is!"
"There you are, I said you were mad!" he said, laughing.
"I'm not mad," she said. "There's only one thing in her house, and that's a husband."
"Mother Wang, let's be serious now. I've heard that they make delicious rolls there, and I'd like to order thirty or forty of them. I just wonder if there'd be anyone at home?"
"If you want to buy rolls, just wait a bit and you can buy them from him in the street on his way back. What call is there to go to the house?"
"No doubt you're right." He drank his tea, sat there a little longer and then got up to go, saying: "Put it all down, Mother Wang."
"Don't worry," she said, as he went out, "I keep good accounts."
Observing dispassionately from the teahouse Mrs. Wang saw his Nibs pass in front of the door, going first one way and then the other, looking around him this way and that. When this had occurred six or seven times, he wandered back into the teahouse.
"What a surprise, Your Honour," she said. "Haven't seen you in ages!"
Smiling sheepishly, he sat down and took out a tael of silver that he handed to her, saying: "Here's something to settle the account, Mother Wang."
"That's much more than what's needed," she said.
"Just take it," he said.
Secretly she was delighted. "That's it," she thought to herself. "Now I've got him!" She put the silver away carefully and said: "I can see you're thirsty, Your Honour. I expect you'd like some sort of fresh young brew, is that it?"
"How did you guess?"
"Easy. You know the saying, 'When you enter the room, don't ask how things are going, just look at the faces.' You've no idea what kinds of weird and wonderful things I can guess!"
"Well, I've got something in my mind, and if you can guess what it is I'll give you five taels of silver."
"Well, I don't need any clues. From the merest hint I can tell it all. Approach your ear, Your Honour. You keep dashing about, these last few days, like a cat on hot bricks, and I warrant it's all to do with a certain young person next door. Right or wrong?"
"Mother Wang, you're a witch. You'd be a match for the finest and subtlest of statesmen! I'll be honest with you. I don't know how it is but ever since that day she dropped the pole on me and I first saw her face, it's as if I'd surrendered my three souls and seven spirits. The problem is, I just can't think of any pretext to get in there. Do you think you can help me?"
The old woman set up a gleeful cackling. Then she said: "I'll be honest with you too. This teahouse of mine is a front, the kind of place they call 'The Devil strikes the hours.' Three years ago, the day it snowed in early June, I sold a cup of tea but I've hardly had a regular customer since. No, what I rely on to make my living by is 'mixed trade'."
"What do you mean by 'mixed trade'?" he asked.
"Well, to start with, matchmaking and dealing. Then there's pregnancies, I assist with those, and even deliveries. And I can help with affairs of the heart, or simply fix you up with a woman."
"If you can really arrange this business of mine, I'll give you ten taels of silver. You'll have enough to buy yourself a coffin!"
"Listen to me then," she said. "These seduction cases are generally the most difficult. In order to succeed there's five things you must possess: number one, looks like Pan An's; two, a tool as big as a donkey's; three, the wealth of Deng Tong; four, youth, together with all the patience of a needle sewing silk; five, plenty of leisure. If you've got all five of those — call them for short Pan, donkey, Deng, youth and leisure — then you've a hope of succeeding."
His Nibs answered confidently: "I can honestly say that I'm pretty well equipped with all five. For the first one, I may not be Pan An but I'm not bad-looking; for the second, even as a child I had a bloody big prick; for the third, I've no shortage of ready cash, and even if I'm not quite the equal of Deng Tong, there's certainly enough to go on with; for the fourth, I can put up with anything — if she were to hit me a hundred times I wouldn't retaliate; for the fifth, I've more than enough time, as you can see with your own eyes from the fact that I'm round here so often. So Mother Wang, please help me. If you can set it up, you can be sure I shall reward you handsomely."
"Even if you've got the five basic requirements, Your Honour, there's still one big obstacle that's hard to overcome."
"What is it? Tell me quickly!"
"All right but don't blame me for being frank. Generally the tough part in a seduction is this: if you're serious, you've got to be prepared to part with your money or you won't get anywhere. Now as far as I know you've a tendency to be tight-fisted, you don't like throwing money around. That's the problem."
"That's easy to remedy. I shall simply follow your instruc-tions."
"Well, if you're prepared to spend, I've got a plan which will secure you a tête-à-tête with the young person in question. But are you really willing to do as I say?"
"I'll do anything you tell me to, no matter what. What's your plan?"
"It's a bit late now. You'd better go home first. You come back in a few months' time and we'll talk it over then."
His Nibs went down on his knees. "Mother Wang stop fooling and just help me," he implored.
"My, you are in a hurry!" she said, laughing. "My plan's a brilliant one. It may not be exactly something you'd put in the temple of Prince Wucheng but it's worthy of Sun-zi and his Amazons. It's ninety-nine percent sure. Now, listen, here's your instructions. This girl was once a servant in a rich man's house in Qinghe and she's a very good hand at sewing. So you're going to go and buy a piece of white silk, a length of blue silk, a piece of white gauze and ten ounces of good silk floss and have them delivered to me here. I will go and see her and invite her to take tea, and then I'll say to her, 'There's this rich official, he's given me the materials for a set of burial clothes, I wanted to borrow a calendar from you and ask you to choose an auspicious day for me to invite a tailor here to make the clothes up.' Now, if she hears me out and says nothing, then we'll have to forget your affair. But if she says, 'I'll do it for you,' and won't let me call a tailor, well, that's the first step towards your objective.
"Next thing, I shall invite her to come to my house to sew. If she refuses and says, 'No, we'll go to my house,' we may as well give up. But if she's tickled pink and says, 'I'll come and cut them for you and sew them,' then that's the second step completed.
"If she comes to my house, I shall arrange some wine and things to eat. But mind you don't come here, not the first day. The second day, if she says it's not right and she wants to work in her own house, then the whole thing's no good. But if she comes to my house again, that's the third step. Only again, you must keep away.
"On the third day, round about noon, you appear, all dressed up to kill. You give a cough, first, to warn me. Then you call out, 'Mrs. Wang, why haven't I seen you around lately?' I'll come out and invite you in, see. Now, if when she sees you enter she jumps up and rushes off home, there's nothing we can do to stop her. In that case, it's all over. But if she doesn't move, then that's the fourth step.
"After we've sat down, I shall say, 'This is the generous provider of the material. Oh, how grateful I am to him!' I shall praise you in all sorts of ways and you must admire her needlework. If she's not moved to reply, then we're not going to get anywhere. But if she's drawn into a conversation, then that's the fifth step.

"Then I say, 'I just don't know how I'd manage if I didn't have this young lady to help me with the work. Really, I'm so grateful to both of you. One's so generous with his money, the other with her labour. I don't want to sound like a beggar, Your Honour but since she's taking so much trouble, don't you think you should treat us? I mean, cough up the necessary for a little refreshment?' Then you fork out some money and tell me to go and buy things. If she gets up and leaves, we can't stop her, we have to give up. But if she stays put, things are looking good, we've accomplished the sixth step.
"I take the money, and as I go out I say to her, 'Do you mind keeping the gentleman company for a few minutes?' If she then gets up and goes home, I can't do anything, it's all over. But if she stays, that's great, that's the seventh step.
"When I come back with the food, I'll lay it on the table and say, 'Put away your work, dear, and come and have a cup of this wine that the gentleman has so kindly provided.' If she refuses to sit down at the table with you and goes home, forget it. But if she only says she ought to go, and actually doesn't move, then everything's all right, we've got through the eighth step.
"When we're well into the wine and the conversation is warming up, I'll say there's no wine left and ask you if you'll pay for more. You send me off for more wine. As I go out I bolt the door, with you two inside. If she's upset and tries to run away, then you must give the business up. But if she hears me bolt the door and doesn't protest, then that's the ninth step and we're only one step away from success. But this last step may prove the most difficult!
"Now, you're alone with her in the room and you've got to start off with some very sweet words. On no account must you be violent or hasty. You've got to control your hands and feet. If you're rough with her in any way, I won't answer for the consequences. First you pretend to brush the table accidentally with your sleeves so that a pair of bracelets fall out. As you bend down to pick them up, touch her feet gently. If she starts to scream, I shall come to the rescue straight away. Don't try to push the matter any further, you won't get anywhere. But if she keeps quiet, you know the tenth step is over, she's all for it, your success is assured.
"Well, how do you like my plan?"
"I don't know if it would get your portrait hung in the Emperor's hall but it's brilliant," his Nibs cried ecstatically.
"Don't forget to give me the money," the old woman said.
"No one forgets Lake Dongting after tasting its wares," he replied. "When can the plan go into operation?"
"I'll answer that this evening," she said. "I'll take the opportunity while the Midget is still out to go and show her the bait. Meanwhile, you'd better get someone to bring me the material."
"Right you are," he said. "If you can bring this thing off, Mother Wang, I assure you I shall not forget my promise." After leaving Mrs. Wang he went straight to a haberdasher's in the market where he bought all the necessary goods. Arriving home, he told a servant to pack them carefully and take them round to the teahouse, together with five taels of loose change. Mrs. Wang received all this and sent the servant away.

How can lechery's course be stayed?
The trap is set, the ambush laid.
When the ten-step seduction scheme's applied,
Into the pit she'll blindly slide.

Mrs. Wang now popped out of her back door and went over to the Midget's. Jinlian welcomed her and invited her upstairs to sit down. "Why haven't you been round to see me?" the old woman asked.
"I haven't been feeling very well lately," the girl answered. "I just didn't have the energy."
"Do you by any chance have a calendar you could lend me? I want to find an auspicious day to ask a tailor to come in."
"What clothes are you making, Mother?"
"Well, the fact is at my age there's always something wrong with one, and I've this feeling there may be serious health problems ahead for me. That's why I've been wanting to have some burial clothes made up, so as to be prepared, you know. I was lucky because a rich man I know heard me say this and he provided me with the materials — some fine silk and gauze and plenty of good floss for padding. It's all been sitting around for over a year because I can't manage to do it myself. But I really feel my health is going downhill this year and as we've got two extra days this month I thought I'd take the opportunity to have it done. Only now the tailor's trying to blackmail me, he says he hasn't got time. All this trouble, it's just what I don't need!"
"Well, I don't know if I could do it as well as you want," she said, "but if you'd let me, I'd do the sewing for you."
The old woman's face lit up. "If you'd do it for me," she said, "I know I'd die happy! I've always heard how beautifully you sew, only I just didn't like to ask you myself."
"Then there's no problem. If you agree, I'll be happy to do the work for you. As soon as you've got someone to name an auspicious day, I'll start at once."
"If you're going to do it, that's sure to bring me luck anyway. We needn't worry about the day. Actually I got hold of someone the other day and he said tomorrow is a lucky day for me. I wasn't paying a lot of attention, because I didn't really think it mattered all that much, just for making up some clothes."
"Of course you should have a lucky day for making up burial clothes! What's the point of choosing any other day?"
"If you're going to be kind enough to do it for me, do you think you could start tomorrow? I'd like to invite you to my house."
"You don't have to do that. Why don't I do it here?"
"I'd like to be able to watch you. I can't leave the house because there's no one to look after things there."
"In that case I'll come round after breakfast tomorrow."
With many expressions of gratitude the old woman left. When his Nibs returned that evening, she told him everything had been arranged to start the next day. Nothing else happened that night.
First thing in the morning, Mrs. Wang cleaned and tidied her house. She brought the thread, prepared the water for tea and sat down to wait.
As soon as the Midget had had breakfast, sorted out his wares and taken himself off to start trading, Jinlian hung up the curtain and went round to Mrs. Wang's, leaving by the back door. The old woman greeted her effusively and took her into the sitting-room. She made her a good cup of tea and offered her pine-seeds and walnuts. Then she carefully wiped the table and brought out the material. Jinlian measured and cut it, and started sewing. The old woman was lavish with her praises. "My, what wonderful work! I've lived over sixty years but never have I seen such fine needlework!"
Jinlian went on sewing till midday, when the old woman produced some wine and a catty of noodles and invited her to eat. She continued afterwards until it began to get late, when she tidied up her work and went home. She was just in time to open the door to the Midget, returning with an empty load, and to lower the blind. Noticing that his wife was a little flushed, the Midget asked: "Have you been drinking?"
"It's the neighbour, Mrs. Wang," she explained. "She asked me to go over to make some burial clothes for her, and she invited me to lunch."
The Midget was a little shocked. "Aiya! You shouldn't be eating her food, we ought to invite her. If she asks you to go over and do some work for her you should come back here to eat, you shouldn't go bothering her. If you go there again tomorrow, take some money with you; you can buy the wine and food to return the courtesy. 'A close neighbour's more useful than a distant relative' as the saying is. You don't want to make yourself unpopular. If she won't let you pay, better bring the work back home and give it to her when you've finished." Jinlian said nothing. As the poem says:

Her schemes are deep, layer upon layer;
What lies beneath, the poor man doesn't see.
Forking out money to benefit your betrayer!
That's just giving your life away for free!

Well, the plan was working, she'd lured the girl to her home! Next morning after breakfast when the Midget had left, Mrs. Wang went round and invited Jinlian back. Arriving at Mrs. Wang's, Jinlian got out her work and started sewing. Mrs. Wang made some tea for them. The morning passed uneventfully.
At midday the girl took out some silver and gave it to the old woman, saying: "Here you are, Mrs. Wang, this is to buy wine and food."
Mrs. Wang protested: "Aiya! Why should you give me this? I asked you here to do the work for me, how can I possibly let you spend your money as well?"
"It's my husband's orders. He said if you don't agree I must do the work at home and give it to you when I've finished."
Mrs. Wang quickly said: "What a stickler your husband is! Well, if you say so, this time I'll have to accept." Apprehensive for her plan, the old woman added some money of her own and went out and bought some particularly good wine and food, and some rare fruits, in order to entertain Jinlian royally. No doubt you've heard, friends, that women are like this: these small attentions, if they're thorough enough, will always get a response, nine out of ten will fall into the trap. Anyway, Mrs. Wang arranged the things on the table and invited Jinlian to eat and drink. Afterwards the sewing continued, and in the evening, after many protestations of mutual gratitude, the girl went home.
Well, to speed things up, on the third day after breakfast Mrs. Wang waited till she had seen the Midget leave and then went to his back door and called out: "Excuse me, my dear ..."
Jinlian ran downstairs. "I was just coming," she said. The two of them went back to Mrs. Wang's. Jinlian sat down, got out the work and started sewing. Mrs. Wang made some tea that they drank.
It was nearly noon. At this point his Nibs, who had scarcely been able to contain himself till this day dawned, put on new headgear and his smartest clothes and with a good supply of loose change in his pocket betook himself to Redstone Road. Arriving at the teahouse door, he coughed and called out: "Mrs. Wang, are you all right? I haven't see you lately."
Mrs. Wang heard the signal and said: "Who is it?"
"It's me," he answered.
She got up and hurried to the door. She smiled when she saw him: "Well, so it's you, Your Honour! I was wondering who it could be. You're just at the right time, I want you to come in and take a look." She caught him by the sleeve and pulled him into the room. "Look who it is," she said to Jinlian. "It's my benefactor! You know, the one who gave me the materials."
His Nibs greeted the girl ceremoniously. She quickly stood up and returned the courtesy.
"You know all that cloth you were so kind as to give me?" the old woman said to his Nibs. "I've had it a year and haven't managed to get it made up yet. But now this young lady has most generously offered to do it for me. Her stitching is a miracle, like tapestry it's so close and even, truly it's a wonder to behold! Come and look."
His Nibs went and looked. Then he sipped his tea and said: "The young lady's work is miraculous, you'd think it the work of a fairy's hand!"
Jinlian smiled and said: "Don't make fun of me, Your Honour!"
"Dare I ask whose house the young lady is mistress of?" he asked Mrs. Wang.
"Why don't you try and guess?" she said.
"I just can't," he replied.
Mrs. Wang laughed happily. "Well, she's the wife of my neighbour, Mr. Wu," she said. "Don't you remember? The other day she dropped the pole on your head — without hurting you of course."
Jinlian blushed scarlet. "It just slipped out of my hands, it was an accident. Please forgive me."
"It was nothing at all," he said.
Mrs. Wang carefully added: "This gentleman never gets angry, he never bears anyone a grudge. He's the kindest of souls."
"I didn't know who you were then," his Nibs said. "I had no idea you were Mr. Wu's wife. I know Mr. Wu as a man who works honourably for his living. I believe he sells something in the street. One who goes simply about his business, giving offence to no man, and who has a good character. Such men are hard to find."
The old woman seconded this: "You're absolutely right. Ever since she was married this young lady has been kept busy all the time observing all his instructions."
"My husband is a feeble useless person, don't laugh at me, please," Jinlian said.
"You're quite wrong," his Nibs said. "Don't you know the proverb, 'He who gives way will live in peace, he who is stubborn will court disaster'? One can say of people like your husband, who always show restraint, that they 'make the most of every drop of water, even in times of flood'."
"That's so true," said Mrs. Wang approvingly.
His Nibs continued to sing the Midget's praises for a moment, and then sat down opposite the girl.
"Do you know what they say about His Honour?" the old woman asked her.
"No," she said.
"He's one of the richest men in the district, you know. He's a friend of the Governor. People call him 'Your Honour,' just like an official. He's got millions. He runs a little medicine shop opposite the Magistracy. Yes, he's got more money than there are stars in the Milky Way! There's more rice in his storeroom than he'd use in a month of Sundays! Gold, silver, pearls, jewels, you name it, he's got it. And other treasures too, rhinoceros horns, elephant tusks ...!" On and on she went, lauding his Nibs to the skies, with her deceitful intent. Jinlian only kept her eyes on her sewing. His Nibs studied the girl avidly, impatient to be alone with her.
Mrs. Wang went and fetched two bowls of tea, handing one to his Nibs and the other to the girl, saying: "Drink this dear, and keep His Honour company."
After they'd drunk the tea the girl seemed, by the faintest quivering of her eyebrows, to betray some feeling. When Mrs. Wang saw this, she gave his Nibs a purposeful look and touched her face. He understood this signal as meaning that he was half-way there.
"If Your Honour hadn't come," the old woman said to him, "I wouldn't have had the courage to go to your house and invite you. So it must be fate, especially since you came just at the right time. But as the proverb says, 'A guest shouldn't ask two hosts for favours at the same time.' Now, since you've contributed the money and the young lady's giving me her skill, well, I was wondering, not wanting of course to seem presumptuous but seeing as the young lady here is so good to me, I was just wondering if I could ask you to play the host? What I mean is, do you think you might offer her a little extra something on my behalf?"
"I'm so sorry I didn't think of it before. Here's some money," he said, taking out his purse and giving it to the old woman for her to buy more food and wine.
"Please don't trouble yourself," Jinlian said. But she did not move. Mrs. Wang took the money and started to leave. Still Jinlian did not stir. As the old woman went out of the door, she said: "May I ask you to sit with Mr. Xi-men, dear?"
"Please, no," the girl said. But she still did not move. Maybe it was fate. But they were both now aware of what was going on. His Nibs, the bastard, was devouring her with his eyes! And she in turn was giving him little covert glances. Most likely in the presence of such a personage she was already more than half won over. However, she lowered her eyes and continued her work.
Mrs. Wang was soon back with some cooked food — plump goose, roast meat, choice fruits — which she put onto dishes and brought upstairs and laid on the table. Then she looked at Jinlian and said: "Put your work away dear, and come and take some wine and food."
"You go ahead, Mrs. Wang. You can serve Mr. Xi-men. It's not for me to do so." But she still made no attempt to leave.
"But this is specially for you," Mrs. Wang said. "You can't refuse!" She arranged the dishes on the table carefully and all three of them sat down. The wine was poured. His Nibs took a cup and said to Jinlian: "Madam, please do me the honour of emptying this cup."
"You are too kind, sir," said the girl.
"I know you can drink wine," Mrs. Wang said to her. "So please drink up and enjoy yourself." There's a poem that says:

Eating together, dangerous habit.
What can follow but lechery and sin?
She didn't remember the Captain's warning:
The dog's at the fence, about to get in.

Jinlian took the wine and his Nibs picked up his chopsticks and said: "Mother Wang, please ask the young lady to try some of these dishes."
Mrs. Wang chose some of the best pieces and put them on Jinlian's plate. After three rounds of wine, Mrs. Wang went and warmed more.
"May I make so bold as to inquire how old you are, madam?" his Nibs asked Jinlian.
"I am twenty-three sir," she said.
"Then I am just five years older than you," he said.
"The comparison is unworthy," she said.
Mrs. Wang butted in: "Such an accomplished young lady she is, sir. Not only is she a beautiful seamstress but she also knows the hundred philosophers."
"Where could you find her equal?" he said. "Truly Mr. Wu is a lucky man!"
"I don't want to sound critical," the old woman said, "but for all the women in your household, I'll wager you haven't one to equal her."
"Well, that's a long story," he said. "But it's true I have not been blessed. I have never found a good one!"
"Surely your first wife must have been good?" Mrs. Wang said.
"Ah, don't talk of her! If she was still alive, then my house would not be in the mess it's in now. The three or four concubines I have seem to do nothing well except eat, they can't organize a thing."
"How long is it since you lost your first wife sir?" Jinlian asked.
"Oh, that's a sad story," he replied. "My first wife was a wonderful and clever woman, though she came from a very humble background. She managed everything for me. It's three years since I was unlucky enough to lose her, and my household's going to the dogs. Why do you think I go out so much? I can't stand being at home."
"Forgive me for saying this, Your Honour," said the old woman, "but your first wife couldn't match Mrs. Wu for needlework."

"Nor for beauty, I have to admit it."
The old woman laughed. "But you keep a mistress in East Street, don't you? Why haven't you invited me to go and take tea with her?"
"You mean Xixi Zhang, the singer? She's just a common soubrette. I think nothing of her!"
"Haven't you also been with Jojo Li for a long time?"
"Yes, she's living with me now. If she were cleverer at running the household I'd have made her my wife long ago."
"If you did find someone like this young lady, I mean someone who really suited your taste, would there be any problems?"
"Who would object? My parents are both dead, I'm my own master!"
"I'm only joking. I don't suppose there's anyone who would satisfy you."
"Why shouldn't there be? It's just that I never have any luck in these matters. I just haven't met the right one."
These exchanges continued for a while and then the old woman exclaimed: "We've finished all the wine, there isn't any left! What do you say, Your Honour, shall I go and get some more?"
His Nibs said: "I think I've got four or five taels in my purse. Here, take the lot. Spend whatever you like on drink and keep the rest."
She thanked him and stood up. First she cast her eye over the young woman, noting how she had grown quite excited with all the wine she had drunk. The two were now totally absorbed in one another and it looked as if they would not be long in coming to an understanding. The girl kept her head lowered and gave no sign of wanting to leave.
"I'm going to get more wine and then we can continue," the old woman said, grinning happily. "You stay here, my dear, and look after His Honour. Let's just see if there's any more wine left in the pot. Yes, just enough for another two cups for you and His Honour to drink. I'm off to the shop in front of the government offices. They've good wine there. I'll go and get a bottle. It may take me a little while though."
"You don't need to," the girl said but she made no move.
The old woman went out. She tied a string across the door and then went to sit in the street.
Within the house, meanwhile, his Nibs was pouring wine and inviting the lady to drink. Soon his sleeve brushed across the table and the two trinkets rolled out and fell on the floor. Whether by destiny or lucky chance, they came to rest right beside the girl's feet. His Nibs immediately went down on his hands and knees to pick them up. What should he see but those sweet tiny feet, gracefully poised beside the trinkets! Instead of picking up what he had dropped, he gently pinched the tiny brocade shoe. The girl began to giggle. "Heavens, sir, what are you doing?" she said. "Surely you don't mean to seduce me?" On his knees before her, he said: "Madam, have pity on me, I beg you!" She took him in her arms and raised him up. And then, right there in Mrs. Wang's parlour, they both removed their clothes and went to it with a will:
Ducks in their pairs bill and coo in the water; the phoenixes stroll through the flowers. The trees that interlace their branches are filled with the joy of life; hearts that are at one are joined in sweet concord. Vermilion lips are closely pressed, face lies by powdered face. Gauze stockings are thrown in the air; a slip of crescent moon is glimpsed over his shoulders. Gold hairpins fall to the floor, beside the pillow a cloud of raven tresses floats. A sea of vows, a mountain of promises, provoke a thousand flutterings. A bashful cloud and shameful rain are imminent, as a million secret charms are crushed together in the hand. The quiet oriole's call carries no further than the adjacent ear; in the moist mouth the tongue half advances, half retreats. The willowy waist welcomes spring's bounty; the cherry lips whisperingly exhale. The starry eyes cloud over, a fine dew perfumes the jade kernel. The soft breast ripples, a bubbling spring waters the heart of the peony. Such bliss in union is the end of all things; such stolen moments are indeed the sweetest of delights.
The climax over, they were just arranging their clothes when Mrs. Wang pushed open the door and marched in. "Well!" she exclaimed, with feigned indignation, "You two certainly don't waste any time!"
The pair looked thoroughly startled.
"Here's a fine thing," the old woman went on, "I asked you here to do some sewing for me, not to have it off with a man! If Mr. Wu finds out, what's he going to think of me? Maybe I'd better go and tell him before he does." She turned round and started to leave. But the girl caught hold of her sleeve and said: "Mrs. Wang, please forgive us." And his Nibs said: "Mother Wang, please lower your voice."
The old woman grinned. "If you want me to let you off," she said, "you've to promise me one thing."
"Not just one," the girl said, "ten if you wish."
"Starting from today, you are to keep everything hidden from the Midget and come here everyday without fail to see His Honour, Mr. Xi-men. If you miss a single day I shall tell the Midget."
"I'll do exactly as you say," the girl said.
"As for you," the old woman said, turning to his Nibs, "there's no need for me to tell you. This business is successfully concluded, so don't forget what you promised. If you go back on anything, I shall tell all to the Midget."
"Don't worry, Mother Wang. I shall keep my promise."
Then they all drank more wine. But it was afternoon already, and soon Jinlian stood up and said: "My idiot of a husband will be coming home, I'd better go."
She slipped into her house through the back door and was just lowering the curtain when the Midget came in.
Meanwhile Mrs. Wang looked at His Nibs and said: "Nice work, eh?"
"I owe it all to you," he said. "I'll go home now and send you a silver ingot. And of course I won't forget everything else I promised you."
"All right then, I shall, as they say, 'watch for the banners and await good news.' But I hope I won't be like the paid mourners, trying to collect their money too late, after the coffin's in the ground!"
His Nibs was laughing as he went out of the door.
From that day on Jinlian went everyday to Mrs. Wang's for her rendezvous with his Nibs. They stuck together close as lacquer, clasped each other tight as rubber. But as the saying has it, 'Good things remain secret, evil will always out.' In less than a fortnight the whole neighbourhood knew about it and only the Midget remained in the dark. As the poem says:

What's the good of all those charms?
Their taste is greatly overrated.
When she fills the house with rude alarms
He'll rue the day she was instated.

Here we must digress because our story divides in two. There happened to be in that place a young man of fifteen or sixteen by the name of Qiao. His father was a soldier serving in Yunzhou when he was born, and the boy was generally referred to as the Young'un. He lived at home with his old father. He was a lively, quick-witted lad and he was generally to be seen around the local inns selling whatever fruit was in season. Xi-men Qing had often helped him out with funds. Well, on this occasion he had just got hold of a basket of crystal pears that he was toting about the streets in search of Mr. Xi-men, when some busybody said to him: "If it's his Nibs you're wanting, I can tell you where to look."
"All right, Mr. Know-all, tell me where, 'cos I need to earn a spot of cash for the sake of my old pa."
"His Nibs is having it off with the wife of the Midget, the one that sells bread. Everyday he's round at old Mother Wang's in Redstone Road. You'll most likely find him there now. Just go right in, it won't matter since you're only a kid."
The Young'un thanked the man for the information. Next thing, the young monkey picked up his basket and headed straight for Redstone Road. He barged into the teahouse where he found Mrs. Wang sitting on a stool, sewing.
"Greetings, Mother Wang," he said, putting down his basket and looking straight at her.
"What have you come for, Young'un?" she asked.
"I want to see His Honour, 'cos I need a spot of cash to buy food for my old pa."
"His Honour? Who do you mean?"
"I mean the one you know I mean, who else would I mean?"
"If he's that important he has a name, I suppose!"
"Course 'e does, a double-barrelled one too."
"What do you mean, double-barrelled?"
"Oh, come off it! I want to talk to 'is Nibs, Mr. Xi-men." And with this he headed for the inner room. But Mrs. Wang grabbed him first. "Hey! where do you think you're going to, you young jackanapes? You can't just invade people's privacy like this!"
"I'm going inside, 'cos he's there and I want to see him."
"You bloody little ape, how do you expect to find Mr. Xi-men in my parlour?"
"Don't be such a dog-in-the-manger! Why can't I have some of the gravy too? D'you think I don't know what's going on?"
The old woman was furious. She began to shout: "What do you bloody well know, then, you little bastard?"
"I know you want to keep it all to yourself because you're an old meany. All right then, suppose I talk. Let's see how the bread-man takes it!"
This indication that he had cottoned on to the truth made the old woman see red. "You bloody ape!" she screamed. "Who asked you to come farting round here, stinking the place out?"
"If I'm a bloody ape, you're a filthy old tart!" he replied.
She took a firmer grip on him and boxed his ears.
"Ow! Why are you hitting me?" he yelled.
"Shut your noise, you fucking monkey, or I'll beat you all down the street!"
"You ugly old bloodsucker, yer've no right!" Maintaining her grip with one hand and slapping him with the other, she pushed him out into the street. The basket of pears followed, the pears spilling and rolling in all directions. Recognizing he was no match for this ferocious old woman, the boy took himself off, cursing and crying simultaneously, picking up pears as he went down the street and pointing his finger at the teahouse and shouting: "You filthy parasite, you'll be sorry for this! I'll tell him, I'll tell him everything, just see if I don't!" And when he'd picked up his basket, he went straight off to find the person he had in mind. Well, in truth, once an affair's under way, the troubles come all in a bunch:

The den is discovered, the burrow found,
The paired ducks taken where they sleep on the sand.

Wu Song turned round, and when he saw that the man who was speaking to him, was his elder brother Wu the Elder, he knelt down and kowtowed. He said, "I have not seen you for more than a year. But why have you come here?"
"You have been away for a long time," replied Wu the Elder, "but why have you not written to me? Although I did not like you yet I never forgot you."
"Why were you annoyed, and why did you think of me so often?" asked Wu Song. "When you were in Qinghe County you often got drunk and fought with other men," said Wu the Elder. "You were often brought before the magistrate. And when at last you ran away, I had to go to the court repeatedly about your affairs. That was what made me annoyed. And what made me to think of you was that I recently married a Qinghe County woman, and many men came to insult me about that matter, and there was no one like you to assist me. When you were at home who would have dared to come and so much as fart? I could not live in peace there so I removed here, and found a house where I now live. That trouble made me to think of you."
Now dear reader, please note: Wu Song and Wu the Elder were brothers to the same mother. Wu Song was over six feet in height, and he could lift about three hundredweights. If he had not been so strong how could he have killed the tiger?
Wu the Elder was nearly four and half feet in height, and his countenance was ugly. The shape of his head was conical. The people of Qinghe County looked upon him as a dwarf, and had therefore given him the nickname "Three Inches of Mulberry Bark."
Now in Qinghe County there was a big family which had a maidservant named Pan Jinlian who was about twenty years of age, and was quite good-looking. Her master made base suggestions but she told her mistress about it and said that she was not willing to agree to his advances. Because of this the master disliked the maidservant but offered her in marriage to Wu the Elder, and also gave her some presents but he declined to receive any money from Wu the Elder.
Shortly after the marriage there were quite a number of loose profligates who came to Wu the Elder's house to visit his wife. In fact as Wu the Elder was only a small, ugly man his wife looked upon him as being of useless nature, and quite unsuitable as a lover. She did not hesitate to consort with other men.
Wu the Elder was rather a quiet fellow and would not dispute with what these loose fellows did; they shouted out at his street door, "What a nice piece of meat has fallen in a dog's mouth!" As a result of this Wu the Elder did not care to stay in Qinghe County, and removed to a house in Zishi Street, Yanggu County town.
Everyday he acted as hawker selling cakes on the street. On this day he had been selling cakes when he happened to see his brother Wu Song.
"The day before yesterday," said Wu the Elder, "I heard a great many people talking about a man named Wu who had killed a tiger on Jingyang Ridge, and who had been given a commission as Inspector by the county magistrate. I guessed that it was you but how could I expect to meet you today? I will not sell any more cakes just now, and will go with you to my home." "Elder brother, where is your home?" asked Wu Song.
"It is near the Zishi Street," replied Wu the Elder pointing with his finger.
Wu Song carried the load of cakes, and Wu the Elder led him round many corners to his home. He stopped at a house near a tea shop, and called out, "Wife, open the door."
The screen at the door was lifted and a woman appeared who asked, "Husband, why have you returned so soon?"
"Your brother-in-law has arrived," replied Wu the Elder, "please come out to meet him."
Wu the Elder now took the load from Wu Song, and entering the house said, "Brother, come inside and let me introduce you to my wife."
Wu Song lifted up the screen and entered, and was duly introduced.
Wu the Elder said, "Wife, the man, who killed the tiger on Jingyang Ridge, and was given a commission as Inspector in the police, is none other than my younger brother."
She at once saluted by folding her arms and said, "Much prosperity, uncle," addressing Wu Song with the level of reverence that her son would have done.
Wu Song asked her to be seated. He kowtowed, and it was as magnanimous as the fall of a golden mountain and a jade pillar.
The woman raised up Wu Song and said, "Uncle, by doing this you lessen the prospects of my life."
"I only ask you to receive my respects," replied Wu Song.
"My adopted mother, Grandma Wang, told me that a big man had killed a tiger and that I must go and see him," replied the woman. "And you are that man. I request you to come upstairs and sit down."
They all three sat down upstairs, and when the woman had had a look at Wu Song, she said to her husband, "I will keep company with your brother, while you go and prepare some food and wine in order to entertain our uncle."
Wu the Elder agreed to this and promised to return soon.
When he had gone, his wife looked more closely at Wu Song, and was pleased with his appearance. She thought that if she had married a man like him, all her life would not have been wasted. Her husband was only three parts a man, and seven parts an imp. What bad luck she had had. As Wu Song had killed a tiger he must be enormously strong. "I think he has no wife, so why should I not ask him to stay here? I think that I shall now find my marriage affinity here after all."
With her smiling face she asked Wu Song how long he had been in that district, to which Wu Song replied that he had been there about ten days.
"Where do you stay then?" asked the woman.
"I am staying temporarily at the yamen," replied Wu Song.
"That cannot be very comfortable and convenient," remarked the woman.
"As I am by myself that does not matter," replied Wu Song. "Besides I have soldiers to wait upon me."
"But how can those men look after you properly," said the woman. "Why not come and live here? When you want hot water or food, whether early or late, I can always get the same ready for you, and that would be much better than depending on those dirty men. When you want clear soup you need have no worry about it."
Wu Song thanked her very much for her suggestion.
"But have you an aunt (a wife) living in some other place?" asked the woman. "If so then ask her to come here to live with us."
"I have not married yet," replied Wu Song.
"How old are you?"
"I am twenty-five years of age," replied Wu Song.
"So you are three years older than I. Where have you come from this time?"

"I lived at Cangzhou for more than a year," replied Wu Song, "and then decided to come to visit my elder brother at Qinghe County. I did not know that he had removed here."
"To explain that removal it would take a long time. Since I married your elder brother so many men have insulted him owing to good nature that we could not live any longer at Qinghe County, and therefore we removed to this place. If such a brave man as you had been there who would have dared to say a word against us."
"My brother was always law-abiding and good-natured, and was quite different, from me as I always make disturbances," said Wu Song.
"Why do you make such a false accusation againt yourself?" asked Pan Jinlian. "There is a common saying, 'Men of yielding nature cannot have a stable foothold in society.' I am of a precipitous nature, and cannot bear to see a man who does not even turn his head after being abused three times, and who runs away at the fourth attack."
"My brother does not like to provoke unpleasantness so that there is no need for you to be distressed," said Wu Song.
While they were still talking about him, Wu the Elder returned with the meat, wine, and fruit, and placed them in the kitchen below. He then came upstairs and said, "Wife, you go downstairs and get things ready."
"You see that fellow does not understand things. Here is my uncle and I am told to leave him alone and go to the kitchen," said Pan Jinlian.
"Please suit your own convenience, my sister-in-law," said Wu Song.
"But why not ask my adopted mother Grandma Wang, who lives next door, to do this?" asked Pan Jinlian. "If I have to do the work that will not be very nice."
So Wu the Elder went to the next door, and requested Grandma Wang to come and prepare the food for them—fish, meat, fruit, and vegetables. He also warmed some wine, and put it on the table. All three sat down—Pan Jinlian sat opposite to Wu Song, in a hostess position, and Wu the Elder, at the side. Wu the Elder poured out the wine for all the party.
"Uncle," said Pan Jinlian, picking up a cup of wine, "I hope you won't mind our rough ways. Please drink a cup of wine."
"I am deeply grateful," replied Wu Song, "you need not talk in that manner."
Wu the Elder did not appear to take notice of anything except serving the wine.
"Uncle, why don't you eat a little fish or meat?" asked Jinlian with a smiling face. So saying she selected some of the best bits and placed them in his bowl.
Wu Song was a very straightforward man, and looked upon this great compliment as merely the expression of a real sister-in-law's desire to please. But he did not know previously that Pan Jinlian had been a maidservant, and had acquired the habit of coquetry. As Wu the Elder was an honest and weak-natured man how could he know to entertain a guest?
Jinlian drank several cups of wine, and gazed steadily at Wu Song but he appeared to take no notice of this and simply bowed his head. After he had drunk about ten cups of wine he rose from the table.
"Brother, please drink another cup of wine before you go," said Wu the Elder.
"Not this time," said Wu Song. "I will come to visit you again."
When they were all down below seeing Wu Song off Jinlian spoke to him, "Uncle, I hope that you will not forget to come and live with us here, or else the people will laugh at us. We are relatives, and not strangers." She then addressed her husband, "You had better prepare a room, and ask your brother to come to live here. Do not give our neighbours the opportunity of saying that we do not know how to do things properly."
"What you say is quite right," said Wu the Elder. Turning to his brother he said, "Brother, you must come and live here, and let me be proud of it."
"As you both press me," said Wu Song, "I will get my baggage and come over here this evening."
"Then don't forget to do so," said Jinlian, "because I shall look forward upon you."
Wu Song left them, went down the Zishi Street, and was soon at his quarters. The county magistrate was sitting on the bench, so Wu Song went to him and said, "I have a brother here who lives on Zishi Street, and I should like to go and live with him. I assure you that this would not interfere with my duties here. I would not dare to do it without your authority so I now ask for your esteemed permission."
"That is a matter of brotherly duty," said the county magistrate, "and I cannot place any obstacle in your way. You will of course attend to your duties in the yamen as before."
Wu Song expressed his thanks, and then going to his room packed up his things, including the new clothes and other things which had been presented to him. He then summoned a soldier to carry his baggage to his elder brother's home.
Upon seeing him arrive Pan Jinlian laughed and was as delighted as though she had received a great deal of gold at midnight.
Wu the Elder got a carpenter to fix up a room for his brother, and furnished it with a bed, a table, two chairs, and a stove.
When every thing was ready Wu Song brought his baggage upstairs, and then dismissed the soldier.
Early the next morning Jinlian quickly arose, and got ready the hot water for washing the face and cleaning the teeth; she gave it to Wu Song and called him. He dressed and tied his turban to his head. As he was leaving Jinlian spoke to him, "Uncle, I hope you will come back early for your meal, and not go anywhere else."
He promised to do this, and then went to the yamen to register his attendance there before 7 A.M. He attended to his duties at the yamen, and then left about noon to return home.
Pan Jinlian had had a wash, and manicured her nails. She was very spick-and-span. She had prepared the food, and arranged the table for three persons. They all sat down, and she presented Wu Song with a cup of tea.
Wu Song said, "Please do not be so courteous to me or I am afraid that it will only upset me. I shall then have to send a soldier here to look after me."
Jinlian called out several times, "Uncle, you must make yourself at home. We are brothers of the same parents and I am not treating other people in this way. If you brought a soldier here to cook your food it would not be clean, and that would not suit me."
"In that case I must submit to your kind attentions," replied Wu Song.
Shortly after coming to the house Wu Song gave Wu the Elder some money to purchase cakes, fried crisp, tea, and fruit, and asked him to invite the neighbours to attend an entertainment. They all came with gifts for Wu Song, and Wu the Elder afterwards gave another dinner.
After a few days Wu Song bought a roll of silk, and asked Jinlian to make herself a suit of clothes. Jinlian laughed and said, "Uncle, as you present me with this silk I dare not refuse it."
Thenceforth Wu Song stayed at the house of his brother, and Wu the Elder continued selling cakes on the street while Wu Song attended to his duty at the yamen and as usual Jinlian prepared the food, and was evidently much pleased to wait upon Wu Song, who could not help being very grateful. The woman in everything she said never failed to try to stir up Wu Song's feelings towards herself. Being a very virtuous man he did not pay much attention to that.
After staying about a month with Wu the Elder he noticed that it was winter-time. Everyday there was a bitter cold wind, and the sky was covered with clouds. One day there was a heavy downfall of snow, and it continued to fall all the day without stopping.
The following day Wu Song got up early, and went to the yamen to register his attendance, and he did not return from his duties about noon. Meanwhile Wu the Elder had been sent off by his wife to hawk the cakes on streets.
Pan Jinlian went to her neighbour Grandma Wang, and asked her to go and buy some wine and meat for her. She then went into Wu Song's room, and lit a charcoal fire. She thought that this was a fine opportunity to make Wu Song conforming to her desires. She was absolutely alone by herself, and stood behind the screen near the front door. She soon saw Wu Song treading his way through the snow as though he were walking through fragments of white jade. She raised the screen, and greeted him with a smile, asking whether he was cold.
Wu Song thanked her for thinking so much about his welfare. He entered, and took off his felt cap. Jinlian held out both hands to receive it from him. But Wu Song said, "I cannot trouble you to wait upon me in this way." He shook the snow off the cap, and hung it on the wall. He then unloosened his cummerbund, and took off his parrot-green silk clothing. He went into his room, and hung up his clothing there to dry.
Jinlian asked him why he had not returned for his dinner at an earlier time as usual, and Wu Song explained that he had met a friend in town who had invited him to dinner. There was another friend who also asked him to dine but he had declined his invitation and came straight home.
"So that was it," she said. "Well, come close to the fire."
"All right," replied Wu Song. He then took off his boots, changed his socks, and put on a pair of warm slippers. He then drew a chair to the fire and sat down. Pan Jinlian went downstairs, and barred the front door, and locked the back door. She then got the wine, fruit, and vegetables and carrying them upstairs, placed them on the table.
"Where has my brother gone that he has not returned yet?" asked Wu Song.
"Your brother has gone selling cakes as usual," replied Jinlian. "We two can drink our wine together."
"We had better wait until he comes when we can dine together," said Wu Song.
"But why wait until he arrives?" said Jinlian. "We need not wait for him." While saying this, she took a jug of warmed wine from the fire.
"Please sit down," said Wu Song. "I will attend to warm the wine."
"Uncle," replied Jinlian, "be at ease." She drew a chair close to the fire and sat down there. Close by her side there was a table, and on it she put some wine and food. Pouring out a small cup of wine she held it in both hands, and looking at Wu Song she said, "Uncle, please drink this full cup of wine."
Wu Song took the cup, and drank the wine at a gulp.
The woman refilled the cup and said, "The weather is very cold so please drink a cup with me."
"Just as you like," replied Wu Song, and drank off the second cup. He then filled a cup, and handed it to the woman who drank the wine. She in turn filled another cup, and placed it in front of Wu Song. She then unloosened her upper dress, and displayed a little of her breasts. A little of her hair was also hanging loosely.
With smiling face she spoke to Wu Song, "A certain man has told me that you are keeping a girl in the east side before the yamen. Is that true or not?"
"You should not listen to such nonsense," said Wu Song, "I am not that kind of man."
"I do not believe you, I am afraid that your deeds might differ from your words."
"If you do not really believe me, then ask my brother," replied Wu Song.
"But what does he know," said Jinlian. "If he knew such matters he would not sell cakes on the streets now. Please drink another cup of wine, uncle."
As Wu Song drank the wine she kept filling his cup, so that he had soon drunk about four cups. She also drank the same quantity so that very soon she was unable to restrain her passions, and began to talk unguardedly.
Through her words Wu Song now understood a little but he declined to take any notice of her, and hung down his head. She went downstairs, to put some more wine on the fire and Wu Song stirred up the fire in his room with a poker. She came upstairs again with a fresh jug of wine in one hand and squeezing Wu Song's shoulder with the other she said, "Uncle, are you not afraid of the cold as you wear so little?"
Wu Song now understood more of her ways. He was not pleased but did not reply to her. Seeing his silent attitude, she took the poker out of his hand and said, "Uncle, you need not trouble about the fire. I will poke the fire for you. I wish that your heart could be always as hot as the fire." Now Wu Song understood her almost completely, and was highly upset but he did not say a word. Jinlian was now very lustful so throwing the poker down she filled another cup, drank half of it, and looking at Wu Song said, "If you love me, drink the remainder of this wine." Wu Song seized the cup, and threw it on the floor saying, "Sister-in-law, you evidently have no shame!" and at the same time he pushed her away from him. Glaring at her he said, "I am a decent man, and am not of immoral character. I am not like a pig or dog without morals. You must not be shameless like this. If your lustful words came to my ears, my eyes might recognize you as my sister-in-law but my fist would not take any notice of such relationship. So let us have no more of this."
Jinlian was now blushing all over her face and removing a stool she said, "I was only playful. I did not expect that you would take it serious; you are indeed strange to compliment." She then removed all the dishes and took them down below, while Wu Song remained in his room fuming with rage.
About two o'clock Wu the Elder returned carrying his load of cakes, and knocking at the door he was immediately admitted by his wife. He put his things down in the kitchen, and then noticed that both his wife's eyes were red with crying. He asked whom she had been quarreling with.
She replied, "It is all due to your lack of energy, and your allowing an outsider to insult me."
"Who has insulted you?" asked Wu the Elder.
"Whom do you think?" asked his wife. "It was none other than that fellow Wu Song. I saw him return when it was snowing, and I quickly prepared some mulled wine for him. When he saw me alone he began to flirt with me."
"My brother is not that kind of man," replied Wu the Elder. "He is always honest. Do not speak in such a loud tone or else our neighbours may hear what you say, and they will laugh at us." He pushed her to one side, and went upstairs to see Wu Song. "I see, brother," he said, "you have not eaten your repast; let us have some together."
Wu Song did not speak. He thought just a moment, then took off his slippers, put on his leather boots, and fastened them. He put on his felt cap, buckled his belt, and then walked towards the door.
"Where are you going?" asked Wu the Elder in a loud voice. But he got no reply, and Wu Song left the house without saying a word. Wu the Elder went to the kitchen and asked his wife, "Do you know where he has gone? He did not reply to me, and went in the direction of the yamen."
"You stupid ass!" replied his wife. "Isn't it very obvious! He is ashamed of himself, and does not care to face you. I will not approve of your allowing that man to stay here."
"Since he has gone we shall be the laughingstock of our neighbours," said Wu the Elder.
"You idiotic imp!" replied his wife. "His flirting with me would of course make our neighbours laugh! You may live with him if you want. But I cannot tolerate that kind of man to come and live here again. You write out a document divorcing me, and then you can go and join him."
What could Wu the Elder say to this? But while these two were talking they saw Wu Song arrive with a soldier who took away Wu Song's baggage, and they both left the house without saying a word.
Wu the Elder ran after him and asked, "Brother, why are you removing your baggage?"
"Brother, you must not ask, because if I told you you would have to wear a mask. Just let me go," replied Wu Song.
What could Wu the Elder say? So he let Wu Song go.
Pan Jinlian was still muttering to herself in the house. "Well!" she said, "people know that Wu Song is a relative of ours, and also an Inspector, and they will assume that he helped us but they will not understand why he has now turned against us. Truly it is, 'A flower and a cydonia are only nice to look at.' You can go, and I will give thanks to Heaven for your departure, you, an ungrateful cur."
Wu the Elder could not understand his wife being so abusive, and he was very much upset. After Wu Song'a departure Wu the Elder resumed his job of hawking cakes on the street. At first he had thought of going to the yamen and talking the matter over with his brother but his wife was emphatically opposed to that idea, therefore he did not go.
About ten days afterwards, the county magistrate, who had been at that place for more than two years, and had amassed a great deal of money, decided to send it to a relative at Eastern Capital for safe-keeping until he could use it to insure promotion. But he was afraid of the dangers of sending it by road, and was on the lookout for a reliable man to convey it. Suddenly he thought of Wu Song who was just the man he wanted. So he sent for Wu Song to talk the matter over, and upon the latter's arrival he said, "In the Eastern Capital I have a relative to whom I want to send some presents, and also a letter inquiring about his health. But I am afraid that on the journey it would not be safe and that a brave man here like you must undertake the task. You would not decline this toilsome task, and if you do this for me I will greatly promote you when you return."
As I am indebted to you for my present position," said Wu Song "how dare I offer excuses? Since you commission me to undertake this work I will go. I have never been to the Eastern Capital, and when I get there I can have a good look around the town. If you, sir, would have the present ready by tomorrow I could leave then."
The magistrate was much pleased at this, and offered him three cups of wine.
Having received the orders of the county magistrate, Wu Song left the yamen, and returned to his quarters. Then, he gave a few taels of silver to a soldier and ordered him to buy a bottle of wine, and some dried fish, meat, and fruit and took them to Wu the Elder's house on the Zishi Street. By a lucky concurrence Wu the Elder who had just returned from his cakes selling, happened to see Wu Song at his house door giving orders to the soldier for cooking the food.
When Pan Jinlian saw the wine and food arriving she thought that Wu Song had been thinking of her, and was coming back to her. She would not show that he had aroused her feelings but would quietly ask him a few questions. She went upstairs; powdered her face; dressed her hair; put on some pretty coloured clothes, and then went downstairs to receive Wu Song. She greeted him, "Uncle, I was not aware that I had treated you badly. You have not been here for several days but I wonder what made you to do so. Everyday I told my husband to go to the yamen, and talk matters over with you. When he returned he said that he could not find you. I am much pleased to see you here today. But why have you bought so many things?"
"I specially came here today to talk about a matter with you and my brother," replied Wu Song.
"Then let us go upstairs," said Jinlian.
So all three went upstairs. Wu Song conducted Wu the Elder and Jinlian to the seats of honour, and then taking a stool sat down in the inferior position. The soldier brought the wine and food and placed them on the table. Wu Song invited his brother and the latter's wife to partake the wine. Jinlian would not take her eyes away from Wu Song but the latter gave all his attention to the wine. After they had drunk about five cups of wine Wu Song ordered the soldier to fill up the cups again, and then taking his own cup in his hand he addressed Wu the Elder, "Elder brother, today I have been ordered to go to the Eastern Capital, and I have to start on my journey tomorrow. I expect to be gone not less than forty days, or at most two months. Now you have ever been rather weak, and when I am abroad I am afraid that you may be insulted. If you have been selling, say ten lots of cakes each day, then beginning from tomorrow I want you to sell only five lots. Everyday go out late and come back early. Do not drink wine with men. When you return home lower the screen, and lock the door. Avoid scandal at all. If anybody insults you do not have a row with him but wait until I return when I will discuss matters with him. If you will listen to my advice, then drink this wine."
Wu the Elder took the cup of wine from Wu Song, and replied, "Younger brother, what you say is right, and I will follow your advice."
When Wu the Elder had drunk the wine Wu Song refilled the cup, and turning to Jinlian he said, "Madame, you are so clever that I need not say much to you. My brother is sincere, and he has entrusted his affairs to you. People have a saying, 'Outer strength is not so much as a inner strength.' Now sister-in-law, if you look after the household affairs well my brother will not be annoyed. Have you heard of the ancient saying, 'If the fence is not broken the dogs cannot enter.'"
While listening to this, Jinlian was blushed, and her face then turned to brown. When he had finished his speaking she pointed at her husband with her finger and abused him saying, "You stupid ass! What language an outsider is now insulting me with! I do not wear a man's cap but I am quite a termagant. I could hold a man in my fist; I could support a horse on my shoulders; and I could allow men to walk over my face without flinching. I am not like the turtle women who rouge their faces, and then draw their heads in when anybody approaches. Since I married Wu the Elder not even an ant have dared to come in my room, so how could a dog enter even if my fence was broken. You only speak confusedly. If you have anything to say say clearly. If you throw a brick or a tile it will of course strike the ground somewhere."
Wu Song laughed and said, "If you can do things in this way that will be all right. But your words should correspond with your heart. As matters are as you say, I will not forget your words, and must ask you to pledge me with this wine."

But Jinlian pushed off the cup, and ran downstairs. When halfway down the ladder she stopped and shouted, "You may be very clever but do you understand the saying, 'The wife of the eldest brother should be treated like your mother.' Before I married Wu the Elder I never heard of him having a younger brother but now you have turned up. I do not know whether you are a relative or not but you evidently just want to be the boss of this house. My own fate has now many things to face." Having said this she burst out crying and went downstairs. All this was not genuine but full of deceit.
The two brothers drank a few cups of wine more, and then Wu Song got up to take his leave.
"Are you going?" asked Wu the Elder, "I hope that you will soon return, and that we shall meet again." As he said this he could not avoid crying.
Wu Song seeing him in tears said, "Elder brother, you must not do so much peddling but stay at home more. I will repay you for the loss of that."
They then went down, and as they were at the street door Wu Song said, "Brother, do not forget what I have said." He then departed with the soldier.
Early the next day Wu Song packed his things, and then went to the yamen. The magistrate had already ordered a cart, and the boxes and baskets had been loaded on it. Two reliable soldiers, and also two confidential servants, had already been instructed. He saluted the county magistrate who was standing in front of the hall. He put his own baggage in the cart, and took his halberd in his hand; seeing everything in order he and all four men soon left Yanggu County on the road for Eastern Capital.
When his brother had gone, Wu the Elder was abused and cursed by his wife for several days. But Wu the Elder smothered his anger, and took care not to forget his brother's words. Each day he only sold about half as many cakes as he had sold before, and it was never late when he returned home. As soon as he had put down his load he always rolled up the screen, and shut the door, and then went inside to sit down.
This vexed his wife, and pointing at him she said, "You stupid ass. I have never seen anyone close the door while the sun is still at its zenith. People will think we have a demon in the house. You listened to what your brother had said but you are not afraid of people laughing at us."
"You may let them laugh. What my brother said is quite right, and it will save us from a lot of trouble if we follow his advice."
"Rubbish! Stupid ass! You are a man! Yet you are not master of your own affairs but listen to other people's orders."
Wu the Elder waved his hand and said, "Take no notice of them. What my younger brother has said are words of gold."
When Wu Song had gone about ten days Wu the Elder continued to go out late everyday, and return early, and when he returned he always closed the door. His wife was always abusing him, so that they both got quite accustomed to it. In fact she often rolled up the screen and closed the door herself when he returned. Wu the Elder was much pleased to see her doing this.
About three days later the winter was nearly over, and the weather was gradually getting a little warmer. On one day when Wu the Elder would be expected to return his wife as usual went outside the door to roll up the screen. As she did this a man happened to pass. The ancients had a saying, "Without luck nothing can be completed." As she took the forked stick in her hand to let down the curtain, she held it so loosely that it fell down, and hit the man on the head. He stopped, in his excitement but turning round he saw a very pretty woman and was rendered helpless. Immediately his anger vanished to Java, and he smiled. She saw that his annoyance had gone so she saluted him with folded arms and said, "My hand slipped; I hope that you are not hurt."
He adjusted his turban with his hand, and bowed to her. He said, "Never mind! I hope that you did not sprain your wrist."
Standing under a curtain at a tea-house which was close by, there was a woman, Grandma Wang, who had noticed all this. She laughed and called out, "Who told you, sir, to pass under the eaves of this house? You deserve what you got."
He laughed and said, "That was my fault. To intrude on women is unusual."
Pan Jinlian laughingly replied, "I hope that you will forgive me."
The man also laughed, and gave her a big slow salute; he then said that he dared not intrude further. At that time he was examining her closely with both his eyes. He then swaggered off, and at each step he turned his head to look at her.
Jinlian then picked up the forked stick, rolled up the curtain, closed the door, and went inside to wait for her husband.
You know what's the name of that man, and where did he live? He was a once wealthy man of Yanggu County but now his property had been ruined. At present he owned a small drug-store opposite the front gate of the yamen. In his youth he had been a rascal, and was skillful with the cudgel and hand combat. Now he had gathered some influence and presumed to be an umpire of disputes that came to the yamen. He was always making further trouble in petty quarrels; the more he spoke the more money he got, from passing money and bribing officials, so that everybody in the town tried to avoid him. His family name was Ximen and his personal name was Qing. He was the eldest son of his family so that he was often called Ximen the Elder. But now he became a wealthy man, and was called the Honourable Ximen Qing.
Now after that incident with Jinlian he had not gone far before he turned into Grandma Wang's tea-house where he sat down near the door curtain.
Grandma Wang laughed and spoke to him, "What a big slow salute you gave, sir!"
Ximen Qing laughed and replied, "Granny, come here! I have something to ask you. Who is that woman next door?"
"She is the younger sister of 'King Yama,'" replied Grandma Wang, "and the child of a demon. What do you mean by asking her name?"
"I will be straight with you but you must not jest at me," said Ximen Qing.
"How is it that you do not recognize her?" asked Grandma Wang. "Her husband sells warm food daily before the yamen."
"Is not that man, Xu San, who sells date cakes?" asked Ximen Qing.
"No, not that man," said Grandma Wang. "If she were his wife they would be a nice couple. Guess again!"
"Oh, perhaps she is the wife of that silverware huckster, Li Er," said Ximen Qing. "Wrong again," replied Grandma Wang. "It would be a good match if she were his wife."
"Oh, then perhaps she is the wife of that tattooed fellow, Liu Xiaoyi," said Ximen Qing.
"No," replied Grandma Wang laughingly. "They would be a suitable pair if it be the case for her. Guess it again."
"I cannot think of anybody else," said Ximen Qing.
Grandma Wang laughed and replied, "If I tell you her husband's name you would be amused very much. He is that seller of cakes named Wu the Elder."
Ximen Qing burst into laughing, and stamped on the ground, and said, "Is not that Wu the Elder who is nicknamed Three Inches of Mulberry Bark?"
"That is the man," said Grandma Wang.
But Ximen Qing had pity for her hard lot. "It is a nice piece of meat in a dog's mouth," he said.
"That is the trouble," replied Grandma Wang. "It reminds me of the ancient saying, 'A fine steed ridden by a silly fellow is like a clever wife always sleeping with a stupid husband.'— But what is the old matchmaker in the moon thinking of such unequal alliances?"
"How much do I owe for the tea, Grandma Wang?" asked Ximen Qing.
"Not much. But rest a little while and I will reckon it up," replied Grandma Wang.
"With whom has your son gone away?" asked Ximen Qing.
"That is a thing I do not care to talk about," replied Grandma Wang. "He went to Huaian Prefecture with a guest, and as he has not returned so far we do not know whether he is living or not."
"Why did you not send him to me to do some business?" asked Ximen Qing.
"If you would take him, and recommend him for promotion that would be very good," replied Grandma Wang.
"When he returns we will discuss the matter in detail," said Ximen Qing. After some further talk he left.
In about an hour's time he returned, and sat down near the curtain at the door of the tea-house looking at the door of Wu the Elder's house which was nearly opposite.
Grandma Wang came and asked whether he would like some brewed plum juice.
"That is a good idea," he replied. "I like it a little tart."
She soon made the plum juice, and handed the bowl to him. He drank it slowly, and when finished placed the bowl on the table and said punningly, "Grandma Wang, this plum juice is very nice. Have you any more in your establishment?'
Grandma Wang laughed and said, "I have acted as a marriage matchmaker for a long time but just at present I have no woman on hand in my house."
"I asked you about 'mei' (plums), and you replied about 'mei' (marriages)—there is a wide difference."
"I thought you said that I arranged marriages very well," said Grandma Wang.
"As you are so expert in uniting people in matrimony it would be an extremely fine thing if you would find me a woman. I would reward you abundantly."
"If I introduce you to a woman your wife would be angry and slap my face," she replied.
"My wife is extremely docile and would not mind. I already have several concubines at home but there is not one of them that quite suits me. So if you find me an extremely good one you need not worry about my people raising an objection. Even if she is a widow it does not matter so long as she suits me."
"The day before yesterday there was a nice woman but I am afraid she would not suit you," said Grandma Wang.
"If she is nice, please arrange the marriage for me and I will thank you," said Ximen Qing.
"She is a paragon but unfortunately she is not young," she said.
"If there is only a difference of a few years between us that won't matter. How old is she?" he asked.
"She is of the Year of the Tiger, and is now just eighty-three years of age," said Grandma Wang.
"You crazy woman, making such funny jokes!" so saying he got up and went out with a laughing face.
In the evening when it was getting dark Grandma Wang lit the lamp, and upon going out to close the door she saw that Ximen Qing had come back, and was sitting under the door curtain gazing at the door of Wu the Elder's house as before.
"Honourable Sir, would you like some more plum juice?" asked Grandma Wang.
"Splendid idea," replied Ximen Qing. "But please make them a little sweet this time."
Grandma Wang soon prepared, and brought it to him. She took a seat near him. He asked her to keep an account of what he owed, and that he would pay her the following day.
Grandma Wang said that did not matter. "You need not worry about payment but come here at any time." He then departed and laughed as he went.
Very early the next morning when Grandma Wang went to open the door she saw Ximen Qing pacing backwards and forwards before the door. She soliloquized, "This fellow is getting very keen and comes here so often. I will flick some soft sugar on his nose, and see whether he can lick it off. He is always taking advantage of the people of this town but as he is now in my hands I will see that this time he is defeated." She then opened the door, and came back to kindle the charcoal fire, and boiled some tea. Immediately Ximen Qing entered, sat down near the screen, watching the door of Wu the Elder's house. Grandma Wang pretended not to see him, and busily fanned the fire in the stove. She did not go to ask whether he wanted some tea. But at last he called out for two cups of tea.
Grandma Wang laughed and asked, "Sir, are you arrived? I have not seen you for several days. Please be seated." She then prepared two cups of strong ginger tea, and placed them on the table.
"You come and drink tea with me," said Ximen Qing.
She laughed loudly and said, "But I am not one of your sweethearts."
Ximen Qing was amused at this, and asked, "Granny, what are the people in the opposite door selling?"
"What they're selling is steaming, dripping, hot and spicy. said Grandma Wang.
Ximen Qing laughed and said, "You seem to be mad."
Grandma Wang said, "I am not mad. She has her own husband."
"Granny, I will be straight with you. As they make good cakes I want to ask them to make about fifty for me but I do not know whether they are at home or not."
"If you want to buy some cakes you may wait until her husband returns from cakes selling. What need is there for you to go to the house?" she asked.
"What you say is quite right," said Ximen Qing, and after sipping his tea for a time he got up and asked for his bill.
"Never mind that," she said. "I have put it on account." Ximen Qing laughed again and left the tea-house. But Grandma Wang watched him closely from inside of her tea-house, and saw he went in one direction and looked closely at Wu the Elder's house door, he then returned and passing it again and had another careful look at it, and so on seven or eight times. He then reentered her tea-house. She addressed him, "Sir, I have not seen you for quite a long time."
Ximen Qing took out one tael of silver and gave them to her saying, "Please accept these in payment for my refreshments."
She smiled and asked, "Why give me so much?"
"Never mind that," replied Ximen Qing.
She was really pleased at this, as it showed her that he was defeated. So she took the money, and put it away. She then spoke to him,
"Sir, I see that you are thirsty. How would you like to have some tea?"
"How is it that you can get my idea correctly?" asked Ximen Qing.
"Where is the difficulty in that?" she asked. "There is an ancient saying, 'When a person enters, there is no need to ask him whether his affairs are prosperous or not because his face will always tell you that.' If there is any secret or strange affairs I can guess correctly."
"Well, I have a secret affair and if you can guess what it is, I will give you five taels of silver."
Grandma Wang laughed and said, "That will not need five guesses because I can guess it correctly in a straightway. Honourable Sir, let me whisper it in your ear. For these last few days you have been gallivanting about a great deal. So I know that you are very keen on that woman who is at our next door. Have I guessed rightly?"
"Granny," said Ximen Qing laughingly, "your wisdom is certainly as great as that of Sui He and Lu Jia! I will not try to deceive you. I do not know how it happened but since that woman dropped the forked stick on my head I seem to have lost my 'three souls and seven essences.' And I can think of no plan to get into her presence. Can you contrive a method to accomplish that?"
Grandma Wang laughed loudly saying, "Well, I will be straight with you. I, of course, sell tea but I am generally known as 'devil playing a night-watchman.' Three years ago, on a day in the sixth month when it snowed I sold one cup of tea but ever since no second visitor has come and my livelihood had to depend on 'other jobs.'"
"What are those 'other jobs?'" asked Ximen Qing.
"My chief business," she said, "is acting as a matchmaker, a broker, a midwife, arranging miscarriages, or as a procuress, a 'Maboliu.'"[66] 66 One who arranges improper or adulterous relations.
"If you can arrange this matter for me," said Ximen Qing. "I will give you ten taels of silver to provide a coffin for you, when the affair is completed."
"Just listen to me," said Grandma Wang. "For seducing the fair sex there are five things that are necessary." She then explained them to him. "One, you must be as handsome as Pan An; Two, you need to be be 'hung like a donkey'; Three you need to be as rich as Deng Tong; Four, you need to be as forebearing as a needle threading cotton wool; Five, you need to make the time and effort. Pan An, donkey, Deng Tong, forebearance, time and effort—you can do it only if you meet these requirements."
"I have some of each of these five," said Ximen Qing. "First, I'm not as handsome as Pan An but I hold my own; second, I've had a big dick since I was young; third, my family has 'some spare change'—not as much as Deng Tong but we manage; fourth I'm very forebearing. If she hit me a hundred times, I wouldn't retaliate even once; fifth, time and effort are not a problem—I'm here after all. Granny, if you will arrange this matter for me, and help me to accomplish it I shall be extremely grateful and reward you."
"I know that you have all these qualifications," said Grandma Wang, "but there is still one thing that stands in the way."
"What is that?" he asked.
"Well, although you have all these things, yet if you are just short of one per cent of what I now refer to it may destroy all your chances. I know that you have always been thrifty, so I should like to know whether you are willing to splash out now."
"Of course I will," replied Ximen Qing, "I will be guided by what you advise."
"As you are willing to spend the money, I have a plan by which you can meet that woman but will you follow my advice?"
"Of course I will do whatever you propose," replied Ximen Qing. "What is your plan?"
She laughed and said, "It is now late, and you had better go. But come back in half a year or three months, and we will discuss the matter further."
Ximen Qing knelt down and appealed to her not to let the matter rest in that way.
She laughed at this and told him that he was getting precipitous. Her plan was an extremely good one, and it would be as successful as the famous military tactician Sunzi (6th century B. C.) who applied his methods to train court concubines into women soldiers. "Now I will tell you this, that woman was previously a servant in the house of a wealthy man at Qinghe County, and she is a very good sewing woman. Now I suggest you to purchase a roll of thin white silk, a roll of blue silk, a roll of pongee silk, ten taels of fine cotton, and give them to me. Then I will go across to meet her and have a chat with her. During tea I will tell her that a very wealthy man have presented me these silk for making my burial clothes. I will ask her to lend me her almanac to select an auspcious day on which to invite a tailor to make the clothes. If I see that she will not assist me I am afraid that the matter will be finished. But if she offers to help me in making the clothes and asks me not to send for a tailor then that will be the first step towards your object. I will ask her to come to my home to do the work. But if she wants me to go and do the work at her house that will be the end of the matter. If she offers to come here and cut the silk for me, that will be a second step towards your object. If she comes, I will then, of course, ask her to have some wine and cake with me. You need not come the first day. And if on the second day she prefers to take stuff to her house again the matter will be ended there but if she comes everyday to my house that will be the third step towards your object. During that day also you need not come here. On the third day you can come with your best dress, and cough outside the door, saying, 'How is it that I have not seen you for several days, Grandma Wang?' Then I will come and ask you to come inside. If, when you enter, she runs away, I cannot of course detain her, and that again will be the end of the matter. But if she does not move when she sees you then it will be the fourth step towards your object. When we are all seated I will explain to her that you are the person who gave me the silk. I will boast about your great generosity, and you can tease her about the needles and threads. If she makes no reply that will be the end of the matter. But if she replies that will be the fifth step towards your object. Then I will tell you how lucky I am to get her to come and help me. I will also praise both of you as donors; one gave me money and the other gave me assistance. I did not look for you on the street but you both just happened to come here. I will then suggest that you are a good master, and should reward her for her voluntary work. If she runs away when you take out your money, the matter will again be over. If otherwise, that will be the sixth step towards success. When I have the money to buy refreshments I will tell her to entertain you while I am away. If she won't do this the matter is over but if she does not move that will be the seventh stage completed. When I come back with the things I will put them on the table and ask her to put her needles, etc. away and join us in drinking a little wine as provided by you. If she declines and says she must go, the matter will be over but if actually she does not get up, that will be the eighth step toward success. When we have been drinking the wine for some time and are getting merry, I will say more wine is required. I will ask you for the money, and as I go out I will close the door. Then you two will be alone inside. If she gets nervous and runs back, the matter will be over. If she is not anxious when she hears me close the door, and remains inside then that will be the ninth stage completed.

"The last stage may be the most difficult. You must be careful and speak honeyed words to her, and avoid any roughness of manner or speech. Do not touch her with hand or foot or make any violent move, or else it will soon come to naught, and I cannot help you. You had better accidentally brush a chopstick off the table with your sleeve; then you stoop down, and quietly stroke her foot. But if she objects to this you will have to wait until I come to help you. It will be difficult to go any further in the matter. But if she does not say anything then the matter is completed and you can go ahead. What do you think of my plan?"

Ximen Qing laughed and said, "Your plan is extremely well thought out."

Grandma Wang told him that he must not forget to give her the ten taels of silver.

Ximen Qing said, "How can one forget that oranges come from Dongting Lake when one is eating the peel? I will give you the money of course but when can the plan be put into effect?"

"I will report further to you this evening," said Grandma Wang. "As Wu the Elder has not yet returned I will now go across, and lay the bait. You can go and buy the rolls of silk, and engage a man to bring them here."

"You need have no doubt as to carrying out of my part of the bargain," said Ximen Qing. He then took his leave and went to a silk shop where he purchased the silks and ten rolls of pure cotton and told his servant to take them with five taels of silver to Grandma Wang's tea-house.

She duly received the silk, and dismissed the servant. She went out by the back door to Pan Jinlian's house. Pan Jinlian welcomed her, and invited her to go upstairs and sit down there. Grandma Wang asked why Pan Jinlian did not come to her tea-house the last few days, to which Jinlian replied that she had not been very well. Grandma Wang then asked if she had an almanac, as she wanted to select an auspicious day on which to cut out some silk for clothes.

Pan Jinlian asked what kind of clothes she was making.

Grandma Wang said that she had been far from well, and she could not be sure how it would end, so she was going to make some burial clothes for herself. She said at her request a very wealthy local man had given her a lot of silk to make the clothes with. She had had the silk at home for more than a year but now as she felt her end was drawing near she had decided to wait no longer but make the clothes at once. As there was an intercalary month in that year she would like to have made a start during the next two days but the tailor was so busy that he could not come that was very disappointing.

When she heard this Pan Jinlian laughed and said, "I am afraid that I am not properly qualified to do such work but if you would like it I could assist you in that matter."

Grandma Wang also laughed and said, "If you would help me my soul might have a happy destination after my death. I have heard of your skill with needle and thread but I did not dare to come and ask you about the matter."

"There is no obstacle in the way," said Pan Jinlian, "and as I have promised to do it I will certainly stick to my word. I will get a man to select an auspicious day, and then will come and help you on that day."

Grandma Wang said, "If you will help me in this work there will be no need to select an auspicious day because you are such a fortunate person. The other day I did ask a man for an auspicious day, and I now remember that tomorrow is such a day but then I did not think it necessary to select such a day to start with this work, so I did not take pain to remember it."

"It is very important to have an auspicious day on which to start making interment vestures but why wait for another auspicious day?" asked Jinlian.

"As you are quite willing, then I venture to ask you to come to my house tomorrow and we will start work," said Grandma Wang.

"But why would you not come here to do this work?" asked Jinlian.

"Because I would like to watch you work, and as I live by myself I have no one to look after my house," replied Grandma Wang.

"In that case I will come tomorrow as soon as I have had my breakfast," said Jinlian.

When Grandma Wang left, she was very profuse in her thanks for the help offered. That afternoon she went straight to Ximen Qing, and reported to him what had been arranged. She told him to call at her house the day after the next.

The next day Grandma Wang got up early and cleaned and set her room in good order, and prepared water for making tea. She went and bought some thread, and then waited at home for the arrival of her guest. At the other house Wu the Elder had departed with his load of cakes after breakfast. As soon as he had gone his wife let down the door screen, and then went out by the back door to Grandma Wang's house.

Grandma Wang was exceedingly glad to see her, and took her inside and invited her to partake of some strong tea, white pine-seeds, and walnuts which she had prepared. After their repast she cleared the table and brought out the four rolls of silk. Pan Jinlian examined them, measured them, and after cutting them in lengths began to sew. Grandma Wang looked on and applauded all that was done. She said that although she was nearly seventy years old she had never seen such excellent needlework before. Jinlian continued sewing till about noon, when Grandma Wang invited her to stop and dine—food, wine, and vermicelli being prepared. Afterwards the sewing went on until late in the afternoon when Jinlian went home. Shortly afterwards Wu the Elder returned, and his wife opened the door for him and raised the curtain. When Wu the Elder entered the room he noticed that his wife was flushed so he asked her where she had been drinking wine. Pan Jinlian then explained that she had been across the way sewing for their neighbour Grandma Wang who at noon had asked her to partake of some repast.

Wu the Elder did not like this, and said that if she had to go again he preferred that the repast be taken in his own house. He objected to her causing trouble to other people. If she went the following day he wanted her to take some money, buy some food, and invite Grandma Wang to dine with her. There was a saying, "A distant relative is not as good as a near neighbour." He did not however wish her to lose their neighbour's fraternity. But if Grandma Wang did not want to accept her hospitality then she must ask her to bring the work to his house. His wife listened to this but made no comment.

The next day Grandma Wang went on with her deceitful scheme, and as soon as Wu the Elder had gone she came to his house, and asked his wife to go and proceed with the needlework. They both went to Grandma Wang's house, and the sewing was taken up, while Grandma Wang got the tea ready. This went on till near noon when Pan Jinlian took out a string of cash and gave it to Grandma Wang saying that it would be used for some wine for them to drink.

But Grandma Wang would not take it. She said it would be unreasonable. "I have asked you to come here and do this work for me, so how could I allow you to spend money?"

"My husband told me to make this offer," replied Jinlian, "and if you would not accept it then I should do the work at my own home."

"Your husband is very kind," said Grandma Wang. She was afraid that her plans would be upset if she did not accept the money so she took it, added some of her own money and went out to buy the best wine, food, and fruit. Upon her return she took every care to entertain her guest. Now, reader, you should know that the women of this generation, no matter how clever and careful they are, cannot escape the temptations of evil men, and nine out of ten of them will be duped. Grandma Wang prepared some meat and requested Jinlian to dine and drink wine with her. This was done, and in the evening Jinlian returned home.

On the third day Grandma Wang watched for the departure of Wu the Elder and then went by the back entrance to his house, and again requested his wife to come with her. The latter agreed and they both adjourned to Grandma Wang's house where the needlework was continued until nearly noon.

Now Ximen Qing had not forgotten that this was the day for him to appear on the scene, so he put on a new turban, and dressed in his best clothes. Taking about four taels of silver he set out for the Zishi Street. Upon arriving at the door of the tea-house he coughed and said, "Granny Wang, how is it that I have not seen you for so long?"

Grandma Wang went out and asked laughingly, "Who are you?"

"It's I," replied Ximen Qing.

"As first I wondered who it was," she said looking round, "but now I see that it is you, my benefactor. Please come inside and have a look." She took hold of his sleeve and drew him inside, and when he saw Pan Jinlian she said to her, "This is the gentleman who gave me the silk."

Ximen Qing saluted Pan Jinlian, and upon seeing this she dropped her work, and saluted him with both hands.

Grandma Wang then addressed Ximen Qing, "You will remember that about a year ago you gave me a lot of silk. I did not do anything with it, until a few days ago when this lady offered to help me in making the clothes. She is an excellent needlewoman, and very skillful in her work. She does the fine minute parts very well indeed. Just look at the work she has done."

Ximen Qing looked at the silk and said, "How is it possible for anyone to do such wonderful work? It looks as though it had been done by a fairy."

Jinlian laughed and said, "Sir, you need not laugh at me."

Ximen Qing addressed Grandma Wang and asked, "May I dare ask you who this lady is?"

"Honourable Sir, you had better guess," replied Grandma Wang.

"How can I guess?" replied Ximen Qing.

Grandma Wang laughed and said, "This is our neighbour Pan Jinlian. The other day she dropped a forked stick on your head; its fall must have caused no pain that you now have forgotten it?"

Jinlian with a violent red blush said, "On that day my hand unfortunately slipped but I hope that you will not bear me any grudge."

"Nothing of the kind!" replied Ximen Qing.

Grandma Wang interrupted by saying, "This man is always amiable and has never born any grudge towards any one. He is an extremely good man."

"I was then not aware that she was the wife of Wu the Elder," said Ximen Qing. "I know of course that he sells cakes on the street to support his family but he also is quite a good man. He earns money, and is a good-tempered fellow. Such men are very rare."

Grandma Wang remarked, "Do you know that since Wu the Elder married her, she has always been obedient to him in every matter."

"He is a useless man," said Jinlian, "but, sir, you will not laugh at him."

"Madame, you are mistaken," said Ximen Qing. "There is an ancient saying, 'Meekness is essential to success; violence will bring calamities.' As your husband is such a good man he is like the saying, 'Of a vast volume of water not one drop could leak away.'"

Grandma Wang interrupted him by saying, "That is so."

Ximen Qing now sat down opposite to Jinlian, and Grandma Wang asked the latter whether she recognized him but Jinlian replied that she did not know him.

Grandma Wang said, "Well, he is one of the rich men of our town, and is on very friendly terms with the magistrate. He is called the Honourable Ximen Qing. He has a great deal of money, and has a dispensary opposite the yamen. At home his store of money is so high it reaches the Big Dipper and has granaries full of rice. At home things yellow are of gold, and that of white are of silver; round things are pearls, and bright are jewels. He has precious rhinoceros horns and elephants' tusks." She indulged in this puff like a quack (as she really did not believe in it herself). While this was going on Jinlian bowed her head over the needlework. But Ximen Qing gazed at her longingly, and was anxious to have her alone. Grandma Wang went and got two cups of tea which she set before them saying that she hoped Jinlian would entertain him. While the two were drinking the tea they made eyes at each other. Grandma Wang stroked her face with her hand, and Ximen Qing knew that he had already got halfway there. She said to him, "If you, sir, had not happened to drop in I could not have dared to ask you to come here. It was very fortunate for you to come today. There is a saying, 'One guest cannot disturb two hosts.' You gave me the money, and she gives me her labour. I did not go on the street looking for you, and this lady just happens to be here when you call, so I hope that as you are a good master, you will entertain her for me."

Ximen Qing expressed regret that he had not thought of that before, and he now took out some money and gave it to Grandma Wang to buy some wine.

Jinlian objected to this but she did not move. Grandma Wang took the money but even then Jinlian did not move. As Grandma Wang left the room to buy some things she turned and asked Jinlian to sit and talk with their guest. Jinlian told her she need not go out to buy the things but still she did not move. It was now evident that Jinlian and Ximen Qing had the same idea. Ximen Qing looked at her steadily, and Jinlian took stealthy glances at him. She liked his appearance, and had almost made up her mind but she dropped her head again and awaited developments. Soon Grandma Wang returned with a fat goose, cooked meat, and very nice fruit which she had purchased. She soon had them arranged on a tray, and brought them into the room, and placed the tray on the table. Jinlian asked Grandma Wang to entertain their guest as she was not justified in doing so, again she did not move.

"But how can you say that," replied Grandma Wang, "because this is particularly to entertain you?"

They all three then sat down at the table, and the wine was poured out. Ximen Qing lifted up a cup of wine and asked Jinlian to drink it.

Jinlian laughed and said, "Sir, I am much obliged to you for your kindness."

"I know that you like the wine," said Grandma Wang, "so I hope that you are not standing on ceremony but drink a few cups of wine."

Ximen Qing then picked up his chopsticks, and asked Grandma Wang to get the lady to eat some food also. Grandma Wang selected some of the best food, and gave them to Jinlian. After they had drunk about three cups of wine each Grandma Wang went for a fresh supply.

While she was away Ximen Qing asked Jinlian how old she was, to which she replied that she was twenty-three years of age. Ximen Qing said that he was five years older. To which she replied, "You are as high as the sky while I am as low as ground."

Just then Grandma Wang returned and said, "What a fine smart lady you are! You are not only good at needle craft but you are also well educated."

Ximen Qing said, "Where is there another lady like her? Wu the Elder was very fortunate in getting such a prize."

"I speak to the point when I say that although you have many women at home I guarantee you have not a lady equal to this one," said Grandma Wang.

"About that matter I am very sorry, I cannot say anything," said Ximen Qing. "except that I have been unfortunate in not getting a really good wife."

"But, sir, your first wife was good," said Grandma Wang.

"I do not care to talk about her," said Ximen Qing, "but if she were alive now my house would not have been turned upside down. Just now I have about three or seven concubines but they are all useless, just mouths waiting to be fed."

"How many years has it been since the death of your first wife, sir?" asked Jinlian.

"I do not wish to say that," said Ximen Qing, "but although she came of a poor family she was exceedingly clever, and managed all my affairs well. Unfortunately, she died. That was three years ago, and since then all my affairs at home have been in great confusion. That is why I do not stay at home now, because there I get nothing but abuse and annoyance."

"Sir, please do not be offended if I speak to you rather straightforwardly," said Grandma Wang, "your first wife was not as good as Jinlian at needle craft."

"She was moreover not as good-looking as this lady," said Ximen Qing.

Grandma Wang laughed and said, "But is it not true that you keep a mistress on the East Street? And yet you have never asked me to go there and have tea with you."

"She is a singsong girl named Zhang Xixi," said Ximen Qing. "But I know that she is also a stranger so that I do not care for her."

"But are you not Madame Li Qiaoqiao's lover for a long time too?" asked Grandma Wang.

"Oh! I have taken her to my home," said Ximen Qing. "If she were as pretty as this lady I would of course have married her long ago."

"And if I find a woman like this lady may I come to your house as a matchmaker to discuss marriage?" asked Grandma Wang.

"Both my father and mother are dead," replied Ximen Qing, "I now manage my own affairs so who can question anything I do?"

"Speaking earnestly," said Grandma Wang, "how could I immediately get a woman who would suit your taste?"

"Why not?" asked Ximen Qing. "So far I have only been unfortunate in marriage and, therefore, I have not met the one as I desire."

They talked further on this subject, and then Grandma Wang pointed out that they had drunk all the wine and said that she should go out to buy some more.

"I have here five taels of silver which I will hand you to buy wine with," said Ximen Qing, "and if it is too much then you can keep the balance."

As she took the money, and arose to go out, Grandma Wang looked at her lady friend, and saw that the wine had had its effect. She still however hung down her head but did not move. Grandma Wang knew that they both had the same object, and that when she left them together they would soon arrange matters.

Grandma Wang was pleased and she said to Jinlian, "I will now go and buy some more wine, so I shall have to trouble you to entertain this gentleman. Is there still some wine left? If any, fill two cups for the Honourable Ximen Qing. There is a place near the yamen where I can buy some good wine so that I may be some time before I return."

Jinlian said she did not want any more wine but again she did not move. So Grandma Wang left them but as she went out she fastened the door with a rope, and sat down just on the other side.

Ximen Qing took a cup of wine, and asked Jinlian to drink it. As he did this he brushed a chopstick off the table with his sleeve. This was a trick, as it fell close to the feet of the lady. When he stooped down to pick it up, he saw that she had two small pointed feet. So he stealthily placed his hand on her embroidered shoe. She laughed at this but said, "You need not be so backward."

Ximen Qing knelt down and petitioned her to satisfy his desire. She thereupon embraced him, and he got up. Soon afterwards Grandma Wang returned and pretending to be angry said, "You two look happy." Both Ximen Qing and Jinlian were startled, and Grandma Wang continued, "I asked you to come here to help me to make some clothes, and not to carry on with this man. If Wu the Elder got to know of this he would blame me. I will go and tell him about it at once." She then turned round to leave the room. But Jinlian seized hold of her skirt and begged to be forgiven. Ximen Qing appealed to her not to make a noise.

"If you want me to forgive you, you must do one thing as I tell you," said Grandma Wang.

"I will obey you in everything, not to say one thing," said Jinlian.

"Then from now you must deceive your husband, and not let him know of this affair. You must not break your promise and abuse the kindness of this gentleman, and then I will not disclose the affair. But if you do not come here once everyday, I will immediately tell your husband."

"I will do as you wish," said Jinlian.

"Sir, it is not necessary for me to advise you," said Grandma Wang to Ximen Qing. "This affair is now completed but you must not forget to present me with those things. If you should forget that, I should then have to inform Wu the Elder."

"You need not trouble about that," said Ximen Qing, "I will keep my promise."
The three then sat down, and drank wine until late in the afternoon when Jinlian got up and said that her husband would soon return and she must go now. She left and entered her own home through the back door, Wu the Elder came in shortly afterwards.
Being alone with Ximen Qing, Grandma Wang asked him, "Well, what do you think of my plan?"
"It all passed off very smoothly," said Ximen Qing. "I will now go to my house, and send you the sum of money I promised. How dare I not keep my word?"
"Then I will wait with great expectations," said Grandma Wang. "But do not let me beg for the money after I have rendered the service."
Ximen Qing laughed and departed. Everyday Jinlian stole into Grandma Wang's house, and there continued to meet Ximen Qing. Their feelings were like varnish, and their hearts stuck together like glue. There is an ancient saying, "Good deeds are never heard of outside the door but bad deeds are proclaimed for a thousand li." In less than a fortnight all the neighbours knew about this affair, and Wu the Elder was the only one who did not know about it.
We will now consider another matter. In the town there was a boy called Qiao of about fifteen years of age. His father had been a soldier at Yunzhou, an ancient city in Shandong and the boy was nicknamed Elder Brother Yun Ge. He was very cute, and earned a little money by selling fruit at the inns; Ximen Qing had set him up in business by advancing the small capital. One day he was hawking with a basket of "Snow Pears," and was on the lookout for Ximen Qing. Upon his inquiring if anyone had seen Ximen Qing, a man said that if he really wanted to find him he would tell him where to go.
"Well," said Yun Ge, "I you will tell me it will enable me to earn a few cash for the support of my old father."
"Well," said the bystander, "I suppose Ximen Qing is at his usual work of seducing Pan Jinlian. He goes everyday to meet her at Grandma Wang's tea-house in the Zishi Street. He will certainly be there now. As you are only a small boy, there would be no objection raised if you went inside."
The boy went straightway to the Zishi Street, and entering the tea shop saw Grandma Wang seated on a stool weaving the yarn. He put his basket down and saluted her with both hands.
"Yun Ge, what do you want here?" asked Grandma Wang.
"I am looking for an Honourable gentleman to earn a few cash from him," replied the boy.
"What 'Honourable'?"
"You know whom I am looking for," said the boy.
"What is his name?"
"His family name has two characters," replied the boy.
"What are the two characters?"
"Granny, you are only playing with me. I want to speak to the Honourable Ximen Qing." So saying he went towards the next room. But Grandma Wang was quick, and seizing his coat, she asked, "You little monkey! Where are you going? In houses there are places where you cannot go."
"I am only going to look for him inside," he said.
"You stinking monkey!" exclaimed Grandma Wang. "How could Ximen Qing be in my rooms?"
"What I do not know? But as you make money, why not let me share a little of it?"
"You little monkey!" exclaimed Grandma Wang. "What do you know?"
"You are like a chopper cutting vegetables in a wooden bowl," said the boy, "because not the least bit leaks out. If I told what I know I am afraid that the seller of cakes would make trouble."
As soon as Grandma Wang heard this, she knew that he had hold of what she thought was her secret, so she was angry and shouted at him, "You monkey! How dare you come into my house, and fart like that!"
"I am a monkey but you are a pimp!" said the boy.
She thereupon seized hold of him and boxed him on the head with her knuckles.
"What are you beating me for?"
"You thieving monkey! If you make any noise I will box your ears," said Grandma Wang.
"You brothel-keeper! You have no reason for beating me." Grandma Wang dragged him to the street door, and all the way hammered at his head. She then took his basket of snow pears, and threw them through the door, and they were scattered in all directions. That little monkey could not retaliate with force but he began to pick up the pears. Cursing, crying, picking up his pears, and pointing at the teahouse he shouted, "You old pimp! You need not get anxious, be assured that I will certainly go and tell him." He at last picked up his basket, and went off to find a man.

Fox and hare in dons are turned over;
Mandarin ducks (lovers) are roused from sleep.

Wu Sung turned around and saw that it was his elder brother.
Both of them were greatly delighted by their reunion, and Wu the Elder invited Wu Sung to his home where he ushered him to a seat in the upstairs room and called Chin-lien out to meet him. Then he said, "The man who killed the tiger on Ching-yang Ridge the other day is your brother-in-law. Now he has just been appointed to the post of police captain. He and I are brothers from the same womb."
The woman:
Stepping forward and saluting him with folded hands, said, "Many felicitations, Brother-in-law."
Wu Sung returned her salutation by kneeling down to kowtow but the woman attempted to help him to his feet, saying, "Please rise, Brother-in-law. You'll be the death of me yet."
"Accept my salutation, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung. The two of them dickered politely for a while and ended up kowtowing to each other before getting to their feet.
After a brief interval Wu the Elder's daughter served tea to the two of them. Wu Sung saw that the woman was extremely seductive and merely lowered his head. Before long Wu the Elder took it upon himself to provide food and drink for Wu Sung's entertainment and, leaving the two of them to their conversation, went downstairs to buy the necessary provisions. The woman was left upstairs all by herself to keep Wu Sung company.
Chin-lien looked at Wu Sung and saw that:
His physique was awe-inspiring, and
His appearance was imposing.
His body seemed to be possessed of boundless strength. Were this not so, how could he have overcome the tiger?
"They are brothers, born of the same mother," she thought to herself, "and yet one of them is so big and strong. If I'd been married to him I might have gotten by somehow or other. But look at that Three-inch Mulberry-bark Manikin of mine! He's only:
Three parts human, and
Seven parts ghoul.[66]
I must have been so plague-stricken in a previous incarnation that I'm still suffering the ill effects to this day. Wu Sung certainly looks manly enough to me. Why don't I see if I can get him to move in with us here? Who knows? This may turn out to be the very love-match I've been waiting for."
Making herself all smiles, the woman asked, "Brother-in-law, where are you staying right now, and who's looking after your meals?"
"I've just been appointed to the post of captain," Wu Sung said, "so I have to be on duty everyday to await the orders of my superiors. For the sake of convenience I'm making do with lodgings right in front of the district yamen. Two local recruits are detailed everyday to act as my orderlies and take care of my meals."
"Brother-in-law," the woman said, "why don't you move in with us here? It would save you the trouble of having to put up with the services of those orderlies from the yamen who probably aren't any too sanitary where food is concerned. It's more convenient if we all live under the same roof. Then, if you happen to want some soup or something, I can make it for you myself, and you'll know it's safe to eat."
"Thank you very much, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung.
"You must have a wife somewhere," the woman went on. "Why don't you bring her along and introduce her to us?"
"I've never gotten married," said Wu Sung.
"How old are you, Brother-in-law?" the woman asked.
"I'm twenty-seven," said Wu Sung.
"It so happens that you're just three years older than I am," the woman said. "Where have you come from on this occasion, Brother-in-law?"
"I've been living in Ts'ang-chou for more than a year," Wu Sung said. "I thought my brother was still living in our old house and had no idea he had moved here."
"It's a long story,"
the woman said. "Ever since I married your elder brother, people have taken advantage of his good-heartedness. That's why we had to move here. If he were only a real man like you, Brother-in-law, who would dare to say him nay?"
"My brother has always minded his own business," said Wu Sung. "He doesn't allow himself to lose his temper the way I do."
"You've got it all backward," laughed the woman. "As the saying goes:
If you aren't tough enough,
You will never be secure.[67]
I've always been quick-tempered myself, and could never abide the sort of person who:
If you hit him three times won't turn around; but
If you hit him a fourth time goes into a spin."[68]
There is a poem that testifies to this:
Brother and sister-in-law happen to meet
like floating duckweed;
With a seductive air she insists on flaunting her beauty.
In her heart she only wants him to make love to her;
With deceptive words she sets out to inveigle Wu Sung.[69]
It so happens that this woman was the sort who is forever protesting her own virtue.
Wu Sung said, "My brother is not a troublemaker, so you have nothing to worry about, Sister-in-law."
Before the two of them had finished speaking, Wu the Elder returned from his shopping expedition, laden with meat and vegetables, fruit and pastries. Putting these down in the kitchen he started up the stairs and called out, "My dear, why don't you come downstairs and fix these things for us?"
"Just see what an ignoramus he is!" the woman responded. "Here you are, Brother-in-law, with no one to entertain you, and he wants me to go downstairs and abandon you."
"Please don't inconvenience yourself on my account, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung.
"Why don't you go next door and ask Godmother Wang if she could help out?" the woman demanded. "Can't you ever figure things out for yourself?" Wu the Elder did as he was bidden and Dame Wang prepared everything very nicely, bringing it upstairs and setting it out on the table for them. The fare consisted of fish and meat, fruit and vegetables, sweetmeats, and the like. As soon as the wine was heated, Wu the Elder asked his wife to play the role of host, with Wu Sung sitting across from her, while he took a seat to one side. When the three of them had sat down at their places Wu the Elder took up the wine and poured a little for each of them.
Picking up her winecup the woman said, "Brother-in-law, don't take it amiss but we've nothing to offer you. Please try a cup of this watery wine."
"Thank you, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung. "Please don't talk that way any more."
Wu the Elder was so preoccupied with running up and down stairs to heat and pour the wine that he could hardly concern himself with what went on between them.
The woman gave Wu Sung:
Such a smile you could have plucked it off her face,[70]
while her mouth was full of nothing but "Brother-in-law this and Brother-in-law that." "Why don't you help yourself to the meat, or some fruit?" she asked, and she picked out the best tidbits and put them on his plate with her own chopsticks.
Now Wu Sung was a man of straightforward temperament and took this to be no more than his sister-in-law's cordiality. How could he have known that this woman had started her career as a serving maid and become adept at the art of playing up to others? He was quite unaware that in her heart she had designs on him. Wu the Elder, on the other hand, was too naïve to be any good at entertaining guests.
By the time the woman had downed a few cups of wine with Wu Sung she couldn't take her eyes off him. Wu Sung was embarrassed by the way she looked at him and merely lowered his head without responding to her. After they had been drinking for a while the wine ran out and he got up to go. Wu the Elder said, "If you haven't anything else to do, Brother, why not have another cup or two before you go?"
"I've troubled you enough," said Wu Sung. "I'll come and see you again, Brother and Sister-in-law."
When they had seen him downstairs and out the door the woman said, "Brother-in-law, be sure you don't forget to come and move in with us here. People will laugh at us if you don't. After all, you're blood brothers. It's not as though you were anyone else. Besides, if you can stick up for us, you'll actually be doing us a favour."
"Since you're so hospitable, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung, "I'll get my things and move in this very evening."
"Brother-in-law," the woman said, "be sure you don't forget. I'll be waiting for you." Truly:
The natural beauty of the vista remains unseen;
In spring the peach blossoms bloom
all by themselves.[71]
There is a poem that testifies to this:
How reprehensible is Chin-lien
whose schemes are deep;
She conceals her wanton intent though her desires are in a tumult.
Wu Sung is steadfast and true,
not easily tempted;
The shining integrity of his name is worth ten thousand pieces of gold.[72]
That day the woman outdid herself in her efforts to please him.
To resume our story, Wu Sung returned to the inn in front of the district yamen where he had been staying, collected his luggage and bedroll, got his orderlies to carry them for him, and led the way to his brother's house. When the woman saw him she was happier than she would have been if she had:

Discovered a piece of gold or a precious stone.[73]
Then she swept out a room and fixed it up nicely for him. Wu Sung sent the orderlies back to the yamen and slept that night at his brother's house.
The next day he arose early and the woman also got up hastily and heated water for him so he could wash his face. Wu Sung washed, combed his hair, put on his turban, and headed out the door to make the morning roll call at the yamen.
"Brother-in-law," the woman said, "after the roll call is over come back for something to eat as soon as you can. Don't go anywhere else for your meals."
Wu Sung assented and then went to the yamen to be in time for roll call. When he returned home after putting in a morning on duty he found that the woman had prepared a full-course meal. After the three of them had finished eating, the woman brought Wu Sung a cup of tea and served it to him with both hands.
"I'm really imposing on you, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung. "It makes me:
Too uncomfortable to sleep or eat in peace.[74]
Tomorrow I'll have the yamen send an orderly over to help out."
"Brother-in-law," the woman retorted, "how can you make so much of it? Our own flesh and blood! It's not as though I were waiting on anyone else. It's true we've got this little chit, Ying-erh but when I see the way she:
Picks up this and then picks up that,
Floundering about all over the place, there's no way I can rely on her. And even if you arrange for an orderly, he won't be any too sanitary where food is concerned. I really can't abide people like that."
"If that's the way it is, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung, "I guess I'll just have to impose on you."
There is a poem that testifies to this:
Wu Sung's demeanor is really awe-inspiring;
His sister-in-law's wantonness can not be checked.
She inveigles him into coming to live
under the same roof;
In order to share the clouds and rain in a romantic affair.[75]
To make a long story short, after moving into his brother's home Wu Sung took out some silver and gave it to Wu the Elder in order to buy pastries, tea, and fruit to entertain the neighbours on either side. The neighbours, on their part, clubbed together to return the treat, and Wu the Elder, in due course, reciprocated.
But no more of this.
After several days had gone by, Wu Sung presented his sister-in-law with a bolt of variegated satin to make a dress for herself.
With an ingratiating smile the woman said, "Brother-in-law, this will never do. But since you've already given it to me, I can't very well refuse, can I? I guess I'll just have to accept." And she bowed to him, saying, "Many felicitations."
From this time on Wu Sung lived in his brother's home. Wu the Elder continued to shoulder his load and go out into the streets to sell his steamed wheat cakes as before. Wu Sung went to the yamen everyday to report for duty and no matter whether he:
Returned early or returned late,
the woman would:
Cook some soup or cook a meal,
As though nothing in Heaven or Earth could
make her happier.
This only had the effect of making Wu Sung feel more uncomfortable.
From time to time the woman would try to arouse him with a suggestive comment but Wu Sung was an adamantly straightforward man and did not rise to the bait.
When there is a story to tell it is long;
When there is no story to tell it is short.
Before anyone knew it more than a month had gone by. It was now the eleventh month and a strong north wind began to blow, day after day. In every quarter what should appear but:
Dense masses of dark clouds,
and all of a sudden:
Fluttering and swirling,
A skyful of auspicious snow came flying down.
Behold:
To the tune "Immortal at the River"
For ten thousand li dark clouds are densely massed;
In midair the auspicious omen
ripples the blinds;
The petals of alabaster flowers dance before the eaves.
It was at just such a time,
on the Shan River,
That Wang Hui-chih's boat,
was immersed.[76]
In an instant the towers and terraces
are weighted down;
Rivers and mountains are linked by an expanse of silver;
Flying salt and scattered powder
fill the sky.
Such was the occasion when
Lü Meng-cheng,
In his dilapidated kiln, bemoaned his penury.[77]
The snow continued to fall that day until the first watch and made everything look like:
A world decorated with silver;
A universe carved out of jade.
The next day Wu Sung reported to the yamen in time for the morning roll call, as usual, and had not yet returned home at noon. Wu the Elder had long since allowed himself to be hustled out of the house by his wife to ply his trade. Now she asked Dame Wang, next door, to buy her some meat and wine, and then went into Wu Sung's room and lit a brazier of charcoal.
"Today I'll give his cinders a real stirring," she thought to herself. "Never fear, he's bound to catch fire."
Cold as it was, the woman stood inside the hanging blind at the door, all by herself, until she caught sight of Wu Sung:
Trampling the scattered fragments of alabaster and jade,
as he made his way homeward through the snow.
The woman raised the blind to let him in and said with a smile, "Brother-in-law, you must be cold."
"Thanks for your concern, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung.
He came in the door and took off his broad-brimmed felt hat. The woman reached out her hand to take it from him but Wu Sung said, "Don't bother, Sister-in-law," and proceeded to brush off the snow and hang it on the wall himself. Then he unfastened his belt, took off his parrot-green silk jacket, and went into his room.
"I've been waiting for you all morning, Brother-in-law," the woman said. "Why didn't you come home for breakfast?"
"A friend of mine treated me to a meal this morning," said Wu Sung. "Just now another one invited me for a drink but I couldn't be bothered, and came straight home."
"In that case, warm yourself at the fire, Brother-in-law," the woman said.
"That's just what I need," said Wu Sung, who proceeded to take off his waxed boots, change his socks, put on a pair of warm slippers, pull over a bench, and seat himself next to the brazier.
By this time the woman had already told Ying-erh to shut the front door and check to see that the back door was closed also. Then she put the wine on to heat, prepared a few dishes of food, brought them into his room, and laid them out on the table.
"Where is my brother?" Wu Sung asked.
"Your brother has gone out to peddle his wares as he does everyday," said the woman, "but I'll share three cups with you, Brother-in-law."
"I'd just as soon wait till he gets home," said Wu Sung.
"Why should we wait for him?" the woman said.
Before she had finished speaking the little girl, Ying-erh, appeared with a flagon of warmed wine.
"You needn't have gone to so much trouble, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung. "Let me do the honours."
The woman also pulled over a bench and sat down next to the brazier. The table was already set. Picking up a cup of wine and holding it out to him in her hand, she looked at Wu Sung and said, "Bottoms up, Brother-in-law."
Wu Sung took the cup of wine and:
Drained it in one gulp.
The woman refilled it and said, "The weather's cold, Brother-in-law. Have another cup. It takes two to make a couple."
"Why don't you help yourself, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung but he took the cup of wine and again:
Drained it in one gulp.
Wu Sung then poured a cupful of wine and offered it to the woman, who accepted and swallowed it. Picking up the flagon, she refilled the cup and put it in front of Wu Sung. Then and there:
Her creamy breasts slightly exposed, and
Her cloudy locks half askew, the woman said to him with an ingratiating smile, "I've heard people say, Brother-in-law, that you're keeping a singing girl on the street in front of the district yamen. Is that true?"
"Sister-in-law, you shouldn't pay any attention to the nonsense people talk," said Wu Sung. "I've never been that sort of person."
"I don't believe you," the woman said. "I only fear that:
Your mouth is not in harmony with your heart."
"If you don't believe me, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung, "just ask my brother and see what he says."
"Ai-ya!" the woman said, "why bring him into it? What does he know about anything? For him:
Life and death are but a drunken dream.[78]
If he knew the score he wouldn't be peddling steamed wheat cakes. Brother-in-law, have another drink."
By the time a few more rounds had been poured and drunk the woman had reached that state in which:
Three cups of wine in the stomach
ignite the flames of desire.
How could she hope to repress
the fire of lust in her heart?
But she merely continued her idle conversation.
Wu Sung was now 80 or 90 percent aware of what was going on but he merely lowered his head without responding to her.
The woman got up and went to heat some more wine, leaving Wu Sung alone in the room. He picked up the fire tongs and started to poke up the fire in the brazier. After a while, when the wine had been heated, she came back into the room. Holding the flagon in one hand, she reached out with the other and gave Wu Sung a pinch on the shoulder, saying, "Brother-in-law, if that's all you've got on, you must be cold, aren't you?"
Wu Sung was already more than a little uncomfortable about the situation but did not pay any attention to her. When the woman saw that he did not respond, she grabbed the fire tongs out of his hand and said, "Brother-in-law, you don't know how to stir up a flame. Let me show you how. It's got to be red-hot or it won't do any good."
Wu Sung had nearly reached the end of his fuse but did not make any reply. Without noticing that he was upset, the woman dropped the fire-tongs and poured a cupful of wine. She took a sip from this herself, leaving the cup more than half full. Then, looking at Wu Sung, she said, "If you share my feelings, you'll drink the rest of my cup."
Wu Sung grabbed the cup away from her and threw its contents on the floor, saying, "Sister-in-law, how can you be so shameless!"
At the same time, he gave her a push with his hand that nearly knocked her over. Opening his eyes wide, Wu Sung said, "I'm the sort of man who:
Stands erect between Heaven and Earth,[79]
With teeth in his mouth and hair on his head:[80]

I'm not the sort of pig or dog who:
Poses a threat to public morality,[81] or violates the standards of human decency. Sister-in-law, this kind of shameless behavior must cease! From now on:
If the wind so much as stirs a blade of grass,[82]
My eyes may recognize you as my sister-in-law,
But my fists won't recognize you.[83]
Let's have no more of this."
The woman's face turned bright red as she listened to this tirade. Calling in Ying-erh to clear the saucers, cups, and other utensils from the table, she muttered under her breath, "I was only kidding. It's hardly worth taking so seriously.
You wouldn't know a favour if you saw one."
As soon as the table was cleared she retired to the kitchen. There is a poem that testifies to this:
Chin-lien's disreputable schemes are all too wicked;
Wanton and shameless, she knows no behavioral norms.
Even at table she seeks the consolation of clouds and rain;
Only to find herself subjected to the captain's reprimand.[84]
Not only did the woman discover that Wu Sung would not respond to her advances but she got a good verbal drubbing for her pains.
Wu Sung remained in his room, still fuming, and thinking to himself. Before long it was five o'clock in the afternoon and Wu the Elder, with his carrying pole over his shoulder, made his way home through the snow. After pushing open the door and putting down his load he came into the room and saw that his wife's eyes were red with weeping.
"Who've you been quarreling with?" he asked.
"It's all your fault," the woman said. "You never stick up for yourself, and you allow other people to take advantage of me."
"Who would dare take advantage of you?" Wu the Elder demanded.
"You know perfectly well who it is," the woman replied. "It's really intolerable! That bastard, Wu the Second! When I saw him come home through the snow I went to the trouble of fixing some wine and food for him. Then, when he saw there was no one about, he tried to proposition me. Ying-erh saw it with her own eyes. I'm not making it up."
"My brother isn't that sort of person," stated Wu the Elder. "He's always been an honourable man. Keep your voice down! The neighbours will laugh at us if they hear you."
Leaving his wife where she was, Wu the Elder went into Wu Sung's room and said, "Brother, if you haven't had an afternoon snack yet, I'll have something to eat with you."
Wu Sung made no reply. Instead, after thinking for a while, he took off his silk slippers and pulled his waxed boots back onto his feet. Then he put on his jacket and his wide-brimmed felt hat, fastened his belt, and strode out the front door.
"Brother, where are you going?" Wu the Elder called after him but Wu Sung made no reply and proceeded straight on his way.
Wu the Elder went back into the house to interrogate his wife. "He didn't even respond when I called to him," he said. "He just headed along the street toward the front gate of the district yamen. I really don't know what's the matter with him."
"You lousy muddleheaded worm!" his wife railed at him. "What's so hard to see about it? The bastard's so ashamed of himself he doesn't have the face to confront you, so he's walked out on you. I'll bet he sends someone to fetch his luggage and refuses to live here any longer. I wouldn't put it past you to urge him to stay!"
"If he moves out people will laugh at us," Wu the Elder said.
"You muddleheaded troll!" his wife cursed. "If he starts playing around with me, no one will laugh at us I suppose! Go stay with him; if that's what you want to do; but I'm not the kind of person to put up with this sort of thing. Just give me a writ of divorce and you can have him all to yourself!"
Wu the Elder scarcely dared open his mouth again in response to this tirade from his wife. The two of them were still going at it when who should appear but Wu Sung, with an orderly in tow, who walked right into the house with his carrying pole, picked up his luggage, and headed out the door.
Wu the Elder ran outside and called after him, "Brother, why are you moving out like this?"
"Don't ask, Brother," said Wu Sung. "If I tried to explain, it would only serve to publicize the problem. Just let me go my own way."
Wu the Elder dared ask nothing more about it and let Wu Sung do as he wished. Inside the house, his wife continued to rail away. "A fine thing it's, too! Just as they say, it's not easy to collect a debt from a relative. All anybody knows is that you've a younger brother who's been made a captain, and everyone assumes that he's supporting his brother and sister-in-law in fine style. What they don't know is that he's just a sponger. In fact: he's a real quince: good to look at but not fit to eat.[85] Now that he's moved out, all I can say is: thanks be to Heaven and Earth; at long last my enemy has been removed from my sight."[86]
When Wu the Elder heard his wife utter these imprecations, he did not know what to make of it and remained in a state of mental perturbation. After Wu Sung moved back into his room in the inn in front of the district yamen, Wu the Elder continued to go out on the street and peddle his steamed wheat cakes as before. He wanted to look up his brother and have a talk with him but his wife forbade him directly to have anything to do with him. For this reason, Wu the Elder did not dare seek out Wu Sung. A poem testifies to this:
Chin-lien's dream of clouds and rain did not materialize;
Who would believe that this evoked hostility in her heart?
Thus did she contrive to get Wu Sung out of the way;
And sow enmity between brothers of the same flesh and blood.[87]
In making this match, the Old Man under the Moon[1] has made a mistake;
Displaying her talents, P'an Chin-lien flaunts her beauty.
Merely because she dreams of assignations under the moon, beneath the stars;
She attracts the attentions of those beyond the door, outside the screen.
Tempted by greed, Dame Wang employs a crafty scheme;
Peddling his fruit, Yün-ko becomes the object of rancor.[2]
How can she foresee that a later day will bring domestic disaster;
That her blood will spatter the standing screen and make the whole floor red?
Wu Sung had no sooner moved out of his elder brother's house than, in a snap of the fingers, the snow stopped and the weather cleared. This state of affairs prevailed for more than ten days.
To resume our story, two years and more had elapsed since the district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho assumed office, and during that time he had been able to put away a tidy sum in gold and silver. It now occurred to him that he should find a trustworthy person to deliver these valuables into the hands of a relative in the Eastern Capital[3] for safekeeping. When he reported to the capital for an audience at the expiration of his three-year term they would come in handy in fixing things up with his superiors. The only problem was that the roads were infested with criminal elements so that he would have to find a fairly formidable person for the task. Suddenly he thought to himself, "That captain, Wu Sung, with his heroic combination of courage and strength, is the very man for the job."
The same day he called Wu Sung into the yamen to discuss this matter, saying, "I have a relative who is serving as an official in the Eastern Capital. His name is Chu Mien, [4] and he holds the post of defender-in-chief in the Palace Command. I'd like to send a consignment of presents to him, along with a letter asking after his health but I'm afraid that the roads may not be safe. You're the only person I can trust with such a responsibility, and I hope you won't refuse on account of the hardships involved. When you return, of course, I'll see that you are amply rewarded."
"Your Honour has already done so much for me," responded Wu Sung, "that I could hardly refuse. Since you have a mission for me to perform, I'll set off at once. Actually, I've never been to the Eastern Capital, so Your Honour is only doing me another favour by giving me this chance to take in the sights of the big city."
The district magistrate was delighted and rewarded Wu Sung with three cups of wine, along with ten taels of silver for his traveling expenses. But no more of this.
To resume our story, after Wu Sung had received his instructions from the district magistrate, he walked out the gate of the yamen and went by his lodging place to pick up an orderly. Then he stopped on the street to buy a bottle of wine and some groceries and proceeded straight to his brother's house. Wu the Elder happened to come home at about the same time and when he found Wu Sung waiting for him on the doorstep, he invited him inside and instructed the orderly to go into the kitchen and start fixing the food.
The smouldering feelings of the lady of the house had not been completely extinguished. When she saw Wu Sung arrive, with wine and food in hand, she thought to herself, "That bastard must not be able to get me off his mind, otherwise why should he come back like this? He may well have found me too much for him after all. I'll have to feel him out gradually."
Hurrying upstairs to:
Retouch her powdered face, and Recomb her cloudy locks,
she changed into a more attractive outfit and proceeded to the doorway to welcome Wu Sung.
Bowing as she spoke, the woman said, "Brother-in-law, I don't know what sort of misunderstanding could have arisen to keep you from paying us a visit for such a long time. I've been at my wit's end over it. Everyday I've told your brother to go to the yamen to look for you and try to make it up some way but when he comes home he says you're nowhere to be found. I'm certainly glad you've stopped by again today but what did you have to go and waste your money like that for?"
"There's something I particularly want to tell my brother," said Wu Sung.
"In that case," said the woman, "please come upstairs and sit down."
After the three of them had ascended the stairs, Wu Sung insisted that his elder brother and his wife take the seats of honour, while he pulled up a stool and sat to one side. The orderly served the wine and brought up a hot meal to go with it.
Wu Sung urged his brother and sister-in-law to eat. As they did so the woman kept glancing at Wu Sung but he paid no attention to anything but his wine. After several rounds of drinks, Wu Sung asked Ying-erh to bring a set of pledge cups and then told the orderly to fill one of them with wine.
Taking this cup in his hand, he looked at Wu the Elder and said, "My respects to you, Elder Brother. Earlier today His Honour, the district magistrate, commissioned me to carry out some business for him in the Eastern Capital that will require me to set out tomorrow. At the most I should be away for two or three months, and at the least I should be back in a month. There is something I have come here especially to tell you. You have always been of a meek disposition, and I fear that while I am away people may try to take advantage of you. If you normally sell ten trays of steamed wheat cakes in a day, starting tomorrow, make only five trays. Go out late and come back early, and don't stop to have a drink with anyone. Take down the blind and close the door as soon as you get home. That ought to put a stop to any idle chatter. If someone does try to take advantage of you, don't make an issue of it but wait until I get back and let me handle it for you. If you're willing to do as I suggest, Elder Brother, drink this cup to the bottom."
Accepting the cup, Wu the Elder said, "Your suggestions are good, Brother. I'll do just as you say," and drained it to the bottom.
Wu Sung then filled another cup and said to the woman, "You are a clever person, Sister-in-law, so there's no need for me to say more than a few words. My brother is ingenuous by nature, and totally dependent on you where decisions are concerned. As the saying goes:
Outer strength is no match for inner strength.[5]
If my sister-in-law does a good job of managing the household, what will my brother have to worry about? You must be familiar with the old saying:
If the fence is secure dogs won't get in.[6]
No sooner did the woman hear these words than:
A spot of red appeared beside each ear, and
In an instant her whole face was purple.
Pointing her finger at Wu The Elder, she launched into a tirade of vituperation. "You muddleheaded creature! If you had anything to complain about, why did you have to go and spill it to someone else so he could take such a high tone with me?
I may not wear a turban but I'm a match
for any man;
I may be only a woman but I'm a real
dingdong dame.
I can lift a man on my fist,
Carry a horse on my arm, and
Trample on anyone else's face.[7]
I'm not the sort of:
Blood-sucking tick that buries itself in the skin
so you can't dig it out.[8]
Ever since I've been married to Wu the Elder not even an ant has dared to come into the house. What's all this about dogs getting in if the fence isn't secure? You'd better lay off that:
Wild and nonsensical talk.
Every word of an accusation has got to have a basis in fact.
If you throw a brick into the air,
It will come down to earth every time."[9]
Wu Sung laughed and said, "If you take charge in that way, Sister-in-law, everything will be fine; just as long as:
Your heart and your mouth are in agreement,[10]
but not if:
Your heart is not in harmony with your mouth.
In any case, if that's the way it is, Sister-in-law, I'll remember everything you've said. Please drain this cup."
Pushing the winecup aside with one hand, the woman jumped up and started to run downstairs but before she had gotten half way down she stopped and said, "Since you're so smart you must know the saying that:
An elder brother's wife is like a mother:[11]
When I first married Wu the Elder I didn't hear anything about a brother-in-law. Where do you think you come off anyway:
Acting like a relative whether you are one or not,[12] and demanding to play the role of head of the family? It's just my luck to run into this kind of crap!"
She then proceeded the rest of the way down the stairs, crying as she went. There is a poem that testifies to this:
Good advice proves bitter to the taste,
as do words of admonition;
Chin-lien resents him for this and throws a tantrum.
So mortified, herself, that she can scarcely remain at table;

She arouses the anger of the hero,
young Wu the Second.[13]
The woman succeeded in putting on quite a scene. Wu the Elder and Wu Sung felt so uncomfortable that after a few more cups of wine they came downstairs and bade each other farewell with tears in their eyes.
"After you've gone, Brother," said Wu the Elder, "come back and see me as soon as you can."
"Brother," said Wu Sung, "it would be just as well if you didn't do any business at all but just sat at home. I could send someone to provide you with living expenses."
And just before he left Wu Sung said to him again, "Brother, don't forget what I've told you. Be careful not to let anyone into your house."
"I understand," said Wu the Elder.
Wu Sung took leave of his brother and returned to his lodgings in front of the district yamen where he got together his luggage and the weapons he would need to protect himself on the trip. The next day he took charge of the district magistrate's consignment of presents, checked to see that the gold and silver were properly packed in saddlebags, obtained the waybill authorizing the shipment, and set off on his way to the Eastern Capital. But no more of this.
To resume our story, after Wu the Elder allowed himself to be admonished by his younger brother, Wu Sung, he had to put up with three or four days of unremitting abuse from his wife. There was nothing he could do but:
Swallow his anger and keep his own counsel;[14] letting her curse herself out. Meanwhile, he followed his brother's advice by making only half as many steamed wheat cakes as usual everyday. After making his rounds he came home before evening and put down his carrying pole, took down the blind, and closed the front door behind him before proceeding any further into the house.
When his wife realized what he was doing she was furious and cursed him, saying, "You ignorant nincompoop! Who ever heard of:
Locking the jailhouse door while the sun is high in the sky!
Our neighbours will laugh themselves silly over this futile attempt to keep out the ghosts. You'll do anything your brother says. A lot of good your own cock and balls do you! Aren't you ashamed to make such a laughingstock of yourself?"
"Let them laugh," said Wu the Elder. "My brother's advice is for our own good and ought to put a stop to any idle chatter."
"Phooey!" the woman said, spitting right in his face, "you stupid clod! You call yourself a man, yet you can't make up your mind about anything but let yourself be manipulated by others."
"So what?" said Wu the Elder with a negative wave of the hand. "As far as I'm concerned, my brother's words are as immutable as if they were graven in bronze or stone."
It so happens that from the time that Wu Sung left town Wu the Elder went out late, came back early, and closed the front door as soon as he got home. His wife was:
So angry she scarcely cared whether she were dead or alive,
and gave him a hard time about it more than once but eventually she got used to it. From then on, around the time that Wu the Elder got home, she would take down the blind and close the front door herself. When Wu the Elder noticed this he was secretly pleased and thought to himself, "This way everything ought to be all right."
There is a poem that testifies to this:
Careful as he is to lock the door
and come home early;
There is so little love between them they are separated by peaks.
Once her desires are aroused they weave a tangled web;
Even if she were shut up in a cage
it would not avail.
Time flies like a white horse galloping past a crack;[15]
The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.
No sooner has the flowering plum blossomed
at winter's end;
Than warmer weather proclaims the return of spring.
One day in the third month, when spring was at its most beautiful, Chin-lien dressed herself up alluringly and could hardly wait for Wu the Elder's departure before taking up her position behind the bamboo blind that hung over the front door. She had become accustomed to standing there until her husband was expected home and then taking down the blind and going inside to wait for him. But this particular day was one of those occasions on which:
Something was destined to happen.
Just as she was about to take down the blind a certain person happened to walk by.
Without coincidences there would be no stories;[16]
It is those who are predestined to do so who meet.
The woman was in the very act of reaching up to take down the blind with a forked stick when a gust of wind dislodged it from her grip so that it fell,
Neither correctly nor precisely,
but right onto the hat of the passerby. As she hastened to put on an ingratiating smile she looked at him and saw that he was twenty-four or twenty-five years old and cut quite a dashing figure.
On his head he wears a tasseled hat,
Gold openwork hairpins, and
A pair of jade rings inlaid with gold;
On his long torso, a green silk jacket;
On his feet, fine-soled Ch'en-ch'iao[17] shoes, and Pure cotton stockings;
On his trouser legs, jet drawnwork kneepads.
In his hand he sports a gold-flecked Szechwan fan,
Enhancing a face as handsome as young Chang's,[18]
A countenance as good-looking as P'an Yüeh's.[19]
A man after my own heart,
As romantic as can be,
Beneath the screen he tips a wink at me.
This man, on whose head the forked stick had fallen, stopped in his tracks and was about to make trouble; but when he looked around to see who was responsible he found, to his surprise, that it was a beautiful and seductive woman. Behold, she has:
Glossy, black, raven's feather tresses;
Dark, curved, new moon eyebrows;
Clear, cold, almond eyes;
Redolently fragrant cherry lips;
A straight, full, alabaster nose;
Thickly powdered red cheeks;
A handsome, silver salver face;
A light, lissome, flowerlike figure;
Slender, jade-white, scallion-shoot fingers;
A cuddlesome, willow waist;
A tender, pouting, dough-white tummy;
Tiny, turned-up, pointed feet;
Buxom breasts; and
Fresh, white legs.
And there is something else as well:
Tight and squeezy,
Red and wrinkly,
Pale and fresh,
Black and cushioned;
Who can tell what it might be?[20]
The beauties of this woman were such that he could not look his fill. And how is she adorned? Behold:
The glossy black chignon on her head is enclosed in a fret spangled with gold,
Setting off the fragrant clouds of her hair and studded all round with hairpins.
The spit curl at her temple is embellished with a double-headed flower;
A comb of aromatic wood holds her hair in place behind.
Her arched willow-leaf eyebrows would be hard to depict;
As would the pair of peach blossoms that grace her cheeks.
Her openwork pendant earrings are beyond praise;
A glimpse of her smooth creamy bosom is beyond price.
A pale blue homespun blouse, with wide sleeves and jacket to match, Complements the embossed silk of her beige skirt.
A figured handkerchief dangles from the mouth of her sleeve;
A sachet of pomander hangs low at her waist.
The rows of frogs on her bodice are neatly fastened;
Her ankle leggings, concealed above, extend below.
The upturned points of her tiny golden lotuses
are just visible;
With a pattern of mountain peaks embroidered on the tips of their toes,
Her raven-hued shoes, with high white satin heels, are made to order for tripping the fragrant dust;
Her red silk ankle leggings are figured with orioles among the flowers;

Whether walking or sitting, the breeze parts her skirts and reveals what lies below.
From her mouth the fragrance of orchid and musk is constantly wafted;
When her cherry lips open in a smile her face breaks into bloom.
The mere sight of her makes one's "ethereal and material souls take flight";
Shown off to such advantage, she is a beautiful, if heartless, lover.
No sooner did the man catch sight of her than:
His starch began to melt, and
His anger flew to Java,[21]
as the irate look on his face changed into a broad smile.
The woman knew that she was in the wrong and, folding her hands in front of her, bowed deeply in his direction as she said, "The wind blew it right out of my hand, sir, and it happened to land on you. Please don't hold it against me."
Adjusting his hat with one hand, the man made such a low bow that he almost scraped the ground, saying as he did so, "It doesn't matter at all! Please make yourself easy, miss."
This scene happened to be witnessed by Dame Wang, whose teahouse was situated next door. Breaking into a laugh, the old lady said, "And whatever induced you to walk under these particular eaves, sir? It serves you right."
"It's really my fault," the man replied with a smile. "I've put you out, I'm afraid. Don't hold it against me, miss."
"I do hope you won't take offence, sir," the woman said.
"How could I dream of such a thing?" the man responded with a smile, and he made another low bow, during which his mischievous eyes:
Long experienced in sizing up the flowers;
Adept at assessing romantic possibilities, never left the woman's body. As he made his departure he glanced back seven or eight times before proceeding to swagger on his way, concealing his face with his fan. There is a poem that testifies to this:
In the cool breeze and genial weather
he has sauntered out for a stroll;
By chance, beneath the blind he encounters a seductive beauty.
Merely because, "on the point of departure, she gives him a meaningful glance";[22]
His desires are so aroused that he cannot call it quits.[23]
The woman, for her part, had had a good look at the man and thought to herself, "He's dashing and romantic as well as soft-spoken, and he seems to be rather taken with me; but I don't even know his name, or where he lives. If he didn't care for me he wouldn't have glanced back at me seven or eight times before going his way. Who knows? This may turn out to be the very love-match I've been waiting for."
She fixed her gaze upon the man until he was out of sight before taking down the blind, closing the front door, and going back inside.
Gentle reader take note: It is scarcely likely that such a person should not turn out to be a man of some property. It so happens that he was the decadent scion of a family of considerable wealth from whom he had inherited a wholesale pharmaceutical business located on the street that ran in front of the district yamen. He had been a dissolute young scamp since his youth and had acquired some skill in such martial arts as boxing and fencing with the quarterstaff. He also liked to gamble, and there was little he didn't know about backgammon, elephant chess, and the various word games played by breaking characters down into their component parts. Now that he had come into his inheritance and had money of his own to spend, he had gone into cahoots with the officials and functionaries in the district yamen where he played the role of influence peddler, intervening in public business on people's behalf, for a fee. For this reason everyone in the whole district was rather afraid of him.
This man bore the double surname, Hsi-men, and the single given name, Ch'ing. He was an only son, so people had been in the habit of calling him Master Hsi-men but now that he had come into his inheritance and had money of his own to spend they referred to him as the Honourable Hsi-men. Both his father and his mother were dead, and he had no siblings.
His first wife had died some time ago, leaving behind her only a single daughter. Recently he had been formally remarried to the daughter of Battalion Commander Wu of the Ch'ing-ho Left Guard but he was not above availing himself of the four or five serving maids in his establishment. Moreover he had carried on an affair with a girl named Li Chiao-erh from the licensed quarter for some time, and he had just arranged to take her into his household. On top of this he had also been maintaining an unlicensed prostitute called Cho the Second on South Street. This girl's professional name was Cho Tiu-erh, or Toss-off Cho, and he had now moved her into his household as well.
In fact, Hsi-men Ch'ing was a past master at:
Toying with the breeze and dallying with the moonlight.
Whenever he established a liaison with a woman, even one of good family, he was wont to take her into his establishment; but if she should then fail to please him in any way, however slight, he would call in a go-between and dispose of her without more ado. It was said that he sometimes resorted to the services of such brokers as often as twenty times in a single month. As a result, no one dared cross him.
Now this Honourable Hsi-men, once he had caught sight of that woman beneath the blind, went home and thought to himself, "What a fine filly! I wonder how I could get hold of her."
Suddenly he bethought himself of Dame Wang, who kept the teahouse right next door to her home. "She can surely do:
Thus and thus, and
So and so,
and help me to pull this affair off successfully. If it costs me a few taels of silver to reward her for her pains, what does it matter?"
Thereupon, without even waiting to eat, he sauntered out onto the street again, made straight for Dame Wang's teahouse, slipped in unobtrusively, and took a seat inside the beaded portiere.
"That certainly was a fat bow you took just now, sir," said Dame Wang with a laugh.
"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "come here. There's something I want to ask you. Who does that filly next door belong to?"
"She is King Yama's[24] younger sister, the daughter of the General of the Five Ways,"[25] said Dame Wang. "What do you want to know about her for?"
"I'm serious," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Stop joking."
"How is it you don't recognize her, sir?" asked Dame Wang. "Her old man's the one who sells ready-cooked food in front of the district yamen."
"You don't mean to say she's the wife of Hsü the Third who sells date cakes!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"Not him," said Dame Wang with a negative wave of her hand. "If it were him, they'd make a pair. Guess again, sir."
"She must be the wife of Li the Third who sells won-ton," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"Not him," said Dame Wang with another wave of her hand. "If it were him, they'd be well matched."
"You don't mean to say she's the wife of Little Liu the Second with the tattooed arms, do you?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Dame Wang laughed uproariously and said, "Not him. If it were him, they'd make another pair. Guess again, sir."
"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the truth of the matter is I can't guess who it is."
"In that case," said Dame Wang with a sardonic smile, "I'll tell you, sir," and she burst out laughing again. "The man whose lot it is to cover her is Wu the Elder, who peddles steamed wheat cakes on the street."
When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he stamped his feet and laughed.
"You don't mean to say he's the Wu the Elder, whom everyone calls the Three-inch Mulberry-bark Manikin, do you?"
"That's the man," said Dame Wang.
When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he groaned and said:
"How did a piece of fine mutton
End up in the mouth of such a dog?"
"It's the same old story," said Dame Wang. "It's always been true that:
The finest steed may be forced to carry an unworthy rider;
The loveliest wife must often share her bed
with a clumsy clod.[26]
That's just the way the Old Man under the Moon arranges things."
"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "how much do I owe you in the way of tea money?"
"Not much," replied Dame Wang. "Let it go for a few days. It doesn't matter."
"Who is your son, Wang Ch'ao, working for these days?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"I don't even want to talk about it," said Dame Wang. "He's gone off with a merchant from the Huai River region and hasn't come home to this day. I don't know whether he's dead or alive."
"Why doesn't he come and work for me?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He's a likely looking lad."
"If you saw fit to favour him in such a way, sir," said Dame Wang, "it would certainly be handsome of you."
"Wait till he gets home and we can talk about it again," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. When he had finished speaking he thanked her profusely, got up, and took his leave.
Before four hours had elapsed, however, he showed up again, slipping into a seat just inside the beaded portiere of Dame Wang's teahouse and directing his gaze at Wu the Elder's door. In a little while Dame Wang came out and said, "How about a damson punch, sir?"
"That would be great," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Make it good and sour."
Dame Wang prepared an order of damson punch and served it to him with both hands. When he had finished drinking it Hsi-men Ch'ing put the cup down and said, "Mother, you really know how to fix a damson. How many more have you got in the house?"
Dame Wang laughed. "I've been fixing up damsels all my life but what would I want with one for myself?"
"It was damsons I asked about," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, laughing in turn, "but you're talking about damsels. There's quite a difference between the two."
"All I heard, sir, was something about fixing damsels," said Dame Wang, "so I thought you were talking about the way I fix them up."
"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you're as good as all that at making matches, how about fixing one up for me? If you come up with a good one, I'll see that you're amply rewarded."
"You've got to be kidding, sir," said Dame Wang. "If the lady of your house found out about it, I'm afraid my head's a bit too old to stand up to being boxed about the ears."
"My wife has a most accommodating disposition," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've already got a number of bedmates at home. It's just that none of them really tickles my fancy. If you've got anything good to propose, there's no harm in bringing it up. Even someone who's been married before would be all right, as long as she tickles my fancy."
"There was one that looked pretty good just the other day," said Dame Wang, "but I'm afraid you wouldn't be interested, sir."
"If she's really a good prospect, and you can bring it off," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll reward you generously."
"She's as talented as she can be," said Dame Wang. "The only thing is she's a little along in years."
"It's always been true," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that:
A mature beauty makes a worthy mate.[27]
Even if she's been around a year or two longer than one might wish, it doesn't matter. Just how old is she anyway?"
"The lady in question," said Dame Wang, "was born in the year of the pig, so, come New Year's Day, she'll be just ninety-two."
"What a crazy old crone you are," laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The only thing you're really any good at is pulling people's legs." And when he was through laughing he got up and took his leave.
Gradually it grew dark, and Dame Wang had just lit her lamp and was about to close her door, when who should appear but Hsi-men Ch'ing. Once again he slipped inside the beaded portiere, pulled over a bench to sit on, and proceeded to gaze fixedly at Wu the Elder's door.
"How about a concord punch, sir?" asked Dame Wang.
"That would be great," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Make it good and sweet, Godmother."
Dame Wang promptly served him a cupful and Hsi-men Ch'ing drank it but he continued sitting there until it was quite late before he stood up and said, "Put it on my bill, Godmother. I'll settle the whole account tomorrow."
"Don't worry about it," said Dame Wang. "Pray let the matter rest. Drop in again tomorrow and we can discuss it then."
Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed and took his leave but when he got home he was:
Too uncomfortable to sleep or eat in peace.
He couldn't get the woman off his mind. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.
Early the following morning, when Dame Wang opened her door and looked outside, she saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing was already there, pacing back and forth in the street. "This sucker is certainly impatient enough," she thought to herself. "Just watch me:
Stick some sugar candy on the tip of his nose
Where he can't quite get at it with his tongue.[28]
That bastard is always presuming on his connections in the yamen to take advantage of people. Now that he's fallen into my hands I might as well make him pay for his fun by lining my nest with a few strings of cash."
It so happens that this Dame Wang, the proprietress of the teahouse, was not the sort to abide by her lot. In fact, for years she had:
Played the procuress,
Made a living as a matchmaker,
Peddled human flesh,

Been a broker,
Meddled in midwifery,
Acted as accoucheur, and
Revealed a knack for every sort of knavery.
And she had yet another accomplishment that doesn't bear mentioning:
She could jab a needle through the chignon, and
Inject solder into the cranial cavity.
Truly, this old lady's skills were such as to evade easy detection. Behold:
When she starts to speak,
she excels Lu Chia;[29]
When she opens her mouth,
she surpasses Sui Ho.[30]
She relies on the lethal lips that persuaded the Six States;[31]
She depends on the trenchant tongue that won the dominions of Ch'i.[32]
The solitary male phoenix and its female counterpart,
Are in a trice transformed into a couple;
The lonely widow and
bereft widower,
Are by a single speech induced to form a pair.
She knows how to inveigle the young lady locked behind triple gates,
Into a tryst with the immortal
within his nine-tiered palace.
The Golden Lad who tends the incense within the halls of the Jade Emperor;[33]
She can drag hither
by the arm;
The Jade Maiden who transmits messages in the palace of the Queen Mother of the West;[34]
She can embrace
around the waist.
She has but to put in motion
one of her crafty schemes,
In order to induce an arhat
to cosy up to a bhikshuni.
She has but to resort to one of her devices,
In order to cause Devarāja Lī[35]
to embrace Hārītī.[36]
Once exposed to her sweet suasions
and inviting arguments,
Even such a paragon as Feng Chih[37]
would start to get ideas:
When confronted with her winning words
and beguiling promises,
Even so chaste a goddess as Ma-ku[38]
would find her equanimity disturbed.
"Concealing the head of the matter while revealing the tail,"[39]
She incites even the Weaving Maid[40]
to thoughts of love;
"Playing the role of intermediary in passion's heats and chills,"[41]
She prevails upon Ch'ang-o[42] herself to take a lover:[43]
Truly, this old lady was:
Adept at manipulating the breeze and the moonlight
to her own advantage;
Constantly to be seen in the law courts
as an instigator of quarrels.
The old lady had just opened for business and was engaged in getting her teakettles ready when she caught sight of Hsi-men Ch'ing. After pacing back and forth a few more times he slipped hurriedly inside the beaded portiere and proceeded to stare fixedly at the blind over Wu the Elder's door. Dame Wang pretended not to notice and continued to fan up the fire in her stove rather than coming out to take her customer's order.
"Godmother," called out Hsi-men Ch'ing, "make me two cups of tea."
"Oh, it's you, sir," responded Dame Wang. "Long time no see. Please have a seat."
In no time at all she brought two cups of strong tea and set them down on the table.
"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "come have a cup of tea with me."
"I'm not the one you're after," said Dame Wang with a laugh. "Why should I have a cup of tea with you?"
Hsi-men Ch'ing also laughed a while and then asked, "Godmother, what do your neighbours have for sale?"
"Their stock in trade," replied Dame Wang, "is fried doughballs, cured coney, stuffed patty-cake, baked buns, noodles with cockle sauce, and hot Schlag in cider."[44]
"Why you crazy old crone," laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing, "all you can do is joke."
"It's no joke," Dame Wang laughed back at him, "she's got an old man of her own."
"I'm serious," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If her husband can make good steamed wheat cakes, I'd like to buy forty or fifty of them to take home with me."
"If all you want to do is buy wheat cakes," said Dame Wang, "he'll be back in a while and you can buy them then. What need is there to pay a formal call?"
"You're right, Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, who then drank his tea, sat a little longer, stood up, and took his leave.
Sometime later, as Dame Wang was tending her teashop, she looked out with a sardonic eye only to see another vision of Hsi-men Ch'ing. He was pacing back and forth in front of the door. First he would head east, then turn around and go west, only to repeat the process again and again. This happened seven or eight times in a row. Finally he came right into the teashop.
"This must be my lucky day, sir," said Dame Wang. "It seems like ages since I saw you last."
Hsi-men Ch'ing started to laugh and then fumbled for a tael of silver that he handed to Dame Wang with the words, "Godmother, why don't you take this for the time being to cover my tea money?"
"Why so much?" asked Dame Wang with a smile.
"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if it's too much, keep the difference."
"I've got him," the old lady thought to herself. "This is one sucker who's going to get what's coming to him. I might as well take his money. It'll come in handy to pay the rent."
Then she said out loud, "You look a little thirsty to me, sir. How about a well-steeped cup of tea?"
"How'd you guess what I wanted, Godmother?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"What's so hard to guess about that?" said the old lady. "It's always been true that:
When someone comes in the door don't bother
to ask how he's doing;
One look at his face will suffice
to give you the answer.[45]
I've guessed the answers to a lot of stranger things than that in my day."
"There is something I've got on my mind," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If you can guess what it is, Godmother, I'll give you five taels of silver."
Dame Wang laughed. "There's no need for any:
Three conjectures and five guesses.
One conjecture will be quite enough for my guess to hit the bull's-eye. Come a little closer, sir, so I can whisper in your ear. The last two days:
Your footsteps have been fidgety, and
Your inquiries incessant.
Surely it's because you've got my next-door neighbour on your mind. How's that for a guess?"
Hsi-men Ch'ing began to laugh. "Godmother," he said, "truly:
In intelligence you rival Sui Ho;
In resourcefulness you outdo Lu Chia.
There's no reason for me to deceive you. I don't know why it is but ever since I caught sight of her when she was taking down the blind the other day, it's been just as though she had stolen away my three ethereal and my seven material souls. Day and night I can't get her off my mind. When I'm at home I don't even feel like eating or drinking and am far too distracted to work. I wonder if there's anything you could do to help me out?"
Dame Wang gave a cynical laugh. "There's no reason for me to deceive you either, sir. I get a customer in my teashop about as often as the devil plays night watchman. Three years ago, when it snowed so heavily on the third day of the sixth month, I sold a cup of tea but I haven't been able to make a go of it since. The only thing that keeps me going is the occasional odd job."
"And what, may I ask, do you mean, Godmother, by the occasional odd job?" demanded Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Dame Wang laughed. "When I was only thirty-five my old man kicked off and left me with this youngster but without any means of livelihood. At first I tried my hand at matchmaking. Then I went round collecting people's old clothes to sell. I offered my services as an accoucheur and then as a midwife. When the occasion arises I dabble in pandering and procuring. I can also perform acupuncture, moxabustion, and other medical services. And, lastly, I treat the 'proper tea' of every customer as though it were my own."[46]
When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he burst into laughter. "I had no idea you were as talented as all that, Godmother. If you can actually pull this affair off for me, I'll give you ten taels of silver toward the cost of your coffin. All I want you to do is to arrange a meeting between this filly and myself."
This proposal elicited a hearty laugh from Dame Wang. A poem testifies to this:

That wastrel, Hsi-men Ch'ing, had the wildest ideas; he was willing to go to any lengths to get his way with a woman.
But it was the proprietress of the teahouse, old Dame Wang who engineered the tryst between the Goddess of Witches' Mountain and King Hsiang.[47]
Beauty does not delude people, they delude themselves;[1]
But if they become deluded they will suffer the consequences.
Their vitality will be dissipated, their countenances grow pale;
The marrow in their bones will dry up and their strength will wane.
Those who engage in fornication find that their families will break up;

Once venereal disease is contracted it is difficult to cure.
As always, "A full stomach and warm body give rise to disorder;" [2]
Those for whom disaster is imminent never seem to realize it.

Hsi-men Ch'ing said to Dame Wang, "The only thing I'm interested in is a tryst with this filly."

"Godmother," he went on to say, "if you can really arrange this for me, I'll give you ten taels of silver."

"Listen to me, sir," said Dame Wang. "Generally speaking, the words 'garnering the glow' refer to a most difficult matter. Do you know what this term 'garnering the glow' means? It's just another way of referring to what is commonly known as an illicit affair. Now there are five prerequisites that must be possessed by anyone who wishes to consummate such an affair: He must have the

1: looks of P'an Yüeh,
2: member of a donkey,[3]
3: wealth of Teng T'ung,[4]
4: youth and resilience of a 'needle in a wad of cotton.' (something sharp or dangerous, the nature of which is disguised by a soft exterior.)
5: leisure.

Only if you possess all these prerequisites that are known for short as 'looks, member, wealth, youth, and leisure,'[6] can you hope to consummate such an affair."

"To tell you the truth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I happen to have all five. As for the first: although I may not be as handsome as P'an Yüeh, I can certainly pass muster. As for the second: in my younger days I frequented the streets and alleys of the licensed quarter and reared a 'turtle' [7] of prodigious size. As for the third: I've got a few strings of cash laid away. Although I may not be in the same league as Teng T'ung, I've got more than enough to get by. As for the fourth: I've got the youth and resilience to take anything she can dish out. She could hit me four hundred times without my giving her a blow in return. As for the fifth: I've got leisure to spare. If I didn't, how could I spend so much time over here? Godmother, if you can pull this off for me, I'll make it worth your while."

Hsi-men Ch'ing had now made his intentions explicit.

"Sir," said Dame Wang, "you say you've got all five prerequisites. I understand that. But there's still another problem that might get in the way and make success unlikely."

"Tell me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "what might get in the way?"

"Sir," said Dame Wang, "don't take it amiss if I speak bluntly. The hardest thing about this business of 'garnering the glow' is getting you to commit yourself to it 100 percent. Even if you're willing to spend whatever it takes to complete 99 percent of the task, something might still stand in the way of success. I know you've always been a bit tight, unwilling to fling your money about with abandon. This is the only problem that might get in the way."

"That's easy," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll just do whatever you tell me."

"If you're prepared to spend the money, sir," said Dame Wang, "I've got a splendid plan for getting you and this filly together. But I don't know if you'll be willing to go along with me or not."

"No matter what you say, I'll go along with it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What is this splendid plan of yours?"

Dame Wang laughed. "It's already getting late today. Why don't you go home for the time being. Come and see me again in half a year, or three months time, and we can talk about it then."

"Godmother," entreated Hsi-men Ch'ing, "stop joking. You've got to help me pull this off.
Your kindness will be amply rewarded."

Dame Wang broke into raucous laughter. "You're getting carried away again, sir. Although this plan of mine may not be worthy of commemoration in the Temple of Prince Wu-ch'eng, the God of War, [8] it's certainly superior to that scheme of Sun Wu's which called for drilling the palace ladies.[9] The odds are eight or nine to one that you shall have her.

"Let me give you the lowdown on this filly's background. Although she's only of humble origin she's as clever as can be. She's an excellent musician and singer. And as for needlework and suchlike feminine accomplishments, the standard repertory of popular songs, backgammon and elephant chess, and so forth, there's very little she doesn't know about any of them. Her given name is Chin-lien and her maiden name is P'an. Her father was the Tailor P'an whose shop used to be located outside the South Gate. After his death she was sold into the household of Mr. Chang, the well-to-do merchant, where she learned to play musical instruments and sing. Later, because Mr. Chang was getting along in years, he released her from the terms of her contract and gave her to Wu the Elder as wife without demanding a candareen in return.

"That was several years ago. Now Wu the Elder is something of a simpleton. Everyday he goes out early and comes home late and doesn't pay attention to anything but his business. Ordinarily this filly is not much given to gadding about. When I've got nothing better to do I often go over to her place to pass the time of day, and when she needs help with anything she asks me to take care of it for her. She addresses me as Godmother just as you do.

"The last few days Wu the Elder has been going out early. If you want to pursue this matter, sir, buy me a bolt of blue pongee and another of white, along with a bolt of white damask. I'll also need ten taels' worth of good-quality silk wadding. When you've brought all these things to me I'll go over and ask to borrow her calendar so I can get someone to pick out an auspicious day on which to engage a tailor to make them up for me. If she responds by picking out a lucky day but doesn't offer to do the work herself, then it'll be all over. But if she says, 'Let me do it for you':

As though nothing in Heaven or Earth could
make her happier,

and doesn't want me to hire a tailor, then one-tenth of this glow-game will have been achieved.

"If I am successful in inviting her to come over to my place to do the work, then two-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved.

"If she does come over to my place to do the work, at noontime I'll prepare some wine and a snack and ask her to have lunch with me. If she says it's inconvenient and insists on taking the work home with her, then it'll be all over. But if she doesn't say anything and agrees to eat lunch with me, then three-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved.

"On the following day you mustn't show up. But on the third day, around noon, dress yourself up appropriately and cough outside my door as a signal. Then call out, 'It's been days since I've set eyes on you, Godmother Wang. I've come to buy a cup of tea.' I'll come out and invite you to come in and sit down while you drink your tea. If she gets up and retires to her own home when she sees you, I can't very well physically restrain her, can I? It'll be all over. But if she sees you come in and makes no effort to withdraw, then four-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved.

"When you sit down I'll say to the filly, 'This is the very gentleman who was kind enough to give these materials to me. I'm greatly indebted to him,' Then I'll proceed to sing your praises and you can wax extravagant on the subject of her needlework. If she pays no attention and refuses to respond, then it'll be all over. But if she responds by engaging you in conversation, then five-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved.

"Then I'll say, 'It's really kind of this young lady to have volunteered her services on my behalf. I'm greatly indebted to both of you benefactors; to one for providing the money and the other for providing her skills. If I hadn't:

Asked her a favour, as one trouper to another,[10]

there would scarcely be any reason for this young lady to grace us with her presence. Why don't you play the role of host, sir, and show this young lady how much her efforts are appreciated.' You then pull out some silver and ask me to buy whatever's needed. If she insists on leaving at this point, I can't very well physically restrain her, can I? It'll be all over. But if she makes no effort to withdraw, the situation will be promising, and six-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved.

"Then I'll accept your money and on my way out the door I'll say to her, 'Be so good as to keep the gentleman company for a few minutes, young lady.' If she refuses and gets up and goes home instead, I can scarcely do anything to prevent her, can I? It'll be all over. But if she doesn't budge, everything will be fine, and seven-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved.

"When I've bought the things I'll put them on the table and say, 'Young lady, why don't you set your work aside for a minute and have a cup of wine? It's a rare treat this gentleman has provided for us.' If she refuses to drink at the same table with you and goes home instead, it'll be all over. But if she only talks about leaving and doesn't budge, everything will be going fine, and eight-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved.

"After she's had enough wine to feel it, and the conversation has started to warm up, I'll say the wine has run out and suggest once again that you buy some. You pull out more silver and ask me to get it for you, along with some delicacies to go with it. I'll put the latch on the door so that the two of you are locked inside the room together. If she gets all hot and bothered and tries to run home, it'll be all over. But if she lets me put the latch on the door without getting hot and bothered, then nine-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved.

"Only one-tenth will then remain but this last step is the hardest. There in the room, sir, you'll have to move in with the sweet talk but whatever you do, avoid any rough stuff that might wreck the whole affair. In such a case you'd be strictly on your own as far as I'm concerned. You might proceed by brushing a pair of chopsticks off the table with your sleeve and then giving her foot a pinch when you stoop down to pick them up. If she kicks up a fuss, I'll have to come to her rescue, and it'll be all over. That will be the end of the matter. But if she doesn't make a peep, the last tenth of this glow-game will have been achieved, for she will have given her consent to your conquest. If this glow-game is carried to a successful conclusion, how will you thank me?"

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had heard her out he was delighted and exclaimed, "Godmother, this plan of yours may not earn you a place in the Ling-yen Pavilion,[11] but it's certainly a splendid, first-class scheme!"

"Whatever you do," said Dame Wang, "don't forget those ten taels of silver you promised me."

Hsi-men Ch'ing replied: "Whenever one gets so much as a tangerine peel to eat; one should never forget Tung-t'ing Lake[12] from whence it came.[13] Godmother, how soon can this plan of yours be put into operation?"

"I should have something to report this very evening." said Dame Wang. "I'll go over soon and ask to borrow her calendar, before Wu the Elder gets home, and then start to work on her as best I can. You'd better get cracking and send someone over with the pongee, damask, and silk wadding before it's too late."

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you can pull this off, how could I ever let you down?"

Thereupon he took his leave of Dame Wang, walked out through the teahouse, and went to buy the three bolts of pongee and damask and ten taels' worth of the best-quality silk wadding. When he got home he instructed his young body servant, named Tai-an, to wrap them up in a bundle and deliver them to Dame Wang's house, where she was only too pleased to accept them and send the lad on his way. Truly:

Unless the clouds and rain come together on Witch's Mountain;
King Hsiang of Ch'u will have erected his terrace in vain.[14]

A poem testifies to this:

The two of them feel an affinity as sweet as honey;
The way Dame Wang brings them together is remarkable indeed.
She devises a ten-part plan for "garnering the glow";
To ensure that they will come together without fail.[15]

When Dame Wang had received the pongee, damask, and silk wadding she opened her back door and went over to Wu the Elder's house. The woman greeted her, invited her upstairs, and offered her a seat.

"Young lady," said Dame Wang, "how is it you haven't been over to my place for a cup of tea the last few days?"

"It's just that I've been out of sorts lately," the woman replied, "and haven't felt like doing anything at all."

"If you've got a calendar in the house, young lady," said Dame Wang, "lend it to me so I can get someone to choose a good day for me to have some tailoring done."

"What sort of tailoring do you have in mind, Godmother?" the woman asked.

"It's just because I seem to be suffering from all:

Ten aches and nine pains,"

said Dame Wang. "I'm afraid I could end up:

High as the hills or deep as the sea, at any moment, and my son isn't even here to take care of things if anything should happen to me."

"Why haven't I seen Little Brother around for such a long time?" the woman inquired.

"That rascal is out on the road, traveling with a merchant," said Dame Wang, "and I never hear a word from him. I can't help worrying about him from one day to the next."

"How old is Little Brother this year?" the woman asked.

"That rascal's already sixteen," replied Dame Wang.

"Why don't you find him a wife, Godmother?" the woman said, "so she could lend you a hand?"

"It's just as you say," responded Dame Wang. "I've got nobody to help out. Sooner or later, someplace or other, I'll have to find him one all right. But I'm not going to worry about that till he gets home.

"Right now the problem is that, day and night, if I'm not coughing I'm short of breath; and I hurt all over, just as if I'd been beaten to pieces, so I can't even get any sleep. I've been wanting for some time now to prepare my burial garments, just in case. Fortunately a certain well-to-do gentleman who often drops into my place for a cup of tea—a man who has noticed how reliable I am as a medical practitioner, employment agent, and matchmaker, and insists on patronizing me in matters great and small—has made me a gift of all the materials I need for a complete set of burial garments, enough pongee and damask for both exterior and lining, along with a quantity of fine silk wadding. They've been sitting at home for over a year now without my having the time to get them made up.

"This year I really feel I may not be able to hang on much longer; and since it happens to be an intercalary month[16] in which I've got a few days to spare, I thought I'd get this taken care of. But the tailor is giving me a hard time, claiming he's too busy right now to do it for me. I can't tell you what a hassle it's been."

On hearing this speech the woman smiled and said, "I don't know if I could do a satisfactory job but if you're willing to risk it, I happen to have some spare time right now and could do it for you myself. What do you think, Godmother?"

When the old woman heard this she said with an ingratiating smile, "If you deign to do it with your own hands, young lady, I'll feel myself honoured even in the grave. I've heard for a long time how good you are at needlework but I haven't presumed to impose on you."

"It's nothing, Godmother," said the woman. "I've offered to do it, and I insist. Take the calendar along and get somebody to choose a lucky day so I can begin."

"Young lady," said Dame Wang, "there's no need to pretend with me. There can't be many words in the standard anthologies of poetry and drama that you can't read. What need is there to get someone else to consult the calendar?"

"I'm afraid I never received a proper education," demurred the woman with a faint smile.

"That's a fine way to talk!" said Dame Wang, as she picked up the calendar and handed it to her.

The woman took the calendar in her hand and examined it for a while. "Tomorrow is an unlucky day," she said, "and the day after tomorrow is bad too. The next good day for tailoring is not until the day after the day after tomorrow."

Dame Wang snatched the calendar away from her and hung it back on the wall, saying. "The fact that you're willing to do it for me, young lady, makes you my lucky star. What need is there to be particular about the date. I already asked someone to check for me and he reported that tomorrow is an unlucky day. But I, for one, see no reason to pay any attention to the taboo against doing tailoring on unlucky days."

"Actually," said the woman, "an unlucky day might be the most appropriate for making burial garments."

"As long as you're willing to do it," said Dame Wang, "I'll make so bold as to trouble you to come over to my place tomorrow."

"There's no need for that," said the woman. "It'll do just as well if you bring it over here for me to work on, won't it?"

"The fact of the matter is," said Dame Wang, "I want to see the way you go about it but there's no one to tend the shop for me."

"In that case," said the woman, "I'll come over after breakfast tomorrow morning."

The old lady descended the stairs with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude.

That evening she reported what had happened to Hsi-men Ch'ing and reiterated that he was not to turn up until the third day. Of the events of that night there is no more to tell.

The next day, bright and early, Dame Wang tidied up her room, laid out the necessary needles and thread, got the tea things ready, and sat down to wait for her visitor.

To resume our story, when Wu the Elder had eaten breakfast, shouldered his carrying pole, and gone off to work, the woman hung the bamboo blind over the door, told Ying-erh to look after the house, and went over to Dame Wang's place by the back door. The old lady, as pleased as could be, invited her in and offered her a seat. Then she poured her a cup of strong tea, flavoured with walnuts and pine seeds, wiped the table clean, and got out the three bolts of pongee and damask. The woman took her measurements, cut up the material, and began to sew.

As the old lady looked on she kept up an unbroken stream of flattering commentary. "What exquisite skill! I've lived for sixty or seventy years without ever seeing needlework as fine as this."

The woman continued sewing until noon, when Dame Wang prepared some food and wine, along with a serving of noodles, and asked her to lunch. Afterward she continued sewing for a while, until late afternoon, when she put her work aside and returned home.

Wu the Elder happened to come home about the same time, and the woman put the latch on the door and took down the blind. When Wu the Elder came into the room he noticed that his wife's face was a little red and asked her, "Where've you been?"

"Just over at Godmother Wang's next door," the woman replied. "She asked me to make up a set of burial garments for her. At noontime she prepared some food and wine in the way of a snack and asked me to lunch."

"It would have been better not to accept her hospitality," said Wu the Elder. "We may need to call on her for help some time. Even though she asked you to make up these burial garments for her, you could just as easily have come home for a snack. It's not worth it, putting her to all that trouble. If you go back there to continue working tomorrow, take a little money along so you can buy some food and wine and return the treat. As the saying goes: A distant relative is no match for a close neighbour.[17]

We mustn't fall behind in our social obligations. If she won't let you return the treat, bring the work home with you and give it back to her when you're done." There is a poem that testifies to this:
The machinations of the old matron
are deep indeed;
But Wu the Elder is too ingenuous to catch their drift.
By supplying money to return the treat
he rewards her betrayal;
And by so doing gives his wife away to another man.[18]
The woman agreed to go along with Wu the Elder's suggestion. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.
The next day, after breakfast, Wu the Elder had no sooner shouldered his carrying pole and gone out than Dame Wang slipped over to press her invitation. The woman accompanied her back to her room, got out the unfinished work, and continued to sew. Dame Wang hastened to pour the tea and had a cup with her. As it drew near midday the woman pulled three hundred cash out of her sleeve and said to Dame Wang, "Godmother, let me buy you a cup of wine."
"Ai-ya!" said Dame Wang. "Who ever heard of such a thing? I asked you here to do something as a favour to me, young lady. How could I consent to let you put up the money? I hope the fare I provided hasn't disagreed with you."
"It's just what my husband told me to do," said the woman. "He said that if you raised any objections I was to take the work home with me and return it to you when I was through."
When the old lady heard this she said, "Wu the Elder really knows how to do things right, doesn't he? If that's the way you want it, young lady, I guess I'll have to accept, at least for the time being."
The old lady was afraid of interrupting the proceedings. Adding some money of her own, she went out to buy food and wine of good quality, along with some unusual delicacies, and waited upon her assiduously.
Gentle reader take note: Nine out of ten of the women of this world, no matter how smart they are, prove susceptible to flattery.
The old lady prepared an enticing repast of food and wine and invited her guest to partake of it. Afterward the woman continued sewing for a while, until late afternoon, when she returned home with:
A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude.
To make a long story short, the third day, after breakfast, Dame Wang waited until she had seen Wu the Elder go out and then went to her back door and called out, "Young lady, may I make so bold?"
"I'm on my way," the woman responded from the second floor.
After they had greeted each other they repaired to Dame Wang's room, where she got out her work in order to go on with the sewing. Dame Wang made haste to pour the tea and they had a cup together, after which the woman continued to sew until it was nearly noon.
To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing had hardly been able to wait for this day. Dressing himself up to befit the occasion, taking three or five taels of silver along with him, and sporting his gold-flecked Szechwan fan, he swaggered off in the direction of Amethyst Street.
When he arrived at the door of Dame Wang's teashop he coughed and called out, "Godmother Wang, why haven't I seen anything of you the last few days?"
Dame Wang caught on immediately and responded with the words, "Who is that calling after this old body?"
"It's me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.
The old lady bustled out to see who it was and then said, with a laugh, "I had no idea who it could be but it turns out to be you, sir. You've arrived in the nick of time. Come into my room and see who's here."
Taking hold of Hsi-men Ch'ing by the sleeve, with one tug she pulled him into the room where, addressing herself to the woman, she said, "This is the very gentleman who was kind enough to give these materials to me."
Hsi-men Ch'ing opened his eyes wide and took a good look at the woman.
Her cloudy locks rose up like serried hills;
Her fair countenance evoked an air of spring.
She was wearing a white linen blouse with a peach red skirt and a blue vest as she sat there in the room, working on her sewing. When she saw Hsi-men Ch'ing come in she lowered her head.
Hsi-men Ch'ing quickly stepped forward and made her a bow as he uttered a word of greeting. The woman put down her work and returned his salutation.
Dame Wang then said, "It was rare generosity on this gentleman's part to give me these bolts of pongee and damask. They've been sitting at home for over a year now without my having time to get them made up. I'm greatly indebted to this young lady, my next-door neighbour, who has volunteered her services in making them up for me. Her needlework is as regular as any turned out on a loom, it's so close and fine. Such a thing is rarely to be seen. Just come take a look at it, sir."
Hsi-men Ch'ing picked up the garments and made appreciative noises as he examined them.
"Where could this young lady have learned to do such needlework?" he exclaimed. "It looks just like the work of a goddess or immortal."
"Don't make fun of me, sir," the woman said with a smile.
Hsi-men Ch'ing deliberately proceeded to inquire of Dame Wang, "Godmother, I hardly dare ask but whose household does this young lady belong to?"
"Make a guess, sir," said Dame Wang.
"How could I hope to guess correctly?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Dame Wang laughed out loud and said, "Please sit down, sir, and I'll tell you all about it."
Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down across the table from the woman and Dame Wang said, "Let me tell you, sir. Remember what happened to you when you were walking under the eaves here the other day? Well it served you right, sir."
"You mean to tell me she's the one whose forked stick fell on my hairnet[19] the other day as I passed by her door?" responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I still have no idea whose household she belongs to."
"I'm afraid I may have unintentionally shaken you up a bit the other day, sir," said the woman. "Please don't hold it against me." As she said this she stood up and made him a bow.
Hsi-men Ch'ing returned her salutation with alacrity and said, "How could I dream of such a thing?"
"This same lady," said Dame Wang, "is the wife of Wu the Elder who lives next door."
"So you're Wu the Elder's wife," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I know your husband only as a hardworking family man who plies his trade in the streets. He has never given offence to anyone, high or low. He knows how to make a living and has a good disposition. Truly, men such as he are not easily come by."
"True enough," said Dame Wang. "Ever since the young lady has been married to Wu the Elder she's been:
Obedient to his every whim.
They really hit it off with each other."
"My husband is an utterly useless person," said the woman. "Don't make fun of me that way, sir."
"You're mistaken, young lady," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "As the poet says:
Flexibility is the root of success;
Adamancy is the womb of misfortune.[20]
When one has a husband as irreproachable as yours, who:
Though he possess ten thousand fathoms of water will not suffer a drop to escape,[21]
And strives throughout his entire lifetime to set an example of integrity, how could he be anything but an asset?"
For some time Dame Wang kept up a steady drumbeat of praise for Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Turning to the woman she said, "Young lady, do you know who this gentleman is?"
"No I don't," she replied.
"This gentleman," said Dame Wang, "is one of the more substantial citizens of the locality. Even His Honour, the district magistrate, consorts with him, and addresses him as the Honourable Hsi-men. He disposes of property worth tens of thousands of strings of cash and owns the wholesale pharmaceutical business on the street in front of the district yamen. In his home:
The piles of money reach higher than the dipper,
The stores of rotting rice suggest a granary,
What is yellow is gold,
What is white is silver,
What are round are pearls,
What sparkle are jewels.[22]
And he also possesses:
Horns off the rhinoceros's head, and
Tusks out of the elephant's mouth.[23]
In addition to which:
He lends money to officials, and
Is very well connected.
At the time of his present marriage I played the role of go-between. His wife is Battalion Commander Wu's daughter, who's just as clever as can be."
Then, turning to Hsi-men Ch'ing, she asked, "Sir, how is it you haven't dropped in to my place for a cup of tea for lo these many days?"
"It's all on account of my daughter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She's just been betrothed to someone and I've been tied up for some time."
"Who has your young lady been betrothed to?" asked Dame Wang. "And why didn't you employ me as go-between?"
"She's betrothed to Ch'en Ching-chi,"[24] said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the son of that Ch'en family that's related by marriage to Yang Chien, the commander in chief of the 800,000 imperial guards in the Eastern Capital. He's only sixteen years old and is still going to school. In any other circumstances we would have asked you to represent us, Godmother but they took the initiative by sending a certain Auntie Wen to propose the match; so we countered by asking that Auntie Hsüeh who is constantly to be seen around our place peddling costume jewellery to be coguarantor, and we have consented to the terms. If you would like to come, Godmother, I'll send someone to invite you over, one day soon, when they present us with the ritual gift of tea."
The old lady laughed uproariously. "I was only kidding, sir. We go-betweens are a pretty bitchy bunch. When they were conducting the negotiations I was nowhere to be seen. Why should I be entitled to a share of the feast they have earned by their own efforts? As the saying goes:
Fellow professionals can't abide each other.
It will be more appropriate if I wait until the bride has been carried over the threshold and then go pay a call on the third-day or fifth-day celebrations, with a present in hand, in hopes of getting a bite to eat. There's no point in antagonizing people."
The two of them carried on an animated dialogue for some time, in which the old lady pulled out all the stops in her exaggerated praise of Hsi-men Ch'ing. Meanwhile, the woman merely lowered her head and continued to sew. There is a poem that testifies to this:
It has always been the nature of women to be like water;
Behind their husbands' backs they betray them with other men.
In her heart Chin-lien hankers after Hsi-men Ch'ing;
Once her desires are aroused she can no longer control them.[25]
Hsi-men Ch'ing sensed that Chin-lien was well-disposed toward him and could hardly wait to begin coupling with her.
Dame Wang poured two cups of tea and served one to Hsi-men Ch'ing and one to the woman, saying, "Young lady, have a little tea with the gentleman."
By the time they had finished their tea they were already exchanging meaningful glances. Dame Wang looked at Hsi-men Ch'ing and stroked her cheek with a finger. Hsi-men Ch'ing understood that five-tenths of the glow-game had already been achieved. It's always been true that:
Romantic affairs are consummated over tea, and
Wine is the go-between of lust.[26]
"If you hadn't dropped by, sir," said Dame Wang, "I would not have presumed to visit your home in order to issue an invitation. In the first place:
This meeting was fated to occur;
and in the second place:
You've arrived in the nick of time.
As the saying goes:
One guest does not trouble two hosts.[27]
You have provided the money, sir, and this young lady has provided her skills. I'm greatly indebted to both of you benefactors. If I hadn't:
Asked her a favour, as one trouper to another,
there would scarcely be any reason for this young lady to grace us with her presence. Why don't you play the role of host, sir, by coming up with the silver to buy some food and wine, in order to show this young lady how much her efforts are appreciated?"
"How stupid of me not to have thought of it myself," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've got some silver right here." He reached into his wallet, pulled out a lump of silver of about a tael's value, and gave it to Dame Wang to buy the food and wine with.
"There's no need to put the gentleman to all this trouble," said the woman but, although she uttered the protest, she made no effort to withdraw.
Dame Wang accepted the money and on her way out the door said, "Be so good as to keep the gentleman company for a few minutes, young lady. I'll be right back."
"Don't bother, Godmother," said the woman but she made no effort to withdraw.
By now both of them had the same idea in mind. Dame Wang went out the door, leaving them in the room together. Hsi-men Ch'ing couldn't take his eyes off the woman, and she, too, stole surreptitious glances at him. When she saw what a handsome figure he cut she was more than half inclined in his favour but again she merely lowered her head and continued to sew.
Before long Dame Wang returned from her shopping expedition with a plump cooked goose, a roast duck, baked meats, salted fish, and other delicacies.
When she had put them out on platters and plates she arranged them on the table in her room and said to the woman, "Young lady, why don't you set your work aside for a minute and have a cup of wine?"

"You keep the gentleman company if you like," said the woman. "It's not proper for me to do so."
"But all this has been provided for the sole purpose of showing you how much your efforts are appreciated," the old lady protested. "How can you say such a thing?" And she proceeded to set the platters of food down right in front of her.
When the three of them had sat down at their places the wine was poured. Picking up a cup of wine and holding it out to her in his hand, Hsi-men Ch'ing addressed the woman with the words, "Please don't refuse me. Bottoms up."
The woman declined, saying, "You're very kind, sir but I have so little capacity that I couldn't handle it."
"I know perfectly well you could swallow the ocean itself," said Dame Wang. "Please relax and have a cup or two."
There is a poem that testifies to this:
Since "Boys and girls are forbidden, to occupy the same mat";[28]
Flaunting one's beauty and inviting seduction have perennial appeal.
Not only did Cho Wen-chün, once upon a time, elope with Ssu-ma Hsiang-ju,[29]
But, even today, a Hsi-men Ch'ing may enjoy the favours of a Chin-lien.[30]
The woman took the cup of wine and saluted each of the others in turn.
Hsi-men Ch'ing picked up his chopsticks and said, "Godmother, do me the favour of urging the young lady to have something to eat."
Dame Wang picked out the best tidbits and put them on the woman's plate. After the third round of drinks the old lady went to heat some more wine.
"I hardly dare ask," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "how old you are, young lady?"
"I'm twenty-four," the woman responded. "I was born in the year of the dragon, on the ninth day of the first month, at two o'clock in the morning."
"You're the same age as my wife, then," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She was also born in the year wu-ch'en,[31] the year of the dragon but you're seven months older than she is. She was born on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, at midnight."
"How can you compare Heaven to Earth?" said the woman. "You'll be the death of me yet."
"This young lady is an intelligent person," interjected Dame Wang. "She's as clever as can be. It's no wonder her needlework's as good as it is. As for the works of the hundred schools, backgammon, elephant chess, and the various word games played by breaking characters down into their component parts, she's thoroughly versed in them all. She even writes a good hand."
"Where could one hope to find the like!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Wu the Elder is a lucky man, indeed, to have this young lady as his wife."
"I wouldn't want to make invidious comparisons, sir," said Dame Wang, "but you've got quite a few ladies in your own household, and which one of them is a match for this young lady?"
"That's no more than the truth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"It's a long story.
I guess it's just my bad luck not to have found a good one yet."
"Your first wife was all right, wasn't she, sir?" said Dame Wang.
"Don't talk to me about my first wife," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If she were still alive, things wouldn't be the way they are.
When the family lacks a ruler,
The household is topsy-turvy.[32]
I've got three, five, maybe seven bedmates around the place right now but a lot of good it does me. All they can do is eat; none of them is willing to take charge of anything."
"If that's the way things are, sir," asked the woman, "how many years has it been since your first wife died?"
"I don't even like to talk about it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "My first wife's maiden name was Ch'en. Although she was only of humble origin, she was as clever as could be. She was always able to act on my behalf whenever the occasion arose. But now, unfortunately, she's dead. It happened more than three years ago. Since my remarriage, my second wife has been sick so much of the time she hasn't been able to take charge. As a result, everything in the household is:
All at sevens and eights.[33]
That's why I spend so much of my time out of the house. When I'm at home all I do is get upset."
"Sir," said Dame Wang, "don't take it amiss if I speak bluntly. Neither your first wife nor your present wife could match the needlework of Wu the Elder's lady, not to mention her looks."
"For that matter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "my first wife also lacked the romantic air of Wu the Elder's lady."
The old lady laughed. "Sir, what about that mistress you've been maintaining—the one who lives on East Street—why haven't you had me over for a cup of tea?"
"You must mean the ballad singer, Chang Hsi-ch'un," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "When I realized she was nothing but a street musician I grew tired of her."
"Sir," said the old lady, "you've been carrying on with Li Chiao-erh, from the licensed quarter, for some time."
"As for her," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I've already taken her into my establishment. If she had been able to run the household, I would have made her my legitimate wife."
"You're on good terms with Cho the Second too," said Dame Wang.
"I've also taken Cho Tiu-erh into my establishment as my Number Three," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "But recently she's come down with an indisposition that she doesn't seem able to shake."
"If I ever came across anyone who might tickle your fancy to the extent that Wu the Elder's lady does," inquired Dame Wang, "would you have any objection if I paid you a call to broach the subject?"
"Both my father and my mother are dead," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "so I'm my own master. Who would dare to say me nay?"
"I'm only joking," said Dame Wang. "Where could I ever find anyone who tickled your fancy to that extent?"
"It's not that there's none to be had," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It's just that my meager matrimonial affinities have prevented me from encountering one."
The two of them had carried on an animated dialogue for some time when Dame Wang exclaimed, "Just when we're having such a good time, the wine has run out. Don't take it amiss, sir, if I seem to be ordering you about; but what would you think of buying another bottle of wine?"
Hsi-men Ch'ing pulled out the three or four taels of loose silver remaining in his wallet and gave them to Dame Wang, saying, "You take these and use them to buy more if we run out of anything. If it's too much, keep the difference."
The old lady thanked him and got up to go. When she glanced at Chin-lien she saw that she had reached that state in which:
Three cups of wine in the stomach
ignite the flames of desire.
From the manner in which they were talking back and forth, it was obvious that by now both of them had the same idea in mind. The woman merely lowered her head but didn't budge from her seat. Truly: the natural beauty of the vista remains unseen; in spring the peach blossoms bloom all by themselves. A poem testifies to this:

The messages conveyed by her eyes and brows have never ceased;
The love match is about to be consummated with a romantic partner.
In her greed for reward Dame Wang possesses no other skill;
Than flowery words and a cleverly specious tongue.
Wine and beauty frequently occasion the ruination of the state;
From of old, good looks have been the undoing of the loyal and the true.
The royal house of King Chou came to an end because of Ta-chi;[1]
The sacred altars of the state of Wu perished on account of Hsi-shih.[2]
Those who care only for the joys of youth, seeking pleasure where they may;
Remain oblivious to the disasters lurking beneath the powdered smile.[3]
Hsi-men Ch'ing allowed himself to become so enamored of Chin-lien's beauty;
That he abandoned the domestic doe to pursue the high-stepping hind.

As Dame Wang started out the door with Hsi-men Ch'ing's money in hand she turned to the woman with an ingratiating smile and said, "I'm just popping out into the street to get a bottle of wine. Be so good as to keep the gentleman company for a few minutes, young lady. There's a little wine left in the pot, so if you run out you can pour another couple of cups and share them with the gentleman. I'm going to go all the way to East Street, where I can be sure of getting a bottle of the best quality, so I'll be gone quite a while."
On hearing this the woman said, "Godmother, don't go. I've already had enough wine. I don't need any more."
"Ai-ya!" Dame Wang exclaimed. "Young lady, it's not as though the gentleman were anyone else. If you haven't anything else to do, why not share a cup with him? What is there to be afraid of?"
Although the woman said, "I don't need any more," she sat where she was and didn't budge from her seat. Dame Wang put the latch on the door and fastened it with a piece of cord so that the two of them were locked inside the room together. Then she sat down on the curb and devoted herself to spinning thread in order to pass the time.
To resume our story, inside the room Hsi-men Ch'ing looked at the woman.
Her cloudy locks were half askew, and
Her creamy breasts slightly exposed.
On her powdered face the colours red and white formed a pleasing contrast. Picking up the pot, he continued to ply the woman with wine.
After a while, pretending to be hot, he took off his green silk jacket and said, "I wonder, young lady, if you would hang this over the bedrail of Godmother's bed for me?"
Nothing loath, the woman took it in her hand and disposed of it as directed. Hsi-men Ch'ing then deliberately brushed a pair of chopsticks off the table with his sleeve so that they fell to the floor. It is clear that:
This meeting was fated to occur,
for the chopsticks came to rest right beside the woman's feet. Hsi-men Ch'ing quickly stooped down to pick them up. Behold:
The up-turned points of her tiny golden lotuses,
Barely three inches long,
But half a span in length,
Peeked out beside the chopsticks.
Hsi-men Ch'ing ignored the chopsticks but gave a gentle pinch to the embroidered tip of her shoe.
The woman laughed out loud. "There's no need to beat around the bush, sir.
If you've got a mind to it,
I've got the will.[4]
Are you actually trying to seduce me?"
Hsi-men Ch'ing got down on his knees with the plea, "Young lady, make a happy man of me."
The woman then embraced Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "My only fear is that Godmother may come back and catch us in the act."
"It doesn't matter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "she's already in on it."
Now, right there in Dame Wang's room, the two of them:
Took off their clothes, undid their girdles, and Enjoyed each other on the same pillow.
Behold:
Their necks entwined, the mandarin ducks sport in the water;
Their heads together, the phoenixes thread the flowers.
How joyous their delight as the growing branches
intertwine;
How sweet their pleasure as the lover's knot is tied.
The one sticks tightly with his
ruby lips;
The other clings closely with her
powdered face.
Silk stockings in the air,
Two new moons rise above his shoulders;
Gold hairpins askew,
A black cloud piles up beside the pillow.
Swearing eternal fidelity,
He kneads her into a thousand shapes of compliance;
Bashful at the clouds and rain,
She submits with ten thousand forms of complaisance.
The pleasing cries of the oriole,
Are never absent from his ears;
Forever moist with sweet spittle,

She smiles as she sticks out her tongue.
Her willow waist droops with the weight of teeming spring:
Her cherry mouth is slightly split
with panting breath.
As her starry eyes grow dim,
Tiny beads of sweat form on her fragrant jade body;
As her creamy breasts heave,
A stream of dewdrops drips into the heart of the peony.
Despite the fact that they are both well matched and compatible;
How true it is that "Stolen delights always taste the best."[6]

The two of them had just finished with the clouds and rain and were about to get dressed when they were interrupted by Dame Wang, who pushed open the door of the room and walked right in on them.

With a great show of consternation,
Clapping her hands and beating her palms,

she said, "A fine thing the two of you have been up to!"

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Chin-lien were both caught by surprise. The old woman then addressed herself to the latter, saying, "Fine! Just fine! I asked you over here to do a job for me, not to do a job on a man. When Wu the Elder finds out, I'm going to be implicated. I might as well tell him about it before anyone else does."

Having said which, she turned around and started out the door.

The woman was thrown into such a panic by this that she caught hold of her by the skirt and got down on her knees with the plea, "Godmother, forgive us!"

"You'll both have to agree to one condition if there's to be any hope of that," said Dame Wang.

"Don't talk about one condition," said the woman. "If you were to impose ten conditions, Godmother, I'd agree to them."

"Everyday from now on," said Dame Wang, "you must agree to keep Wu the Elder in the dark and never to disappoint this gentleman, no matter whether he calls for you early or late. Then and only then will I agree to call it quits. If you refuse to come even once I'll tell Wu the Elder all about it."

"I'll do whatever you say," the woman replied.

Dame Wang then said, "As for you, sir, there's no need for me to remind you. All ten parts of this glow-game have been carried to a successful conclusion, so you can't very well renege on what you promised me. If you show bad faith by going away and not coming back again, I'll also tell Wu the Elder all about it."

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can relax. I won't go back on my word."

"There's no way of holding the two of you to your word," said Dame Wang, "unless you exchange tokens of some kind as mementoes of your feelings."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then pulled a silver hairpin with a gold head out of his own hair and inserted it into the woman's cloudy locks. Fearing that Wu the Elder might suspect something if he saw it, she pulled it out and put it in her sleeve, from which she drew out a handkerchief which she gave to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who also put it away out of sight.

The three of them drank another few cups of wine together, by which time it was late afternoon. The woman then got up and said, "It's about time for that bastard, Wu the Elder, to be getting back. I'd better go home."

She then took her leave of Dame Wang and Hsi-men Ch'ing and slipped into her own house through the back door. Once there, she barely had time to take down the blind over the front door before Wu the Elder came in.

To resume our story, Dame Wang looked at Hsi-men Ch'ing and said, "Now was that a good scheme, or wasn't it?"

"I'm greatly indebted to you, Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Truly:

In intelligence you rival Sui Ho:
In resourcefulness you outdo Lu Chia.

Not one woman out of ten could escape your designs."

"And did this filly live up to your expectations?" asked Dame Wang.

"Why:

'She's two under full four words!'[6]

replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"She got her start in life as a privately owned singing girl," said the old lady. "There isn't much she doesn't know about anything. And it was all my doing that has:

Cast you in the roles of man and wife, and Contrived to make you a couple.

Whatever you do, don't forget what you promised me."

"You really outdid yourself, Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "When I get home I'll pick out an ingot of silver for you and bring it over myself.

Whenever I promise anything,
I never fail to deliver."

Dame Wang said:

"My eyes are on the lookout for the flag of victory,
My ears are always on the alert for good tidings:[7]

Just don't leave me in the predicament of:

Trying to collect the fee for the professional mourners after the coffin has already been interred."[8]

Hsi-men Ch'ing replied:

"Whenever one gets so much as a
tangerine peel to eat;
One should never forget Tung-t'ing Lake
from whence it came."

Then, after checking to see that the coast was clear, he put on his eye shades, laughed, and departed. But no more of this.

The next day he returned to Dame Wang's shop and called for some tea. Dame Wang offered him a seat and hastened to pour out a cup for him. When he had finished his tea Hsi-men Ch'ing pulled a ten-tael ingot of silver out of his sleeve and handed it to Dame Wang.

Generally speaking, nothing moves the people of this world so much as money.

When the old lady's black eyes caught sight of this "snowflake" silver[9] she tucked it away:

As though nothing in Heaven or Earth could
make her happier,

and saluted Hsi-men Ch'ing with a double bow, saying, "Many thanks for your generosity, sir."

She then went on to say, "I haven't seen Wu the Elder go out yet. If you'll wait a minute, I'll step over there and ask to borrow a gourd dipper so I can see if he's still there."

And she proceeded to slip over to the woman's house by the back door. The woman was in the main room serving Wu the Elder his breakfast.

When she heard someone at the door she asked Ying-erh, "Who is it?"

"It's Granny Wang," Ying-erh replied. "She wants to borrow our gourd."

The woman hastened out to greet her, saying, "Godmother, the gourd's right here. You can have it whenever you want. Why don't you come in and sit down for a minute?"

"There's no one over there to tend the shop," said the old lady.

As she spoke she made a sign with her hand which the woman understood to mean that Hsi-men Ch'ing had come and was waiting for her.

As soon as her visitor had picked up the gourd dipper and gone out the door, the woman urged Wu the Elder to finish his breakfast, shoulder his carrying pole, and start on his way.

After going upstairs, redoing her makeup, and changing into an attractive new outfit, she said to Ying-erh, "I want you to look after the house for me. I'm just going over to your Granny Wang's place for a visit; I'll be back before long. If your daddy comes home, be sure to let me know. If you don't do as I say, you little wretch, I'll beat your bottom right off!"[10]

Ying-erh nodded her assent. But no more of this.

The woman went over to Dame Wang's teashop to keep her tryst with Hsi-men Ch'ing. Truly:

The coupled halves of the peach stone
serve to evoke a chuckle;
Because inside, it will be found, lie
yet another couple.[11]

There is a poem composed of double meanings that testifies to this:

This gourd's a gourd, the mouth of which is small,
the body large.
When young, up in its breezy arbour,
it's high-slung;
But when it grows bigger, it becomes hard enough to bite.
How could it have hung in there with Yen Hui, content with privation for principle's sake;[12]
When all it wanted to do was bob about on the water in the spring breeze?
When you really need it
it falls down on the job;
But whether you want it or not it's always hanging about;
Until you feel you simply have to take it in hand.
It contributes its stale share to the work of the stable;
And is not infrequently called upon in the teahouse.
You may not want it any more than Hsü Yu did,[13]
but can scarcely do without it;
And from its dark interior you never know what nostrum will come out.[14]

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw the woman come in he felt:

Just as though she had fallen from Heaven.

The two of them sat down:

Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh,

while Dame Wang served them a cup of tea.

"When you went home yesterday," the old lady inquired, "did Wu the Elder raise any questions?"

"He asked whether I had finished the work on your burial garments yet," the woman said. "I replied that the garments themselves were finished but that I was still working on the shoes and stockings."

As soon as this problem had been disposed of the old lady made haste to provide some wine. She served it to them in her own room and they immediately fell to exchanging cups and enjoying themselves without restraint. Hsi-men Ch'ing examined the woman closely and she looked even more beautiful to him than the first time he had seen her. After a few drinks, the colours red and white formed a pleasing contrast on her powdered face, the temples of which were adorned with two long spit curls. Truly:

She was the equal of any immortal, and Excelled even the goddess Ch'ang-o.

There is a song to the tune "Intoxicated in the East Wind" that testifies to this:

How provocative are the red and white tints of her flesh;

How lovable is this delectable maid.
Trailing a silk skirt of halcyon hue,
Beneath the gathered sleeves of a gold-flecked blouse;
In her joyous abandon her chignon has fallen askew.
She is the very picture of Ch'ang-o come down from the moon;
The like of which you could not buy for a thousand pieces of gold.[15]

Hsi-men Ch'ing couldn't say enough in her praise. Taking her onto his lap, he lifted her skirt far enough to catch a glimpse of her pair of tiny feet, enclosed in black satin shoes, just half a span in length. His heart was filled with delight. The two of them passed the same cup of wine back and forth between them and laughed and joked with each other.

The woman then asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "How old are you?"

"I'm twenty-seven," he replied. "I was born in the year of the tiger on the twenty-eighth day of the seventh month, at midnight."

"How many ladies do you have in your household?" the woman asked.

"Aside from my wife," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I've got three or four other bedmates at home. It's just that none of them really tickles my fancy."

"And how many sons have you got?" the woman asked.

"All I have is a young daughter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "who's about to get married. I don't have any other children."

After they had laughed and joked with each other for a while, Hsi-men Ch'ing reached into his sleeve and pulled out a cylindrical silver pillbox that contained breath-sweetening lozenges [16] flavoured with osmanthus. One at a time he proceeded to put these into the woman's mouth on the tip of his tongue. The two of them then fell to:

Hugging and embracing each other,
Like snakes darting out their tongues.
The sound of their sucking was audible.

Dame Wang was so preoccupied with serving food and pouring wine that she could hardly concern herself with what went on between them, and left them in her room to enjoy themselves as they pleased.

In a little while, when they had both had enough wine to:

Ignite the flames of desire,

Hsi-men Ch'ing's lustful thoughts got the better of him. Exposing the organ that lay between his loins, he induced the woman to manipulate it with her slender fingers.

It so happens that ever since his youth Hsi-men Ch'ing had frequented the streets and alleys of the licensed quarter and patronized the women who dwelt there. About the base of his member he wore a clasp that had been:

Beaten out of silver, and Imbrued with drugs, which had the effect of making that organ both large and long. It was:

Dark red, with black whiskers;
Straight standing, firm, and hard;

a fine object, indeed! There is a poem about its characteristics that testifies to this:

There is an object that has always been about six inches long;
Sometimes it is soft and at other times
it is hard.
When soft, like a drunkard, it falls down either to the east or the west;
When hard, like a mad monk, it runs amok either above or below.
It makes it's living by traveling in and out of virgin territory;
It makes its home beneath the navel in the Province of the Loins.
It has two sons who always accompany it wherever it goes;
In how many skirmishes, with how many beauties, has it emerged the victor?

It was not long before the woman had taken off her clothes and Hsi-men Ch'ing discovered, by both visual and tactile means, that her mount of Venus had been depilated of its pubic hair. It was:

Pale and fragrant,
Plump to bursting,
Soft and yielding,
Red and wrinkly,
Tight and squeezy;
Beloved of thousands,
Craved by tens of thousands;
Who could tell what it might be?

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Warm and tight, fragrant and dry, it tastes better than lotus root;
It knows how to be soft and yielding and to make itself agreeable.
When happy, it sticks out its tongue, opens its mouth, and smiles;
When tired, it collapses lazily into itself and takes a nap.
The name of the place it makes its home
is Crotch County;
Its old garden is to be found beside the sparsely wooded slopes.
If it should ever encounter a dashing young gentleman;
It will engage him in battle, without a word,
on the slightest pretext.

To make a long story short, from that day on, the woman slipped over to Dame Wang's teashop everyday to keep her tryst with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Their feelings for each other were like lacquer;
The love in their hearts was like glue.

It has always been true that:

Good deeds seldom become known beyond the gate;
Bad deeds are quickly transmitted a thousand li.[17]

In less than half a month the whole neighbourhood knew what was going on, with the sole exception of Wu the Elder, who remained in the dark. Truly:

The only thing he knew was that it was his duty
to abide by his lot;
What did he know about defending himself from deceit or foul play?

There is a poem that testifies to this:

As always, "Good deeds seldom become known beyond the gate";
Whereas bad deeds and evil talk are quickly
noised abroad.
How pitiful it is that Wu the Elder's lawful wife;
Should surreptitiously become the consort of Hsi-men Ch'ing.[18]

At this point the story divides into two. To resume our story, there was in the same district a certain youngster who was just fourteen or fifteen years old and whose surname was Ch'iao. Because he had been born in Yün-chou, where his father was serving in the army at the time, people referred to him by the nickname Yün-ko, or Little Yün. The only remaining member of his family was his father, who was now well advanced in years. The lad was clever by nature and managed to scrape a living by peddling fresh fruits in the wineshops that were clustered near the front gate of the district yamen. Hsi-men Ch'ing was one of his patrons and often gave him a little extra to help with his expenses.

One day he set out to look for Hsi-men Ch'ing with a basket of snow pears for sale. As he was going his rounds a certain busybody said to him, "Yün-ko, if that's who you're looking for, I can tell you a place where you'll be sure to find him."

"Thanks, Uncle," said Yün-ko. "If you help me find him I can pick up thirty or fifty cash toward the expenses of keeping my old father alive. You'll be doing a good deed."

"Listen to me," said the busybody. "Hsi-men Ch'ing is carrying on an affair with the wife of Wu the Elder, who sells steamed wheat cakes. Everyday he can be found sitting around in Dame Wang's teashop on Amethyst Street. He's almost certainly there at this very moment. You're still just a kid, so even if you walk right in on him it won't make any difference."

On hearing this Yün-ko said, "Thanks for your help, Uncle."

The little monkey then picked up his basket and headed straight for Dame Wang's teashop in Amethyst Street. When he got there he found Dame Wang sitting on a short bench, spinning hemp thread.

Yün-ko put his basket down and bowed to Dame Wang with the words, "Greetings to you, Godmother."

"What brings you here, Yün-ko?" asked the old lady.

"I'm looking for the gentleman in order to pick up thirty or fifty cash toward the expenses of keeping my old father alive," said Yün-ko.

"What gentleman is that?" asked the old lady.

"You know perfectly well who I mean," said Yün-ko. "That's the one."

"He may be a gentleman," said the old lady, "but even gentlemen have names."

"I mean the one who has two characters in his surname," said Yün-ko.

"And what two characters might they be?" inquired the old lady.

"All you ever do is joke, Godmother," said Yün-ko. "I want to have a word with the Honourable Hsi-men."

As he said these words he proceeded to walk in toward the interior of the shop. The old lady grabbed hold of him with one hand and said, "Little monkey, where do you think you're going!

In every house there are areas that are private,
and areas that are public."

"If you'll just let me into your room," said Yün-ko, "I'll find him for you soon enough."

"You cocksucking little monkey!" Dame Wang cursed at him. "What would the Honourable Hsi-men be doing in my room?"

"Godmother," said Yün-ko:

"Don't try to keep it all for yourself;

Spare me a mouthful of leftover gravy.[19]
Do you think I don't know what's going on?"
"You little monkey!" cursed the old lady. "What do you know about anything!"
Yün-ko said, "You don't give much away do you? Truly:
You do your chopping in a wooden ladle with a horseshoe blade:[20]
Not one drop escapes:
Not even half a drop ever hits the floor.
If you make me tell the whole story, I fear our brother who sells steamed wheat cakes may kick up a fuss."
When the old lady heard these words that struck her right on her sore spot, she was enraged and shouted, "You cock-sucking little monkey! You think you can come farting around my place, do you!"
"If I'm a little monkey," said Yün-ko, "you're nothing but a procuress, a pandering old bitch!"
The old lady tightened her grip on Yün-ko and gave him a couple of sharp raps on the head with her knuckles.
"Who do you think you're hitting!" Yün-ko yelled at her.
"You lousy mother-fucking little monkey!" the old lady cursed. "If you raise your voice again I'll drive you out of here with a couple of good boxes on the ear!"
"You lousy old bloodsucker!" responded Yün-ko. "You think you can start a fight with me over nothing, do you!" Pushing him before her with one hand around his neck, and rapping him on the head as hard as she could with the knuckles of her other hand, the old lady drove him right out into the street and threw his basket of snow pears after him. The snow pears went rolling hither and yon all over the street. The old woman had been too much for the little monkey to handle. Cursing, crying, and scurrying all over the street after his pears, he pointed at Dame Wang's teashop and unleashed a flood of imprecation. "Don't you worry, you old bloodsucker! Just wait and see whether I tell him what's up and blow this whole thing wide open or not! By the time I'm through your shop will be a shambles and you'll have no way to make a living!" At this point, the little monkey picked up his basket and ran off to search the streets for a certain person but he couldn't find him. If Yün-ko should find this person, truly: though Dame Wang's deeds were done in the past, today the chickens would come home to roost[21] because of this event: the Spirit of the Perilous Paths[22] would strip himself for action; the little monkey's revelations would lead to disaster.

It was his brother Wu Da, the very man he had been hoping so long to meet. During a period of severe famine the brothers had been compelled to separate. Wu Da had moved to Qinghe and taken a house in Amethyst Street. He was a simple-minded man, not impressive in appearance. In fact people called him sometimes Tom Thumb and sometimes Old Scraggy Bark. (This was because his body was deformed and his face pinched.) The poor man was neither very strong nor very intelligent, so he became a constant butt for the wits of the neighbourhood.
Wu Da had no established business but scraped together a living by hawking baskets of cakes. His wife had died, leaving him with a little daughter, Ying'er, who was now about twelve years old. They lived alone together for some months, and then Wu Da fell into low water and removed to the house of a rich man named Zhang who lived in the High Street. Here he obtained a lodging of a single room. Zhang's people found him a very honest fellow, and they did their best for him, and started him off selling cakes. When they had time to spare, they used to go to his little place, and he was very attentive to them. They all liked him and spoke well of him to their master, and he, in consequence, did not worry Wu Da for his rent.
This rich man Zhang was more than sixty years old. He was wealthy and prosperous but he had no children. His wife, a daughter of Master Yu, managed his household with a rod of iron, and he had no pretty maids to amuse him. He was always beating his breast, sighing and lamenting: "Here I am, aged and childless, and though perhaps I am not exactly poor, what use is all my wealth to me?"
"If you feel like that about it," his wife said one day, "I will tell the go-between to buy a couple of girls for you. They can study, morning and night, and learn how to play and sing for your entertainment, and then perhaps you will feel better."
At this, the rich man was delighted, and thanked his wife again and again. Before long, she redeemed her promise, sent for the go-between, and the two girls were bought. One, surnamed Pan, was called Jinlian, and the other, whose surname was Bai, was called Yulian. Yulian was about sixteen years old, and had been born in a bawdy house. She was fair, clear-skinned, dainty, and intelligent. Jinlian was the daughter of a certain Pan Cai who lived outside the South Gate. She was his sixth child, and had been given her name because she was very beautiful even as a child. Her tightly bound feet were particularly charming. When her father died, her mother had been entirely without resources, and when she was only nine years old, she was sold to General Wang. In his house, she learned to play and sing, and, in her spare time, to read and write also. She was clever and industrious, and before she was twelve years old acquired a host of accomplishments. She learned, for example, how to darken her eyes, powder her face, and rouge her lips, and she could play more than one musical instrument. Her needlework had not been neglected and she could read the characters in books. With her hair dressed in a braid, and wearing a simple gown, she made a very pretty picture.
When Jinlian was fifteen years old, General Wang died, and her mother sold her to Master Zhang for thirty taels of silver. She and Yulian were both given music lessons but since she had had some previous experience, she did not find them very difficult. It was decided that she should play the lute and Yulian the zither. They shared the same room.
When the two girls first came to the house, their mistress was very kind and gave them gold and silver ornaments to make them look pretty. Then Yulian died, and Jinlian was left alone. By this time she was eighteen years old and as beautiful as a peach flower. Her eyebrows were arched like the crescent moon. Many times Master Zhang hungered for a closer acquaintance but, under the austere eye of his wife, no opportunity was forthcoming. One day, however, when the mistress of the house had gone to take wine with one of her neighbours, the rich man secretly summoned her to his room, and had his way with her.
Unhappily, after he had thus disported himself with Jinlian, all sorts of troubles came upon him. His nose ran, tears streamed from his eyes, and he could not hear. He had severe pains in the loins, and difficulty in making water. He had not long suffered from these complaints before his lady got to know his secret. She upbraided him for several days, and devised all manner of punishment for Jinlian. Master Zhang, though he knew he was doing something he ought not, secretly provided the girl with a trousseau, and looked about for a suitable man to whom to marry her. Everybody said, "Wu Da is a widower and a very honest fellow," and it occurred to him that no one could be more desirable, for Wu Da lived in the same house, and there would be no need for him to lose sight of the young lady. So he married the girl to Wu Da without asking for anything in return. The marriage once celebrated, Zhang heaped kindnesses upon the bridegroom. If he needed money for the ingredients with which to make his buns, the rich man provided it, and when Wu Da went out with his baskets, the rich man, after making sure that there was no one about, would go to console Jinlian in her loneliness.
Wu Da could not help seeing that Zhang treated his wife as though she belonged to him but he was not in a position to object. Master Zhang came in the morning and stayed until evening, until one day he was overcome by exhaustion and died on the spot. His wife had not been blind to all that was going on, and now, in a rage, she told her servants to turn Wu Da and his wife into the street. The poor man went to Amethyst Street, and there rented a couple of rooms in a nobleman's house, and continued to sell his cakes.
It did not take Jinlian very long to discover that her husband was not much of a man. He was by no means a model of manly vigor, and she came to hate him with an intense hatred. Never a day passed but she found some quarrel to pick with him, and she even cursed Master Zhang. "There is no lack of men in the world," said she. "Why should he have married me to a thing like this? It is always the same. Drive him as hard as I will, he never does a stroke of work, and if I try to push him forward, he only goes backward. No matter how busy the day, he malingers and will not touch his tools. I must have been a great sinner in my last existence to have been doomed to marry such a creature as this. My life is wretched indeed." And when she was quite alone, she sang this song :
This was an ill-made match.
A man I thought him; now I know that he is no true man.
I would not boast but it is plain
The crow can ne'er be mated with the phoenix.
I am as gold deep buried in the ground
And he a lump of common brass
Who may not hope to stand beside my golden glory.
He is nothing but stupid clay.
Shall my jade body, lying in his arms, thrill him with ecstasy
As from a dunghill the dainty sesame springs?
How can I pass my days with him forever?
How can I suffer him so long as life shall last?
I, that am purest gold, can never rest upon a bed so vile.
Women, my dear readers, are all very much the same. If a girl is pretty and intelligent, all goes well so long as she marries a fine specimen of a man. But if her husband turns out a simple-minded sort of fellow like Wu Da, it does not matter how virtuous she may be, some degree of hatred will sooner or later affect her attitude to him. And we must remember that seldom do beautiful maidens succeed in finding handsome husbands. The man who has gold to sell never seems to meet the man who wishes to buy.
Everyday, Wu Da took his baskets and went out to sell his cakes, returning only at sunset, and when the woman had rid herself of him, she used to sit beneath the blind, chewing melon seeds and pushing forward her tiny feet in the hope of attracting the attention of some young ne'er-do-well. And, indeed, there was a constant stream of courtiers before the gate, who spoke in riddles and called out such remarks as:
"What a pity that such a tasty piece of lamb should fall into a dog's mouth!" They poured out smooth words like oil, till Wu Da came to the conclusion that Amethyst Street was no place to live, and decided to remove elsewhere. But when he talked to his wife about the matter, she cried, "You low creature, you are nothing but a fool. You take a wretched little place like this, and of course dishonourable fellows come and say whatever they think fit. The best thing you can do is to scrape together a few taels, find a decent house, and take a couple of rooms in it. Then perhaps we can live more respectably, and people will cease to treat us like dirt."
"Where am I to get the money from to take a house?" Wu Da said.
"You are not a baby, you lump of mud! Why can't you? Are you going to allow your wife to be continually insulted in this way? If you have no money, take my hair ornaments and sell them, then buy a house with the proceeds. We can buy them back again sometime if we wish to."
Wu Da succeeded in getting together ten taels of silver, and took a place not very far from the Town Hall. It had four rooms on two floors, and there were two small courtyards. The whole place was very clean. When they had taken up their abode in West Street, he still continued to make a living by selling cakes.
Now, unexpectedly, he had come across his younger brother, and their hearts overflowed with joy. Wu Da at once invited his brother to go home with him, and took him upstairs to sit down. Then he called Jinlian to come and see Wu Song. "You remember," he said, "the man who killed the tiger on Jingyang hill. He is none other than your brother, the son of the same mother as myself. He has just been appointed captain of police."
Jinlian made a reverence to her brother-in-law, and Wu Song knelt down to return her greeting. She would not allow this, and made him stand up, saying that such condescension on his part would embarrass her beyond measure. Wu Song, however, persisted, and for some time they carried on a polite dispute, until at last they both knelt and kowtowed down to one another. Soon afterwards, the little Ying'er brought tea for the two men. Wu Song, realizing the seductive charm of his sister-in-law, modestly refrained from looking at her. Wu Da, who was anxious to offer his brother some entertainment, went downstairs to buy some wine and refreshments, and left his wife alone with Wu Song in the upper room.
Jinlian admired his manly qualities and the nobility of his bearing, remembering how he had killed the tiger, and thinking what immeasurable vigor he must have. She said to herself: "These two men are both the sons of one mother; why should my husband's body be so ill-shapen that he seems more like a ghost than a man? In which of my former lives did I so misbehave that I should be doomed to marry an object like him? Wu Song is strong and lusty. Why should I not invite him to make his home with us? He seems the very man for me." She smiled sweetly, and said, "Where are you living, Uncle? Who looks after you?"
"I have just been appointed captain of the police," Wu Song said, "and, as I have to be ready for duty at all times, I live near the Town Hall. Two soldiers wait upon me and cook for me."
"Why not come and live here?" the woman said. "It would be much pleasanter for you than living near the Town Hall with only those nasty dirty soldiers to look after you. If you come and live with us, you will find it much more convenient and, any time you want any little thing to eat or drink, I shall be only too glad to prepare it for you myself and it will be perfectly clean."
"It is very good of you to suggest it," said Wu Song.
"Perhaps your wife is living somewhere in the neighbourhood," Jinlian said delicately. "I hope you will ask me to call on her."
"I have never married," said Wu Song.
Then Jinlian inquired politely how old he was, and when he told her he was twenty-eight, she remarked that he was three years older than herself. Finally, she asked where he had been living.
"I have been at Cangzhou for more than a year. I didn't know my brother had moved here but thought he still lived at the old place."
"Ah," Jinlian said, "that is a long story. We had to come here because, ever since I married your brother, people have taken advantage of his excessive meekness and never ceased to insult us. If only he were as strong as you, Uncle, no one would dare to answer him back."
"My brother has always been a good steady fellow," said Wu Song, "not a good-for-nothing like me."
"Don't be so absurd," the woman said, smiling. "There is an old saying that a man who has no spunk cannot long maintain his independence. I have some spirit myself, and I don't care for the sort of man who lets you hit him without turning a hair, and spins round and round like a top the more you strike him."
"If my brother does not make trouble," Wu Song said, "it is because he wishes to spare you unhappiness."
They were still talking in the upper room when Wu Da came back with a host of things to eat, and set them down in the kitchen. He came to the foot of the stairs and called, "Wife, Wife, come down!"
"Where are your manners?" Jinlian cried. "Why do you call me down? There is no one except myself to entertain your brother."
"Please do not trouble about me," Wu Song said.
"Why don't you go next door," the woman said, "and ask old woman Wang to come and get the dinner ready? That's what you ought to do."
Wu Da went off and asked the old woman to come. She busied herself, and when all was ready, took the food upstairs and set it on the table—fish, meat, fruit and cakes. The wine was heated, and Wu Da, having asked his wife to take the host's place, himself sat at the side and put his brother in the seat of honour. When they were all in their places, the wine was poured out. Wu Da himself heated it and served the other two. "Uncle," Jinlian said, as she took her cup, "please excuse our having made no special preparations for you. I am afraid this is very inferior wine."
"Please don't say that," said Wu Song. "It is most kind of you to trouble about me at all."
While Wu Da busied himself with the heating of the wine, Jinlian, all smiles, and with the word "Uncle" continually upon her lips, kept saying, "Will you not have something tasty?" and, taking the choicest parts from different dishes, herself offered them to her brother-in-law.
Wu Song was a simple-hearted fellow and treated her like a sister, not knowing the sort of woman she was. Cleverly enough, she assumed a modest air, and it never occurred to him that she was deliberately trying to seduce him. They sat together and drank several cups of wine but she could not keep her eyes away from him, and this finally embarrassed him so much that he turned his head away. By this time, he had drunk much wine and, as he began to feel a little tipsy, he decided it was time to go and stood up to take his leave.
"What is your hurry?" Wu Da cried. "Stay and have a little more to drink. You have nothing to do now."
"Thank you," said Wu Song politely, "but I shall see you both some other time."
They went downstairs with him, and as he was going out of the door, Jinlian cried, "Don't forget to make arrangements to come here to live. If you don't, the neighbours will have a very poor opinion of our hospitality. Brothers are not strangers, and your company will be a pleasure to us."
"It is very kind of you," Wu Song said. "I will bring my things here this very evening."
"We shall be waiting for you," the woman said.

*

Wu Song went to the inn near the Town Hall, packed his baggage and his bedclothes, and told a soldier to carry them to his brother's house. When Pan Jinlian saw him coming, she was as delighted as if she had discovered a hidden treasure. She bustled about preparing a room for her brother-in-law and setting everything to rights. Wu Song sent back the orderly, and stayed the night at his brother's home. The next day, he rose very early, and Jinlian hastened to heat water for him. He washed, combed and tied his hair, and then made ready to go to the office to sign the roll.
"Uncle," Jinlian said, "when you have signed the roll, be sure to come home for lunch. You mustn't think of taking your meals anywhere but here."
After signing the roll, Wu Song waited all the morning in attendance at the office, and finally went home. Jinlian had taken the greatest pains over the cooking, and the three sat down together to lunch. Taking a cup of tea in both hands, the woman offered it to Wu Song.
"You take so much trouble on my account," he said, "that it makes me quite embarrassed. Tomorrow I will arrange for a soldier to come and wait on us."
"Please do no such thing," Jinlian cried anxiously. "We are the same flesh and blood, and this house is home to us all. I am not waiting upon a stranger. Certainly this little Ying'er is not much use, and I can't rely upon her. She always seems to do the wrong thing. But if we get a soldier to help about the house, I shall find him in the way in the kitchen, and it will fidget me to watch him."
"In that case," Wu Song said, "I can only accept your kindness gratefully."
Not long after Wu Song had taken up his abode in his brother's house, he gave Wu Da some money and asked him to make arrangements to give a party for the neighbours. They came with presents to pay their respects to Wu Song, and a little later Wu Da gave another party in return. Wu Song presented his sister with a length of coloured silk to make dresses.
"Oh, Uncle," she cried delightedly, "I can't possibly accept such a magnificent present," but she hastened to add: "Since you have already bought it, I suppose I must not refuse." She made a reverence, and took the silk. From that time, Wu Song was definitely established as a member of his brother's household. Wu Da, as before, went to the street everyday to sell his cakes, and Wu Song went to the Town Hall to perform his official duties. Whether he returned early or late, Jinlian always had something ready for him, and seemed delighted to wait upon him. He noticed this but thought no more about it. Nonetheless, the woman was forever trying to lead him on by pretty speeches, though she found it no easy task, for he was really incorruptible. If he had anything of importance to say, he would stay long enough to say it but if not, he went straight about his business.
A month soon passed. It was the eleventh month, and they began to experience seasonable weather. The north wind blew violently for several days and black clouds gathered on every hand. Then the snow began to fall, and soon it filled the skies.
For miles and miles the skies were filled with thick dark clouds.
Snowflakes, dancing past the window ledge, in midair formed a screen like tiny flowers of jade.
Zi Yu's boat, on the Yan River, was held and forced to tarry.
Soon was a mantle laid on the high palaces

River and mountain bound with a chain of silver
The skies filled with winged salt and driving, powdery dust.
That day, LŪ Meng, in his little hut, sighed
For all his wretchedness.

The snow continued without ceasing until the first night watch; the world was silver everywhere, and it seemed as though the earth had arrayed itself in a glorious garment of jade. Next morning, Wu Song went to the office and stayed till noon. Jinlian bade her husband go and sell his cakes and she went to ask her neighbour, old woman Wang, to go and buy some food and wine for her. Then she went to Wu Song's room, and made up the fire, thinking: "Today I will make sure of him. Beyond a doubt I can do something to wake him up." Afterwards, feeling quiet and lonely, she went and stood beneath the lattice and waited till she saw Wu Song trampling down the glistening snow as he hastened home.

She quickly raised the lattice for him and smiled. "You look frozen, Uncle." He answered her politely and came in, taking off his hat. Jinlian offered to take it but he brushed the snow away himself and hung it on the wall. Then he unloosed his girdle, took off his outer gown of parrot green, and went into the living room.

"I have been expecting you all the morning," Jinlian said. "Why didn't you come back to lunch?"

"One of my friends asked me to lunch," Wu Song replied, "and just now I had another invitation but I decided not to accept it, and came home instead."

"Is that so?" said the woman. "Won't you come a little nearer the fire?" Wu Song thanked her and, taking off his oiled boots, changed his socks and put on a pair of slippers. Then he brought a bench and sat down by the fire. Jinlian told Ying'er to bolt the gate and shut the back door. She herself went to fetch some of the dishes she had cooked, and set them on the table before Wu Song.

"Where is my brother?" he said.

"He has not come back from business yet," the woman answered. "Let us drink a few cups of wine together."

"It is not late," Wu Song said. "We had better wait for him."

"Oh, why should we bother about him?" Jinlian cried.

At that moment Ying'er came in with the wine already warmed. Wu Song again apologized politely for causing so much trouble. Jinlian said nothing but brought a bench to the fire and sat down. There were several dishes on the table but she only took a cup of wine, looked at Wu Song, and invited him to drink it. This he did in one breath. She poured a second cup and handed that to him, saying, "It is so cold, you must drink this to keep the other company." This, too, Wu Song drank straight off. Then he filled a cup for her. She took the wine and sipped it delicately, then poured out still another cup and offered it to him. Her milk-white breast was partially uncovered, and her disordered hair was like a beautiful cloud. Desire had given colour to her cheeks.

"People tell me you keep a singing girl over there by the Town Hall," she said slyly. "Is that true?"

"People always talk nonsense like that but you shouldn't believe them, Sister," Wu Song said. "I never was that kind of man."

"I don't believe you," said Jinlian. "Your heart speaks one language and your tongue another."

"Ask my brother, if you don't believe me."

"What on earth is the use of bringing him into it?" Jinlian said. "His life is one long dream. Judging by the way he goes about, you might think he was always half tipsy. He would not have to spend all his days selling cakes if he had a particle of intelligence. But have another cup of wine."

She filled three or four cups one after the other, and Wu Song drank them all. She drank a few cups too, till the spur of desire pressed her more acutely and the passion within her blazed so that she lost all control of herself and could hardly speak. By this time, an inkling of the true state of affairs was beginning to dawn upon Wu Song, and he looked away from her. After a while she rose and went to heat some more wine. Wu Song, left alone in the room, took up the poker and began to poke the fire. Jinlian was soon back again with a jar of wine that she had warmed. In one hand she held the jar and with the other she gently pressed his shoulder. "Uncle," she said, "you must be cold with so few clothes." Wu Song was now beginning to feel thoroughly uncomfortable, and made no answer. Seeing him thus silent, she snatched the poker from his hand and cried, "You don't know how to poke. Let me do it for you. I want it as hot as a bowl of fire."

Wu Song felt even more uneasy but he still said nothing. Jinlian was not in any way put out. She set down the poker and poured out another cup of wine. She drank a mouthful, looked meaningly at Wu Song, and said, "If you feel like it, drink what I have left."

This was too much. He snatched the cup from her hand and dashed the wine upon the floor, crying, "Don't be so shameless," and at the same time pushed her so violently that she almost fell. Then he gazed haughtily upon her.

"My feet are steadfast upon the earth and I aspire to reach the heavens. I am a man with teeth in my mouth and hair upon my head. I am a man, I say, not a swine or a cur, that I should pay no heed to the sacred laws of honour or flout the precepts of common decency. You must not behave in this shameless way. If I hear any whisper of your ever doing such a thing again, my eyes may tell me that you are my sister but my fist will not recognize you."

This made Jinlian so confused and angry that her face became crimson. She called Ying'er to clear away the dishes, and muttered, "I was only joking. How could you think I was in earnest? You are not an honourable man." When the dishes had been removed, she went down to the kitchen.

So Jinlian came to realize that her blandishments were without effect, except that Wu Song had treated her roughly, while he, now sitting alone, grew angrier and angrier and thought very seriously about the matter.

It was still early, about the hour of the Monkey, when Wu Da came back, carrying his baskets over the snow. He opened the door, put down his burden, and going into the house at once saw that his wife's eyes were red with weeping. "With whom have you been quarreling now?" he said.

"If you were not such a mean-spirited creature," his wife cried, "things like this would not happen. But you never care whether outsiders insult me or not."

"Who has been insulting you?" Wu Da said.

"If you really wish to know, it was that scoundrel, your brother. When the snow was very heavy, I saw him coming back, and I was kindly getting something ready for him, when he saw there was nobody about, and tried to seduce me. It is perfectly true: Ying'er saw him."

"My brother is not that kind of man," her husband said. "He has always been high-principled and straightforward. Don't make so much noise, or the neighbours will hear you and laugh." He went to see Wu Song.

"You haven't eaten your cakes, Brother," he said. "I'll come and have some with you." But Wu Song did not answer him and, after brooding there a while, started to leave the house.

"Where are you going?" cried Wu Da but his brother went off without replying. Wu Da went back to the room and said to his wife, "I called him but he would not answer, and now he has gone down the road to the Town Hall. I'm sure I don't understand what all the bother is about."

"You thievish, stupid worm," Jinlian cried. "There is nothing to understand. The wretch is ashamed and dare not face you. That's why he has gone out. Probably he has not the audacity to inflict himself upon us any longer, and has gone to tell somebody to come and take his things away. I can't imagine why you bother about him."

"If he goes away," Wu Da said, "people will certainly laugh at us."

"You silly creature," Jinlian cried. "He is a shameless, immoral fellow, and he tried to seduce me. Is that a laughing matter? If you want him so much, go and live with him. I won't put up with it. Give me divorce papers if you like, and then the pair of you can live together."

After this, Wu Da did not dare to open his mouth again, and he had to suffer his wife's ill-temper for a long time. They were indeed still quarreling when Wu Song, with a soldier carrying a long pole, came back, packed up his luggage, and went off. Wu Da went after him, crying, "Why are you going away, Brother?"

"Ask no questions," Wu Song answered. "If I tell the truth, your good name will be ruined. Let me go."

Wu Da did not dare to question him any further, and was obliged to let him go with his luggage. Meanwhile his wife was scolding in her room: "That's better. Relations always prove a nuisance in the long run. People don't know the truth. Just because here is a young brother with a position at the Town Hall, they must needs conclude that he keeps his brother and sister. They never think that he is really eating us out of house and home. He is like a yellow quince, good to look at and rotten inside. I shall thank my lucky star if he takes himself off for good and all. Indeed there is nothing I hope more than that I may never set eyes on that piece of ill-fortune again."

Wu Da could not avoid hearing all his wife said but still he could not make out what had really happened, and his heart was troubled. Now that his brother had gone back to live at the inn near the Town Hall, he still sold buns and cakes upon the street. He longed for an opportunity to go to the Town Hall and have a talk but his wife gave him strict instructions that he must not dare to do anything of the sort, and he did not venture to disobey her. After Wu Song's departure, the snow suddenly stopped. Ten days passed.

The magistrate of Qinghe had been stationed there for more than two years and had amassed much gold and silver. Now he wanted a man of courage to take his treasure to the Eastern Capital, so that his relatives might take charge of it. In three years his term of office would expire, and knowing that he would then have to make his report to the Emperor, he thought it would be well to have this gold and silver in hand when he came to deal with officials more exalted than himself. But he felt the need of a stout fellow for the job, as thieves often beset the way. Then he thought of Wu Song. He was just the man. That very day he sent for Wu Song and said to him:

"I am thinking of sending an important present to one of my relatives at the Eastern Capital. I mean Zhu Mian, one of the Grand Marshal's officers. There may be some danger about the journey but if you undertake it, I am sure all will be well. If you will do this for me, I will reward you handsomely when you get back."

"You have shown me so much kindness, Sir, that I should never think of refusing," Wu Song replied. "I will set off as soon as you give me your orders."

The magistrate was now perfectly satisfied. He gave Wu Song three cups of wine, and handed him ten taels of silver as journey money. After receiving his instructions, Wu Song went to the inn and, after getting his orderly to buy some food and a jar of wine at a shop in the street, went to his brother's house. When Wu Da returned, he found his brother waiting on the doorstep. He had told his servant to take the wine and food into the kitchen.

Jinlian had not abandoned all hope, and when she saw Wu Song coming with wine and other delicacies she said to herself: "He must still be thinking about me, or he would not have come back. I may get him yet." So she went upstairs to powder her face and arrange her hair, and when she had changed into a prettier dress, she came down to welcome him.

"I can't imagine what can have displeased you, Uncle," she said, as she made a reverence. "For several days you haven't been near us, and I have often wondered why. It is delightful to see you home again but why did you trouble to bring wine and food?"

"I have something to say to my brother," Wu Song said. "That is why I have come."

Jinlian invited him to go upstairs, and they all three went to the upper room. Wu Da and his wife sat in the places of honour, and Wu Song sat down on a long bench. The orderly brought up the food and Wu Song invited his brother and sister to take some. From time to time, Jinlian glanced meaningly at her brother-in-law but he paid no attention to anything but the wine he was drinking. When they had all drunk several cups, Wu Song asked Ying'er to bring a loving cup and, when the orderly had heated the wine, he took this cup in his hands and said to Wu Da:

"Honourable elder brother: today the magistrate has ordered me to go to the Eastern Capital for him. I am starting tomorrow, and it may easily be two or three months before I get back, though I hope it will be less. What I have come to say to you is this: you have always been a long-suffering kind of man, and I don't intend you to be imposed upon in my absence. Now, listen to me. You have been in the habit of selling ten trays of cakes but in future you must only make five. Then you will be able to go out later and come home earlier. Don't let anyone persuade you to drink; pull down the shutters and bolt the door as soon as you get home. If you do this, you will be saved a great deal of unpleasantness but if anything disagreeable should happen, don't let yourself be drawn into a quarrel. Wait till I come back, and I'll soon settle the matter. Now, my dear brother, if you agree, drink this cup of wine."

Wu Da took the cup and drained it. "I will do whatever you think fit," he said.

Wu Song filled up the cup again and spoke to Jinlian. "Sister, you are no fool, and I don't think I need say any more. My brother is so simple-hearted that the real management of the household is in your hands. You will remember the old saying that a proud appearance is not always the mirror of an honest heart. If you attend to your household duties as you should, my brother will have nothing to worry about. As our fathers used to say: 'When the fence is safe, dogs cannot get in.'"

Jinlian listened, and the crimson colour spread across her face. She shook her finger at Wu Da, and addressed Wu Song through him. "You fool! What do you think you will gain by insulting me like this? I have to wear a woman's clothes, it is true but I am as good as any man. I am always steady and reliable. A man might stand upon my fist or a horse ride over my arm. I am not a turtle to be wounded without bloodshed. Never, since I married Wu Da, has even an ant dared to sneak into my room. How dare you talk about dogs getting in if the fence is not safe? Tell the truth, not a pack of lies. I don't care in the slightest what you say."

Wu Song laughed. "Don't lose your temper, Sister. So long as your heart keeps company with your mouth, all will be well. But I shall remember what you have said. And now, won't you drink this cup?"

Jinlian dashed the cup aside and ran downstairs. Before she reached the bottom, she turned and cried, "You think you're very wise and clever but how is it you don't seem to know that a brother's wife should be respected as a mother? When I first married Wu Da, nobody ever mentioned his having a brother. Where have you come from? Are you really a relative or are you not? One would think you were the master of the house. Oh, it makes me wild to have to put up with such nonsense." She went down the rest of the stairs, sobbing.

The brothers drank several more cups of wine together till they could stay no longer, while Jinlian affected many airs and graces. At last they both went downstairs, and took their leave of one another with tears streaming down their cheeks. "Brother," Wu Da said, "you must go, I suppose but come back as soon as you can and let my eyes rejoice in you once more."

Wu Song said, "Wouldn't it be better if you stayed away from business altogether, and let me arrange with somebody to supply you with funds?" Finally, he cried, "Remember what I say, Brother, and keep a watch on your door." Wu Da promised.

So Wu Song parted from his brother. He went back to the inn, packed his luggage, and saw to his weapons. The next morning he took charge of the magistrate's presents, secured a horse, and set off for the Eastern Capital.

After his brother's departure Wu Da had to endure his wife's scoldings for several days but he held himself in check, swallowed his wrath, and let her scold him. He did what his brother had told him, and made only half the number of cakes he had made before. Everyday he returned before sunset and, setting down his baskets, pulled down the shutters and closed the outer gate before he came to sit down in the room. His wife saw this, and grew more and more resentful everyday. "You horrible creature," she said at length, "one would think you couldn't tell the time. Even jailers don't bar the prison gate while the sun is still in the heavens. Our neighbours must be in fits of laughter and think we are afraid of ghosts. You are just like a newborn babe who has to do what his brother tells him. Aren't you ashamed to have everybody laughing at you?"

"Let them laugh," Wu Da said. "What my brother said is true enough, and may save us much trouble yet."

"Pah, you vile creature!" his wife shouted, and spat in his face. "You, a grown-up man, have no will of your own but have to do whatever anybody tells you."

"Say what you like," Wu Da said with a gesture of weariness. "To me my brother's words are as gold and precious stones." He continued to go out late and return early, and he still shut the door as soon as he got home. This so infuriated his wife that she almost had a fit; she quarreled with him so incessantly that trouble seemed to have become a habit. About the time for his return, she would pull down the shutter and bolt the door, thinking that so she would annoy him but instead of making him angry, this gave him considerable secret satisfaction and he thought: "If she takes things like this, so much the better for all concerned."

The sun's bright horses galloped past the window, and the sun and moon raced like a weaver's shuttles. It seemed but a moment since the winter solstice passed and it was the season when the plum trees blossom, yet now the weather was giving warning of spring's return. One day, in the third month, the sun shone so pleasantly that Jinlian decided to dress herself in her best clothes. Wu Da was out, and she was standing by the door beneath the lattice. Thinking it was nearly time for his return, she prepared to pull down the shutter and go back to the room to wait for him. But now the fates intervened. A man passed beneath the lattice.

In affairs of the heart we always find that Fate brings the lovers together, and a story would not be worth the telling if accidents never happened. Jinlian was holding the pole and preparing to pull down the shutter, when a gust of wind suddenly blew it out of her hand. She could not catch it, and it fell upon the man's head. She smiled her apologies, and stole a look at him. Upon his head he wore a tasseled hat, and golden filigree hairpins, with one of the signs of the zodiac edged with jade. Over slender hips he wore a green silk gown and on his feet a pair of fine but heavily soled shoes, with socks as white as the purest water. He was fanning himself with a gilt fan. He was indeed as handsome as Master Zhang, and worthy of comparison with Pan An.

Jinlian peeped at him from under the lattice. When first the pole struck him, he stopped and seemed on the point of an angry outburst but, as he turned, he suddenly beheld an incredibly pretty woman.

Her hair was black as a raven's plumage; her eyebrows mobile as the kingfisher and as curved as the new moon. Her almond eyes were clear and cool, and her cherry lips most inviting. Her nose was noble and exquisitely modeled, and her dainty cheeks beautifully powdered. Her face had the delicate roundness of a silver bowl. As for her body, it was as light as a flower, and her fingers as slender as the tender shoots of a young onion. Her waist was as narrow as the willow, and her white belly yielding and plump. Her feet were small and tapering; her breasts soft and luscious. One other thing there was, black-fringed, grasping, dainty, and fresh but the name of that I may not tell. Words fail to describe the charm of so beauteous a vision.

Her luxuriant coal-black hair was as thick as the clouds. On each side she wore small pins and, at the back, a pair of combs with a cleverly fashioned flower. Two peach flowers adorned her willow-leaf eyebrows. The jade pendants she wore were remarkable but the glory of her uncovered bosom was that of jade beyond all price. She wore a blue gown bound with a long silk-embroidered sash, and in her cuff a tiny satchel of perfumes. Beneath her delicate throat, a many-buttoned corsage concealed her breast.

Her feet were graced by tiny shoes made like the mountain crow, with tips embroidered to look like the claws. Their high heels were of white silk, so that she seemed always to walk upon a fragrant dust. Her scarlet silken trousers were decorated with birds and flowers and, as she sat or when she rose, the wind would puff out her skirts and flowing undergarments. From her mouth there came a perfume as delicious as that of orchides and musk, while her cherry lips and beautiful cheeks had the glory of a flower. One glimpse of this vision, and the souls of men would flutter away and die. Many handsome young men might perish at the sight.

No sooner had the man set eyes upon all this beauty than he became almost beside himself with desire. His anger sped to Java and his face was quickly wreathed in smiles. Jinlian knew that she was to blame for the disaster, so she made a graceful reverence and said, "The wind suddenly blew the pole out of my hand, and I had the misfortune to strike you. Please do not be angry with me."

The man set his hat straight with one hand, and made a reverence so low that he almost swept the ground. "Lady," he said, "it was not of the slightest consequence. You may do with me what you will."

It so happened that the neighbour, old woman Wang, the tea seller, had seen everything that happened. She was greatly entertained. "Who may you be, Sir," she cried, "who pass by this house to be welcomed with blows upon the head?"

The man laughed. "It was all my fault. I should have been more careful. Please don't be vexed with me, Lady."

"Don't beat me," said the old woman Wang, still enjoying the joke. The man laughed again, and bowed most profoundly to express his regret. His roguish eyes, experienced in amorous adventure and well versed in the value of a woman's charms, could not look away from Jinlian. At last he went off, strutting and waving his fan, though not without turning around seven or eight times.

Jinlian had no sooner set eyes upon the man with his engaging manner and lively ways, no sooner heard him speak so winningly and brightly, than she fell head over heels in love with him. She had no idea who he was or where he lived but she rightly concluded that he would not have turned his head so often unless he reciprocated her feelings in some measure. She stayed beneath the lattice until he was out of sight and then, pulling down the shutter, closed the door and went back to her room.

You may have guessed who this man was. None other than that chief of those who sought the pleasures of the couch, that captain of those who gather precious treasure and pursue unlawful fragrance, his Lordship Ximen. His third wife had just died and been given a solemn burial and, being distressed in mind, he was taking a stroll along the street intending to call upon Ying Bojue and thus secure a little distraction from his gloom. As he passed by Wu Da's house, he received, as we have seen, an unexpected blow on the head. But now that he had seen Jinlian under the lattice, Master Ximen went home again. "That was a splendid woman," he thought. "I wonder how I can get hold of her." He suddenly remembered old woman Wang, the neighbour who kept a tea shop. "She seems a clever old body," he said to himself, "and, if she can bring this affair to the conclusion I desire, she shall have a few taels of silver." He did not stay to eat anything but hurried off to the street and dashed to old woman Wang's tea shop. He went in and took a seat, looking out beneath the awning.

"That was a very fine bow you made, Sir," said old woman Wang, laughing.

"Please come here, Stepmother," Ximen said. "That young neighbour of yours—er—that young woman—ahem— whose wife is she?"

"Oh," the old woman replied, "she is the sister of the King of Hell, the daughter of General Wu Dao. What makes you ask?"

"Don't treat the matter as a joke," Ximen said. "I am speaking seriously."

"Surely you know, Sir," said old woman Wang. "Her husband sells cakes outside the Town Hall."

"What! Xu the Third?" Ximen said.
The old woman shook her head. "No, if it were he, they would be something like a pair. Guess again, Sir."
"Perhaps it is Li the Third, then: he sells cakes."
The old woman shook her head again. "No, if he were the man, I should think they were perfectly matched."
"Well, then," Ximen cried, "it must be Liu Xiao. You know: the man they call Tattooed Arms."
Still the old woman laughed. "No," she said, "even if it were he, I should say they were a well-mated couple. Guess once more, Sir."
"I can't guess, Stepmother," Ximen said almost in despair, while the old woman roared with laughter.
"Well, I'll tell you. Her husband is that fellow Wu Da, who hawks his cakes about the streets."
When Ximen Qing heard this, he nearly jumped out of his chair. "You can't mean that Wu Da whom people call Tom Thumb or Old Scraggy Bark."
"That is the man," replied the old woman.
"Good Heavens," Ximen cried. "What a tasty piece of lamb to fall into a dog's mouth. However can it have happened?"
"It is always the same," old woman Wang replied. "You always find a beautiful horse ridden by some fool of a man, and a pretty girl sleeping with a husband who is not fit to be seen. The old Man in the Moon works things that way."
"How much do I owe you?" Ximen said.
"Nothing worth mentioning," the old woman replied. "We will leave it till another time."
"With whom is your son Wang Chao working now?" Ximen asked.
"He is away with a merchant, a native of Huai but really he has been away so long that I don't know whether he's alive or dead."
"Why not let him come to me? He seems to be a smart lad."
"I am glad he meets with your approval."
"Very well," Ximen said, "when he comes back we must talk about the matter again." He thanked the old woman and went away. But in less than no time he was back again, sitting once more near the door that looked upon Wu Da's house.
"May I offer you some damson broth, Sir?" said old woman Wang, when she came out.
"I should like some very much," Ximen said, "but let it be a little sour, if you don't mind." The old woman made the broth, and offered it to him with both hands. When he had finished it, he put down the cup. "You make excellent damson broth, Stepmother," he said. "Have you got many dam-sons in your room there?"
"I have dealt in damsons all my life," the old woman said, "but I never keep them in my room."
"I was talking about damsons, not damsels," said Ximen. "You are getting a little mixed up."
"It was damsels you were thinking about, nonetheless," the old lady retorted.
"Well," said Ximen, "you admit you sell damsels. What about finding one for me? If you can let me have a nice tasty one, you won't lose by it."
"You are only teasing me," the old woman said. "If your wife heard about it, my old face would have a rough time."
"Not at all," Ximen said. "My wife is a most amiable woman, and I have several girls already but none of them is exactly what I want. If you have a really good girl on your books, you must introduce her to me. I don't care whether she is somebody else's leavings or not but she must be a woman who will satisfy me."
"Ah," the old woman said, "a few days ago I did hear of an excellent girl but I'm afraid she wouldn't do for you."
"If she is the right stuff, just go ahead, and you shall be well paid for your pains."
"She is more than usually good-looking," said the old lady, "but rather old, perhaps."
"Well," said Ximen, "people have always said that a middle-aged woman has a charm all her own. It will not put me off if she happens to be a year or two older than I am. But how old is she?"
"She was born under the planet Mercury and her animal is the Pig, so as my reckoning goes, she will be ninety-three years old next New Year."
"You crazy old woman," Ximen cried. "Why do you screw up your silly old face and make fun all the time?" It was getting late and he decided to go away. The old woman had lighted her lamp and was going to fasten the gate, when Ximen Qing once again appeared. He sat down under the awning and gazed with longing eyes at Wu Da's house.
"Would you like a little allspice soup?" old woman Wang said.
"Yes, please," said Ximen, "but let it be sweet." The old woman hastily brought some soup, and he ate it all. He sat there till it was very late. At last he stood up. "Please make out my bill, old lady, and I will pay you next time I come."
"Don't worry about it," the old woman said; "we shall certainly have another opportunity of settling it." Ximen Qing laughed and went away.
At home, he could take no pleasure either eating or sleeping; his heart was consumed with desire for Jinlian. Wu Yueniang saw him in this sad state but thought it was because of his third wife's death, and did not trouble him. Next morning, as soon as it was light and old woman Wang came out to unbolt her gate, Ximen Qing was already striding down the street.
"Ah," she thought, "new brooms sweep clean, and this one seems to be doing all its sweeping in this direction. I must keep the young man on tenterhooks for a while. In his dealings with the people here, he always manages to come off best but if I get him into my clutches, I shall be surprised if I can't squeeze a little bawdy money out of him."
Old woman Wang's past history was none too creditable. She had been an efficient and busy go-between all her life, and occasionally dealt in children. She had also practiced midwifery, applying the requisite pressure to the mother and receiving the little ones on their arrival. In short, she was a thoroughly accomplished rogue.
The old woman had just opened her door to throw out the tea leaves when she saw Ximen Qing pacing up and down. Finally he came towards the tea shop and stood underneath the awning facing Wu Da's door. He was looking up at the lattice as though he could not take his eyes from it. The old woman pretended not to see him, and went on making a fire in her tea shop, until Ximen Qing, finding that she did not come out to offer him any tea, called to her to bring two cups.
"Ah," the old woman said, "is that you, my lord? Why have you allowed so long a time to pass without coming to see me? Please take a seat." In a few moments, she had made two cups of very strong tea and set them on the table.
"You'll take a cup with me, Stepmother, won't you?" Ximen said.
"I am not your shadow," the old woman said, laughing. "Why should I always drink tea with you?"
Ximen Qing laughed. "What do these neighbours of yours sell?"
"Roasted love darts; dried cuckoo's nests with parsley all around them; good fresh mincemeat; rolls all ready to be stuffed; oyster dumplings, and warm-heart pastries."
"You mad old woman," Ximen said, laughing. "I do wish you would talk sense."
"I am not mad by any means," said the old woman. "If you would rather go and ask the master of the house, you will find him at home."
"I am quite serious," Ximen said. "If they have good buns there, I should like to buy forty or fifty and take them home with me."
"There is no need to go to the house to buy them. The man will be going to the street in a minute or two, and you can get as many as you like."
"That is true," said Ximen. He drank his tea, lingered for a while, and at last went away. Old woman Wang watched him with her stony eyes, and saw him pacing to and fro, looking first to the right and then to the left. This he did seven or eight times. At last he came back to the tea shop.
"How do you do, Sir?" the old lady said. "I had almost forgotten what you look like."
Ximen Qing took a tael of silver from his sleeve and handed it to her. "This is for my tea," he said.
The old woman smiled. "Why do you give me so much?"
"I should take it if I were you," said Ximen, "and not trouble how much it is."
"Now," thought the old woman, "my chance has come. It is time this broom lost some of its bristles. I will take this today, and it will doubtless come in for my lodging tomorrow." She said aloud, "I see there is something you have set your heart upon."
"What makes you think that?" Ximen said.
"It is not very hard to see. There is an old saying, 'When a man enters your door, don't trouble to ask whether he is in luck or not. Look at his face.' I can assure you I've guessed things far more difficult than that."
"If you can guess what I am thinking about," said Ximen, "you shall have five taels of silver."
Old woman Wang laughed. "One guess will be enough. Let me whisper in your Lordship's ear. You have been haunting this neighbourhood for two or three days, and it is quite clear that you have your eye on the lady next door. Am I right?"
Ximen Qing smiled. "Your intelligence, Stepmother, is worthy of Sui He, and you are even sharper than Lu Jia. I shall not attempt to hoodwink you. I don't know how it is but ever since I saw her face under the lattice I seem to have lost both my heart and my head. Day and night I can think of nothing else. When I am at home, I can neither eat nor drink, and work is out of the question. I wonder if you can think of some way to help me."
"I shall not try to hoodwink you either," the old woman said. "People imagine that I keep a tea shop here but to tell you the truth, a ghost playing the night watchman would fill the part as honestly as I do mine. One day, I certainly did sell some tea. It was three years ago, to be precise, when snow fell in the sixth month; but I've sold none since. No, sir, I make my living in quite another way."
"And what may that be?" Ximen asked.
"When I was thirty-six years old, my husband died. He left me with a young boy and not a penny to live on. So I took up the business of a go-between, and also made a little money by making clothes, acting the midwife, and introducing people to one another. Sometimes I let blood for people who are ill."
I had no idea your accomplishments were so many," Ximen said. "If you can arrange this matter to my satisfaction, I will give you ten taels of silver for your coffin. All you have to do is to get that woman to meet me."
"I was only joking," the old woman said. "Why did you take me seriously?"

*

Ximen Qing was desperately anxious to possess Pan Jinlian. He gave the old woman no peace.
"Stepmother," he said, "if you bring this business to a happy end, I will give you ten taels of silver."
"Sir," said the old woman, "you may have heard, perhaps, of setting a love snare. The expression implies much that is difficult and is, indeed, what is more commonly known as wife stealing. Before a man can set about this wife-stealing business with any prospect of success, five things are essential. He must be as handsome as Pan An. His member must be at least as large as a donkey's. He must be as rich as Deng Tong, and reasonably young. Finally, he must have plenty of time on his hands, and almost endless patience. If you are possessed of all these qualifications, you may think of going in for this sort of entertainment."
"I think I may say I do possess them all," Ximen Qing said. "I would not venture to compare my handsome figure with that of Pan An but it will serve. Ever since I was a boy, I have played in the lowest and most unsavory haunts, and I must say I have succeeded in keeping a very fat turtle well content. I may not have as much money as Deng Tong but have a good deal put away, certainly sufficient to live upon. As for my patience, I should never think of retaliating though I received four hundred blows. Finally, if I had not plenty of time to waste, you would not be seeing me here so often. Stepmother, do this for me, and you shall not be disappointed with your reward."
"There is one thing more, Sir," the old woman said. "You tell me that you possess the five essential qualifications but I fear this too is indispensable."
"What do you mean?" Ximen Qing cried.
"Forgive my speaking plainly," the old woman said, "but when a man would run off with somebody else's wife, there are very considerable difficulties in the way. A man may spend almost his last penny, and still fail. He must go to the absolute limit. I happen to know that you particularly dislike parting with your money, and that is the difficulty."
"It shall be no difficulty in this case," Ximen said, "for I will do anything you suggest."
"Very well," the old woman said, "if you are really prepared to spend a few taels, I have a plan that should enable you to secure the lady."
Ximen would have liked to hear it but the old woman said, with a laugh, "It is too late today, and time you went home. Come back in six months, or perhaps three, and we will see what we can do."
"Stepmother," said Ximen, "don't joke about it. Only do this for me and you shall have a really handsome present." But the old woman laughed all the more.
"You certainly seem to be very keen," she said. "Nobody ever comes to say his prayers to me at the temple of Wu Cheng Wang but my plan is as good and better than any that fellow Sun Wuzi could have made. He was able to turn girls into soldiers but I could have captured eight out of ten of them. Let me tell you all I know about this woman. She comes of a poor family but she is as clever as can be. She knows how to play and sing, her embroidery is excellent, and she is expert at many games. In fact, there is nothing she doesn't know. Her surname is Pan, and her personal name, Jinlian. Her father was Pan Cai, who used to live by the South Gate. Originally, she was sold to Master Zhang, and at his house she learned to sing and play. When Zhang was very old, he made a present of her to Wu Da. She does not go out very often and, when I am not busy, I go over to her place and get anything she happens to want. She always calls me Stepmother.
"These last few days, Wu Da has been going out early. If you wish to clinch the matter, you must buy some silk, one roll of blue, another of white, another of the finest white silk, and ten taels of good raw silk. Give them to me. I will go to her house to borrow a calendar, and ask her to tell me a day of good omen so that I can engage a dressmaker to come and make me some clothes. It may be that she will find a day for me but not offer to come herself to make the clothes. In that case, there is nothing to be done. If she is very pleasant and says, 'Don't get a dressmaker. I will come and make the clothes for you,' that will be one to us. If I can persuade her to come here to sew, that will be another one to us. If she comes at noon, I will set out refreshments and invite her to have some. She may say, 'I am very sorry but I can't,' and go off home and, in that case, we shall have to give up. On the other hand, she may say nothing but sit down and eat my lunch, and then we score again.
"You must not come tomorrow but the day after. Put on your smartest clothes. Give a cough of warning, and then come to the door and call, 'How do you do, Stepmother? May I come in and have a cup of tea?' I will come out and ask you in. It is possible that, as soon as she sees you, she may want to go home, and, if she does, I cannot stop her. That will be the end. But if she stays where she is, we shall be four points to the good.
"When you sit down, I shall say to her, 'This is the gentleman who gave me the clothes. I can't tell you how grateful I am to him,' and I shall say all sorts of pretty things about your generosity. Then you will compliment her on her sewing. If she does not answer, we are done. If she does answer, and enters into conversation with you, our fifth point is gained.
"Then I shall say, 'Isn't this good lady kind to make my clothes for me?' and praise you both—you for giving me the money and her for making the clothes. I shall say, 'This lady is indeed good-hearted. I was lucky to be able to persuade her to come. Perhaps you would like to offer her some refreshment.' You will take some silver out of your pocket and ask me to go and buy something. If at that moment she decides to go, I can't hold her, and all is over. But, if she doesn't move, we shall have gained our sixth point.
"I shall take your silver and, as I go out, I shall say, 'I wonder if you would mind keeping this gentleman company?' She may jump up at that and, if she does so, I can't very well put my arms around her and hold her but, if she doesn't, we shall have gained another point.
"When I come back with the things, I shall put them on the table and say, 'Lady, put the clothes aside for a while and let us drink a little wine. This gentleman has been good enough to spend his money on us.' If she will not join us but takes her leave, the matter is ended. But if she says, 'Oh, really I can't stay,' but does not make any effort to go, the eighth point is ours.
"If she drinks her wine contentedly and begins to talk to you, I shall say, 'There is not enough wine,' and you will ask me to buy some more, and some fruits too, and give me silver for the purpose. Then I shall shut the door upon you both. If she is shy and tries to run away, we can do no more. But if she lets me fasten the door and does not get angry, we are within an ace of our goal. The last stage is the critical one. You, Sir, will stay in the room with the woman and talk prettily to her but you must not be too rough when you begin to take liberties. If you touch her, and spoil the whole game, it will not be my fault. But it is possible that you might knock down a pair of chopsticks with your sleeve, and touch her foot when you pretend to pick them up. If this makes her angry, I shall come in and make peace between you but all our chances will be gone and we can never hope to retrieve the position. If she says nothing, we gain our tenth point, and the game is ours. If I lead you to victory, what reward may I expect?"
Ximen Qing listened to all this, and was perfectly delighted. "Your plan may not come from the Ling Yan temple," he said, "but it is absolutely flawless."
"Don't forget those ten taels of silver," old woman Wang said.
"If I get but a single piece of orange peel," Ximen said, "I shall never forget the Dongting lake. But when do you propose to put this scheme into operation, Stepmother?"
"Come back this evening," the old woman said, "and you shall know. By this time Wu Da has gone out, and I will go over about the calendar and say my part. You send somebody with the silk as quickly as possible. Don't waste any time."
"I'll see to it at once," Ximen Qing cried. "You may count upon me absolutely." He went to the street to buy the three rolls of silk and the ten taels of raw silk, and told Daian to wrap them up and take them to the old woman. She received them with great satisfaction and sent the boy away.
When the silk had come, the old woman opened her back door and went across to Wu Da's house. Jinlian took her upstairs, and they sat down.
"Why have you not been to take tea in my poor house lately?" asked the old woman.
"I haven't been well these last few days," Jinlian replied, "and somehow I have not felt inclined to move."
"Have you a calendar in the house?" the old woman said. "I should like to see one. I wish to find a day favourable for making clothes."
"What clothes are you thinking of having made?"
"I am always suffering from something or another," the old woman said. "One of these days I shall find myself as high as the mountains and as deep as the ocean. And my son is not at home."
"Where has he been all this time?" Jinlian said.

"He went away with a stranger, and I have never had a word from him since. I worry about him all day long."
Jinlian asked how old the boy was, and when the old woman told her he was seventeen, she said, "Why don't you find him a wife? You would save yourself a great deal of work."
"You may well say that," the old woman said. "There never was a place so lonely as mine. I potter about, as best I can, and sometimes I do think I'll find a wife for him. When he comes home, I really must see about it. Day and night I have trouble with my breathing, and I cough till my body shakes as though it were being torn in pieces. And I can't sleep. I've come to the conclusion that it's time I was getting my funeral clothes together. Fortunately for me, there is a rich gentleman who often comes to have tea at my shop. When there is anybody ill at his place, he sends for me; I buy maids for him and see about marriages. He knows I am to be trusted; that I never neglect any little point, however unimportant it may seem to others. He has given me the material for a full set of funeral clothes, and all the trimmings too. I have had this stuff put away for more than a year and have done nothing with it. But this year I have not felt at all well, and as there is an extra month in it, and I am not very busy, I have taken my chance and I am going to have it made up at last. Unfortunately, all the dressmakers say they are too busy to come and make my clothes. You've no idea how ill all this anxiety makes me."
Jinlian listened to this long story, and smiled. "I'm afraid I can't make the clothes as well as they should be made but I have nothing particular to do, and, if you like, I'll see what I can do for you."
The old lady smiled delightedly. "With your precious hands to make the things, even if I die, my poor old body will rejoice. I have always heard what a good needlewoman you are but I have never dared to come and trouble you."
"Why should I not make them?" Jinlian said. "Anyhow, I've promised now, and I must do them for you. Take the calendar, and get someone to find an auspicious day. Then I'll begin."
"Do you think I don't know that you can read all the characters in the poems and the hundred dramas? Why should I take the calendar to anybody else?"
"I have never had any education," Jinlian said, with a smile.
"Oh, thank you, thank you," the old woman cried, handing her the calendar. Jinlian examined it, then she said, "Tomorrow is no good, and the day after that is no good either. We shall have to wait."
The old woman took the calendar and hung it on the wall. "If you are willing to do the work you yourself are my lucky star. I need not bother whether the day is lucky or not. Others have looked at the calendar and told me that tomorrow is not a good day for the purpose but that doesn't trouble me."
"Well," Jinlian said, "it may be that a day unlucky for other purposes is most suitable for the making of funeral clothes."
"If you don't mind, then come to my poor house tomorrow."
"Why not bring the material here?" said Jinlian.
"Because I should like to watch you sewing, and there is nobody to look after my house."
"Very well," Jinlian promised. "I will come to your house tomorrow after lunch."
"God bless you! God bless you!" the old lady cried. She went downstairs and away. That evening she told Ximen Qing the result of her efforts, and asked him to come two days later. The next morning the old woman swept out her room, prepared needles and thread, made some tea, and waited for Jinlian.
When Wu Da had eaten his breakfast, he went out with his baskets. His wife pulled up the lattice and ordered Ying'er to look after the house. Then she went by the back door to old woman Wang's house. The old lady, who was as pleased as could be, welcomed her and made her sit down. Then she made a cup of very strong tea, with walnuts and beech-nuts, and gave it to Jinlian. After wiping the table, she brought out the three rolls of silk. Jinlian measured them and cut all the garments out. Then she began to sew. The old woman watched her and poured forth a stream of compliments.
"What marvelous skill! I have lived nearly seventy years and never have I seen so swift a needle or such cunning fingers."
Jinlian sewed till noon. Then old woman Wang prepared lunch, and asked her to have some. Afterwards, Jinlian sewed till it was nearly dark; then she packed up the silk and went home. When Wu Da came in with his baskets, she closed the door and pulled down the blind. Wu Da saw that his wife's face was red, and asked her where she had been.
"I have been with our neighbour, Stepmother Wang," Jinlian said. "She asked me to make some funeral clothes for her and at lunchtime she set out some wine and cakes and insisted that I should have some."
"You ought not to eat her food," Wu Da said. "It is our place to invite her. She asked you to make these clothes, it is true but you should take your meals at home and not trouble her. If you go tomorrow, take some money with you and buy some food and wine in your turn. The proverb says: 'Better a neighbour at hand than a relative far away.' Don't let us spoil the friendship between us. If she will not allow you to return her hospitality, you must bring the clothes here and make them."
Jinlian listened but said nothing. The next day, after breakfast, Wu Da took his baskets and went out. Old woman Wang came over to invite Jinlian to go to her house, and soon they had brought the clothes out and were at work upon them again. Old woman Wang made a cup of tea for Jinlian but at lunchtime Jinlian took three fen from her sleeve and gave them to the old woman.
"Stepmother," she said, "it is my turn to buy a cup of wine."
"Oh dear!" the old woman cried, "what can you be thinking about? It was I who asked you to come and make these clothes, and I can't possibly allow you to spend your money as well. Why, if I did, your wine and food would poison me."
"You must blame my foolish husband," Jinlian said, "but he said, if you did not take it kindly, I was to go home."
"If your husband feels like that about it," the old woman said, "I suppose I must keep it." She was very much afraid of doing anything that might interfere with her plans, so she put some of her own money to it and went out to buy better food and wine. Then she invited the woman to join her.
It would seem that in all the world there is not a single woman, no matter how intelligent she may be, who cannot be led astray by some trivial act of kindness. Nine women out of every ten are caught this way.
The old woman prepared some refreshments and enjoyed them with Jinlian. Afterwards they went on sewing and, when evening began to fall, the old woman thanked her very heartily, and she went home once more.
After breakfast on the third day, the old woman waited till Wu Da had gone out, then she went to the back door and called out: "Lady, may I make so bold..." Jinlian said she would come in a moment, and soon they were again in the old woman's room, sitting down to work upon the clothes. The old woman made tea as usual. About midday, Ximen Qing arrived.
He had waited anxiously for this day, and now he dressed himself very elegantly, put three or four taels of silver in his sleeve, and sauntered off to Amethyst Street, with a golden fan in his hand. When he came to the old woman's house, he coughed. Then he called, "Where are you, Stepmother Wang? I haven't seen you for ever so long."
"Who is that calling me?" the old woman cried.
"Ximen Qing."
"I could not imagine who it might be," the old woman said, hurrying to the door, "and here you are! You have just come at the right moment. Come in and see what I have to show you." She took him by the sleeve and led him to her room. "This is the very gentleman who gave me the silk," she said to Jinlian.
Ximen Qing opened his eyes wide and gazed at the woman. The masses of her piled-up hair seemed like clouds of the darkest hue. Her rosy cheeks had all the freshness of spring. She was wearing a white linen coat, a dark red skirt, and a blue stomacher. When Ximen came in, she was sewing but she rose at once and made a reverence to him. He came forward and bowed profoundly. Then she put down the clothes and made a more profound reverence.
"I owe this gentleman a great deal," old woman Wang said. "It was he who gave me this material. I had it in the house a year before I could get anyone to make it up." Then she added, "I am greatly indebted to this lady too, for making the clothes for me. Her sewing is as fine as fine can be. Anything so good and fine is seldom seen in these days. Come and look at it, Sir."
Ximen Qing took up the clothes and examined them. "Indeed," he said, "the lady sews so exquisitely that only an angel could rival her."
Jinlian shyly looked at the ground but she smiled. "Do not make fun of my poor efforts," she said.
"Stepmother,' Ximen Qing said, "I hardly dare to ask you but who is this lady?"
"Guess," said the old woman.
"How can I guess?"
"Sit down then, and I will tell you. Do you remember passing by one day and getting a knock on the head?"
"Yes." Ximen said, "I know it is she who struck me that day but I still don't know who she is."
Jinlian bowed her head more deeply and said with a smile, "It was very careless of your slave to strike you. Please don't be angry with me, my lord."
"How could I possibly be?" Ximen said hastily.
"This lady is the wife of my neighbour, Wu Da," the old woman said.
"Is that so?" Ximen said. "I am afraid I was forgetful of my good manners."
The old woman turned to Jinlian and asked if she knew the gentleman.
"I do not," the woman replied.
"He is one of the wealthiest men in our district and a very good friend of the magistrate. It is Master Ximen. He has thousands and thousands of strings of cash, and keeps a medicine shop near the Town Hall. The money in his house is piled so high that it touches the North Star and even his spoiled rice is enough to fill many barns. His gold is yellow and his silver white. His pearls are round and his precious stones brilliant. He has rhinoceros horns and elephants' tusks. It was I who arranged his first marriage. His wife is the daughter of Captain Wu, a very intelligent woman indeed." Then she turned to Ximen. "Why have you not been to have tea with me lately?"
"I have been very busy attending to my daughter's betrothal," Ximen said, "and that has left me very little leisure."
"Whom is your daughter going to marry?" the old woman said, "and why didn't you get me to arrange the marriage?"
"She is going to marry Chen Jingji, the son of that Chen who is related to General Yang, who commands the Imperial Guard. The young man is seventeen years old and still at his studies. I should have asked you to arrange this marriage but a woman named Wen came from his family to ask for the betrothal papers, and Xue, the flower seller, acted for us. They arranged everything between them. But, Stepmother, we shall be giving a party very soon, and, if you care to come, I shall be delighted to have you join us."
"I was only joking," the old woman said. "The go-betweens in this city are all bitches. When they arranged the marriage, I had no finger in the pie, and, now that the dinner is cooked, they certainly won't wish me to have a bite. There is an old saying that there is never any love lost between those who follow the same profession. No, I will wait until the wedding is over and then I will come with a few humble presents, and I may pick up some of the leavings. That will be the best thing I can do. I can't allow myself to be left completely out of it." They chattered away in this strain, the old woman flattering him, and he muttering any nonsense in return. Meanwhile, Jinlian kept her head modestly bowed and went on with her needlework.
Ximen Qing glanced at her from time to time, and could see the passion within her growing stronger. This delighted him beyond measure, and he was more eager than ever to bring the matter to its consummation. The old woman made two cups of tea. She gave one to Ximen Qing and the other to Jinlian, and said: "Lady, won't you take a cup of tea with this gentleman?" She looked at Ximen, and stroked her cheek gently; it was a sign that five of their ten points were already gained. The power of tea to exhilarate, and the power of wine to bring people together, have always been acknowledged as the go-betweens of love.
"If you had not come here," old woman Wang said, "I should never have had the courage to go to your house and invite you. Good fortune brought you here, and good fortune, again, decided the moment of your coming. But there is an old saying: 'One guest never troubles two hosts.' You have given me money, and this kind lady has been good enough to work for me, and I don't know how I can express my gratitude to either of you. If the fates had not been kind, I should have found it hard to bring you two together. I suggest, Sir, that you take my place as host, and give me something to buy a little wine for the lady."
"I don't know whether I have any money with me," Ximen Qing said, feeling in his sleeve. He brought out a tael of silver, gave it to the old woman, and asked her to buy something with it.
"Not for me, please," Jinlian said but she made no attempt to move. The old woman took the silver and, as she prepared to go out, said, "Lady, I wonder if you will be good enough to keep the gentleman company till I come back. I shall only be a few minutes."
"Stepmother, please don't trouble," Jinlian said but still she remained in her place. The old woman went out, and left Ximen Qing and Pan Jinlian alone together.
Ximen's eyes seemed to devour the woman. She looked up at him coyly, then bowed her head again and went on with her sewing. Before long, the old woman was back again with cooked goose and roasted duck, meats of various kinds, and some luscious-looking fruits. She put them on dishes and set them on the table. Then she said to Jinlian: "Won't you put the clothes aside for a while, and take a cup of wine?"
"You drink with his Lordship," the woman said. "It is not for me to take such a liberty."
"You mustn't say that," the old woman cried, "it has all been arranged in your honour." She placed the dishes before them and, when they had taken their places, poured the wine.
"Stepmother," Ximen Qing said, "will you ask the lady to take wine with me?"
Jinlian thanked him. She dared not drink, she said, because a very little wine went to her head.
"Oh, you can hold a good deal," the old woman said, "I know that. Don't make a fuss about a cup or two." Jinlian took the wine and raised her glass to the others. Ximen Qing took up his chopsticks. "Stepmother," he said, "ask the lady to take something to eat." The old lady picked out some tidbits and passed them to the woman. The wine went around three times, and old woman Wang went out to warm some more.
"May I ask your age?" Ximen said.
"I am twenty-five," Jinlian said, bowing her head again.
"Then you and my wife are the same age. Her animal is the Dragon, and she was born on the fifteenth day of the eighth month."
"You are putting Earth and Heaven on the same plane," Jinlian said. "You pay me too great a compliment."
"This lady," old woman Wang said, "is as clever as can be, besides being such a good needlewoman. She knows all the philosophies of all the philosophers, not to speak of backgammon and chess. She can write very nicely too."
"Ah," Ximen said, with a sigh, "but where shall we find another like her?"
"I wouldn't say anything impertinent for the world," old woman Wang said, "but though you have many ladies in your house, I doubt whether there is one among them equal to this lady."
"That is true, I fear," Ximen said. "It is a long story. The fates have been unkind to me and I must own that none of them is really any use."
"Your first wife was good enough," the old woman said.
"Don't talk about her," Ximen cried. "If she had lived, things would have been very different but now there is no real mistress in the house and the whole place is going to rack and ruin. There are three, five, nay seven people—all ready enough to eat my food but not so ready to attend to their household duties."
"How long is it since your first wife died? I have forgotten."
"I hate to talk about it," Ximen said. "My first wife Chen came from a very poor family but she was a clever woman and did all I needed. Unhappily, she died more than three years ago. I have married again but my present wife is always ailing and the business of the household is too much for her. My domestic affairs are in complete disarray. Perhaps that is why I spend so much of my time away from home. If I didn't there would be trouble."
"You must excuse me, Sir," said the old woman, "but your late wife and your present wife together were not so skilled in needlework as this lady, or so attractive in appearance."
"My other wives also," said Ximen, "cannot compare with her."
"But what about the establishment in East Street?" the old woman said, laughing. "Why do you never ask me to tea there?"
"You are thinking of Zhang Xichun, the singing girl?" Ximen said. "I found she was a flighty creature and I have given her up."
"That may be," the old woman continued, "but what about Li Jiao'er, who used to be in the bawdy house? You have been on very good terms with her for a long time."
"Oh, I took her into my household some time ago and, if she proves satisfactory, I shall marry her."
"Then there was Miss Zhuo," the old woman suggested.
"Do not mention her name," Ximen said. "I made her my third wife but a short time ago she fell ill and died."
"Dear me! Dear me!" cried the old woman. "Suppose I found a lady like this, one whom you really liked, and came to your house to talk over the matter? Don't you think it would cause a disturbance?"
"My parents are both dead, and I am my own master. Who would dare say a word to me?"
"However, I may try. Where can I find a lady so much to your liking as this one?"
"Oh, there may be one for all we know," Ximen said. "But I loathe the Fates who control my matrimonial affairs. If they had been more indulgent, I might have found such a woman."
They chatted in this way for some time. At last old woman Wang said, "Just when we are ready for a little more wine, it all seems to have gone. I am sorry to trouble you, Sir but may I buy another jar?" Ximen Qing put his hand in his sleeve. There were still three or four taels there. He gave them all to the old lady, "Here you are," he said. "Any time we are short of wine, you need only go and get it."
The old woman thanked him, and got up. She glanced at Jinlian, who, after drinking three cups of wine, was already consumed with passion. The words that passed between them seemed only to add fuel to the fires that burned within. She bowed her head but still she did not move.

*

The sun streams through the painted doorway into the bedchamber.
There stands a maiden whom no gold can buy.
She leans against the door
Her lovely eyes, like beams of sunshine, seek to pursue her lover
But he has gone so far, her tender feet may never hope to follow.

Old woman Wang took the money and started for the door. Smiling, she said to Jinlian, "I must go to the street to buy a jar of wine; you will keep his Lordship company, won't you? If there is a drop left in the jar, warm two cups and drink them with him. The best wine is to be had in East Street. I shall have to go there for it, so I may be away some little time."

"Really I can't drink any more," Pan Jinlian cried. "Please don't go on my account."
"You and his Lordship are no longer strangers," said the old woman, "and you have nothing else to do. Drink a cup of wine with him. Why should you be afraid?"
With her lips Jinlian said she did not wish to drink but her body told another story. The old woman shut the door and fastened it on the outside with a chain, imprisoning the two young people in her room. Then outside in the roadway, she sat down and began to roll some thread. Jinlian saw the old woman go, and pulled her chair to one side. As she settled down again, she glanced swiftly at Ximen Qing. He was sitting on the other side of the table, his eyes wide open, staring at her. At last he managed to speak.
"I forgot to ask your honourable name."
The woman bowed, and answered, smiling, "My unworthy name is Wu."
Ximen Qing pretended that he had not heard properly. "Did you say Du?" he said. Jinlian looked up, and said in a very soft voice, "I did not think you were deaf, Sir."
"I am sorry," Ximen said, "it was my mistake. You said 'Wu.' There are not many people called Wu in Qinghe. There is indeed one fellow who sells cakes outside the Town Hall but he is no bigger than my thumb. His name is Wu, Master Wu Da. Is he a relative of yours by any chance?"
Jinlian flushed. "He is my husband," she said, hanging her head.
Ximen Qing was silent for a long time, and seemed to be thinking very seriously. "How sad! How wrong!" he murmured at last. Jinlian smiled, and glanced at him.
"You have no reason to complain. Why should you say, 'How sad!'?"
"I was thinking how sad it must be for you," he said. He muttered many things, almost unintelligibly. Jinlian still looked down. She played with her skirt, nibbled at her sleeves, and bit her lips, sometimes talking, sometimes glancing slyly at him. Ximen pretended to find the heat trying, and took off his green silk coat.
"Would you mind putting my coat on the old lady's bed?" he said. Jinlian did not offer to take the coat. Keeping her head still turned away, she played with her sleeves and smiled. "Is there anything wrong with your own hands?" she said. "Why do you ask me to do things for you?" Ximen Qing laughed.
"So you won't do a little thing like that for me? Well, I suppose I must do it myself." He leaned over the table and put his coat on the bed. As he did so, he brushed the table with his sleeve and knocked down a chopstick. Luck favoured him; the chopstick came to rest beneath the woman's skirt. Ximen, who had already drunk more wine than was good for him, invited her to join him. Then he wanted his chopsticks to help her to some of the dishes. He looked about. One of them was missing. Jinlian looked down, pushed the chopstick with her toe, and said, laughing, "Isn't this it?" Ximen Qing went to her, and bent down. "Ah, here it is!" he cried but instead of picking up the chopstick, he took hold of her embroidered shoe.
Jinlian laughed. "I shall shout, if you are so naughty."
"Be kind to me, Lady," Ximen said, going down on his knees. As he spoke, he gently stroked her silken garments.
"It is horrid of you to pester me so," Jinlian cried. "I shall box your ears."
"Lady," he said, "if your blows should cause my death, it would be a happy end."
Without giving her time to object, he carried her to old woman Wang's bed, took off his clothes and, after unloosing her girdle, lay down with her. Their happiness reached its culmination.
In the days when Jinlian had performed the act of darkness with Zhang, that miserable old man had never been able to offer any substantial contribution to the proceedings, and not once had she been satisfied. Then she married Wu Da. You may imagine the prowess that might be expected from Master Tom Thumb. It could hardly be described as heroic. Now she met Ximen Qing, whose capacity in such matters was unlimited and whose skill was exceptionally refined and cunning.
The mandarin ducks, with necks entwined, sport upon the water.
The phoenix and his mate, their heads close pressed together, fly among the blossoms.
Joyful and tireless, the tree puts forth twin branches
The girdle, tied in a lovers' knot, is full of sweetness.
He, the red-lipped one, thirsts for a close embrace
She, of the powdered cheeks, awaits it eagerly.
The silken hose are raised on high
And two new moons appear above his shoulders.
The golden hairpins fall
And on the pillow rests a bank of lowering clouds.
They swear eternal oaths by ocean and by mountain
Seeking a thousand new delights.
The clouds are bashful and the rain is shy
They play ten thousand naughty tricks.
"Qia Qia," the oriole cries.
Each sucks the nectar from the other's lips.
The cherry lips breathe lightly, lightly.
In those willowy hips the passion beats
The mocking eyes are bright like stars
Tiny drops of sweat are like a hundred fragrant pearls
The sweet full breasts tremble
The dew, like a gentle stream, reaches the heart of the peony
They taste the joys of love in perfect harmony
For stolen joys, in truth, are ever the most sweet.
Just when they had done and were putting on their clothes again, old woman Wang pushed open the door and came in, clapping her hands as though she had never been more surprised in her life.
"A fine state of affairs," she said. Ximen Qing and Jinlian were extremely embarrassed.
"Oh, splendid, splendid!" the old woman said to Jinlian. "I asked you to come here to make clothes, not to make love with someone else's husband. If your Wu Da found this out, he would blame me. I shall have to go and explain the matter to him at once." She turned, and started out. Jinlian caught her quickly by the skirt. She hid her blushing face and could only get out a single sentence: "Spare me, Stepmother."
"You must make me a promise, then," the old woman said. "From this day forward, you must deceive Wu Da and give his Lordship here whatever he desires. If I call you early, you must come early. If I call you late, you must come late. Then I will say no more about it. But, if there should be a day when you do not come, I shall tell Wu Da."
Jinlian was so abashed that she could find nothing to say. "Well," said the old woman, "what are you going to do about it? I must have an answer now." "I will come," the woman whispered. Old woman Wang turned to Ximen Qing. "I need say no more to you, Sir. This is a fine piece of work, and you owe it all to me. You must not forget your promise. You must keep your word. If you try to wriggle out of it, I shall be compelled to speak to Wu Da."
"Don't worry, Stepmother," Ximen said, "I shall not go back on my word."
"I haven't too much confidence in either of you," old woman Wang said. "Give me a pledge of some sort and then I'll believe you."
Ximen Qing took a golden pin from his head and set it in Jinlian's hair. She took it out again and put it in her sleeve, for she was afraid that if she went home wearing it, Wu Da would wish to know where it had come from. She hesitated to produce any pledge herself but the old woman caught her by the sleeve and, finding a white silk handkerchief, handed it to Ximen Qing. Then they all drank several cups of wine. By this time it was getting dark and, saying that it was time for her to go home, Jinlian said good-bye to old woman Wang and Ximen Qing and went to her house by the back way. She pulled down the blind and, soon afterwards, Wu Da came in.
Old woman Wang looked at Ximen Qing.
"Did I play my cards well?" she said.
"No one could have done better," said Ximen.
"Were you satisfied?"
"Perfectly."
"She comes of singing girl stock," the old woman said, "and she must have had plenty of experience. I am very proud that I have been able to bring you two together, especially since I did it all by my own cleverness. Mind you give me what you promised."
"I will send you the silver as soon as I reach home."
"My eyes have seen the banner of victory and my ears have heard a sweet message," the old woman said, "but don't wait until my coffin is being carried out for burial, and then send money for the choirboys."
Ximen Qing laughed. He saw that the street was deserted, put on his eyeshades, and went home.
The next day he came again to the old woman's house. The old lady made tea for him and asked him to sit down. He took ten taels of silver from his sleeve and gave it to her. Money seems to produce an extraordinary effect upon people everywhere. As soon as the old woman's black eyes beheld this snow-white silver, she was as happy as could be. She took it, and twice made reverence to him. "I thank you, Sir," she said, "with all my heart."
"Wu Da is still at home," she continued, "but I will go over to his house and pretend I wish to borrow a gourd." She went by the back way to her neighbour's house. Jinlian was giving her husband his breakfast when she heard the knocking at the door, and told Ying'er to see who was there. It is Grandmother Wang," the girl said, "she has come to borrow a water gourd."
"I will lend you a water jug, Stepmother," Jinlian said, "but won't you come in and sit down a while?"
"There is nobody to look after my house," the old woman said, beckoning with her finger to Jinlian, thus giving her to understand that Ximen Qing had come. She took the gourd and went away, and Jinlian hustled her husband over his breakfast and packed him off with his baskets. She went upstairs and redressed herself, putting on beautiful new clothes, and told Ying'er to watch the house. "I am going to your Grandmother Wang's but I shall be back in a moment. If your father comes home, let me know at once or it will be the worse for your little bottom." She went to the tea shop.
Jinlian came, and to Ximen Qing it seemed that she had come straight down from Heaven. Side by side, close pressed together, they sat. Old woman Wang gave them tea. "Did Wu Da ask you any questions when you got home yesterday?" she said.
"He asked me if I had finished your clothes, and I told him that the funeral shoes and socks had still to be made."
The old woman hastily set wine before them, and they drank together, very happily. Ximen Qing delighted in every detail of the woman's form. She seemed to him even more beautiful than when he had first seen her. The little wine she had taken brought roses to her pale face and, with her cloudlike hair, she might have been a fairy, more beautiful than Chang E.
Ximen Qing could not find words to express his admiration. He gathered her in his arms, and lifted her skirts that he might see her dainty feet. She was wearing shoes of raven-black silk, no broader than his two fingers. His heart was overflowing with delight. Mouth to mouth they drank together, and smiled. Jinlian asked how old he was. "I am twenty-seven. I was born on the twenty-eighth day of the seventh month." Then she said, "How many ladies are there in your household?" and he said, "Besides the mistress of my house, there are three or four but with none of them am I really satisfied." Again she asked, "How many sons have you?" and he answered, "I have no sons, only one little girl who is shortly to be married." Then it was his turn to ask her questions.
He took from his sleeve a box, gilded on the outside and silver within. There were fragrant tea leaves in it and some small sweetmeats. Placing some of them on his tongue, he passed them to her mouth. They embraced and hugged one another; their cries and kissings made noise enough but old woman Wang went in and out, carrying dishes and warming the wine, and paid not the slightest attention to them. They played their amorous games without any interference from her. Soon they had drunk as much as they desired, and a fit of passion swept over them. Ximen Qing's desire could no longer be restrained; he disclosed the treasure that sprang from his loins, and made the woman touch it with her delicate fingers. From his youth upwards he had constantly played with the maidens who live in places of ill-fame, and he was already wearing the silver clasp that had been washed with magic herbs. Upstanding, it was, and flushed with pride, the black hair strong and bristling. A mighty warrior in very truth.
A warrior of stature not to be despised
At times a hero and at times a coward.
Who, when for battle disinclined,
As though in drink sprawls to the east and west.
But, when for combat he is ready,
Like a mad monk he plunges back and forth
And to the place from which he came returns.
Such is his duty.
His home is in the loins, beneath the navel.
Heaven has given him two sons
To go wherever he goes
And, when he meets an enemy worthy of his steel,
He will attack, and then attack again.
Then Jinlian took off her clothes. Ximen Qing fondled the fragrant blossom. No down concealed it; it had all the fragrance and tenderness of fresh-made pastry, the softness and the appearance of a new-made pie. It was a thing so exquisite that all the world would have desired it.
Tender and clinging, with lips like lotus petals
Yielding and gentle, worthy to be loved.
When it is happy, it puts forth its tongue
And welcomes with a smile.
When it is weary, it is content
To stay where Nature put it
At home in Trouser Village
Among the scanty herbage.
But, when it meets a handsome gallant
It strives with him and says no word.
After that day, Jinlian came regularly to the old woman's house to sport with Ximen Qing. Love bound them together as it were with glue; their minds and hearts were united as if with gum.
There is an old saying: "Good news never leaves the house but ill news spreads a thousand miles." It was not long before all the neighbours knew what was going on. Only Wu Da remained ignorant.
In Qinghe there lived a boy called Qiao; he was about fifteen years old. As he had been born in Yunzhou, where his father was on military service, he was called Yun'ge. His father was now grown old, and they lived together alone. The boy was by no means without craft. He kept himself by selling fresh fruits in the different wineshops, and Ximen Qing often gave him small sums of money. One day he had filled his basket with snow-white pears and was carrying them about the streets, on the lookout for his patron. Somebody he chanced to meet said to him, "Yun'ge, I can tell you where to find him."
"Where can I find him, Uncle?" the boy said. "Tell me if you please."
"Ximen," the man said, "is carrying on with the wife of Wu Da, the cake seller. Everyday he goes to old woman Wang's house in Amethyst Street. Most likely you will find him there now. There is nothing to prevent you going straight into the room."
Yun'ge thanked the man, and went along Amethyst Street with his basket till he came to old woman Wang's tea shop. The old woman was sitting on a small chair by the door, making thread. The boy put down his basket, looked at her, and said, "Greetings to you, Stepmother."
"What do you want, Yun'ge?" the old woman said.
"I have come to see his Lordship in the hope of getting thirty or fifty cash to help support my father," the boy told her.

"What 'Lordship' are you talking about?" asked the old woman.
"You know him."
"Well, I suppose every gentleman has some sort of a name," the old woman said.
"This gentleman's name has two characters in it."
"What two characters?"
"You are trying to fool me," Yun'ge said. "It is his Lordship Ximen to whom I am going to speak." He started to go into the house. The old woman caught him. "Where are you going, you little monkey? Don't you know the difference between the inside and the outside of people's houses?"
"I shall find him in the room," the boy said.
The old woman cursed him. "What makes you think you will find his Lordship in my house, you little rascal?"
"Stepmother, don't try to keep all the pickings for yourself. Leave a little gravy for me. I know all about it."
"What do you know?" the old woman cried. "You are a young scoundrel."
"And you are one of those people who would scrape a bowl clean with a knife. You don't mean to lose even a single drop of gravy. If I began to talk about this business, I shouldn't be surprised if my brother, the cake seller, had something to say about it."
This made the old woman furious. She was touched to the quick. "You little monkey," she screamed, "how dare you come to my house to let off your farts."
"Little monkey I may be," said Yun'ge, "but you're an old whoremonger, you old lump of dog meat."
The old woman caught him and boxed his ears twice.
"Why are you hitting me?" cried the boy.
"You son of a thief, you little monkey, make a noise like that and I'll thrash you out of the place."
"You knavish old scorpion," Yun'ge cried, "you've no right to beat me." The old woman struck him again, and drove him out into the street, tossing his basket after him. The pears rolled all over the street, four here and five there. There was nothing the little monkey could do. He grumbled and cried as he picked them up. He shook his fist in the direction of the teashop, and shouted, "Wait, you old worm! When I've told about this, you'll be ruined, and then there'll be nothing at all for you." The young monkey picked up his basket and went off to the street to see if he could find Wu Da.

025

Yün-ko lends a Hand by Cursing Dame Wang, the old woman Grandma Wang Devises a Plan, tells his Nibs, & Instigates Ximen Qing; The Hussy Adulterous Wife Pan Jinlian Administers Poison to her old Husband Wu the Elder, the Murder of Wu Da, & Hsi-men Ch'ing Suborns Ho the 9th

The aggrieved boy, basket in hand, went in search of Wu the Elder. After turning through a couple of streets, he saw the short man coming towards him, carrying his hampers of buns. Yunge halted.
"It's only a few days since I saw you! What have you been eating that's made you so fat?"
Wu rested his load. "I'm still the same. What's fat about me?"
"I tried to buy some bran the other day but couldn't find any anywhere. Everyone said you had some in your house."
"I'm not raising geese or ducks. What would I want with bran?"
"How is it then that you're stuffed so fat you don't even steam when you're trussed up by the heels and cooked in the pot?"
"Mocking me, eh, you young scamp! My wife doesn't sleep with other men. Why are you calling me a cuckold duck?"
"She doesn't sleep with other men, she just sleeps with another man!"
Wu clutched the boy. "Who is he?"
Yunge laughed. "All you do is grab me. But would you dare to bite his pecker off?"
"Tell me who he is, little brother, and I'll give you ten hot buns!"
"I don't want your buns. But if you treat me to three cups of wine, I'll talk."
"If it's drink you want, come with me." Wu picked up his carrying-pole and led the boy to a small tavern. He rested his load, took out a few buns, and ordered some meat and a dram of wine, all of which was set before Yunge.
"That's enough wine," said the young rascal, "but I could use a few more slices of meat."
"Tell me about it, little brother!"
"Keep your shirt on. I will just as soon as I've finished eating. Don't let it get you down. I'm gong to help you to catch him!"
Wu watched the boy polish off the meat and wine. "Now will you tell me?" he pressed.
"Feel these bumps on my head, if you want to know!"
"How did you get them?"
"Today I went looking for Ximen Qing with a basket of snowy pears, to get a little money out of him. I couldn't find him anywhere. Then a fellow on the street said: 'He cozies up with Wu's wife in Grandma Wang's teashop. He goes there everyday.' I was hoping to earn forty or fifty coppers but that sow bitch Grandma Wang wouldn't let me go in and see him! She pounded my skull and threw me out! That's why I've come looking for you. What I said when we met was only to make you mad. Otherwise you wouldn't have asked me about it."
"Can this really be true?"
"There you go again! A real patsy! Those two are having themselves a time. The minute you leave they get together in Grandma Wang's. And you ask whether it's true of false!"
"Frankly, little brother, I have been suspicious lately. She goes over to Grandma Wang's to sew everyday but when she comes back, her face is flushed. So that's what it is! I'll put my pole and hampers away and go over and catch them in the act. How about it?"
"Where are your brains? You couldn't do it alone. That Grandma Wang is a tough old bitch. You'd never get by her. The three of them must have some signal. They'd hide your wife somewhere as soon as you showed up. And that Ximen Qing is a devil. He could take on twenty like you. You wouldn't catch your wife, and he'd give you a beating. He's rich and influential. He'd probably file a complaint as well, and sue you in court. You don't have any strong backing. He'd finish you off!"
"Everything you say is so, little brother. How am I going to get back at them?"
"That old bitch pummeled me. I want to get back at her, too. Now here's what you do: When you go home tonight, don't blow up, act as if you don't know anything, the same as any other day. Tomorrow, make less buns than usual. I'll be waiting for you at the end of Purple Stone Street. If Ximen has gone in there, I'll call to you. You follow me, carrying your hampers, and wait nearby. I'll go and sass the old bitch. She's sure to sail into me. I'll toss my basket out into the street. That's the signal for you to go charging in. I'll butt the old bitch with my head and hold her off. You rush into the back room and start yelling that you've been wronged ... How's that for an idea?"
"All right! We'll do it! But it's going to be hard on you, little brother. Take these strings of cash and buy some rice for yourself. Wait for me tomorrow morning at the entrance to Purple Stone Street."
The boy accepted the money, and several hot buns, and departed. Wu paid the bill, shouldered his carrying-pole and went out to hawk his wares.
Generally, Golden Lotus scolded and chivied her husband in a hundred ways. But she knew she was being unreasonable, and lately she had been treating him somewhat better. When he returned home that evening, he behaved as usual and said nothing out of the ordinary.
"Have you been drinking?" she asked.
"I had a few cups with another pedlar."
Golden Lotus set the food on the table, and they ate. That night nothing special happened.
The next morning after breakfast Wu prepared only two or three trays of buns to put in his hampers. All the girl's thoughts were of Ximen, and she paid no attention to what her husband was doing. Wu shouldered his carrying-pole and set out. No sooner had he gone than Golden Lotus hurried over to Grandma Wang's to wait for Ximen.
When Wu arrived at the entry to Purple Stone Street, he found Yunge already there with his basket.
"What's happening?" Wu asked.
"It's early yet," said the boy. "You sell some buns for a while. He's almost sure to come. Don't go too far away."
Wu was off and back like a whirling cloud.
"Watch for my basket," the boy reminded him. "When I fling it out, you rush in."
Wu stored his pole and hampers in a safe place. Of that we'll say no more.

We'll talk rather of Yunge, and how, with his basket, he entered the teashop.
"Old bitch," he cried. "What right did you have to hit me yesterday?"
Grandma Wang's temper had not improved. She jumped to her feet and shouted: "There's nothing between us, young ape! How dare you come cursing me again?"
"You're a bawd, I say, and a whore-mongering old bitch. So what!"
In a fury, Grandma Wang grabbed Yunge and pummeled him.
"Hit me, will you!" yelled the boy. He threw his basket out into the street. Seizing her around the waist, he butted her in the belly. She staggered backwards until brought up short against the wall, the young scamp's head still rammed into her mid-section.
Wu, raising the front of his gown, strode quickly into the teashop. Grandma Wang tried frantically to stop him but the boy held her firmly pinned to the wall.
"Wu the Elder is here!" She loudly exclaimed.
Golden Lotus, in the rear room, became frantic. She ran over and leaned hard against the door. Ximen dived under the bed. Wu tried to push the door open but couldn't budge it.
"Fine goings-on!" he shouted.
The girl, distraught, stood pressing against the door. "You're always shooting off your mouth what a great fighter you are but in an emergency, you're useless!" she spat at Ximen. "A paper tiger scares you silly!"
This was a plain hint for Ximen to strike Wu down and escape. The recumbent gentleman under the bed, stimulated by these words, crawled out. He pulled open the door and cried: "Don't fight!"
Wu tried to grab him but Ximen lashed out with his right foot and caught the short man square in the centre of the chest, knocking him flat on his back. Ximen then fled. Yunge, seeing that things had gone wrong, pushed the old woman aside and also ran. The neighbours knew what a tough customer Ximen was. They dared not intervene.
Grandma Wang raised up Wu the Elder. Blood was flowing from his mouth, his skin was a waxy yellow. She called Golden Lotus. The wife emerged from the rear room, scooped a bowlful water and brought him round. She and Grandma Wang, supporting Wu under the arms, helped him through the back door and up the stairs of his house, where they put him to bed. Nothing further happened that night.
The next day Ximen inquired and learned there were no repercussions, so he met Golden Lotus as usual. They hoped her husband would die. Wu was ill for five days and couldn't leave his bed. When he wanted soup or water she wouldn't give it to him. When he called her she didn't answer. Each day she made herself up alluringly and went out, returning always with a rosy face. Wu several times nearly fainted from sheer rage but she paid him no heed.
He called her to him and said: "I know what you're up to. I caught the two of you together. You got your lover to kick me in the chest, and I'm more dead than alive, yet you two are still going on with your games! I may die—I'm no match for you. But don't forget my brother Wu Song! You know what he's like! Sooner or later he's coming back. Do you think he's going to let you get away with it? Have pity on me. Help me recover quickly, and when he come home I won't say anything. If you don't treat me right, he'll have something to say to the both of you!"
Golden Lotus did not reply but went next door and told Grandma Wang and Ximen what her husband had said. Ximen felt his blood run cold. He groaned.
"Constable Wu is the man who killed the tiger on Jingyang Ridge. He was the boldest fighter in Qinghe County! We've been having this affair for some time now, and we've been marvellous together in body and in mind. I forgot all about your husband's brother! What are we going to do? This is a terrible situation!"
Grandma Wang laughed coldly. "I've never seen the like. You're the helmsman and I'm only a passenger but I'm not worried and you're in a flap!"
"Though it shames me to say it, I don't know how to deal with this sort of thing. Have you any idea how to cover for us?"
"Do you want to be long-term lover, or short?"
"What do you mean?"
"If you're satisfied with being short-term lovers, separate after today and when Wu recovers, apologize to him. Nothing will be said when Wu Song comes home. When he's sent out on another mission, you can get together again. If you want to be long-term lovers, and not have to be frightened and alarmed everyday, I have a clever scheme. Of course, you may not be able to do it."
"Save us, godmother! We want to be long-term lovers!"
"The thing we need for this scheme other households don't have. But yours, thank Heaven, does."
"If you ask for my eyes, I'll gouge them out! What is this thing?"
"The wretch is very ill. Take advantage of his misery to do him in. Get some arsenic from your drug shop, let this lady buy medicine for heart pains, mix the two together and finish the dwarf off. She can have him cremated, so there won't be any traces. When Wu Song comes back, what will he be able to do? You know the old sayings: 'Brother and sister-in-law must keep their distance.' 'Parents pick the first husband, widows choose the second.' A brother-in-law can't interfere. You continue to meet secretly for half a year or so till the mourning period is over, then marry her. You'll be long-term lovers, and merry till the end of your days. What do you think of my plan?"
"It's a frightening crime, godmother! Never mind. We'll do it! All or nothing!"
"Good. Pull it out by the roots and it won't grow again. Leave any roots and it sprouts once more, come spring. Get the arsenic, Right Honourable. I'll tell the lady how to use it. When it's over, you'll have to reward me well."
"Naturally! That goes without saying!"
Not long after, Ximen arrived with the arsenic and gave it to Grandma Wang. The old woman looked at Golden Lotus.
"I'll teach you how to mix this in the medicine. Didn't Wu ask you to treat him better? Soften him up with a little kindness. He'll ask you to buy some medicine for his heart. Put this arsenic in it. When he wakes up at night, pour the mixture down his throat, then get out of the way. Once it starts working in him, it will split his guts, and he'll shout and scream. Muffle his cries with a quilt. Don't let anyone hear. Have a pot of hot water boiling, and soak a rag. He'll bleed from every opening, he'll bite his lips. When he dies, remove the quilt and clean away all the blood with the rag. Then into the coffin, off to the cremation, and not a friggin thing will happen!"
"It sounds all right," said Golden Lotus. "Only I'm afraid I'll go soft! I won't be able to handle the corpse!"
"That's easy. Just knock on the wall, and I'll come up and help you."
"Do the job carefully you two," said Ximen. "I'll be back at dawn tomorrow to hear your report." He stood up and departed.
Grandma Wang crushed the arsenic granules with her fingers into powder and gave it to Golden Lotus to hide.
The girl crossed over to her own house and went upstairs. Wu was barely breathing. He seemed to be at death's door. She sat down on the edge of the bed and pretended to weep.
"Why are you crying?" asked Wu.
Golden Lotus dabbed at her eyes. "I made a mistake and let that scoundrel beguile me. I never thought he'd kick you! I've heard about a very good medicine. I'd like to buy it for you but I'm afraid you don't trust me, so I haven't dared!"
"Save my life and we'll forget about the whole thing. I won't hold it against you, and I'll say nothing to Wu Song. Go buy the medicine quickly! Save me!"
The girl took some coppers, hurried to Grandma Wang's house and sent her out for the medicinal powders. Then she brought the packet upstairs and showed it to Wu.
"This is heart balm," she said. "The doctor in the drug shop says you should take it in the middle of the night and cover your head with two quilts to make you perspire. Tomorrow, you'll be able to get up."
"That's fine! I know it's a lot of trouble but stay awake till midnight and give me the potion."
"Don't worry about a thing. Just sleep. I'll look after you."

The day drew to a close and darkness gathered. Golden Lotus lit a lamp. Then she went down to the kitchen, set a pot of water on the stove and put a rag in to boil. When she heard the watchman's drum thump three times, she spilled the arsenic powder into a cup, filled a bowl with hot water, and took them both up the stairs. She called to her husband.
"Where did you put the medicine?"
"Here under the sleeping mat, beside my pillow. Mix it quickly and give it to me."
Golden Lotus took the packet of medicinal powders, sprinkled them into the cup so that they covered the arsenic, then added hot water and stirred with a silver pin which she drew from her hair. Raising Wu with her left hand, she held the cup to his lips with her right.
"It's very bitter," he said after the first sip.
"As long as it cures you, what do you care how bitter it is."
He opened his mouth for another sip, and the girl tilted the cup and forced its entire contents down his throat. She let him fall back on his pillow and swiftly got off the bed.
Wu gasped. "My stomach hurts! The pain, the pain! I can't stand it!"
The girl grabbed two quilts from the foot of the bed and flung them over his face.
"I can't breathe!" he cried.
"The doctor says I should make you sweat! You'll get well quicker!"
Before Wu could reply, the girl, afraid he would struggle, leaped onto the bed and knelt astride his body, pressing down on the sides of the quilts with both hands. He gasped, panted till his intestines split asunder. Then he breathed his last and lay still.
Golden Lotus pulled back the quilts. Wu had lacerated his lips with his teeth, he had bled from every orifice. Frightened, the girl jumped down from the bed and rapped on the wall. Grandma Wang heard the signal, came to the back door and coughed. Golden Lotus went downstairs and opened the door.
"Is it done?" asked the old woman.
"It's done all right but I'm absolutely limp. I can't go on!"
"There's nothing to it. I'll help you."
Grandma Wang rolled up her sleeves, filled a bucket with hot water, put the rag in, and carried them upstairs. Rolling back the quilts, she wiped around Wu's mouth, cleaned up the blood that had spewed from his seven openings, and covered him with his clothes. Slowly, the two women toted him down the stairs. They found an old door and laid him out on it. They combed his hair, tied a kerchief round his head, put on his clothes, shoes and stockings, spread a piece of fine white silk over his face, and covered his body with a clean quilt. Then they went up stairs and set the bedroom in order, and Grandma Wang returned home.
Golden Lotus commenced falsely bewailing the departure of her family supporter. Reader please note, women's lamentations are of three kinds the world over: With both tears and sound it is called crying, with tears and without sound it is called weeping, without tears and with sound it is called wailing. Golden Lotus wailed. By then it was the fifth watch.
The sky was not yet light when Ximen came to hear the news. Grandma Wang related it in detail. Ximen gave her money to buy a coffin and other funerary equipment. He told her to call the girl. Golden Lotus crossed over to Grandma Wang's.
"Wu the Elder is dead," she said. "You're my sole support from now on."
"That goes without saying."
"There's only one more difficulty," said Grandma Wang. "Ho, the local coroner, is a clever man. I'm afraid he may notice something, and not agree to the encoffining."
"Don't worry about that," said Ximen. "I'll have a few words with him. He wouldn't dare go against me."
"You do that, then," said the old woman. "Don't delay."
Ximen promptly left.
By the time the sun was well risen Grandma Wang had bought the coffin, candles and paper ingots, and returned home and cooked some soup and rice for Golden Lotus. They lit a mourning lamp and placed it beside the body. Neighbours came to offer their condolences. The girl covered her powdered face and pretended to weep.
"What illness did Wu the Elder die of?" queried the neighbours.
"He had pains in his heart! They got worse everyday! It was hopeless! And last night, at the third watch, he left me!" Golden Lotus sobbed loudly.
The neighbours knew there was something peculiar about his death but they were afraid to probe too deeply. They gave only the usual advice: "The dead are gone but the living must carry on. Don't take it so hard."
Hypocritically, the girl thanked them, and the neighbours left.
When the coffin was delivered, Grandma Wang sent for Coroner Ho.
All the funerary equipment had been purchased, as well as everything that was needed in the house. Two monks were hired to keep vigil later on. Ho dispatched a few of his men to get things ready.
At mid-morning Ho set out slowly for his destination. When he reached the entry to Purple Stone Street he was hailed by Ximen Qing.
"Where to?"
"I'm on my way to inspect the body of Wu the Elder, the bun seller."
"Can you spare a minute for a chat?"
Ho went with Ximen to a small tavern in a side street, and entered a booth.
"Please sit at the head of the table," said Ximen.
"How can a man of my rank presume to sit together with your Honour?"
"You mustn't treat me like a stranger. Please be seated."
The two sat down and Ximen called for a bottle of good wine. The waiter laid out fruit and vegetables to go with the wine and poured the drinks. Ho was curious. "He never drank with me before," he thought. "There's more here than meets the eye ..."
They drank for an hour or so and Ximen took a ten-ounce bar of silver from his sleeve and placed it on the table. "Please don't scorn this as too trivial. There will be more later on."
"I've done nothing at all," Ho protested, with courteously clasped hands. "How can I accept Right Honourable's silver? Even if there is some way I can be of service, I still wouldn't want it."
"No need to stand on ceremony. Please take it, and I'll tell you."
"Tell me, by all means. I'd like to hear."
"Well, it's this. Soon you'll be going to the house of the deceased, and there also they'll give you some money. When you examine the body of Wu the Elder, I want you to do everything just right. Let an embroidered quilt cover all. That's all I have to say."
"But of course. Why not? How can I take money for a little thing like that?"
"If you don't take the silver it means you're refusing me."
He knew that Ximen was a rascal who had influence with the officials, and he was afraid of him. He had no choice but to accept. They drank several more cups. Ximen told the waiter to charge it to his account, and come tomorrow to his shop for payment. The two walked down the stairs and left the tavern.
"Don't forget," said Ximen. "And keep this quiet. I'll reward you further." He walked away.
Ho's suspicions were aroused. "This is very odd," he mused. "Why should he give me so much money before I inspect the body of Wu the Elder? There must be something fishy!"
At the door of the house, he found his men waiting. "What was the cause of death?" he asked.
"Pains in the heart, his wife says," the men replied.
He raised the door curtain and entered. Grandma Wang greeted him.
"We've been waiting for you."
"A small matter delayed me."
Golden Lotus, wearing plain drab garments, came from the inner room, feigning tears.
"Calm yourself," Ho urged. "What a pity that Wu the Elder had to return to Heaven."
The girl dabbed her eyes. "You don't know the half of it! Who would have thought that he'd die only a few days after his heart started to pain him! I'm so miserable!"
Ho looked her over. "I've heard about Wu's wife but I've never seen her," he said to himself. "So this is the kind of woman he had! There's reason behind those ten ounces of silver of Ximen!" Ho walked over to the body, opened the shroud, and raised the silk covering Wu's face. The coroner had eyes like a hawk, and what he saw caused him to fall over backwards, blood spurting from his mouth. His nails turned blue, lips purple, skin yellow, his eyes lackluster. Truly, his body was like the waning moon being devoured by the mountains at the fifth watch, and life flickered like a dying lamp at midnight.

Now the Young'un, filled with fruitless rage against Mrs. Wang for the beating she had given him, gathered up his pears and dashed off to look for the Midget. He traversed two streets, turned a corner, and there, coming towards him down the street with his carrying-pole and his load of bread, was the Midget.
The Young'un stopped in his tracks and said to the Midget: "I ain't seen yer lately. How come yer gettin' so fat?"
The Midget put down his carrying-pole and said: "I'm the same as I always was, who says I'm getting fat?"
"I wanted some poultry feed the other day an' I couldn't find none. They told me you'd 'ave some."
"Why would I have poultry feed? I don't keep ducks or geese!"
"Oh, yer don't keep geese, doncha? But yer a fat goose yerself and if they hung yer up by the heels in the pot, yer 'd cook lovely!"
"Hey, you watch your tongue, you little twerp! My wife hasn't got a lover, why d'you call me a goose?"
"If yer wife hasn't got a lover, it must be the lover what's got her!"
The Midget grabbed the boy. "Who is it?" he shouted.
The Young'un said: "That's a laugh. Pull me about, go on but it won't do no injury to what he's got between 'is legs."
"Listen, lad," said the Midget, changing his tone. "If you tell me who it is I'll let you have ten rolls."
"Bugger yer rolls! But if you treated me to three cups of wine I'd tell yer."
"So you drink wine, do you?" said the Midget. "All right, come with me, then."
The Midget picked up the carrying-pole and took the Young'un off to a little wineshop. When he'd put his pole down he took out several rolls, bought some meat and ordered a bottle of wine. He told the boy to help himself.
"The wine'll do, don't need no more," the boy said, "but yer can order an extra helping of meat."
"Come on, lad," the Midget said. "You'd better tell me what you know."
"Don't rush me," the boy said. "I'll tell yer when I've eaten. And if yer keep yer 'ead, I'll help yer to nab 'im."
The Midget watched the boy eat and drink. Then he said: "Now are you going to tell me?"
"If yer so interested, just feel these lumps I got on me 'ead!"
"Hm, how did you get them?"
"I'll tell yer. I 'ad this basket of pears, see, and I were looking for 'is Nibs, Mr. Xi-men, to try and get some money out of 'im but I couldn't find 'im nowhere. Then I met someone in the street who said, 'He's at Mrs. Wang's teahouse. He's got something going with the Midget's wife, they meet there everyday.' Well, I were hoping to earn meself a spot of cash, see, so I went down there but that old bitch, Mrs. Wang, wouldn't let me go in to 'im. She started beating me up. That's why I been looking for yer. I only spoke to yer like I did just now in order to get yer worked up, I thought it were the best way to get yer to start asking me about it."
"Is all this true?" the Midget asked.
"There yer go again! I always said you was an idiot. I tell yer, them two's 'aving a great old time. They just wait till you go out, and then they get together at Mrs. Wang's. And all yer do is sit here asking if it's true or not!"
The Midget thought and said: "All right, lad, I'll tell you what. My wife does go off everyday to Mrs. Wang's to make clothes. And she is a bit flushed always when she gets home, and, yes, I was beginning to wonder! That must be it! I'm going to get rid of this load and then I'll go and catch them at it, how about that?"
"Yer supposed to be a grown-up, how come yer 'aven't got more sense! Yer must know what a crafty devil that old woman is! If yer get into her clutches yer'll never escape. Anyway, they must 'ave a signal. When they see yer coming, yer wife'll hide. And 'is Nibs ain't no pushover, he could take care of twenty like you! Yer won't catch them and yer'll get yerself a good beating into the bargain. Besides, 'e's got all that money and influence, 'e'll make an accusation and yer'll wind up in court. And don't expect no one to speak up for yer. Yer'll lose your life for nothing!"
"You're dead right," said the Midget despondently. "How am I ever going to get even?"
"That old bitch beat me up, so I owe her one. I'll tell yer what: go 'ome a bit later than usual tonight and don't let on that yer know anything. Don't go shooting yer mouth off, mind. Just do like yer always do. Tomorrow morning, don't take so much bread out to sell. I'll wait for yer down the end of the road, and if I sees 'is Nibs go in I'll come and fetch yer. What yer do then is, yer wait with yer stuff near the teahouse, on the left, and I'll go in first and get the old bitch angry. She's bound to start hitting me. When I chuck my basket out into the street, you rush in. I'll hold her up, somehow, while yer barge straight in, shouting that yer bein' cuckolded. 'Ow about that?"
"Well, if it works, I shall be in your debt, lad. But wait, here's some silver you can have to go and buy rice. You come early, then, tomorrow, and wait for me on the corner of Redstone Road."
The Young'un picked up the silver and some rolls and departed. As for the Midget, after paying the bill he took up the carrying-pole and went off to do one more round before going home.
Now we have to relate that Jinlian, although she was in the habit of yelling at the Midget and bullying him in a hundred ways, had recently become very attentive towards him, because she felt herself at fault, and had taken to offering him all manner of little comforts. As the poem says:
Though the trollop feigns when home she steals,
Soft words to hide what she really feels;
On her next door beau he's not a patch;
The evil plan begins to hatch.
When the Midget came home with his pole that evening it was just like any other day; he said nothing. Jinlian asked him: "Shall I go and get some wine, dear?"
"No," he answered, "I've just had a few cups with a merchant."
After that she gave him his dinner, and nothing else happened that evening.
Next day, after breakfast, he made only two or three baskets of bread that he loaded onto his carrying-pole. His wife's thoughts were full of her lover, so she wasn't going to notice if he made a little more or less. Finally he left. Jinlian, who could hardly wait for him to go, went straight off to Mrs. Wang's to await her lover.
Meanwhile the Midget had arrived with his carrying-pole at the entrance to Redstone Road, where he met the Young'un, who was waiting for him there, equipped with a basket.
"Well?" the Midget said.
"It's too early," the Young'un said. "Go and sell some bread first. But I'm pretty sure 'e'll come, so stick around."
The Midget shot off to do a quick round and was back in no time.
"Remember, wait till I throw out my basket and then rush in," the Young'un reminded him.
The Midget put down his carrying-pole — but enough of that!
Now the Young'un picked up his basket and marched into the teashop, shouting: "Look here, yer old bitch, why did yer beat me yesterday?"
True to form, the old woman leapt to her feet and replied: "You little guttersnipe! I've nothing to say to you. What do you mean by coming in here and using bad language to me?"
"An' if I call yer a filthy bawd, a dirty old bitch, who gives a fart for what you think?"
The old woman saw red. She grabbed the boy and started beating him.

The Young'un squealed. Screaming, "'Ow dare yer beat me!" he threw his basket out into the street. The old woman sought to tighten her grip on him but shouting: "Just you dare!" he took hold of her waist and butted her in the stomach with his head. He would have knocked her over but for the wall which prevented her from falling. While the Young'un was employing all his strength to pin the old woman to the wall, the Midget bounded into the teahouse, his robe tucked into his belt for action.
When the old woman saw who it was, she made a desperate attempt to stop him. However the boy pinned her down with might and main and she couldn't move. All she could do was shout: "The Midget's coming!" Within the room the terrified Jinlian rushed to secure the door, while his Nibs tried to hide under the bed. The Midget charged the door and tried to push it open. But it wouldn't budge. All he could do was shout: "You oughter be ashamed of yourself!"
Jinlian continued to hold the door but she was getting desperate. "You're always boasting about your fighting skills," she hissed at her lover. "But in an emergency like this you're useless. Even a paper tiger is enough to scare you." She obviously wanted him to come out and fight the Midget and then make good his escape. The lover, in his hiding place under the bed, finally caught on. He crawled out and said: "My dear, it's not that I can't, I just wasn't sure what was best." He flung open the door and shouted: "No violence!" The Midget tried to grab him but his Nibs caught him with his left foot. Now the Midget being very short, the kick took him in the solar plexus and sent him flying backwards. He collapsed on the ground. His Nibs, having floored his adversary, fled amid the confusion. The Young'un, seeing things weren't looking good, released the old woman and vanished. As for the neighbours, well, they knew Xi-men Qing's power and influence, they weren't minded to interfere.
When Mrs. Wang went to help the Midget up, she found he was bleeding from the mouth and his face was as yellow as wax. She called to Jinlian, telling her to bring a bowl of water to revive him. The two of them supporting him under the shoulders got him out the back way and back to his house, where they put him into his bed and he went to sleep.
Well, this is the way it was going:
Poor three-inch midget, what can you do?
That bugger Xi-men's too much for you!
When the wife has the lover bash her true lord,
Adultery's taking a worse crime on board.
Nothing more happened that night. Next day, his Nibs, hearing there had been no repercussions, went back as usual for his assignation with Jinlian. Their great hope now was that the Midget would die.
For five days the Midget lay sick, unable to move. What is more, when he wanted a bowl of soup it didn't come, when he wanted water, it didn't come. It was in vain that he called to his wife. In fact he was obliged to watch her go out each day all powdered and adorned. And when she came back, her face was flushed. More than once he fainted from the violence of his rage. But no one paid him the least attention. Finally he called to his wife and said to her: "I know perfectly well what you're up to, I caught you in the act. You even egged on your lover to kick me in the chest, and now here I am hanging between life and death, while you two live it up together. Well, whether I live or die makes little difference, there's nothing I can do to stop you. But my brother's a different matter, you ought to know what he's like. When he returns that he will do sooner or later, do you suppose he'll stand by idle? If you have any feelings at all, help me now to get better and I won't tell him anything when he comes back. But if you refuse to look after me, just wait till he comes, he'll have a few things to say to the pair of you."
Jinlian left without saying a word in reply but she told Mrs. Wang and his Nibs exactly what the Midget had said. When her lover heard this, it was as if someone had thrown a bucket of cold water over him. "Oh my God! Captain Wu, the killer of the tiger of Jingyang Pass?" he said. "Of course I know him, he's the toughest customer in the whole of Qinghe! Listen, we've been indulging ourselves all this time, okay, we're happy as can be but we must be crazy! All this you've just told us, whatever are we going to do about it? It's terrible."
Mrs. Wang responded with a scornful laugh. "Well, really!" she said. "You're the helmsman and I'm only crew, yet I'm not afraid. Just look at you, trembling with fear!"
"Just because I'm a man," his Nibs replied, "it doesn't mean I can resolve a situation like this. Have you anything to suggest that will help us to cover up?"
"What do you want from this, a long-term affair or just a quickie?"
"What do you mean, long-term or a quickie?"
"If it's to be a quickie, you'd best say goodbye to each other right now. When the Midget recovers, you can pay him something in compensation and when Wu Song gets back there won't be any trouble. Later, if Wu Song's sent off somewhere again, perhaps you can see each other. That's how it would be for just a quickie. But if you want it long-term, if you want to meet each other without all these alarms and disturbances, then I've got a plan, only it's not so easy to tell you about it."
"Mother Wang, please tell us. We do want it to be long-term."
"In order to carry out this plan we need something which most people don't possess but which you, as heaven will have it, do happen to keep in your house."
"If you said you wanted my eyes, I'd cut them out and give them to you. What is it?"
"At the moment, that poor fool is seriously ill. We must strike while the iron's hot. Go and get some arsenic and we'll get the young lady to buy some medicine for the heart and mix the arsenic with it. That'll settle the dwarf. Then all it needs is a good thorough cremation and there won't be any trace. So when Wu Song comes back, what can he do? You know the saying, 'Brother and sister-in-law should leave each other alone'; and then that other saying, 'The first marriage is to please your family, the second is to please yourself.' What can a brother-in-law say? You just have to be discreet for a few months, until the mourning period is over, and then you can marry the girl. Well, that's what you'll get if you have it long-term, a lifetime's joy, as they say. How does that strike you?"
"Mother Wang, what a proposition!" cried his Nibs. "But they do say, 'If you want to have an easy life, you'll have to work for it.' All right then, in for a penny in for a pound!"
"Of course, it's like they say, 'if you're weeding, get the roots out, kill the growth, else in spring they'll start to sprout.' Now, off you go and get the arsenic, and I'll tell her what to do. Only don't forget, you're going to owe me a lot!"
"Of course," he said. "You don't need to tell me that!"
There's a poem about this.
From love's delights they can't abstain;
They'd like to have them spread more thick,
Little aware that there's more pain
In Wu Song's blade than arsenic.
It was not long before his Nibs returned, bearing a small package containing arsenic that he handed to the old woman. The latter went to Jinlian and said: "I'm going to tell you how you can give him the medicine, dear. Didn't you say he'd been asking you to help him get better? Well then, what you must do is pay him some special little attentions. Then when he asks you to get him medicine, you can mix the arsenic with some heart medicine. If he resists at all, just pour it down his throat and get out of the way. When the poison gets into his stomach it's going to tear it to shreds and he'll start screaming, so you must cover him with the bedclothes because you don't want anyone to hear. Get a basin of hot water ready and a hot towel. When the poison begins to work he'll bleed from all the seven orifices, and he'll bite his lips that will leave marks. So when he's dead you must take the bedclothes off him and clean him with the hot towel to remove all traces of blood. Then you only have to stick him in the coffin and have him taken out for cremation. You see, it's dead simple."
"It sounds all right," said Jinlian, "only I'm afraid I'm not strong enough and I won't be able to arrange the body when I have to."
"That's no problem. Just knock on the wall and I'll come over and help you."
"Make a thorough job of it, the two of you," said his Nibs. "I'll be over first thing in the morning to find out how you got on." With that he left. The old woman took the arsenic and rolled it in her fingers to turn it into powder and then gave it to the girl to keep.
When Jinlian got home and went upstairs to see the Midget, he was hardly breathing and looked as if he was at death's door. She sat down beside him and pretended to cry.
"Why are you crying?" the Midget asked.
Wiping away the tears, she said: "I was wrong, I know but that blighter led me astray. How could I know he was going to kick you like that? I've been told of some good medicine and I wanted to go out and buy it for you but I was afraid you might think badly of me if I left you again."
"Don't worry," the Midget said. "If you help me get better, we'll say no more of this business, we'll wipe the slate clean. When my brother comes back I won't mention it. Go and get that medicine for me, quickly!"
Jinlian took some change in coppers and went over to Mrs. Wang's. She sat and waited while Mrs. Wang went to buy the medicine. Then she took the medicine home and went upstairs to show it to the Midget. "This medicine is for the heart. The doctor said you were to take it at midnight and then cover yourself with two quilts so that you will sweat. In the morning you'll be able to get up."
"That's wonderful," the Midget said. "You're very good to me my dear. I shall try to sleep for a while now. Wake me up at midnight for the medicine."
"You sleep now," she said. "I shall watch over you."
Gradually it grew dark and the girl lit the lamps in the bedroom. She went downstairs and heated a basin of water, and also warmed a damp towel. She listened for the watch, and when the third watch was sounded at eleven she took the poison and poured it into a cup and poured out a bowl of hot water. She took all this upstairs. "Where's the medicine, dear?" she called.
"Under the mat, beside the pillow," the Midget answered. "Prepare it and give it to me, quickly!"
She turned back the mat and took the medicine and poured it into the cup. She mixed the two powders and poured hot water into the cup. She took a silver hairpin from her hair and stirred it till it was evenly mixed. Then, supporting the Midget with her left hand she gave him the medicine with her right. After the first sip, the Midget said: "This medicine is horrible, dear!"
"What does that matter, so long as it cures you?" she said.
When he'd taken the second mouthful, she tipped the cup and poured it down his throat. Then she quickly released him and jumped off the bed. He groaned and said: "That medicine's given me a dreadful stomach ache. Oh, the pain's terrible, I can't bear it!"
She got the two quilts at the foot of the bed and pulled them over him, covering his face completely.
"I can't breathe," he cried out.
"The doctor said I had to make you sweat so you'd get better sooner."
When he tried to cry out again, she was afraid he might put up a fight, so she jumped on the bed and sat on him, pressing down the covers tightly with both arms. He hadn't a hope of freeing himself:
His insides are frying, a fire is eating his liver, a blade of ice has pierced his heart, his stomach's being churned by a steel knife. Cold grips his body, blood seeps from the orifices. His teeth are tightly clenched, as the three souls prepare to depart for the realm of the unjustly dead: his throat is burning, as the seven spirits head for the place of judgement. The world of the dead's about to receive another poison victim while the world of the living loses an accuser of adultery.
He groaned twice and struggled for breath a little longer, and then finally the stomach burst and the Midget — ill-fated wretch! — was still.
When she pulled back the covers, she saw that he had bitten his lips and was bleeding from all seven orifices. Suddenly terrified, she jumped off the bed and went to knock on the wall. Mrs. Wang heard the signal and came to the back door and coughed. Jinlian ran downstairs to open the door. "Is it done?" Mrs. Wang asked.
"It's done," she answered. "But I've no strength left in my arms and legs. I can't clear up."
"Don't worry about that, I'll help you," said the old woman. She rolled up her sleeves and poured out some hot water. She threw the warm towel into it and took it upstairs. After turning back the covers she started wiping the Midget's mouth and lips. Then she cleaned away all traces of blood from the other points where it had seeped out. She placed the clothes on top of the body and then the two of them manoeuvred it down the stairs and laid it out on an old door. They combed the hair, put on a cloth cap, and dressed him, putting on new socks and shoes. They covered the face with a piece of fine white silk. Finally they covered the body with a clean quilt. Then they went back upstairs to tidy up there. When they had finished, Mrs. Wang went home.
Next the girl set up a tremendous hullabaloo, falsely mourning the death of her lord and master. As the reader well knows, there are generally three ways in which a woman weeps: with tears and noise, the kind of thing we call weeping; with tears but silently that we call crying; noisily but with no tears, what we call keening or wailing. Well, on this occasion the woman wailed all night. In the early hours of the morning, before it was light, his Nibs came, in great excitement to hear the news. Mrs. Wang gave him a detailed account. He took out some silver and gave it to her to buy a coffin and the necessary for the funeral. Then he conferred with Jinlian.
"Now my husband is dead, I have to depend on you for everything," she said.
"There's no need to tell me that," he said.
"There's one thing that's urgent," Mrs. Wang said. "Mr. Ho, the coroner, is a very careful person. I'm afraid he may smell a rat and refuse to allow the funeral to go ahead."
"Don't worry about that. I'll have a word with him myself. He won't want to oppose me."
"Then you'd better go and do it at once, Your Honour, don't waste any time."
His Nibs left.
When it was fully light, Mrs. Wang went to buy the coffin. She also bought candles and incense, paper money and suchlike. On her return she helped Jinlian prepare the food for the offering and lit the special lamp which accompanies the spirit of the dead person. Now the neighbours all began to arrive to inquire what had happened. The girl covered her pretty face and falsely wept.
"But what did your husband die of?" they all wanted to know.
"He had heart disease," she replied. "It got worse and worse. I could see it was hopeless. He went last night around midnight." She began to snivel and sob again. The neighbours all knew perfectly well that the death was suspicious but they didn't like to go on questioning her, so they merely tried to console her by saying: "Well, his spirit is fled now, and the soul has departed for other regions. Try not to upset yourself too much." She made a show of thanking them and they went away.
Mrs. Wang had the coffin delivered and went to fetch the coroner, whom most people knew as Uncle Ho. She had already bought everything necessary for the funeral, including a number of kitchen utensils. She now sent for two monks, who would be needed later on to watch over the body. Meanwhile, Uncle Ho had sent along some assistants to get everything ready.
It was almost noon when Uncle Ho set out himself. He was in no particular hurry. When he got to the beginning of Redstone Road, he met Xi-men Qing, who called out: "Where are you going, Uncle?"
"I'm going over to inspect the body of Wu Da, the bread-seller," he replied.
"Do you mind accompanying me a moment? I'd like a word with you."
Uncle Ho went with Xi-men Qing to a little wineshop on the corner of the street, where they found a quiet room to sit. "Please take the place of honour, Mr. Ho," said his Nibs.
"I'm just a simple man, how should I presume to sit down with Your Honour?"
"Please don't stand on ceremony. Do sit down."
When they were seated a bottle of the best wine was ordered. The waiter brought dishes of vegetables and fruit, together with the wine that he poured for them. Uncle Ho was becoming quite suspicious. Privately he was thinking, "This man has never invited me before, there must be some special reason for this." They had been drinking there about an hour when his Nibs suddenly took from his sleeve ten taels of silver and placed them on the table. "Please don't despise this, Uncle," he said. "Later on I'll find a way to express my gratitude more suitably."
"But I've done nothing for you," Uncle Ho said, "nothing at all. How can I take your money? Even if there is something you'd like me to do, I can't accept the money now."
"Please, for my sake, Uncle, take it and then we can talk."
"Say whatever you wish, Your Honour, I am listening."
"It's not something special, and in any case, the family will presently be rewarding you for your pains. It's just that you are going along to lay out the body of Mr. Wu and I want you to make sure everything is done nicely; it would be a good idea to cover the body with an embroidered quilt, that's all."
"If that's all it is, there's no problem at all. How can I accept your money for this?"
"If you don't take it, I shall be offended."
Now Uncle Ho knew very well that this man was a crook and had many government officials in his pocket, so he thought it best to accept the gift. After they'd had a few more cups, his Nibs called the waiter and told him to make out the bill and come round to his shop to collect the money next day.
They went downstairs together. As they were going out of the door, his Nibs said: "Don't forget, Uncle. Keep it to yourself and I'll reward you later on."
Uncle Ho was now highly suspicious. "There's something very odd about this business," he said to himself. "I haven't seen the body of the Midget and here he is giving me all this money. There must be something going on." When he arrived at Wu Da's, his assistants were waiting around outside.
"What did Wu Da die of?" he asked them.
"They say in there he died of heart disease," they said.
When Uncle Ho drew back the curtain and went in, Mrs. Wang received him. "We've been waiting a long time for you, Mr. Ho," she said.
"There was some business that held me up," he said, "that's why I'm a little late."
At this point Jinlian, who was dressed in plain white funeral clothing, started crying loudly inside.
"You must control yourself, madam." Uncle Ho said. "However sad, he's departed now."
The girl covered her eyes and said: "It's so awful sir! I never thought that my husband's heart disease would carry him off so suddenly, leaving me here like this!"

Uncle Ho examined her closely. He was thinking: "I'd only heard about the Midget's wife, I never actually saw her till now. So this is what the Midget managed to get himself by way of a wife! I'm beginning to understand why his Nibs offered me that money!" He now proceeded to the examination of the body. He pulled back the shroud and lifted the piece of silk. However, when his sharp and perceptive eyes took in the body, Uncle Ho gave a startled cry and fell to the floor. He was seen to be bleeding from the mouth; his fingernails were blue and his lips purple. His face had a yellowish tinge and his eyes were glazed. His whole body resembled the moon setting behind the mountain in the hour before dawn, and anyone would have said his life was like a lamp at midnight when the oil's exhausted.

As a result of the beating, the boy Yun Ge wanted to take revenge on Grandma Wang, and taking his basket of pears he set forth to find Wu the Elder. He had not gone far before he saw him coming with his load of cakes. The boy stopped, and when Wu the Elder came up to him, he said, "I have not seen you for a long time. But what do you eat to get so fat?"
Wu the Elder put his load down, and replied, "I am not fat at all. I am always like this."
"These last few days," said Yun, "I have been trying to buy some bran but I could not find a shop that would sell, and people all said that you had some bran at home."
"At my home I do not keep either geese or ducks," said Wu the Elder, "so what should I want with bran?"[69]
"You say you have no bran but you are so round and fat that if you were turned upside down it would not make much difference. If you were dropped into hot water you would not display any temper."
"You monkey!" said Wu the Elder. "You certainly know how to insult people. My wife has no sweetheart, so how could I be a cuckold."
"Your wife may not have a sweetheart but she has a lover," said the boy.
Wu the Elder seized hold of him, and demanded proof of his statement.
"I only joke with you and yet you seize me like this," said the boy. "But why don't you seize hold of that fellow?"
"Good little boy! If you will give me the name of that fellow, I will give you ten of my cakes."
"I do not want your cakes. If you will treat me as a guest by inviting me with three cups of wine I will tell you the man's name."
"So you want to drink wine! Then come along," said Wu the Elder. He then carried up his load of cakes, and went on till he came to a wine shop where he put it down again. He ordered a kettle of wine, and some meat, and using some of his own cakes, he invited the boy to partake of same.
"There is enough wine now but what do you say to our having some more meat?" said the boy.
"Good boy," said Wu the Elder, "we will arrange that afterwards but now tell me what you have to say."
"There is no need for hurry," said the boy. "Let us eat first, and talk afterwards. You need not be angry by what I say, because I will help you to capture the man."
Wu the Elder watched the little monkey eat the food, and drink the wine, and when he had finished he again asked him to speak.
"Please take your hand and feel the lumps on my head," said Yun.
Wu the Elder did so, and asked how the boy had got such lumps.
"I will now tell you," said the boy Yun. "Today I took this basket of pears and tried to find Ximen Qing and ask him to buy them. I could not find him anywhere but a man on the street told me that Ximen Qing would be at Grandma Wang's tea-house with your wife as he goes there everyday. I hoped to make a few cash by selling this fruit to Ximen Qing but that pig Grandma Wang would not let me in, and beat me many times. So I came to find you, and tell you. Now you understand the meaning of those remarks about your having 'bran' at home."
"Can things be true like this?" asked Wu the Elder.
"It is so," said Yun. "Those two are right at it. You had better go to Grandma Wang's tea-house, and then you will see for yourself whether it is true or not."
"Younger brother," said Wu the Elder, "I will tell you something. My wife has been going everyday to Grandma Wang's tea-house to make some clothes, and when she returns her face has been so red that I suspected something. What you say may be correct. I will now leave this load here, and go to seize the adulterer." Yun said, "You are an old man, and have no knowledge of such things. That old bitch Grandma Wang, is very fierce and brave, so how could you stand up to her assaults? Moreover, those three will undoubtedly have a secret signal. When they see you they will take your wife and hide her. That man Ximen Qing is very strong, and would face even twenty men like you. If you could not seize him, you would only suffer one blow from his fist. He is so wealthy and has such influence, that he would take out a summon against you for assault. You could get no one to assist you against such a man, and you would have no chance of winning."
"What you say is only too true," said Wu the Elder. "But what can I do?"
"Well, today I have been beaten by that old bitch, and I want revenge. Now I tell you what to do. When you go back home, do not say anything about this. Tomorrow morning make less cakes and leave your house as usual, and I will be waiting for you at the entrance of a side alley. If I see Ximen Qing go into that house I will tell you about it. Then you can put down your load, and follow me. When I enter the house, Grandma Wang will again hit me, and throw my basket on the street, and then you rush in. I will hold that old woman while you rush into the room and cry out. What do you think of that plan?"
"That will do very well," replied Wu the Elder. "Here is some money for you to buy some rice with. Don't forget to be at the entrance of the alleyway off the Zishi Street very early tomorrow morning, and wait there for me." The boy took the money, and also a few cakes, and then departed.
Wu the Elder paid the bill at the wine shop, took his load, and went on the way selling cakes as before.
Now his wife had always previously abused and thoroughly deceived him. But recently she had began to realize the error of her ways, and had treated him decently. On this day when Wu the Elder returned home he put down his load as usual but never said a word. His wife, however, said, "Husband, do you want some wine?" To which he replied that he had just met some friends with whom he had had several cups of wine. His wife then prepared the evening meal, and they ate together without anything particular being said.
The next day after breakfast Wu the Elder took only a few cakes. But his wife did not notice this as all her thoughts were about Ximen Qing. She was waiting for him to go so that she could run across to Ximen Qing.
Wu the Elder was soon on Zishi Street where he saw the boy Yun Ge on the lookout inside an alley, and asked him for the news. The boy said it was too early. He asked Wu the Elder to go around selling cakes, and return shortly when he must stop on the left side of the street. Wu the Elder went off at great speed, and was soon back when the boy spoke to him, "Now you watch for my basket being thrown out, and then you come speedily, and enter the house."
The boy Yun Ge picked up his basket, and entering the door of Grandma Wang's tea-house made insulting remarks. "You bitch! What did you hit me for yesterday?"
Grandma Wang was still angry, and when she heard this she jumped up and shouted, "You little monkey! I have nothing to do with you, and yet you come to insult me."
"You are an old pimp, and that is why I insult you," replied the boy.
Grandma Wang was very angry, and took hold of him to beat him. Yun Ge cried out, "You are hitting me again," and so saying he threw his basket through the door on the street. He then put his arms round her waist, and thrusting his head against her stomach he pushed her backwards, and she would have fallen down had it not been for the wall at her back. He held her there until he saw Wu the Elder rush in with his long gown tucked up. When Grandma Wang saw Wu the Elder, she struggled and tried to arrest him but the boy held her tight against the wall. Grandma Wang shouted out, "Wu the Elder is here." Upon hearing this Pan Jinlian who was inside rushed to the door of the room, and fastened it while Ximen Qing dived under the bed and hid there. Wu the Elder pushed against the door but he could not force it open. He shouted out, "What are you doing?" His wife was crouching with fear behind the door. But she shouted out, "You always said that you could use your fists or a stick but now that there is a fight you will not use them. Now you see a paper tiger you are scared stiff before it." What was her idea in talking like this? It was simply to summon Ximen Qing to come out, and beat Wu the Elder, and then get away. Ximen Qing understood her idea, and crawling out from under the bed he pulled the door open and shouted out. "Do not fight!" Wu the Elder was just going to hit Ximen Qing when the latter kicked him in the breast and he fell to the ground. Seeing Wu the Elder on the floor, Ximen Qing ran out of the house. The boy Yun Ge seeing that things had not turned out as he expected released Grandma Wang. The neighbours knew that Ximen Qing was an influential man, so how could they be expected to interfere? Grandma Wang went to help Wu the Elder to get up, and saw that he was spitting blood, and that his face turned yellow. She told Jinlian to bring a cup of water, and this revived Wu the Elder. They lifted him on his feet, and helped him to walk through the back door to his own room where they put him to bed.
The following day Ximen Qing did not hear anything from Wu the Elder so he hoped that he had died, and went to the house as usual to meet the woman.
Wu the Elder lay sick for five days, and although he called for his wife he got no reply. If he wanted soup or water he could not get it. Yet everyday he saw his wife dress herself neatly, and rouge her face before going out, and when she returned her face was always flushed. Wu the Elder was often unconscious but no one came to nurse him. One day he called his wife and said to her, "You are doing bad things, and I have discovered the adulterer. You told your lover to kick me on the breast, and now whether I live or die you go on with your dalliance. Even if I die it will not matter, because I have not enough energy left now to argue with you. But you know the disposition of my brother, and when he returns, whether it is early or late, he will certainly settle this matter for me. But if you would take pity and nurse me, then when he returns I will not say anything about this affair. But if you don't look after me now, then when he returns he will have something to say to you." But although his wife heard all this she did not say a word in reply but sailed off, and discussed it with Ximen Qing and Grandma Wang.
When Ximen Qing heard this news he felt as though his body was in an ice house, and he said, "Horrible! I know that Wu Song killed a tiger on the Jingyang Ridge, and that he is the great hero of Qinghe County. But I have loved you for so long that our hearts are now one, and we cannot change. But what can we do? The situation is awkward."
Grandma Wang sneered and said, "We are in the same boat; I am the passenger but I am not afraid. This is the first time I have seen the man at the helm in such a state."
"I am a useless man," said Ximen Qing, "and in a situation like this, I cannot arrange anything, so if you have any plan I hope that you will not keep it from us."
"Well, do you want to be a couple for your whole life or for only a short time?" asked Grandma Wang.
"What do you mean? asked Ximen Qing.
"Well, if you wanted to be a couple for a short time then now is the time for you two to separate," said Grandma Wang, "and when Wu the Elder gets better you must apologize to him. Then when Wu Song returns there will be nothing said to him, and after waiting until Wu Song departs on some other business you two can come here again as before. But if you two wish to continue as husband and wife for life without further trouble then I have a plan but I do not care to mention it now."
"Please tell us at once how we can be husband and wife for life," said Ximen Qing.
"To carry out that plan we should require a very rare thing which however you have at your house," replied Grandma Wang.
"Even if you wanted my eyes you could have them," replied Ximen Qing. "But what is the thing you want?"
"This fellow is very sick," said Grandma Wang, "but when he is much worse we can use my plan. At your house you have some arsenic. You can tell Jinlian to go and buy some medicine for her husband's sickness, and she can mix the arsenic with the medicine, and poison him and then burn his body so that there will be no trace left behind, and when Wu Song returns what can he do? An old saying has this, 'An elder brother's wife should not talk matters with her brother-in-law.' 'The first marriage must be in accordance with the wish of the parents but the second marriage is your own affair only.' Wu Song can raise no objection. After Wu the Elder's death you two can secretly come here and continue as before for about six months or a year, and then after the mourning is over you can be formally married, and be husband and wife for life. Live happily together ever afterwards. Is that a good plan?"
"I am afraid that we should be found out," said Ximen Qing. "But still, still, still. If I don't do it I shall have no rest."
"I am glad to hear that," said Grandma Wang. "There is a saying, 'If the roots are removed the grass will not come up again. But if the grass is only cut, then the next spring it will revive.' Sir, you had better go at once and get the arsenic, and in the meanwhile I will instruct this lady how to use it. When this affair is finished you will both be deeply indebted to me."
"That will be so without your saying," said Ximen Qing. He went for the arsenic, and upon returning with it handed it to Grandma Wang. Grandma Wang the looked at Jinlian, saying. "I will teach you how to make the 'medicine.' Wu asked you to nurse him better. Be kinder to him. He will ask you to get him some medicine, and when you give it to him, add this arsenic in it. When he wakes up at night, pour it down the hatch. Once it starts to do its work, it will tear open his guts and he'll scream for sure, so muffle him up with quilts. You must not let anyone hear him. Get a pot of boiling water and soak a rag. He'll bleed from every orifice and bite his lips. When he dies, remove the quilts, clean up the blood with the rag. Then shove it all in the coffin with him, cremate the lot and there's not a damned thing anyone can do about it!"
"Fine then," said Jinlian, "Though I'm afraid that I might not be able to handle the corpse!"
"That's easy," said Grandma Wang "just knock on the wall and I'll come and help."
"Make sure you do it carefully and I'll come back at 5 A.M. to hear all about it" said Xinmen Qing and departed. Grandma Wang prepared the arsenic powder and gave it to Jinlian.
Upon reaching her home Jinlian saw her husband lying on the bed hardly breathing, and almost lifeless. She went to the side of the bed and pretended to cry.
Wu the Elder asked her why she came there to cry, and his wife dried her eyes, and said that she had made a mistake in that affair but she had been deceived. "Who could have foreseen that you would have been kicked in that brutal manner," she said. She added that she had found a good medicine but did not buy it because she was afraid that he would suspect her.
"Well, if you now save my life," said Wu the Elder, "I will forgive you, and when my brother arrives I will not say anything to him. Go at once, and buy the medicine, and so save my life."
So Jinlian went to Grandma Wang, who went to buy the medicine for her. Upon returning to the bedroom with the medicine Jinlian showed it to her husband and said, "The doctor says that you must take this during the night. You will perspire freely so you must have two quilts over your head."
"That is all right," said Wu the Elder. "Thanks very much. You had better not go to sleep tonight but stay up and administer the medicine to me."
"You can go to sleep, and I will look after you," said Jinlian. She saw that it was getting dark so she lit a lamp, and kindled a fire to boil some water. She took a rag, and put it in the water. The night watchman just then sounded the hour of midnight on his drum. She then placed the arsenic in a bowl, and poured some hot water in another bowl. She took these upstairs, and called out, "Husband! Where is the medicine?" Wu the Elder replied that the medicine was underneath the mat on which he was lying at the side of his pillow. He asked her to let him have the medicine at once. She raised the mat, took out the medicine that, together with the bowl of water, she poured into the bowl of arsenic. She then took a silver hairpin, to stir the decoction; she raised Wu the Elder with her left arm, and gave him the bowl to drink. He drank some, and then said, "Wife! this medicine is not easy to take."
"It will do you good, so never mind if it has a bad taste," she said.
He took two mouthfuls and each time his wife tipped up the bowl so that he should take plenty, and at last the bowl was empty. She then laid him down on the bed, and quickly left him. Her husband gave a retch and said, "Wife! That medicine is giving me pain in the stomach. Oh, dear! Oh, dear! I cannot bear it." At this she took two quilts from the foot of the bed and put them over his head. He called out, "I am almost suffocated." His wife replied, "That is in accordance with the doctor's orders, as he wished you to perspire freely, and so you would be better more quickly." The next time he attempted to speak she was afraid that he was going to get free, so she sprang on the bed, knelt on his body, and pressed down the quilts with her hands so that he could not move. He gave several gasps but he was soon suffocated, and lay quite still. She raised the quilts, and looked at him. His teeth were set tight; and blood was flowing from every orifice; and this sight gave her a fright. She jumped off the bed, and running to the partition wall knocked. Grandma Wang upon hearing the sound went to the back door of Jinlian's house and coughed gently. Jinlian immediately went downstairs, and opened the door.
"Is it finished?" asked Grandma Wang.
"Yes! All is over," replied Jinlian. "But I feel too weak to do anything else."
"What is the difficulty? I will help you," said Grandma Wang. She thereupon rolled up her sleeves; filled a bucket full of hot water; put a rag in the bucket; and took it upstairs. She took the quilts off the bed and washed the corpse; she made it all clean, and then covered it with ordinary clothes. The two women then took the body downstairs and placed it on an old door. They combed the hair, put on a turban, dressed the remains with clothes, socks, and shoes. They put a piece of silk over his face, and placed a clean quilt over the body. They then went upstairs, and cleaned the room. When all had been finished Grandma Wang returned to her own house. Jinlian began a very good imitation of crying for her husband. Now generally when a woman weeps for her husband there are three kinds of crying: (1) When there are both tears and voice that is called "sob"; (2) when there are tears but no voice that is called weeping; (3) when there is voice but no tears that is called crying. This woman was crying but not weeping and she did it well up till about 4 A.M. It was not quite dawn when Ximen Qing arrived to hear what had been done. When Grandma Wang told him that all had been satisfactorily finished he gave her money to buy a coffin. He asked her to call Jinlian to discuss matters, and when she arrived she said to Ximen Qing, "My husband is now dead, so that I am dependent upon you."
"It is hardly necessary to mention that," said Ximen Qing.
"There is, however, still an important thing," said Grandma Wang.
"The chief of this neighbourhood is He Jiushu who is very particular, and I am afraid that if he discovers any loophole he will place difficulties in the way of a burial."
"That does not matter," said Ximen Qing. "I will talk to him and square him. He will certainly attend to what I say."
"Then you had better go at once, and get that matter settled," said Grandma Wang. And Ximen Qing acted accordingly.
When it was daylight Grandma Wang went and purchased the coffin, and also some incense and paper joss money. She and Jinlian prepared the sacrificial food for the spirit of the dead, and lit the seven-wicks lamp to be placed underneath the door plank on which the corpse lay. The neighbours came in to offer condolence, and Jinlian was very busy with her artificial crying. The neighbours wanted to know of what complaint Wu the Elder had died, to which Jinlian replied that he had had severe heart pains which got worse and worse everyday, and the doctor had not been able to cure him. Unfortunately he had died last night about midnight. So saying she gave a good display of simulated sobbing and crying. The neighbours, however, did not believe that Wu the Elder had died a natural death but dared not ask further questions. So they consoled her, saying, "He is dead but you are still alive so don't grieve so much." She thanked them, and they then all withdrew.
Grandma Wang, after getting the coffin, went to inform the neighbourhood chief—He Jiushu. She bought all the articles necessary for the funeral, and also engaged two monks to come that evening to perform the necessary prayers. The neighbourhood chief duly engaged two corpse burners to cremate the body. He then went himself to visit the house but when he reached the Zishi Street he met Ximen Qing who asked where he was going. He Jiushu replied that he was going to look the body of Wu the Elder who had died the previous night.
Ximen Qing said, "I have something to tell you about that." So He Jiushu followed him round a corner to a restaurant where Ximen Qing asked him to take the seat of honour but He Jiushu declined this. They both sat down at last, and Ximen Qing called for wine. The waiter brought it with fruit and vegetables.
Now He Jiushu could not understand what was at the bottom of this condescension as previously Ximen Qing had never offered him wine. He was therefore suspicious. After they had been drinking wine for about an hour Ximen Qing took out an ingot of ten taels of silver from his sleeve, and placing it on the table said, "You must not think that this is rather small, because tomorrow there will be some more."
He Jiushu expressed his thanks by saluting with both hands, and said, "But I am not aware of having done anything for you, so why do you present me with this silver? But even if you wish me to do something I do not care to accept this silver."
"I hope that you will not treat me in that way," said Ximen Qing. "Please take the money, and I will then tell you something!"
"Please, sir, speak without any reserve and I will listen," said He Jiushu.
"The fact is," said Ximen Qing, "that they may offer you a gift themselves. When you are inquiring into the death of Wu the Elder it would be much better for you not to go into details but just cover up the fact without any comment."
"Why are you so deeply concerned about such a small affair?" asked He Jiushu. "How can I accept money in such a case?"
"If you do not accept the money I am afraid that you will decline to act as I suggest," said Ximen Qing.

He Jiushu had ever been afraid of Ximen Qing because he was crafty and had influence with the officials so he thought it better to take the money. When they had drunk some more wine Ximen Qing called for the bill, and promised to call again the following day and pay. They both went downstairs, and when at the street door Ximen Qing asked He Jiushu not to forget what he had said, and also not to mention this matter to anyone else, and in a few days he would reward him still further.

Now He Jiushu thought all this was very strange, and he became more suspicious. He thought he was only going to inspect the body, and authorize the burial, and yet this man had given him so much money, so there must be a trick somewhere. When he reached Wu the Elder's house he saw the men engaged to cremate the corpse and asked them of what sickness Wu the Elder had died. They replied that the people of the house said that he had died from some disease of the heart. He raised the curtain over the door, and upon entering he was received by Grandma Wang who said that she had been waiting for him a long time, He Jiushu explained that he had been delayed by a little affair and that was why he was a little late. He saw that Jinlian had already put on the mourning clothes, and was pretending to cry. He said to her, "Please do not grieve so much. Your husband has returned to Heaven."

Jinlian covered her eyes so that he should not see that there were no tears, and said, "I cannot say all there is to say. I did not expect that this heart trouble would carry him off so quickly. He has left me with all this sorrow and misery." He Jiushu looked at her very carefully while she was saying this and remembered that he had often heard others speak about her but this was the first time he had seen her. He now understood why Ximen Qing had given him the ten taels of silver. He Jiushu then removed the shroud screening the corpse, and took the veil from the face. Upon noticing that the lips were purple, and that blood had issued from the mouth; the face was yellow, and the eyes were dull; the fingernails were dark coloured, he fell down in a swoon with a loud exclamation.

Life like the waning moon at dawn,
Or lamp at midnight without oil.

If you ever apprehend the Ch'an enigma posed by the word "romance";
You'll find that good affinities often turn out to be bad affinities.[1]
In the heat of passion, everyone becomes enamored of it;
Looked at dispassionately, everyone comes to despise it.[2]
The flowers by the wayside ought not to be plucked;
Natural beauty and sound substance are safer by far.
A rustic wife, your own children, and everyday fare;
Are unlikely to lead to either lovesickness or penury.

Yün-ko, after his rough treatment at the hands of Dame Wang, had no place to vent his spleen. When he picked up his basket and ran off to search the streets it was Wu the Elder that he was looking for. He hadn't gone more than two blocks when whom should he see but Wu the Elder, shouldering his load of steamed wheat cakes, coming along the very street he was on.

As soon as he saw him Yün-ko stopped in his tracks and said to Wu the Elder, "I haven't seen you for ages. You're really putting on the fat aren't you?"

Wu the Elder put down his carrying pole and said, "I'm just the same as I've always been. Since when am I putting on any fat?"

"The other day," said Yün-ko, "I wanted to buy some bran but couldn't find any, no matter where I looked. Everyone said you had some at home."

"I don't raise geese or ducks," said Wu the Elder. "What would I want with bran?"

"You say you've no use for bran," said Yün-ko. "In that case, how did you get so overstuffed yourself? Even if I picked you up by the feet and put you in a pot to boil, you wouldn't let off any steam?"

"You cocksucking monkey!" said Wu the Elder. "That's a fine suggestion to make! My wife isn't playing at ducks and drakes with anyone, so why should you call me a 'duck'?"[3]

"If your wife isn't playing at ducks and drakes with anyone," said Yün-ko, "she's playing at drakes and ducks."

Wu the Elder grabbed hold of Yün-ko and said, "Tell me who it is then."

"You're laughable," said Yün-ko. "You may be brave enough to grab hold of me but I'll bet you aren't brave enough to bite off his left one for him."

"Good Little Brother," said Wu the Elder, "Just tell me who it is and I'll give you ten steamed wheat cakes."

"Steamed wheat cakes alone won't do the trick," said Yün-ko. "But if you treat me to three cups of wine I'll tell you."

"I didn't know you could drink," said Wu the Elder. "Follow me."

Wu the Elder shouldered his carrying pole and led Yün-ko to a small wineshop. When they got there he put down his load, took along a few steamed wheat cakes, and then ordered up some meat and a jug of wine.

When Yün-ko had finished these off he said, "Don't bother with any more wine but I could use a few more slices of meat."

"Good Little Brother," said Wu the Elder, "please! Tell me who it is."

"Don't worry," said Yün-ko, "I'll tell you as soon as I've finished eating. And don't get too upset. I'll help you to nab him."

When Wu the Elder had watched the monkey finish off the meat and wine he said, "Now, tell me who it is."

"If you want to know," said Yün-ko, "take your hand and feel these lumps on my head."

"Where did you ever get such lumps from?" asked Wu the Elder.

"I'll tell you," said Yün-ko. "Today I took this basket of snow pears and set out to look for the Honourable Hsi-men, in the hope of getting a little something out of him. But I couldn't find him anywhere I looked. Someone on the street told me, 'He's probably in Dame Wang's teashop. He's carrying on an affair with Wu the Elder's wife and hangs around there all the time.'

"I had hoped that if I ran into him I could pick up thirty or fifty cash to spend but that intolerable old pig and dog, Dame Wang, not only wouldn't let me into her room to look for him but drove me out of her place with a couple of sharp raps on the head with her knuckles. So I set out especially to look for you. When I ran into you just now I needled you a few times, deliberately. If I hadn't needled you, you never would have asked anything about it."

"Really," said Wu the Elder.

"Can such things be?"[4]

"There you go again," said Yün-ko. "I was afraid you might be just such a fart of a fuck-off! The two of them are certainly having an easy time of it. All they have to do is wait until you're out of the way and then make out together in Dame Wang's room. And you ask me if it's true or if it's false! Do you think I'm just kidding you for the fun of it?"

When Wu the Elder heard this he said, "Brother, there's no reason for me to deceive you. That woman of mine has been going over to Dame Wang's place everyday, allegedly to help her with some sewing of clothes, or shoes and stockings. When she comes home her face is red. My first wife left a daughter behind, and whenever that woman feels like it she:

Beats her in the morning and curses her at night,[5] or doesn't give her any food to eat. Moreover, the last couple of days she's been acting rather peculiar, as if she wasn't any too happy to see me. In fact, I've been wondering what was wrong myself. What you've told me would explain it. Now then, I'd better leave my load in a safe place and go catch them in the act. What do you say?"

"For a man of your age," said Yün-ko, "you haven't any sense. That old bitch, Dame Wang, is not to be trifled with. If you have a run-in with her you're not likely to escape unscathed. Moreover, the three of them must have a prearranged signal, so if the old lady sees you come in to nab them, your wife will have time to hide. That Hsi-men Ch'ing is a pretty tough customer. He can handle twenty of the likes of you. If you fail to catch them in the act you may end up getting a good drubbing for your pains. On top of which, he's got both money and influence. If he were to lodge a complaint against you, and you were dragged into court without anyone to take your side, you could easily end up losing your life for nothing."

"Brother," said Wu the Elder, "everything you say is true; but how can I let off this head of steam?"

"I took a beating at Dame Wang's hands," said Yün-ko, "and I too have no place to vent my spleen. Let me suggest a move to you. Today, when you go home, don't kick up a fuss or say anything about it. Just act the same way you do everyday. Tomorrow morning, make a smaller number of steamed wheat cakes than usual and come out to sell them. I'll be lying in wait at the mouth of the alley, and when I see Hsi-men Ch'ing go in I'll come and tell you. You can then shoulder your carrying pole and wait nearby while I go in and distract the old bitch, who's sure to pick a fight with me. At that point I'll throw my fruit basket out into the middle of the street as a signal for you to come charging in. I'll pin the old lady against the wall with my head while you dash into the room and raise the hue and cry. How's that for a plan?"

"If it goes as you say, Brother," said Wu the Elder, "I'll be greatly indebted to you. I've got several strings of cash here which I'll give you. Be sure to be there first thing in the morning to wait for me at the mouth of the alley on Amethyst Street."

Yün-ko collected his few strings of cash and some steamed wheat cakes and then went his way. Wu the Elder, for his part, paid the bill, shouldered his carrying pole, and made another round before heading for home.

It so happens that the woman, accustomed as she was to railing at Wu the Elder and abusing him in every way, had been sufficiently troubled in recent days by a bad conscience to go out of her way to be nice to him. That evening when Wu the Elder came home, shouldering his carrying pole, he acted just the way he always did and didn't bring anything up.

"Darling," said the woman, "how about a cup of wine?"

"I've just had three cups with another vendor," said Wu the Elder.

The woman then prepared supper and they ate it together. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day, after breakfast, Wu the Elder made only two or three trays of steamed wheat cakes and loaded them on his carrying pole. The woman was too preoccupied with Hsi-men Ch'ing to notice how many wheat cakes he made. Wu the Elder shouldered his carrying pole and went out to ply his trade. The woman could hardly wait until he was out the door before slipping over to Dame Wang's teashop to wait for Hsi-men Ch'ing.

To resume our story, Wu the Elder shouldered his carrying pole and headed straight for the mouth of the alley on Amethyst Street, where he found Yün-ko already on the lookout, with his fruit basket in hand.

"Has anything happened?" asked Wu the Elder.

"It's early yet," said Yün-ko. "You might as well make one of your regular rounds. By the time you're through that bastard will probably have shown up. You just wait nearby, don't go too far away."

Like a cloud scudding before the wind, Wu the Elder completed one of his regular rounds and came back again.

"You just watch for my fruit basket," said Yün-ko. "When it comes flying out, you go charging in."

Wu the Elder stowed his load in a safe place. But no more of this.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Tigers deploy the revenants of their prey;[7]
birds are snared with decoys;
Victims remain in the dark until the trap is sprung, while predators do as they please.
Yün-ko exposes Hsi-men Ch'ing's crime for all to see;[8]
But Dame Wang's handling of the affair is remarkable indeed.

To resume our story, Yün-ko picked up his basket and headed straight for the teashop, where he opened fire on Dame Wang with the words, "You old pig and dog! Just who did you think you were hitting yesterday?"

The old lady's character remained unaltered. Jumping to her feet, she shouted at him, "You little monkey! I've never had anything to do with you. What are you coming around here to abuse me again for?"

"If I curse you," replied Yün-ko, "for being a procuress and a pandering old bitch, it matters about as much as my prick!"

The old lady was enraged and, grabbing hold of Yün-ko, started to beat him with her fists.

With the shout, "You dare to strike me, do you!" Yün-ko threw the fruit basket in his hand out into the middle of the street.

The old lady tried to get a firmer grip on him but the little monkey, with another cry of "You dare to strike me, do you!" put both arms around Dame Wang's waist, buried his head in the pit of her stomach, and pushed for all he was worth. He nearly knocked her over but she backed into the wall that prevented her from falling down. The monkey held her pinned against the wall with all his strength.

At this point Wu the Elder lifted up his clothes and came charging into the teashop in giant strides. When the old lady saw who it was and realized that he meant business, she tried to block his path but the little monkey continued to hold her pinned against the wall with all his strength and wouldn't let her budge. All the old woman could do was to yell out, "Wu the Elder has come!"

Inside Dame Wang's room the woman, who was already entwined with Hsi-men Ch'ing, was barely able to extricate herself fast enough to rush to the door and hold it fast. Hsi-men Ch'ing, for his part, proceeded to dive under the bed.

Wu the Elder charged up to the door and gave it a shove but he was unable to push it open and could only call out, "That's a fine thing you're up to!"

The woman was in a state of panic. Continuing to hold the door shut she said, "You're always shooting off your fucking mouth, boasting about how good you are at the martial arts but when it comes to the crunch you're no use at all! Even a paper tiger can scare you to death!"

The woman's words were clearly intended to get Hsi-men Ch'ing to confront Wu the Elder and fight his way out of the predicament. Hsi-men Ch'ing was still under the bed but when he heard these words they had the effect of stimulating him to action.

Crawling out from his hiding place he said, "Lady, it's not that I don't have what it takes. It's just that, for the moment, I couldn't think what to do." Then, unbarring the door, he called out, "Come in, if you dare!"

Wu the Elder made a grab at him but Hsi-men Ch'ing countered with a swift kick, and his assailant was so short that Hsi-men Ch'ing caught him squarely in the solar plexus with his foot and knocked him flat on his back.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that Wu the Elder was down and out he took advantage of the confusion to beat a hasty retreat. Yün-ko also, seeing that the situation had taken a turn for the worse, abandoned Dame Wang and took to his heels. The neighbours in the area all knew that Hsi-men Ch'ing was a tough customer, and none of them wanted to interfere in the matter.

At this point Dame Wang attempted to get Wu the Elder back on his feet. When she saw that he was spitting blood and that his face had turned as sallow as wax, she called the woman out to fetch a bowl of water, with the help of which they succeeded in reviving him. Putting his arms over their shoulders, the two of them managed to help him through the back door and up to the second story room of his own house, where they put him to bed. Of the events of that night there is nothing more to tell.

The next day, when Hsi-men Ch'ing found out that nothing had come of the incident, he showed up at Dame Wang's place to keep his tryst with the woman as usual. Their only hope was that Wu the Elder would die.

The injuries he had sustained were serious enough to keep him from getting up or going out for five days. On top of which:

When he wanted soup, there was none to be had;
When he wanted water, there was none to be had.[9]

Everyday he called on his wife for help but she refused to respond. He had to lie there and watch as she dolled herself up before going out, and when she returned her face was red.

The woman even prohibited his daughter, Ying-erh, from coming to his aid, threatening her with the words, "You little wretch! If you give him so much as a cup of water to drink without telling me, you'd better look out."

Ying-erh was so intimidated by this that she didn't dare serve her father a mouthful of soup. On several occasions Wu the Elder fainted away from sheer indignation but there was no one to pay any attention.

One day Wu the Elder told his wife he had something important to say to her and addressed her as follows: "As for what you've been up to, I caught you red-handed in the act of adultery, and you turned around and egged your lover into kicking me in the solar plexus, so that now:

Though I seek to live, I cannot live;
Though I seek to die, I cannot die,[10] while all the time the two of you are off enjoying yourselves together. If I die it scarcely matters. I don't have the strength to contend with you any longer. But my younger brother, Wu the Second—you know what sort of a person he is—when he returns—as he will, sooner or later—he'll scarcely be willing to call it quits. If you consent to take pity on me, and help me to recover as soon as possible, when he comes back I won't say anything about it. But if you refuse to look after me, when he comes home he'll have something to say to you."

When the woman heard this speech she made no reply but slipped over to Dame Wang's place and repeated it, word for word, to the old woman and Hsi-men Ch'ing. When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard what she had to say it was:

Just as though he had been dunked in a tub of ice water.[11]

"That's bad!" he said. "I understand that Captain Wu who killed the tiger on Ching-yang Ridge is the number one stout fellow in Ch'ing-ho district. But right now:

Having been lovers for many a day;
Our feelings and thoughts are one,

We can never agree to be separated.[17]
If what you say is true, what are we to do? It's a bad situation all right!"
Dame Wang laughed sardonically and said, "I've never seen anything like it. You're the helmsman and I'm merely a sculler but I'm not worried about it while you're in a state of panic."
"I may be a man," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but for all that, when it comes to situations like this, I don't know what to do. If you've got any ideas, please do whatever you can to protect us."
"If you want me to protect you," said Dame Wang, "I've got a plan that should do the trick. Do you want to be 'long-term man and wife' or 'short-term man and wife'?"
"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "what do you mean by 'long-term man and wife' and 'short-term man and wife'?"
"If you want to be 'short-term man and wife,' " said Dame Wang, "you should separate from each other this very day, wait until Wu the Elder has recovered, and offer him an apology. Then, when Wu the Second comes back, he won't say anything about it, and you can wait until he's sent away on another mission to get together again. That's what I mean by 'short term man and wife.' But if you want to be 'long-term man and wife,' to spend everyday together without having to:
Anticipate surprise and suffer fear;[18]
I've got a splendid plan for you. The only thing is it's not an easy subject to broach."
"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "please help us out. The only thing we want is to be 'long-term man and wife.' "
"This plan," said Dame Wang, "requires something that no one else has got but which you, sir:
As Heaven begets so Heaven disposes;[19] happen to possess."
"Even if it were my eyes you wanted," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'd gouge them out and give them to you. What is this thing anyway?"
"Right now," said Dame Wang, "this 'knockabout'[15] is in pretty bad shape. This presents you with the opportunity to take action against him while he's incapacitated. You, sir, should go home and pick up some arsenic from your pharmaceutical shop and then get the young lady to buy a dose of heart medicine, mix the arsenic in with it, and polish off this runt once and for all. If you cremate the body afterward you'll have gotten him completely out of the way, without leaving a trace behind. Then, even if Wu the Second comes back, what will he be able to do about it? It's always been the case that:
In one's first marriage one must obey one's parents;
In subsequent marriages one can suit oneself.[16]
Your brother-in-law will have nothing to say in the matter. You can continue to see each other clandestinely, and after half a year or a year the dust will have settled. Then, as soon as the mourning period for your husband expires, the gentleman can pop you into a sedan chair and take you into his household as a concubine. Then you can be 'long-term man and wife' and:
Live happily ever after.
How's that for a plan?"
"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "this plan is splendid indeed. It's always been true that:
If one wants to be able to enjoy life,
One has to be prepared to risk death.[17]
Enough! Enough! Enough! One must either:
Refuse to do something;
Or not stop at anything.[18]
"That's the spirit," said Dame Wang. "This is a situation in which:
One must cut the weeds and pull up the roots,
So that new sprouts will not grow;
If one cuts the weeds without pulling up the roots,
When spring comes new sprouts will grow.[19]
The only problem remaining is how to proceed. You, sir, should go straight home and bring this ingredient as quickly as possible. I'll instruct the young lady on what she is to do. When the affair is accomplished I expect to be amply rewarded."
"Naturally," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that goes without saying."
There is a poem that testifies to this:
Obsessed with thoughts of clouds and rain,
the two of them are inseparable;
Yearning for beauty, hankering after flowers,
he will not call it quits.
In the final analysis, in this world such things do happen;
Wu the Elder will lose his life at the hands of a painted face.[20]
To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing had not been gone for long when he returned with a packet of arsenic that he handed over to Dame Wang, who put it away.
Turning her attention to the woman, she said, "Young lady, I'll tell you how to administer the medicine. Didn't Wu the Elder say to you, this very day, that he wanted you to help him recover? You must take advantage of this opening by playing up to him with every trick at your disposal. If he asks you for any medication, mix this arsenic in with some heart medicine before administering it to him. If he realizes that something is wrong and starts to struggle, just pour the rest of it down his throat before you jump off the bed. When the poison starts to take effect his stomach and intestines will burst and he may cry out. You must muffle his cries with a quilt so no one will hear, holding the quilt in place as tightly as you can. You must also heat a pan of hot water beforehand and put a rag to soak in it. When the poison takes effect there may be hemorrhaging from all his seven apertures as well as telltale marks where he has bitten his lips. After he stops breathing you must remove the quilt, take the rag that you have soaked in hot water, and wipe away any signs of blood. Then he can be popped into a coffin, carted out of town, and cremated. There's nothing to it."
"That's all very fine," said the woman, "but I'm afraid, when the time comes, I may lose my nerve and be unable to handle the corpse."
"That's no problem," said the old lady. "Just knock on the wall and I'll come over to help you."
"Do the best you can," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Tomorrow morning at the fifth watch I'll come by to see what's happened." Having said which, he made his way home.
Dame Wang took the arsenic and rolled it between her fingers into a fine powder, after which she gave it to the woman to take home and hide away in a safe place. The woman went upstairs to see how Wu the Elder was and found him:
With barely two breaths left in his body;[21] manifestly on the brink of death. The woman sat down on the side of the bed and pretended to weep.
"What are you weeping about?" asked Wu the Elder.
The woman wiped away her tears and said, "In a moment of weakness I let that Hsi-men Ch'ing take advantage of me but I never expected he would end up kicking you in the solar plexus. I've heard of a place that has good prescriptions for sale, and I'd like to go buy one for you but I'm afraid you might be suspicious, so I haven't ventured to go and get it."
"If you help me to recover," said Wu the Elder, "so I'm all right again, I'll:
Wipe the slate clean with a single stroke,[22] and won't even hold a grudge against you. When Wu the Second comes back I won't say anything about it. Please go buy the medicine as quickly as possible and help me to recover."
The woman picked up some copper cash and went directly to Dame Wang's place, where she sat down and got the old lady to buy the medicine for her.
Then she took it back upstairs and showed it to Wu the Elder, saying, "This is a dose of heart medicine. The doctor said if you take it late in the evening and then get a good night's sleep, with a couple of quilts over you to make you sweat, you can be up and about tomorrow."
"That's wonderful," said Wu the Elder. "I'm putting you to a lot of trouble. If you're willing to sacrifice a little sleep tonight, you can stay up and fix it for me when the time comes."
"Just relax and try to get some sleep," said the woman. "I'll take care of everything for you."
Gradually darkness began to fall. In the house the woman lit a lamp and heated a large pan of hot water, into which she put a rag to soak. She listened for the sound of the drum that signaled the night watches and eventually heard the third watch struck. First the woman poured the arsenic into a cup and then she scooped up a bowl of boiling water and took them upstairs.
"Darling, where did you put the medicine?" she called out.
"It's under the bed mat, beside my pillow," said Wu the Elder. "Hurry up and fix it for me."
The woman lifted up the mat, shook the medicine into the cup, and set the packet aside. Then she poured the hot water into the cup and, pulling a silver hairpin out of her hair, used it to stir the contents until it was all dissolved. With her left hand she helped Wu the Elder sit up in bed while with her right hand she held the medicine to his mouth.
Wu the Elder swallowed a mouthful and said, "Darling, this medicine really tastes awful."
"As long as it cures what ails you," the woman said, "what difference does it make whether it tastes awful or not?"
While Wu the Elder was swallowing his second mouthful the woman took advantage of the situation to pour the entire contents of the cup down his throat in one gulp. Then she laid him back down and hastily jumped off the bed.
Wu the Elder gave a groan and said, "Darling, no sooner did I swallow the medicine than my stomach began to hurt. It's bad! It's bad! It's more than I can take."
The woman then proceeded to take two quilts from the foot of the bed and put them hugger-mugger over his head and face.
"I'm suffocating," called out Wu the Elder as loudly as he could.
"The doctor told me," the woman responded, "that if I really made you sweat you'd get better that much faster."
Wu the Elder tried to say something more but the woman was afraid he might put up a struggle so she jumped onto the bed, sat astride Wu the Elder's body,[23] and pressed down on the edge of the quilt with all her might, not letting up to the slightest degree. Truly:
Hot grease sears his chest and lungs;
Flames scorch his liver and intestines.
His heart cavity is encroached upon by gleaming blades;
His entrails are rudely invaded
by steely knives.
His whole body feels as cold as ice;
His seven apertures all begin to hemorrhage.
His teeth are tightly clenched;
His three ethereal souls flee to the City of the Unjustly Dead.
His throat is dry and parched;
His seven material souls head for the Terrace of Homeward Gazing Spirits.[24]
The legions of Hell are further augmented
by one poison-eating ghost;
The world of the living is diminished by one adulterer-seizing man.[25]
At this point Wu the Elder groaned twice and panted for a little while. Then his stomach and intestines burst and:
Alas and alack,
he was no longer able to move.
When the woman removed the quilt and saw that Wu the Elder had been:
Grinding and gnashing his teeth,[26] and that he had hemorrhaged from all seven apertures, she was afraid. It was all she could do to jump off the bed and knock on the wall. When Dame Wang heard the knock she came over to the back door and gave a cough, at which the woman came downstairs to let her in.
"Is it all over or not?" asked Dame Wang.
"It's all over all right," said the woman, "but I've lost my nerve and can't handle it."
"What's so hard about it?" said Dame Wang. "I'll help you take care of everything."
The old lady rolled up her sleeves, scooped up a bucketful of hot water, threw the rag into it, and lugged it upstairs. Then she rolled up the quilts, wiped away all traces of coagulated blood from around Wu the Elder's lips and seven apertures, and placed his clothes on top of the body. The two of them then carried him downstairs, one step at a time, and laid him out on the leaf of an old door. Once there, they combed his hair, placed a turban on his head, dressed him, and put on his shoes and stockings. Then they stretched a strip of white damask over his face and covered the corpse with a clean quilt. After they had gone back upstairs and cleaned everything up, Dame Wang went home and the woman commenced the charade of loudly bewailing the loss of her provider.
Gentle reader take note: It so happens that, generally speaking, the women of this world have three ways of weeping. If there are tears as well as sound, it is called weeping. If there are tears but no sound, it is called sobbing. If there are no tears but there is sound, it is called howling.[27]
The woman howled, without shedding a tear, for the remainder of the night.
The next morning at the fifth watch, before it was light, Hsi-men Ch'ing hurried over to find out what had happened. When Dame Wang had told him all the details he pulled out some silver and gave it to her to cover the cost of a coffin and the other funeral arrangements. Then they called the woman over for a conference.
When the woman arrived she said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Now that Wu the Elder is dead I'm completely dependent on you, sir. Don't put me in the position of:
The rings that hold your hairnet in place: always at the back of your head.[28]
"What need is there for you to trouble yourself about that?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"And if you should betray me," the woman asked, "what then?"
"If I ever betray you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "may I suffer the same fate as your Wu the Elder."

"Sir," said Dame Wang, "that's enough idle chatter for the time being. Right now there's only one thing that's important. Later this morning the local constable must supervise the encoffining ceremony, and if the coroner's assistant notices anything suspicious, what will we do then? The head coroner's assistant, Ho the Ninth, doesn't miss a trick. My only fear is that he may not permit the encoffining."
"That's no problem," said Hsi-men Ch'ing with a laugh. "I'll simply tell Ho the Ninth what to do. He wouldn't dare refuse a request from me."
"You'd better go speak to him immediately," said Dame Wang, "before it's too late."
Having turned the silver over to Dame Wang to buy the coffin, Hsi-men Ch'ing then went off to deal with Ho the Ninth. Truly:
The three luminaries cast shadows but who can catch them;
The ten thousand things have no roots, they just arise of themselves.[29]
Concealed by the snow, the presence of the egrets is not seen until they fly;
Hidden by the willows, the existence of the parrots is not known until they speak.[30]
How reprehensible is the wanton fellow, enamored of the flowers by the wayside;
It is because of his insatiable lust that he brings troubles on his head.
His body will perish and his life be lost solely on this account;
His property will be destroyed and his family ruined for this reason alone.
Romantic passion lasts but a moment; what value does it have?
Its taste is quite ordinary; it is nothing to boast about.
One day "catastrophe will arise within the screen-wall of the house";[1]
And it will owe its inception to the machinations of Dame Wang.
Hsi-men Ch'ing went off to deal with Ho the Ninth.
To resume our story, Dame Wang took the silver and set out to buy a coffin and appropriate objects to bury with the dead. She also bought incense, candles, paper money, and so forth. After she had returned she consulted with the woman, and they lighted a vigil lamp and placed it before Wu the Elder's spirit tablet.
The neighbours from the locality all came to see what was going on, and the woman pretended to hide her painted face as she shed crocodile tears.
"What illness did Wu the Elder die of?" the neighbours asked.
"My husband suffered from severe pains in the region of the heart," the woman replied. "Who could have anticipated that they would grow worse and worse as the days went by, until it became apparent that he was unlikely to recover? Unfortunately last night, during the third watch, he died. It's really terrible!" And she commenced once more the charade of loud weeping and wailing.
The neighbours were perfectly well aware that the deceased had died under suspicious circumstances but they did not venture to inquire into them any too closely. They all attempted to comfort her with the words, "The dead are dead. The living must get on as best they can. Try to control your grief, young lady. The weather's too hot for it."
The woman had no choice but to pretend to thank them all, and they went their separate ways.
When Dame Wang had supervised the delivery of the coffin she went out again to request the attendance of the head coroner's assistant, Ho the Ninth, and to buy everything that was required for the encoffining ceremony and other household needs. Then she went to the Pao-en Temple, or Temple of Kindness Requited, and engaged two Ch'an monks to come that evening to keep vigil and perform a mass for the dead. It was not long before Ho the Ninth sent a couple of coroner's assistants ahead of him to take care of the preliminaries.
To resume our story, at about 10:00 A.M. Ho the Ninth himself set forth at a leisurely pace. When he arrived at the mouth of the alley on Amethyst Street he encountered Hsi-men Ch'ing, who called out to him, "Ho the Ninth, where are you headed?"
"I'm just going down the street here," replied Ho the Ninth, "to encoffin the corpse of Wu the Elder, who sold steamed wheat cakes."
"Walk a few steps with me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've got something to say to you."
Ho the Ninth followed Hsi-men Ch'ing into a small wineshop on the corner, where they occupied a private booth.
"Old Ninth, please take the seat of honour," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"Who am I," said Ho the Ninth, "to presume to sit down in your presence, sir?"
"Old Ninth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "why be so standoffish? Please, have a seat."
The two of them dickered politely for a while and then sat down. Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered the waiter to bring a bottle of their best wine. The waiter set out an array of appetizers, nuts, and so forth, suitable to accompany a drinking party, and then heated the wine for them.
Ho the Ninth was somewhat apprehensive. "Hsi-men Ch'ing has never bothered to have a drink with me before," he thought to himself. "This cup of wine today is sure to have something funny behind it."
The two of them had been drinking together for some time when, lo and behold, Hsi-men Ch'ing fumbled in his sleeve, pulled out an ingot of "snowflake" silver, and placed it in front of him, saying, "Old Ninth, please don't despise this, insignificant though it may be. I'll give you a further expression of my gratitude another day."
Ho the Ninth folded his hands in front of him and said, "Having never done the slightest thing to deserve it, sir, how could I possibly accept this silver from you? But if you have a command, sir, I could scarcely presume to refuse."
"Old Ninth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "don't be so standoffish. Please take it."
"Tell me what you have in mind, sir," said Ho the Ninth, "no matter what it is."
"It isn't anything much," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and in a little while the family will also give you something for your pains. The only thing is, right now, when you encoffin Wu the Elder's corpse, I'd be much obliged if you'd take care of everything, and:
Draw an embroidered quilt over it,[2] that's all. Need I say more?"
"I thought you were going to ask me to do something demanding," said Ho the Ninth. "What does a little thing like that matter? How could I possibly accept your silver for that, sir?"
"Old Ninth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you don't accept it, you'll be refusing me."
Ho the Ninth had always been rather afraid of Hsi-men Ch'ing for his unscrupulousness and his influence in official quarters, so he felt that he had no recourse but to accept the proffered silver.
After they had finished another few cups of wine, Hsi-men Ch'ing summoned the waiter and said, "Put it on the tab and come to my shop to collect the money tomorrow."
The two of them then went downstairs and out the door of the wineshop.
As they were on the point of parting Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Old Ninth, be sure to remember. If you keep your mouth shut I'll reward you further on another day."
Having issued his instructions, he then went about his business.
Ho the Ninth was somewhat apprehensive. "It's my responsibility to encoffin Wu the Elder's corpse," he thought to himself. "Why should he give me these ten taels of silver? There's sure to be something funny about this business."
When he arrived at the door of Wu the Elder's house he found the pair of coroner's assistants that he had sent ahead waiting for him there. Dame Wang had also been waiting for a long time and had been questioning them about his whereabouts.
Ho the Ninth asked the coroner's assistants, "What illness did Wu the Elder die of?"
"His family says he died of heart trouble," said the coroner's assistants.
Ho the Ninth approached the door, pulled the hanging blind aside, and went inside.
Dame Wang greeted him with the words, "We've been waiting for you a long time. The Yin-yang Master's already been here half the day. Old Ninth, what's been keeping you so long?"
"Something came up that prevented me from getting here any sooner," said Ho the Ninth. "I'm afraid I'm a little late."
At this point he caught sight of the woman who came out from the interior of the house dressed in plain white clothes, with a white paper cap over her chignon, feigning tears.
"Try to control your grief, young lady," said Ho the Ninth. "Your husband is surely in Heaven by now."
The woman pretended to wipe away her tears, saying, "I can't tell you how terrible it is. My husband was stricken with heart trouble and in only a few days lost his life, just like that. It's really terrible to be so bereaved."
Ho the Ninth looked the woman over from top to toe and thought to himself, "Hitherto I've only heard tell of Wu the Elder's wife without ever having set eyes on her myself. So this is the sort of woman Wu the Elder managed to keep in his house. Hsi-men Ch'ing's ten taels of silver have not been spent for nothing." Then he went over by the spirit tablet and prepared to examine Wu the Elder's corpse. As soon as the Yin-yang Master had finished reciting his text, Ho the Ninth lifted aside the funeral banderole and removed the strip of white damask that had been stretched over the face of the deceased. No sooner did he concentrate the gaze of those vigilant organs of his, with their 5 concentric rings, 8 precious attributes, and 2 spots of magic liquid[4] than he perceived that Wu the Elder's fingernails were black, lips were purple, face was sallow, eyes protruded,[5] and knew he had been poisoned.

When deep in mystic contemplation
Sounding the shallows of this world's emptiness,
Even the marriage most blessed by Fate seems full of evil.
Men in their folly crave for love,
Yet, when in calm collectedness they study it,
Hateful it seems.
Leave the wild grasses
Gather not the idle flowers
So, thy truest self, the vigor of thy manhood,
Will know the peace of Nature.
A simple wife, young children, and plain fare
With these need no man suffer the pangs of love
Or lose his fortune.

Yun'ge could not contain his anger at the way old woman Wang had treated him. He took his basket and went to find Wu Da. He had gone through two streets before he met the man for whom he was looking. Wu Da, carrying his buns, was coming towards him. The boy stopped. "It is some time since I saw you last," he said, looking hard at the man. "How fat you have grown."
"Fat?" said Wu Da. "What do you mean? I am just the same as I always was."
"A few days ago," Yun'ge said, "I wanted some chicken food. I went for miles but couldn't get any. Yet everybody tells me you have lots of it at your house."
"I keep neither geese nor ducks," Wu Da said. "Why should I have chicken food?"
"So you say," Yun'ge retorted, "but what makes you so much like a capon? Why! If you were held topsy-turvy, you would never turn a hair; you'd keep quite cool if you were being boiled in a cauldron."
"This is an insult, you young scoundrel," Wu Da cried. "My wife has not run off with anybody's husband. What makes you call me a capon?"
"Indeed?" the boy said. "So your wife has not run off with anybody's husband, hasn't she? Perhaps I should have said she has run off with somebody's husband."
"Who is the man?" Wu Da cried. "Tell me."
"You make me laugh. You can do what you like with me easily enough but you won't find your wife's new friend so easy to dispose of."
"Good little brother, tell me who he is and I will give you ten cakes." "Cakes won't do. I'd rather you were my host and gave me some wine. Three cups, and I'll tell you the whole story."
"If it's wine you want, come along," Wu Da said. He led the way to a little wineshop. Calling for a jar of wine and some meat, he took cakes from his basket and invited Yun'ge to join him. "Good little brother," he said, "you really must tell me."
"There is no hurry. Wait till I have finished my food. Then I'll tell you. You mustn't be impatient. I'll help you to catch them."
Wu Da waited till the young monkey had finished, and again asked him to explain himself.
"If you would like to know," the boy said, "put your hand on my head and feel the bumps."
"How did you get them?"
"I'll tell you. Today I have been carrying my pears about looking for his Lordship, Ximen. I walked and walked but couldn't find him anywhere. Then somebody in the street told me he was at old woman Wang's tea shop, amusing himself with Mistress Wu; that he went there everyday. I thought I might see him there, and get thirty or fifty cash from him but the old sow Wang wouldn't let me in. She drove me away, and then I thought I'd come and see you. I was rather rude but, if I hadn't made you wild, you wouldn't have asked me any questions."
"Is this the truth?"
"Don't you believe me?" the boy cried. "Didn't I say you were a white-livered fellow? Those two are making merry at this very moment. They wait till you have gone out, and then they go and meet at the old woman's house. You say, 'Is this the truth?' What reason have I for deceiving you?"
"Little brother, it is true. My wife goes everyday to this old woman's house to make clothes and shoes, and when she comes back she has a red face. My first wife left me with a little daughter. This woman beats her every morning and scolds her every night. She gives her hardly anything to eat. Lately she certainly has been looking as if something was on her mind. She looked balefully at me, and I wondered whether anything was wrong. You have told the truth. I will put my baskets down and go and catch these evil-doers in the act."
"You may be old as years go," Yun'ge said, "but for the little you know of the world, you might be a child. That old bitch Wang is not afraid of anybody. She would throw you out of the house. Besides, your wife and Ximen have a secret signal. If they knew you were coming, Ximen Qing would hide your wife. He is a very strong man and could dispose of twenty like you. You will never be able to touch him; much more likely you'll find his fist in your mouth. He is so rich and powerful that he would bring an accusation against you, and have you hauled to the courts. You have nobody to help you, and you'd come to an unhappy end."
"You are right, little brother but what can I do to revenge myself?"
"I want revenge too," Yun'ge said, "for the old woman beat me. Listen to me. Go home today, show no sign of being angry, and don't say one word about the matter. Just behave as usual. Tomorrow, don't make more than a few cakes. Go out with them. I shall be waiting at the entrance to the lane. If Ximen Qing comes, I will give you a call, and you can take your baskets and wait for me somewhere near by. I will go first and plague the old bitch. She will certainly come out to hit me. I will throw my basket far into the street, and then you can run in. I will hold the old woman, and you can rush into the room, and tell them what you think about them. Don't you think that's a good plan?"
"I am greatly indebted to you," Wu Da said; "here are two strings of cash. Come early tomorrow and wait at the entrance to Amethyst Street."

Yun'ge took the money and some of the cakes, and went off. Wu Da paid the reckoning, picked up his baskets, and went back to the street to sell his cakes. A little later he went home.
His wife had never ceased to grumble at him and had found a hundred ways of making life unpleasant to him but of late her conscience had smitten her and she showed signs of relenting. This evening, when Wu Da came home with his baskets and said nothing, as was usual, she asked him to have some wine. He refused, saying he had already taken wine with some merchants. She laid out his supper but still he did not offer to speak, and next morning, after breakfast, he made only two or three trays of cakes, and put them in his baskets. Jinlian was so taken up with her thoughts of Ximen Qing that she did not notice how many cakes he made. She waited impatiently until he had gone out and then went to the tea shop to wait for her lover.
Wu Da took his baskets to the entrance to Amethyst Street. Yun'ge, also with a basket, was looking around.
"Well?" Wu Da said.
"It is too soon yet. Go and sell your cakes till he comes. Wait at the corner, and don't go far away."
Wu Da hurried away but was soon back again. "The moment you see me throw down my basket," the boy said, "dash into the room." Wu Da put down his own basket and waited.
Yun'ge went to the tea shop. "You old pig," he said, in the most irritating tone he could command. "What did you mean by hitting me yesterday?"
Old woman Wang jumped up at once. "I have not done anything to you, you little monkey. Why have you come to insult me again?"
"For a very good reason, you old bitch, you old strumpet mistress. My ramrod to you!"
This made the old woman furious. She dashed at Yun'ge and tried to hit him. "Would you beat me?" he cried, and threw his basket as far as he could into the street. The old woman tried to hold him but the little monkey cried, "Hit me if you can," put down his head, and butted her in the belly. She would have fallen if there had not been a wall behind her. The young monkey pushed as hard as he could and pinned her against the wall, while Wu Da pulled up his skirts and strode into the tea shop. The old woman saw him, and would have stopped him if she could but the boy kept her close against the wall and she could not free herself.
"Wu Da is here," she cried.
Jinlian and Ximen Qing did not know what to do. Jinlian threw herself against the door, and Ximen Qing crawled under the bed. Wu Da tried to force open the door but failed. "This is a fine game you're playing," he cried. Jinlian was filled with confusion but she succeeded in holding the door against him.
"You talk about the strength of your fists," she said to Ximen Qing, "and you are always boasting about your skill with the staff; why don't you come out and do something? Why, even a paper tiger is enough to frighten you." This she said to shame him into coming out, so that he might strike down Wu Da and make his escape. Ximen, in his hiding place under the bed, did grow bolder when he heard what she said. He crawled out nervously.
"I wasn't afraid," he said, "only a little taken by surprise." He threw open the door, and cried, "Stand back there!" Wu Da tried to close but Ximen kicked out at him and, as the man was very small, the foot caught him in the ribs, and he fell backwards. Ximen Qing went out, and Yun'ge, seeing that matters had not turned out as he had hoped, released the old woman and ran away.
The neighbours knew Ximen Qing's power, and none of them dared to come and interfere. Old woman Wang lifted up Wu Da. His face was as yellow as a tallow candle, and he was spitting blood. She told Jinlian to bring a cup of water to revive him and then, each holding him by one arm, they took him home by the back way and put him to bed.
Next day Ximen did not hear any bad news, so he went as usual to the old woman's house to make merry with Jinlian. He hoped that Wu Da would die, and indeed for five days the poor man was very ill, and unable to leave his bed. He longed for food and could obtain none; he sighed for a drink and none was given him. Day after day he appealed to Jinlian but she never answered. She went out, dressed in her best clothes, and came back with a flushed face. His daughter Ying'er had been forbidden to do anything for him. "If you dare to do anything for him and don't tell me," the woman had said, "you shall pay for it." After this the child did not venture to give her father a spoonful of soup or even a drop of water. Several times Wu Da fainted in his anger but nobody paid the least attention to him. One day he cried to his wife, "You have done this because I found you out. You told that wicked man to kick me over the heart. And now I can neither die nor live. And the pair of you are as happy as can be. If I die, it is a small matter; you have nothing to fear from me. But don't forget Wu Song. Sooner or later he will come back, and he will have something to say about all this. Show me a little kindness and help me to get well as quickly as possible and I won't tell him anything. But if you still refuse to do anything for me, I shall have my reckoning with you on his return."
Jinlian listened but made no answer. She went next door and told old woman Wang and Ximen Qing everything Wu Da had said. Ximen shivered as though a bucket of cold water had been poured over him. "This is most awkward," he said. "This brother is the Captain Wu who killed a tiger on Jingyang Hill. And now I have learned to love you. We get on together so perfectly. It is not conceivable that we should separate but it means thinking out some way of dealing with the problem. Really, it is most unfortunate."
Old woman Wang laughed. "I've never seen such a man. You are at the helm and I am only at the oar, yet, while I see no difficulty, you seem to have no notion what to do."
"I am ashamed," Ximen said, "but I must admit I don't know what to do. Have you any plan for getting us out of the difficulty?"
"If you really wish for my help, I have a plan," the old woman said. "First, I must know whether you wish your relations to be permanent or temporary."
"What do you mean, Stepmother?"
"If you will be satisfied with a temporary arrangement, you must separate today. When Wu Da is well, you must ask his forgiveness. Then nobody will say anything to Wu Song about this affair. You will have to wait till some business takes him away again, and then you can meet once more. That is what I mean by 'temporary arrangement.' If you wish for something more permanent, I have an excellent idea but it is one that I hesitate to tell you."
"Stepmother," Ximen said, "please do anything you can to keep us always together."
"There is one thing I need for this plan. It is not to be had everywhere but I have no doubt you have some of it."
"If you want my eye, you shall have it," Ximen cried. "What is it you mean?"
"Wu Da is dangerously ill. Let us take the chance while we have it. Go to your shop, get some arsenic and give it to this lady. Then she can buy some medicine for Wu Da's sore chest and put the arsenic into it. So we shall rid ourselves of that little man. When he is dead, we will burn his body till not a trace remains. When Wu Song comes back, he can do nothing about it. A young man, when he takes a wife, marries to please his parents but when he marries again he makes his own choice. What can a younger brother do? Six months or a year later, when the lady is out of mourning, there is nothing to prevent you marrying her. If you live together happily all your lives, won't that be permanent enough for you?"
"It is an admirable plan, Stepmother. As the proverb says: 'The treasure of a happy life can only be secured by desperate deeds.' Yes, one evil deed deserves another."
"So you think my scheme a good one!" the old woman said. "Well, there is nothing like pulling up the roots when we cut the grass. It never grows again. Go home, Sir, and bring the stuff to me. I'll show the lady what to do with it. But, when all is over, I shall expect a present worth having."
"Of course," Ximen said, "that goes without saying."
He went at once to his shop and soon returned with a packet of arsenic that he gave to old woman Wang. She looked at Jinlian.
"Now, Lady, I am going to tell you how to use this. Wu Da has begged you to save him, and that gives you an opening. You must make a great show of affection. When he asks you for something to make him better, put this arsenic into some medicine to soothe his chest. When he complains of pain, pour it down his throat. As soon as the poison has got to work, his bowels will burst and he will cry out. So put the bedclothes over him, and press down the coverlet, and make sure that no one hears him. One thing you must do is to heat some water, and put a napkin into it. When the poison has taken effect, blood will stream from the seven openings of his body, and there will be marks on his lips. As soon as he is really dead, you must take off the bedclothes, and wipe away the blood. All that remains is to put him into a coffin and get him out of the way."
"I see," Jinlian said, "but my arms are weak. I shall not have strength enough."
"That doesn't matter. Knock on the wall, and I will come and help you."
"You must both be very careful," Ximen Qing said. "I will come tomorrow at the fifth watch to hear what news you have."
Old woman Wang powdered the arsenic and gave it to Jinlian, who went home. Wu Da was breathing so feebly that it seemed as though his soul had already left him. She sat on his bed, and pretended to cry.
"Why are you crying?" Wu Da said.
Jinlian dried her tears. "Because I allowed myself to be led astray by that Ximen Qing and, for a time, yielded to temptation. But I never meant him to kick you in the chest. Now, I have heard of some very good medicine, and I would go and buy some to make you well, if I were not afraid you would be suspicious. As it is, I don't dare go."
"If you will only save my life," Wu Da said, "I'll forgive you everything, and never hold this business against you. And I won't tell Wu Song anything about it, when he comes home. Go and buy the medicine, and save my life."
The woman took a few coins, and went to old woman Wang's, to make it appear as though she had asked her neighbour to go and buy it. When she came back, she showed the medicine to her husband. "This will soon cure you," she told him. "The doctor says you must drink it during the night, and cover yourself with one or two blankets to make you sweat. Then go to sleep, and tomorrow you will be able to get up."
"Splendid," Wu Da said. "I am very grateful to you. Don't go to sleep but make up the medicine for me in the middle of the night."
"Go to sleep again," the woman said. "I will bring it to you without fail." It was beginning to grow dark. Jinlian lighted the lamp. Then she went downstairs, put a great cauldron of water on the fire, and dipped a cloth into it. The watchman sounded the third night watch. She put the arsenic into a cup, filled it up with water, and took it upstairs.
"Brother, where is the medicine?"
"Here, underneath the mattress. Please make it for me at once."
Jinlian lifted the mattress, and took the medicine. She put it into a cup, then filled up the cup with the liquid she had brought, stirring it with a silver pin she took from her hair. With her left arm she supported her husband. Then she poured the medicine down his throat. Wu Da drank a mouthful.
"Sister," he said, "this medicine is very nasty."
"We are only trying to make you well. Don't be put off by the bitter taste."
Wu Da drank again, and the woman emptied the cup down his throat. She lowered him on to the bed again, herself got down from it. Wu Da groaned.
"Sister, I have taken the medicine but the pain in my belly feels worse, worse. Oh, I can't bear it."
Jinlian took two coverlets from behind his head, and pulled them entirely over his head.
"I can't breathe," Wu Da cried.
"It is what the doctor told me to do. It will make you sweat, and you'll be better much sooner."
Wu Da again tried to speak, and Jinlian was afraid he might struggle. She leaped upon the bed and, riding astride his body, pressed down the bedclothes so that he could not move at all.
His lungs were fried in boiling oil, his liver and bowels burned with fire,
His heart was pierced as by a butcher's knife, his belly stirred as by a sword's sharp edge.
Then froze his body to an icy cold, the seven openings all streamed with blood.
Through clenched teeth his three spirits sped to the city of ghosts.
From his parched throat his seven souls fled to the watchtower of Hell.
Thus to the ghosts of all the poisoned deep in Hades
Was joined another,
And in the world of living none was left
To hinder wantonness.
Wu Da groaned twice, and gasped for breath. Then his bowels burst, and he died.
Jinlian pulled down the bedclothes. Wu Da's teeth were tight clenched, and blood streamed from the seven openings. She was frightened and, getting down from the bed, knocked on the wall. When old woman Wang heard the knocking, she came to the back door and coughed. Jinlian went downstairs and opened the door.
"Is it all over?" the old woman asked.
"Over? Yes, it is over. My hands and feet fail me, and I can do no more." "What is the matter with you?" the old woman said. "I'll help you." She rolled up her sleeves, took a tub of boiling water and put a napkin in it. Then she took them upstairs and gathered up all the bedclothes. She wiped Wu Da's lips, and cleaned away the blood from the seven openings. Then she piled the clothes on his body and, step by step, the pair of them carried him downstairs. There, they took an old door, and lifted the corpse onto it. They combed his hair and put a hat on his head, dressed him, and put shoes and socks upon his feet. They covered his face with a piece of white silk, and set clean bedclothes over him. Then they went upstairs again, and straightened the place. Old woman Wang went home, and Jinlian pretended to mourn for Wu Da, crying, "Husband! Husband!"
Readers, though there are many women in the world, they have but three ways of lamenting. Sometimes they weep and sob at the same time; sometimes they sob and do not weep; and sometimes they weep and do not sob. Jinlian sobbed for half the night but not a tear accompanied her sobbing.
Next morning, just before dawn, Ximen Qing came to hear how the thing had gone. Old woman Wang told him all about it. He gave her some silver to pay for the coffin and the funeral expenses, and they called Jinlian to discuss the arrangements. When she came, she said to Ximen Qing:
"Wu Da is dead, and you are all I have in the world. All I have done, I have done for you. You must not, some day, cast me aside like a woman's hairnet that is no more needed."
"There is no fear of that."
"But what if ever you change your mind?"
"If I do, may I have the place that now is Wu Da's."
The old woman interrupted them. "There is one thing that must be attended to at once. We must have him put in his coffin without any delay. The coroner's officers might see that there is something wrong, especially He the Ninth, who is a smart man. He might even refuse to put Wu Da in his coffin."
"There will be no trouble from that quarter," Ximen said. "I will speak to He the Ninth. He will do anything I wish,"
"In that case," the old woman said, "you had better go and speak to him at once. Don't waste a moment." So Ximen Qing set out to find He the Ninth.
The sun, the moon, the stars, all cast their shadows
We cannot reach them.
The multitude of happenings that have no roots save in themselves,
Comes into being.
The herons are behind the clouds
We see them only when they fly.
The parrot is hidden in the willow tree.
We hear him only when he speaks.

*

When Ximen Qing left the old woman's house, it was broad daylight. Old woman Wang went out and bought a coffin, some paper offerings, incense, candles and paper money. When she came back, she lighted a lamp, and set it before Wu Da's body. The neighbours came to offer their condolences, and Pan Jinlian covered her lovely face and pretended to sob.
"How did the gentleman die?" the neighbours asked.
"There was something amiss with his heart, and, although we never expected anything like this, he got worse and worse and at last we saw that he could not get better. Last night, about the third watch, he died." Jinlian pretended to sob.
The neighbours thought that there was something mysterious about the manner of this man's death but they did not venture to ask any more questions. They consoled Jinlian. "The dead are dead," they said, "but the living must live in peace. Do not grieve so much, Lady. It is too hot."
Jinlian thanked them, and they went away. Old woman Wang had the coffin brought, and went to see He the Ninth, the undertaker. She made all the arrangements, not only for the funeral but for the household generally. She went to the Temple of Eternal Felicity and asked for two choirs of monks to come that night and sing a dirge for the departed.
He the Ninth sent some of his assistants in advance to set everything in order, and it was some time before he sauntered along himself. At the entrance to Amethyst Street, he met Ximen Qing.
"Where are you going, old Ninth?" Ximen said.
"I am just going to perform the last offices for Wu Da, the cake seller," said He the Ninth.
"Wait a moment, I want to speak to you." He the Ninth went with Ximen Qing till they came to a small wineshop at the corner of the street, and there they went into a small room.
"Take the upper seat, old Ninth," Ximen said.
"Who am I," said Ho, "that I should take the liberty of being seated in your presence?"
"Don't stand on ceremony, old Ninth; please sit down." They argued politely for a while, and then took their places. Ximen Qing ordered the waiter to bring a bottle of good wine. Refreshments were set out, and the wine warmed. He the Ninth wondered what was to come. "Ximen Qing has never taken wine with me before," he said to himself. "I wonder what he wants." They drank together for a long time. At last Ximen took from his sleeve a piece of pure silver, and put it down on the table before his companion.
"Old Ninth," he said, "do not think this too poor a present. I will express my thanks more worthily tomorrow."

"I have done nothing for you, Sir." He the Ninth said, making a reverence. "How can I take your silver? Any matter that you may care to entrust to me will naturally receive my most careful attention."
"Old Ninth," Ximen said, "don't behave as though you were a stranger. Please take it."
"Tell me what I can do for you," He the Ninth said.
"Only this. You are going to see about the disposal of Wu Da's body and, of course, his people will pay you for what you do there. But if in the course of your duties you should happen to notice anything, pay no attention but cover him up with the bedclothes. That is all."
"I expected you to ask something really important," He the Ninth said, "and it is nothing more than this. It will be no trouble, and I couldn't think of taking your money."
"If you won't accept my money, I take it that you refuse to do this for me."
He the Ninth was aware of Ximen Qing's influence in official circles, and hesitated to offend him. He could not refuse to accept the money. They drank several more cups of wine, then Ximen Qing said to the waiter: "Put this down to my account, and come to my shop tomorrow for the money." They went downstairs and left the inn. As they took leave of one another, Ximen Qing said:
"Old Ninth, don't forget what I have told you but not a word must be said about this. Later on, I will show my appreciation more tangibly." He walked away.
He the Ninth pocketed the silver. "I don't know what all this means but it is evidently something to be kept quiet. Anyhow, here is the silver and if, as I expect, Wu Song has a few questions to ask when he comes back, I can produce it as evidence." A little later, he said to himself, "I need some money very badly just now, so I had better use this. When Wu Song comes back, I must think of something else." He came to Wu Da's house, where his men were all waiting for him at the door. Old woman Wang was also waiting anxiously.
"What did Wu Da die of?" He the Ninth said to his men.
"His wife says he suffered from pains at the heart, and died," his men said. He the Ninth pulled up the lattice and went in.
"We have been waiting a very long time for you," old woman Wang said, "and the Master of the Yin Yang has been here half a day. Why are you so late, old Ninth?"
"I had some business to attend to. That made me late."
Jinlian, wearing plain clothes, with a white covering on her head, sobbed as though her heart were breaking. "Do not grieve so, Lady," He the Ninth said. "Your husband is already on his way to Heaven."
"My sorrow is greater than I can bear," Jinlian said, drying her eyes. "My husband suffered from his heart and, after only a few days' illness, he died and left me inconsolable."
He the 9th looked the woman up and down. "I've often heard people speak of Wu Da's wife," he said to himself, "but this is the first time I've seen her. So this is the lady Wu Da married. Ximen Qing's getting good value for his ten taels of silver." He went to the bed and examined the body. By this time, the Master of the Yin Yang had finished his ritual, so He the 9th pulled aside the mortuary emblems and removed the white silk. He stared. Wu Da's fingers were green and his lips purple; face was yellow, and eyeballs protruded. The undertaker saw at once that a crime had been committed.

The two coroner's assistants who were standing to either side asked him, "Why is it that his face is purple, there are toothmarks on his lips, and signs of bleeding around his mouth?"
"Don't talk such nonsense!" said Ho the Ninth. "The weather's been extremely hot the last couple of days. A certain amount of deterioration is unavoidable under the circumstances."
He then proceeded, hugger-mugger,[8] to go through the motions of a formal examination of the corpse, presided over the encoffining, and directed his subordinates to drive the two "longevity nails" into either side of the lid of the casket.
Dame Wang did her best to expedite the proceedings and when they were finished produced a string of cash for Ho the Ninth and his men and sent them on their way.
"When will the interment take place?" he asked.
"The lady of the house," replied Dame Wang, "wants the funeral procession to take place on the third day, after which the body will be cremated outside the city wall."
The coroner's assistants then went their separate ways.
That evening the woman laid on a feast and invited guests. The second day four monks were engaged to recite sutras. Early on the morning of the third day, during the fifth watch, the coroner's assistants came to carry the coffin. There were also a few neighbours from the locality who put on mourning and joined in the funeral procession.
The woman donned her mourning attire, sat in a sedan chair, and all along the way continued the charade of loudly bewailing the loss of her provider. When they arrived at the crematorium outside the city walls a fire was ignited, the coffin, along with Wu the Elder's corpse, was completely incinerated, and his bones were scattered in the pond provided for that purpose.
It so happens that the refreshments provided for the guests at the funeral ceremony that day were all paid for by Hsi-men Ch'ing.
When the woman returned home she set up a spirit tablet in the upstairs room on which were inscribed the words "Spirit Tablet of My Deceased Husband, Wu the Elder." In front of the spirit tablet she lit a glass lamp, hung up some gilded funeral streamers, and made offerings of paper money, imitation gold and silver ingots, and the like.
That day when Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman got together they sent Dame Wang back to her own home. The two of them then went upstairs and enjoyed themselves to their hearts' content. It was no longer the way it had been in Dame Wang's teashop when they had been confined to the furtive pleasures of:
Snitching chickens and filching dogs.[7]
Now that Wu the Elder was dead there was no one in the house to hinder them and they were able to:
Give free rein to their desires, and
Sleep together all night long.[9]
At the outset Hsi-men Ch'ing had been worried that the neighbours would realize what was going on, so he had always made a point of sitting around in Dame Wang's place for a while to keep up appearances. But now that Wu the Elder was dead he brought his body servant with him and went straight into the woman's house through the back door.
From this time on, he and the woman were inseparable.
Passion pervaded their breasts;
Their mutual love was like glue.[9]
He often stayed over with her for three or five nights in a row without going home. As a result, the members of his household, both high and low, were:
All at sevens and eights,
and became increasingly unhappy about the situation.
It so happens that the allure of feminine beauty ensnares men in such a way that:
Where there is initial success,
There will be ultimate disaster.[10]
There is a lyric to the tune "Partridge Sky" that testifies to this:
With lustful daring as big as the sky they can no longer control themselves;
Their passions deep, their love fast, the two are inseparable.[11]
In their greed for pleasure they no longer care whether they live or die;
When infatuated who bothers to engage in self-cultivation?
As affection grows deeper,
The passions cloy;
The greater the love, the more long-lasting the resentment.
If one wished to dispel the enmity between the states of Wu and Yüeh;[12]
Earth might age and Heaven waste away before it could be accomplished.
Light and darkness alternate swiftly;
The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.

"Why is his face purple?" the two assistants asked. "What is the cause of these teeth marks and the blood on his lips?"
"Don't be silly," He the Ninth said. "It is very hot. How can you expect a corpse not to alter?" The men put the body into the coffin and nailed it up with two longevity nails. Old woman Wang asked He the Ninth to give his men a thousand cash between them.
"When is the funeral to be?" the undertaker asked. "The lady says," old woman Wang told him, "that we'll take the body outside the city wall to be burned, three days hence." He the Ninth went away. That night, Jinlian prepared wine for the funeral supper, and the next day four monks came and read the funeral service.
On the third day at the fifth watch the bearers came to carry the coffin, and some of the neighbours followed behind. Jinlian, dressed in mourning clothes, seated herself in a sedan chair and, all the way along the street, pretended to bemoan her husband. At last they came to an open place outside the city. Here the funeral pyre was, and word was given for the fires to be lighted and the coffin burned. Soon everything was consumed and the ashes thrown into a pond. All the fees at the temple were paid by Ximen Qing.
The woman returned home, and, in the upper room, set up a tablet with the words "In Memory of Wu Da, my beloved husband." Before it she placed a lamp, golden flags, paper money, and ingots of imitation gold and silver. That day, she sat with Ximen Qing and bade the old lady go home. So these two enjoyed each other's company without hindrance, not as before at the house of old woman Wang, where their pleasure had been as uncertain as that of a chicken thief. Now Wu Da was dead they were alone in the house. They were able to spend the whole night together without thought of consequences. At first, Ximen Qing was afraid the neighbours might discover what was going on, and he used to go to old woman Wang's house, wait there for a little while, and then go to Jinlian's back door. But afterwards they seemed to find it almost impossible to separate, and for three or five nights at a time he would not go home. His household was at sixes and sevens, and everybody was unhappy. The days passed quickly, the sun and moon crossed and re-crossed like a weaver's shuttles.

026
Coroner Uncle Ho attends the funeral & Steals Bones from the Funeral Pyre

When Coroner Ho fell to the ground, his assistants hurried to raise him. "He's been possessed by an evil spirit," Grandma Wang asserted. "Bring water, quick!" She sprayed two mouthfuls in his face. He stirred, and gradually revived somewhat. "Take him home," she directed. "They can decide what to do."
Using an old door as an improvised stretcher, two assistants carried Coroner Ho back to his house. His family received him and put him to bed. His wife burst into tears. "All smiles he was when he left! To come home like this! Who knew he'd be taken by an evil spirit!"
She sat on the edge of his bed and wept. Ho saw that his assistants had gone and that he and his wife were alone. He nudged her with his foot. "I'm all right," he said softly. "Don't worry. On my way to inspect Wu's body for en-coffining, at the entrance to his street I met Ximen Qing who has a medicinal drug shop in front of the county office. He treated me to wine and gave me ten ounces of silver, saying: 'Put a cover over everything when you inspect the corpse.' I went to Wu's place. I could see that his wife was not a good person, and I became suspicious. I opened the shroud. Wu's face was purple. There was blood in his ears, eyes, nose and mouth. He had bitten his lips. Obviously, he had been poisoned. I was going to announce this but then I thought—he has nobody to stand up for him; if I offend Ximen Qing I'll only be stirring a hornets' nest. I was going to let it go and approve the en-coffining. But then I remembered that Wu has a brother—Constable Wu who beat a tiger to death on Jingyang Ridge. He's the sort who could kill a man without batting an eye. Sooner or later he's coming home, and then this whole thing is going to blow up!"
"Just the other day I heard someone say: 'Yunge, the son of Old Qiao in the rear lane, went with Wu the Elder to Purple Stone Street to nab adulterers. There was a terrific row in the teashop!' " mused Ho's wife. "So that's what it was! You go on with your investigation. What's so hard about that? Get your assistants to approve the encoffining, and find out when the funeral will be. If they keep the body at home till Wu Song returns and then bury it, there won't be any complications. If they bury it now, let them, for the time being. But if they're going to cremate it, something surely is wrong. You attend the ceremony, and take a couple of bones from the pyre when no one is looking. These, plus the ten ounces of silver, will be important proof. If Wu Song doesn't ask any questions when he comes home, you say nothing. You won't be scraping any skin off Ximen Qing's nose, and we'll dine well on his money."
"You're a good wife and a very clever one!"
Ho got up and instructed his assistants. "I've been taken ill and can't go to Wu's place. You see to the encoffining. Find out when the funeral is to be and let me know immediately. Whatever money they give you, divide fairly among yourselves. If they offer you anything for me, don't accept."
The assistants presided over Wu being placed in his coffin. When the casket and memorial tablet were set properly in position, they returned and reported to Ho. "His widow says they're going to cremate him three days from now outside the city." They divided the tip among themselves and left.
"It's just as you predicted," Ho confided to his wife. "I must go and get those bones!"
At the urging of Grandma Wang, Golden Lotus kept vigil by the coffin all night. The following day, four monks were hired to chant prayers. On the third morning the coroner's assistants arrived to serve as pall-bearers. Several of the neighbours accompanied the funeral cortege. The widow, dressed in mourning, wept the loss of the family bread-winner all the way to the cremation grounds in the outskirts of the city. She directed the attendants to light the funeral pyre. Coroner Ho made his appearance with a string of paper gold ingots. Grandma Wang and Golden Lotus greeted him.
"How fortunate that you've recovered!"
"I owe Wu the Elder for a tray of buns he sold me several days ago. I thought I'd give him this for his journey."
"What an honest man," said Grandma Wang.
Ho ignited the paper sacrificial money and helped burn the coffin.
"You're very kind," said the two women. "When we get home we'll show our thanks more adequately."
"I'm only trying to make myself useful," said Ho. "You ladies needn't bother. Why not look after the neighbours waiting in the rest hall? I'll attend to things here."
At his persuasion, the two women left the pyre. He poked among the ashes, picked out two pieces of bone and doused them in the pool specially used for that purpose. They were flaky and black. He concealed them on his person, then joined the gathering in the rest hall. Soon the coffin was completely consumed. The flames were extinguished, the bones removed and cooled in the pool. The neighbours departed and Ho returned home with the samples he had taken.
On a sheet of paper he wrote the date and the names of those who had attended the cremation. He wrapped the paper around the silver bar, and put them both in a cloth sack that he hid in his house.
When Golden Lotus got home, she set the memorial tablet before the partition wall on the ground floor. It read:

In Memory of Wu the Elder, my Departed Husband.

Before the tablet, she lit a glass lamp. Inside the room, she hung scripture pennants, sacrificial paper money and ingots, and funeral ribbons. But upstairs everyday she sported with Ximen. This was much better than their furtive meetings in Grandma Wang's house, for no one could see them, and they could spend the whole night together whenever they wished. There wasn't a single neighbour on all of Purple Stone Street who didn't know about it. But they were afraid of the knavish violent Ximen, and no one dared interfere. "Ecstasy begets tragedy, from misery good fortune springs." Time quickly passed. More than forty days elapsed. Wu Song carried out the assignment given him by the county magistrate and escorted the cart to the relative's home in the Eastern Capital and delivered the letter and the crates. He spent a few days looking around the busy streets while awaiting the written reply, then returned to Yanggu with his men. The whole mission had taken exactly 2 months.
It was the end of winter when Wu Song had departed. When he returned it was the start of the third lunar month. He had felt uneasy in his mind all the time he was away, and he was anxious to see his brother. But first he delivered the reply to the magistrate.
The official was very pleased. After reading the letter that said that the valuables had been delivered safely, he rewarded Wu Song with a large silver ingot, and wined and dined him. That goes without saying.
Wu Song went to his quarters, changed his clothes, shoes and stockings, put on a fresh head kerchief, locked his door, and hurried to Purple Stone Street. Alarmed neighbours on both sides of the thoroughfare broke into a sweat. They said in an undertone: "Here comes trouble! This big stalwart won't just let the matter rest! Something bad is bound to happen!" Wu Song raised the door curtain and entered. The first thing he saw was the tablet with the inscription:

In Memory of Wu the Elder, My Departed Husband

Shocked, he stared. "Can I believe my eyes?" he thought. "Sister-in-law," he called, "I'm back. It's me, Wu Song." Ximen was asleep after frolicking with Golden Lotus upstairs and had a long nightmarish vision.

Now when Mr. Ho fell to the ground, his assistants rushed to help him, and Mrs. Wang said, "He's having a fit. Quickly, get some water!" After two mouthfuls had been administered, Mr. Ho began to stir and gradually regained consciousness. Mrs. Wang said: "Take Mr. Ho home, we can arrange this matter later." Two of the assistants carried him home, using a door as stretcher. All his family, young and old, came out to meet them and he was put to bed and went to sleep. His wife wept. "He was in the best of humours when he went out," she sobbed. "And now look what sort of a state he comes back in. I've never known him to have one of these fits before."

But as she sat there crying at the bedside, Uncle Ho, having made sure that the assistants were out of earshot, nudged her with his foot and said: "You don't need to worry; there's nothing wrong with me. On the way to Wu Da's to lay out the body, just at the entrance to his street, I met Xi-men Qing — you know, his Nibs, the one that has the medicine shop in front of the government offices. He treated me to a cup of wine and then gave me ten taels of silver and said, 'When you lay out the body, just make sure everything's properly covered, will you?' Well when I got to the house, I could see the wife was not a good sort of person, so I was already practically certain something was wrong. And when I took off the shroud and looked at the body, I found the face was dark purple, blood had seeped out of all the apertures, and the lips bore the marks of his own teeth. I was convinced he'd died of poisoning. I would have announced this but then I thought, no one's going to stick up for the Midget, and I would only be making an enemy of his Nibs. Obviously I didn't want to stir up a hornet's nest. So the best thing to do was turn a blind eye and let them get on with the funeral. But then, the Midget has a younger brother, the one who killed the tiger on Jingyang Pass the other day and was made a captain. He's the sort that could kill a man without batting an eyelid. Sooner or later he's going to come back, and that could mean big trouble."

His wife said: "I also heard that the other day the Young'un — old Qiao's son, you know, who lives in one of those back alleys — went to Redstone Road to help Wu Da set a trap for his wife's lover and caused a commotion in the teahouse. That must have something to do with it. You'd better question the Young'un, discreetly of course. Actually, this business shouldn't be too difficult to manage. Just get your assistants to go and deal with the body and find out when they're going to hold the funeral. If they're going to keep the coffin in the house till Wu Song comes back, then it's all perfectly above board. Even if they want to take it out for burial immediately, let them. But suppose they plan to cremate it, then there's something fishy. When the time for the ceremony comes, you'd better find a time when no one's looking and pinch two pieces of bone. Put them together with the ten taels of silver and you'll have evidence. If Wu Song doesn't ask any questions when he comes back, then forget about it. We won't have upset his Nibs and we'll have made a little profit for ourselves into the bargain."

"I've a wonderful wife," Uncle Ho said, "how clever she is!" He called his assistants and said to them: "I can't go myself because I have these fainting fits. So you must go and see about the body. Ask them when the funeral is going to be, and then come back and tell me. If they give you any silver or silk, you can share it amongst you. But make sure everything's done properly. If they give you money or silk for me, don't accept it."

The assistants went to Wu Da's, as instructed, to oversee the business of putting the body in the coffin and positioning it correctly, and then returned to inform Mr. Ho: "The mistress of the house says the funeral will be in three days' time and the body will be taken and cremated outside the town." They left after dividing up the money.

Uncle Ho said to his wife: "It's just as you predicted. I'll have to find the right moment to go along and take those bones."

Meanwhile Mrs. Wang had been busying herself: she told Jinlian to watch over the body all night and invited four monks on the second day to recite Buddhist scriptures. Early on the third day the coroner's assistants arrived to carry out the coffin. There were also a number of neighbours and local people to see the dead man off. Jinlian followed, dressed in mourning and shedding false tears for her late husband. When they arrived at the cremation ground outside the town, the fire was lit. At this moment Uncle Ho appeared, carrying some paper money. Mrs. Wang and Jinlian welcomed him, saying: "Mr. Ho, we're so glad to see you're better."

"I bought a basket of bread off Mr. Wu the other day," Ho said, "and I hadn't paid him. So now I've brought this paper money to burn with him."

"What a conscientious person you are, Mr. Ho!" Mrs. Wang said.

Ho lit the money and burnt it. Then he set about the business of the cremation. Mrs. Wang and Jinlian thanked him. "It's really kind of you to help like this, Mr. Ho. When we go back, we must find a way to show our gratitude."

"It's always a pleasure to be of use," he replied. "Now, why don't you two leave all this to me and go and look after your friends and neighbours in the funeral hall? I'll keep an eye on things for you here."

As soon as they had departed, he took a pair of tongs and picked two pieces of bone out of the fire. He dipped them quickly in the tank reserved for this purpose. They had turned completely black. He hid the bones away and then went and mingled with the crowd in the funeral hall for a while. When the coffin had been consumed by the flames, the fire was put out and all the bones were collected and immersed in the tank, after which the neighbours all went home. Mr. Ho took his two pieces of bone home and wrote out a label recording the exact date and the names of those present at the ceremony and wrapped them together with the money in a canvas bag which he stored in his house.

When Jinlian returned home, she set up a memorial tablet in front of the niche for the ancestors' spirits, bearing the words: "In memory of Wu Da, my late husband." She placed a glass lamp before the altar and decorated it with Buddhist invocations, paper gold, pieces of gold and silver, coloured paintings and suchlike. From now on, she and her lover could disport themselves freely in the bedroom everyday; it was no longer as formerly when they were obliged to steal their pleasure furtively in Mrs. Wang's parlour, for now there was absolutely no one in the house to hinder them. They could stay together the whole night if they wished. Often his Nibs would not return home for four or five nights on end. Of course no one in his household liked this state of affairs. And in the end such womanizing can only ruin a man. Catastrophe inexorably approaches. As the poem says:

Who love's delights can view with enlightened eyes
Knows luck in love is actually a curse.
To marry a woman plain as daily rice
Will shield your heart from shocks and spare your purse.

So now all day long his Nibs and Jinlian played undisturbed, leading a life of total debauchery, quite unconcerned about what people might think. For by now, not one of the neighbours, far or near but knew everything. Since they were all scared of his Nibs, however, and knew what a crook he was, no one dared to meddle.

Nevertheless, as the proverb says: "Pleasure contains the seeds of sadness, in misfortune relief is born." Time passed quickly and soon over a month had gone by. Wu Song, in accordance with the governor's instructions, had escorted the convoy to the residence of the governor's relative in the Eastern Capital, delivering the letter and handing over the baskets and boxes. He had spent a few days looking round the city, while he waited for the reply, and then with his party set out for Yanggu again. The whole journey, there and back, had lasted about two months: it was early spring when he started, and here he was returning at the beginning of summer. Even during the journey something already made him feel uneasy. He felt somehow both a physical and a mental disquiet. On arrival he would have liked to go and see his brother at once but first he had to report to the government office and deliver the reply.

The governor expressed great satisfaction. When he had read the letter, and learnt that the delivery of the valuables had all gone without a hitch, he rewarded Wu Song with a large silver ingot and entertained him with a banquet. Of this no more.

Finally Wu Song went back to his room, and changed his clothes, shoes and socks. He put on a new headdress and, locking the door behind him, headed for Redstone Road. When the neighbours on both sides saw Wu Song was back they had such a shock the palms of their hands became sticky with sweat. "Look out for domestic storms now!" they whispered to each other. "If he's back, don't expect him to stay quiet, a firebrand like that! He's bound to raise hell!"

Meanwhile, Wu Song had arrived at the door. When he drew back the curtain and walked in, the first thing he saw was the altar with the plaque bearing the scant inscription "In memory of my husband, Wu Da." He was dumbfounded. At first, he stared in horror, wondering if there was something wrong with his eyes. Finally, he called out: "Sister-in-law, it's me, Wu Song." At this moment, his Nibs and Jinlian were asleep upstairs after having made love and Nibs was having a long nightmarish vision.

When He Jiushu saw these marks he fell down in a faint and the corpse burners rushed in and lifted him up. Grandma Wang called out, "He has been made sick by some poison! Bring some water!" She got the water herself and taking it in her mouth spurted it over He Jiushu's face. Slowly he recovered consciousness. Grandma Wang then told the corpse burners to take him home. They took a leaf of door, placed him on it, and carried him off. His people received him and placed him on a bed where he went to sleep.

His wife cried and asked, "He went out this morning laughing and in good spirits. How is it that he returns like this? He has never had such an attack as this before." She sat at the side of the bed sobbing very bitterly. He Jiushu opened his eyes and seeing that the corpse burners had all gone he then explained all that had happened and told his wife that the corpse showed signs of poisoning. "But I did not say anything as I was also afraid there was no man there who would take the matter up. If I had said anything would it not have been like disturbing a wasp, and getting stung? If I had stupidly sanctioned the corpse being put in the coffin then I should have had to face his younger brother, Wu Song, the Inspector who killed a tiger on Jingyang Ridge, and who can kill men without moving an eyelash. When he returns there is bound to be a row."

"I heard a man say a few days ago that the boy, Yun Ge, had assisted Wu the Elder in an endeavor to catch the adulterer in a tea-house on Zishi Street," said his wife. "It must have been connected with this case. You had better go and cross-examine him. At present there is no difficulty, and you can just allow the corpse burners to put the corpse in the coffin, and they can get their instructions from the wife as to when the funeral will take place. If they postpone the funeral until Wu Song returns we can assume that everything is really above-board. Even if they bury the dead before he arrives we need not worry. But if they arrange for the body to be cremated then indeed we may expect that there has been something strange. You can attend the funeral without creating any suspicion, and after the cremation you can get some bones which, and together with those ten taels of silver will be very important proofs. If Wu Song does not make any inquiries then Ximen Qing will not 'lose face,' and everything will be finished."

"A wise wife in the home I have," said He Jiushu. "You see things quite clearly." Forthwith he told the corpse burners that he was sick and they themselves could go and dress the body, and ask Pan Jinlian when the funeral would take place. They must report to him what she said. If she gave them money they could divide it equally among themselves but if she wanted to give him money he would not accept it.

The corpse burners went to Pan Jinlian's house, and duly dressed the body. After everything had been arranged they returned to He Jiushu, and told him that Jinlian had said that the funeral would take place after three days, and they were to cremate the body outside the town. They then divided the money, and departed.

He Jiushu said to his wife, "What you said has come true, and I will go to the funeral and get the bones as you suggested."

During the night Grandma Wang had repeatedly urged Jinlian to stay with the dead. The next day she got four monks to intone their prayers. On the third day the corpse burners came to carry away the coffin, and many of the neighbours followed in the procession. Jinlian was in her white mourning clothes, and on the way she pretended to bewail her loss. When outside the town they came to the crematorium, where the attendants were told to get the fire ready. There they saw He Jiushu with paper joss money waiting for them, and Grandma Wang and that woman Jinlian spoke to him saying, "We are glad to see that you are better."

"Some days ago I bought some cakes from Wu the Elder and was worried because I had not paid him, so I decided to come to his funeral and pay this paper money to his spirit."

"How honest you are!" said Grandma Wang.

When He Jiushu had burnt his offering, he told Jinlian that the men were now ready for the cremating. The ladies thanked him for his trouble to which he replied that he was only too pleased to be able to do some assistance. He then suggested that they might retire to the guest room in the adjoining temple and entertain the neighbours. He would attend to the other part of the business. When they had gone he supervised the burning of the corpse, and when it was over he took two bones and dipped them in a pool of water near at hand. He saw that they were quite black. After hiding the bones he went to the guest room of the temple, and joined in the general conversation. After a time the corpse, burners gathered the bones of the body and cooled them in the pool of water. At last all the neighbours had left on their way home. He Jiushu took the two bones home, wrapped them in paper, and recorded carefully on a paper the date, and also the names of the neighbours who had been to the funeral. He then wrapped them along with the silver in a bundle, and put them carefully away in the house.

Upon returning home Pan Jinlian erected a tablet in the front room, and wrote on it the characters: "In memory of the late Wu the Elder." She then placed a glass lamp in front of the mourning curtain and hung there much paper joss money, gold and silver imitations. But everyday she received Ximen Qing in her bedroom. Previously at Grandma Wang's place there had always been need for caution but now in her own house there was not the least cause for any restraint, and Ximen Qing could stay there all night. All the neighbours knew what was going on but they were all so afraid of Ximen Qing's power and influence that they dared not say a word about it. There is a saying, "Extreme pleasure is followed by sorrow; extreme sorrow must be followed by something better."

Now let us turn to Wu Song. Time passes with great speed. He duly reached the Eastern Capital, and presented the magistrate's letter and the presents to the latter's relative in accordance with the orders he had received. After doing this he had several days of leisure, and spent them strolling about the streets. Then he received the reply, and departed for Yanggu County. Altogether, his journey there to and fro, had taken about two months. When he had left it was the middle of winter but upon his return it was the beginning of spring. On the return journey he did not feel easy in his mind, and was anxious to get back and see his elder brother again. Upon entering the town he went straight to the yamen, to present the reply, and the magistrate was much pleased to see him. The magistrate reading the letter, knew that all the presents had been delivered, and he rewarded Wu Song with an ingot of silver, and entertained him with wine and food.

Upon reaching his lodging Wu Song changed his clothes, shoes, and socks, and put on a new turban. He then locked the door, and left for his brother's in Zishi Street.

The neighbours on all sides were all rather upset at seeing Wu Song coming back. They whispered to one another. "Now trouble will arise within the doors but what will be the end of it? There will certainly be some trouble."

Upon reaching the house he lifted the door screen and entering he saw the mourning curtain and the tablet with the inscription, "In memory of the late Wu the Elder," at which he was dumbfounded. He said to himself, "Surely my eyes are deceiving me." He then called out, "Sister-in-law, I've returned." Now Ximen Qing happened to be upstairs with Jinlian and he was having a long nightmarish vision.

027
Dame Wang Fetches Wine & Encounters a Downpour

More than 2 months had now elapsed since Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman first consummated their affair. One day the Dragon Boat Festival, on the fifth day of the fifth month, rolled around. Behold the swaying branches of the green willows hang like emerald threads; the spots of colour formed by the pomegranate blossoms are as red as rouge. Ever so slightly, the breeze disturbs the curtains; in whispering gusts, its coolness invades the doors. Far and near, when the Dragon Boat Festival comes round; in every house, goblets are raised in celebration. Hsi-men Ch'ing was on his way back from a visit to the fair at the Temple of the God of the Eastern Peak[13] when he stopped in at Dame Wang's teashop and sat down. The old woman hastily poured out a cup of tea and asked, "Where're you coming from, sir; and why don't you go over and look in on the young lady?"

"I've been at the temple fair today," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "On a festive occasion like this she's very much on my mind, so I thought I'd come pay her a visit."

"Her mother, old Mrs. P'an, is here today," said Dame Wang. "I doubt if she's left yet. I'll run over there for a look and then report back to you, sir."

When the old lady went over to her neighbour's house by way of the back door she found her drinking wine with old Mrs. P'an, just as she had expected.

As soon as the woman saw who it was she hastened to offer her a seat and said, with a smile, "Godmother, you've arrived in the nick of time. Keep my mother company, and:

If you drink a cup of wine on entering the door,
You'll bear a bonny baby some day."[14]

"I haven't any old man," laughed the old lady, "so how could I produce a baby? But you're young and strong, perfectly fitted to produce one."

To which the woman replied, "As the saying goes:

Young flowers bear no fruit;
It's the old flowers that bear the fruit."

At this, Dame Wang turned to old Mrs. P'an and said, "Just look at the liberties your daughter takes with me. She's calling me an 'old beggar.'[15] But she'll find a use for this 'old beggar' yet."

"She's been sharp-tongued like that ever since she was a child," said old Mrs. P'an. "You've got to make allowances for her, Godmother."

It so happens that Dame Wang, having brought Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman together, and enabled them to consummate their affair, devoted herself, early and late, to running errands for them, going out with the jug to buy wine, and so forth, and was dependent for her living on what she could make out of these transactions.

So she said to Chin-lien's mother, old Mrs. P'an, "This daughter of yours is just as clever as can be. She's a fine woman, make no mistake about it. I wonder what sort of man will have the luck to possess her in the future?"

"Godmother," said old Mrs. P'an, "since you're a matchmaker we must count entirely on you to bring that matter to a happy conclusion."

In the meantime the woman provided another place setting and poured out a cup of wine for her. Dame Wang drank a few cups with them until her face became bright red but she was worried about keeping Hsi-men Ch'ing waiting too long, so she took the first opportunity to tip the woman a wink, said goodbye, and went home.

The woman realized that Hsi-men Ch'ing had come and did her best to expedite her mother's departure. Then she tidied up the room, lit some exotic incense, removed the remains of the repast she had been sharing with her mother, and prepared a brand new supply of wine and delicacies for the entertainment of Hsi-men Ch'ing. When that gentleman appeared on the terrace at the back of the house the woman came down the stairs to meet him, led him upstairs, greeted him with a bow, and offered him a seat.

It so happens that ever since Wu the Elder's death the woman had shown no inclination to wear mourning. She had put her husband's spirit tablet in a corner of the upstairs room and covered it with a sheet of white paper, and she neglected to set any offerings of soup or rice before it. Everyday she dolled herself up, put on bright-coloured clothing, made herself as attractive as possible, and enjoyed herself with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had not visited her for the last two days, so the woman started out by giving him a hard time. "You unfaithful scoundrel! What do you mean by abandoning me like that? You must have found another sweetheart somewhere to think you can just leave me in the cold and neglect to pay any further attention to me."

"One of my concubines died the other day," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and I've been busy with the funeral arrangements for the last two days. Today I went to the temple fair and bought some hair ornaments, jewellery, clothes, and the like for you."

The woman was delighted by this. Hsi-men Ch'ing called in his pageboy, Tai-an, and then took the gifts out of the felt bag he had been carrying and showed them to her one at a time. Not until he was finished did the woman bow in thanks and put them away.

The woman had beaten her stepdaughter, Ying-erh, into such a state of terrified submission that she no longer felt it necessary to conceal anything from her and actually ordered her to serve tea to Hsi-men Ch'ing. The woman herself set the table in order to keep him company while he drank his tea.

"There's no need for you to bother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've already given the money to Godmother to go out and buy wine, meat, appetizers, nuts, and so forth. On a festive occasion like this I wanted to spend a little time with you."

"This was originally prepared for my mother," said the woman, "but I saved enough of it to make a complete meal. If we wait until Godmother gets back it may be quite a while. Why don't we go ahead and start?"

The woman sat down next to Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Cheek to cheek,
Thigh to thigh, and
Shoulder to shoulder,

and they began to drink wine together.

To resume our story, Dame Wang had picked up a basket, taken along an eighteen-ounce steelyard, and gone out into the street to buy wine and meat.

It happened, at that time, to be early in the fifth month, when heavy rains were a frequent occurrence. Though the red sun might appear to dominate the sky, a thunderhead might appear at any moment and release a downpour like an overturned basin. Behold:

Black clouds arise on all sides;
Dark fog immures the far heavens.
With a rushing sound,
It flies along, filling the heavens and blocking out the sun;
With pattering drops,

It beats a tattoo, as it strikes against the leaves of the plantain.
Assailed by a wild wind,
Skyscraping old cypresses
are overturned;
Battered by thunderclaps,
The peaks of Mounts T'ai, Hua, Sung, and Ch'iao are shaken.
It quenches the flames and dispels the heat;
It moistens and nurtures the sprouts in the fields.
It quenches the flames and dispels the heat,
So that beauties are prone to appreciate it.
It moistens and nurtures the sprouts in the fields,
So that travellers are willing to forget the mud.
Truly:
The waters of the Yangtze, Huai, Yellow, and Chi rivers
are newly augmented;
The emerald bamboo and the red pomegranate blossoms are rendered pristine.[16]
The old lady had picked up a bottle of wine, bought a basketful of fish, meat, chicken, goose, vegetables, fruit, nuts, and the like, and was returning along the street when she encountered this downpour. She ducked under the eaves of a house as quickly as she could and wrapped a kerchief around her head but her clothes were completely soaked. She waited a while, until the rain let up a bit, and then raced for home like a cloud scudding before the wind.
Once inside the door, she put the provisions in the kitchen and then went upstairs, where she found the woman and Hsi-men Ch'ing drinking wine together.
"While you and the young lady have been living it up, sir," she said with an ingratiating smile, "just look at what's happened to my clothes. They're completely soaked. I'll have to ask you to replace them for me, sir."
"Just look at the old lady," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Did you ever see such an inveterate scrounger?"
"I'm no inveterate scrounger," said the old lady, "but at the very least, sir, you'll have to provide me with a bolt of aquamarine material."
"Godmother," said the woman, "what you need is some hot wine."
The old lady drank three cups with them and then said, "I'm going down to the kitchen to dry out my clothes."
After she had suited her actions to her words she cut up the chicken and goose, prepared the appetizers, put the fruit and nuts and so forth onto plates and saucers, and set them out in the upstairs room, together with some newly heated wine.
Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman:
Poured out some more of the superior wine,
Shared with each other the rare repast, and Fell to exchanging cups, thigh over thigh.
As he was drinking Hsi-men Ch'ing noticed that there was a p'i-p'a, or balloon guitar, hanging on the wall, and said, "I've heard for some time what a fine musician you are. Today, whatever happens, you'll have to entertain me with a song while I drink my wine."
"I only picked up a few lines when I started to study music as a child," laughed the woman. "I'm really not very good. You mustn't laugh at me, sir."
Hsi-men Ch'ing took the p'i-p'a down from the wall, lifted the woman onto his lap, and watched her as she placed the instrument on her knees:
Deftly extended her slender fingers,
Gently manipulated the icy strings,
and played a languid accompaniment as she sang a song to the tune "Liang-t'ou nan":
Without her headdress, too indolent to perform her toilet,
Her clouds of black silk coiled in a chignon and gleaming over her temples,
She fastens them in place with a slanting gold hairpin.
She calls out, "Maidservant, Open the clothes chest for me,
So I can put on an outfit of plain white silk."
So attired, she rivals Hsi-shih herself in loveliness.
Emerging from her boudoir,
She calls out, "Maidservant,
Roll up the blind for me,
So I can burn a stick of evening incense."[17]
When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he was so delighted he scarcely knew what to do with himself.
Putting an arm around her powdered neck, he gave her a kiss as he praised her performance, saying, "Darling, whoever would have thought you were as smart as all that? Not one of the singing girls I've known in the streets and alleys of the licensed quarter can play or sing as well as you do."
"After all you've done for me," laughed the woman, "I'm content, for the present, to be:
Obedient to your every whim.
Just be sure you don't forget me in the future."
Hsi-men Ch'ing pinched her cheeks and said, "How could I ever forget you, darling?"
The two of them were:
Entranced by the clouds and intoxicated by the rain,[18]
Laughing and joking at each other's expense.
After a while Hsi-men Ch'ing took off one of her embroidered shoes, held it in his hand while he put a little cup of wine in it, and then drank a "shoe cup"[19] for the fun of it.
"My feet aren't as small as all that," said the woman. "Don't make fun of me, sir."
It wasn't long before the two of them began to feel the effects of the wine, whereupon they closed the door of the room, took off their clothes, got into bed, and began to play with each other.
Dame Wang put the crossbar on the front door and joined Ying-erh in the kitchen, where they made short work of the leftovers.
The two lovers in the upstairs room:
Tumbled and tossed like male and female phoenixes,[20]
As inseparable as fish from water,[21]
as they gave themselves over completely to pleasure. The woman's mastery of the arts of the bedchamber was equal to that of any prostitute, and she made every effort to impress in her endeavors to please her partner. Hsi-men Ch'ing, too, was on his mettle and eager to display his spearsmanship, [22] to best advantage. A woman of beauty and a man of talent, both of them were in the prime of life. A poem describes the picture they presented:

In the seclusion of the nuptial chamber the pillow and mat are cool;
The man of talent and woman of beauty approach the climax of their game.
No sooner have they embarked on "dipping the red candle upside down";[23]
Than they suddenly switch to "punting the boat by night."[24]
Rifling its fragrance, "the butterfly nibbles at the calyx of the flower";[25]
Sporting with the water, "the dragonfly darts, now high, now low."
When pleasure reaches its height passions are intense, and feelings know no bounds;
As the mouth of the "divine turtle" disgorges its "silvery stream."[26]

That day Hsi-men Ch'ing dallied in the woman's house until evening fell. As he was about to go home he left behind a few pieces of loose silver [27] to take care of her expenses. The woman did her best to keep him a while longer but to no avail. Hsi-men Ch'ing put on his eyeshades, walked out the door, and departed. After the woman had taken down the blind, closed the front door, and drunk a little more wine with Dame Wang, they went their separate ways. Truly, lingering at the door, she saw young Master Liu upon his way; amid the misty waters and the peach blossoms, he was soon lost to sight.

It was now two months and more since Ximen Qing had first possessed the woman. It was the Dragon Boat Festival. Ximen Qing was on his way back from the Temple of Yue and, calling at the old woman Wang's tea shop, he sat down there. The old woman quickly made him a cup of tea. "Where have you been, sir? Why haven't you been to see your lady?"
"I have just been to the Temple," said Ximen, "and as it is the Summer Festival, I thought of her and came to see her."
"Her mother, old woman Pan, has been here today," the old woman said. "I fancy she is still here but I'll go and find out for you." She went to the back door and found Jinlian drinking wine with her mother. They asked her to sit down.
"Drink a welcoming cup," Jinlian said, smiling, "and have a lovely baby."
"But I have no husband," laughed the old woman. "Where shall I get a baby? You are still young. You're the one to have babies."
"The young tree bears no fruit; but the old tree bears well," Jinlian said, quoting an old saying.
"Do you hear your daughter making fun of me?" the old woman said, turning to Madam Pan. "She calls me old beggar but she'll be glad enough of her 'old beggar' one of these days."
"She has always had a sharp tongue, Stepmother," old woman Pan said, "but you must not pay too much attention to it."
"Yes, indeed, your daughter is as clever as they make 'em. She is a good woman. Some lucky man will snap her up one of these days."
"You are a go-between, Stepmother," old woman Pan said, "and it rests with you." She set out a cup and chopsticks, and Jinlian poured out some wine. The old woman drank several glasses, and her face grew red. She was afraid that Ximen Qing would grow tired of waiting, so she gave a sly wink to Jinlian, said good-bye to them, and went back to her own place.
Jinlian understood that Ximen Qing had come and hurriedly sent her mother away. She tidied the room, burned some fine incense, took away what was left of her mother's food, and prepared some special dishes for Ximen Qing. Then she went down to the back door to meet him.
She took him into the room, made a reverence to him, and sat down. She had given up wearing mourning very soon after Wu Da's death, and had put his tablet aside with a sheet of white paper over it. She never dreamed of putting offerings of soup or food before it. Everyday she painted her face, put on coloured dresses, and looked very charming indeed. Ximen Qing had not been to see her for some days, and she scolded him.
"What a fickle rascal you are! Why have you run away from me? Have you another sweetheart hidden somewhere that you leave me in the cold?"
"I have been very busy these last few days," Ximen said, "but today I have been to the temple to buy you some ornaments, and some pearls and clothes."
This pleased her. Ximen called Daian and, unfastening the package, showed the things one by one to Jinlian. She thanked him and put them away. She no longer troubled to keep the matter secret from Ying'er, who was afraid of being punished, and told her to bring tea for Ximen Qing. She herself laid the table, and then sat down with him.
"You should not take so much trouble for me," he said. "I have given Stepmother some, money to go and buy a few things. Now that the Summer Festival is here, the only thing I want is to sit here with you."
"It was for my mother originally," said Jinlian, "but this is quite fresh. If we wait for Stepmother to come back with her purchases, we shall have to wait a long time. Let's eat some of this." She pressed her cheek close against his, entwined her legs with his, and, side by side, they drank their wine.
The old woman had taken a basket and gone to the street to buy wine and meat. It was the beginning of the Fifth Month, and the rain was incessant. At one moment the sun was bright in the sky, the next it was hidden by black clouds, and there came down a torrent like the emptying of a washbasin.
Lowering clouds gather from the four corners of the sky
A chain of mist binds the far distances.
Xi-la-la. The air is filled with flying drops that veil the sun.
Pit-pit. They beat upon the plantain tree.
The winds blow, and the old juniper tree is uplifted,
Uplifted and overthrown.
Once its topmost branches threatened the sky.
The crashing thunderclaps grow louder,
The mountains of Tai and Song are shaken as by an earthquake,
Yet now the sultry heat is washed away, its heaviness is banished.
The fields of young corn are fresh again
New water races down the four rivers.
The green bamboo and scarlet pomegranate
Are made clean once more.
The old woman had just bought a jar of wine and a basketful of green stuff and fruits, and was walking along the street when the downpour came. She ran under the balcony of a house and tied her kerchief over her head but her clothes were wet through. She waited a while till the rain began to slacken, then rushed home like a flying cloud and set down her wine and meat in the kitchen. Ximen Qing and Jinlian were drinking wine.
"Yes, my Lord and Lady," cried she, laughingly, "you are drinking but look at me! My clothes are drenched. I shall have to have a new dress."
"Oh, you old woman," Ximen said, "you are one of those spirits who always find somebody to throw the blame on."
"I am not a spirit at all," the old woman said, "but you will have to make me a present of a roll of the deepest indigo silk."
"Drink a cup of hot wine, Stepmother," Jinlian said.

The old lady drank three cups of wine with them and then said she must go to the kitchen to dry her clothes. When she had dried them, she made ready chicken, goose, and rice, carving and chopping till all was to her liking, set the other things on plates and dishes, and then took them into the room and warmed the wine. Ximen Qing and Jinlian again poured the wine and, close pressed together, drank from the same glass.
While Ximen was drinking, he saw a lute hanging on the wall. "A long time ago, I was told how well you play. You must play me a tune, and I shall enjoy my wine all the more."
"When I was a small child," Jinlian said, "I learned one or two bits of tunes but none too well. Please do not make fun of me." Ximen took down the lute and made the woman sit on his knee. She placed the lute in her lap and, gently stretching her delicate fingers, slowly plucked the strings and sang in a low sweet voice:
I set no headdress on my brow; my idle hands refused to serve me.
Round and round I furled the silken tresses, black as night, the curls like clouds in shadow.
Golden pins, thrust crosswise, restrained the lowering masses.
"Oh, maiden, open wide the chests," I cried
And dressed in robes of whitest silk
I came forth from my tiring room, glorious as Xi Shi.
"Oh, maiden dear, throw back the lattice for me, come and burn a stick of evening incense."
This song sent Ximen Qing almost into ecstasy. He drew his loved one to him and put his arms about her white neck.
"I never realized how clever you were," he said. "I have often wandered through the haunts of singing girls but never were their songs or music so exquisite as yours."
"It is kind of you to praise me, my Lord. I am ready to do whatever you wish. All I pray is that the time may never come when you forget me."
"How can I forget you?" Ximen cried, as he stroked her soft cheeks. Then, lazily, they played the game of rain and clouds, joking with one another and making merry. Ximen took off one of her embroidered shoes, poured a cup of wine into it, and drank.
"My feet are small enough," cried Jinlian. "Why should you make fun of them?"
Soon they had taken their fill of wine and, shutting the door of the room, they undressed and got onto the bed. Old woman Wang closed the gate, and sat down in the kitchen with Ying'er. Jinlian and her lover turned over and over, like the cock pheasant and his mate, and played as merrily as the fishes in the water. Her skill in the arts of love was a hundred times greater than that of any strumpet, and Ximen Qing himself was no mean performer. They were at the age when a woman's beauty is at its loveliest and a man's vigor at its highest. Youth was theirs.
Ximen Qing spent the whole day at his lover's house, and gave her several taels of silver for household expenses. At last she could not persuade him to stay longer; he put on his eyeshades, and went home. Jinlian pulled down the lattice and fastened the gate, then she and old woman Wang drank wine together, and went their ways.

028

Auntie Hsüeh Proposes a Match with Meng Yü-lou & Ximen Qing meets her, Aunt Yang Angrily Curses Chang the 4th

I play the role of matchmaker and am really rather good at it;
Entirely owing to the assiduity with which I ply my 2 legs.[1]
My lethal lips are practiced at persuading widowers to remarry;
My trenchant tongue is capable of stirring the chaste widow's heart.
Lucky ribbons of festive red constantly adorn my head;
Party favours from wedding feasts are always present in my sleeves.
There is only one thing wrong with what I do:
Half my clients are helped but the other half are ruined.

one day the same Auntie Hsüeh who was constantly to be seen around Hsi-men Ch'ing's household peddling costume jewellery set out with her box of trinkets and looked everywhere for Hsi-men Ch'ing but was unable to find him. Chancing to meet his pageboy, Tai-an, she asked, "Where is your master?"
"Father's in the shop," replied Tai-an, "going over the accounts with Uncle Fu the Second."
It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing's family were the proprietors of a wholesale pharmaceutical business, the hired manager of which was named Fu Ming. His courtesy name was Tzu-hsin, and he was the second sibling in his generation of the family that is why he was referred to as Uncle Fu the Second. Auntie Hsüeh went straight to the door of the shop, pulled the hanging blind aside, and saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing was indeed inside, going over the accounts with his manager. She nodded to him and motioned for him to come outside. On seeing that it was Auntie Hsüeh, Hsi-men Ch'ing immediately abandoned his manager and came out to meet her, the two of them walking to a secluded spot where they could talk in private. Auntie Hsüeh bowed to him with a word of greeting, and Hsi-men Ch'ing asked her what she had to say. "I've come about a match that I'd like to propose to you, sir," said Auntie Hsüeh. "I guarantee she'll tickle your fancy, and she can take the place left by the death of your Third Lady. I've just been in the First Lady's quarters. She bought some of my trinkets and detained me for a cup of tea. I was there for an age but I didn't dare bring up this subject. I thought it would be better if I found you first and broached it directly to you. The young lady in question is someone you probably already know about, sir. She's the legitimate widow of the owner of the Yang family's textile business outside the South Gate, and she's got a tidy sum of money at her disposal. She owns two Nanking beds, with retractable steps; four or five trunks full of clothing for all four seasons, figured gowns and so forth, packed so tightly you can't stick your hand into them; and pearl headbands and earrings, gold jewellery set with precious stones, and gold and silver bracelets and bangles, it goes without saying. In ready cash alone, she has more than a thousand taels of silver at her disposal. And she has two or three hundred bales of fine cotton drill[2] as well. Unfortunately, her husband died far away from home while he was out on the road selling textiles. She has been observing mourning for him for over a year now. She doesn't have any children of her own to worry about, only a young brother-in-law, who's just nine years old. There wouldn't be any point in maintaining her widowhood just for him. Her husband's paternal aunt is trying to persuade her to remarry. This year the young lady's no more than twenty-four or twenty-five. She's tall of stature and good-looking; in fact, when she's properly done up, she's as pretty as a figure on a decorative lantern. She's romantic and quick-witted, just as clever as can be, and as for the ability to take charge of a household, needlework and suchlike feminine accomplishments, backgammon and elephant chess, and so forth, that goes without saying. There's no reason for me to deceive you, sir. Her maiden name is Meng, she's the third sibling in her generation, and she lives on Stinkwater Lane. Also, she's an expert performer on the moon guitar. If you consent to see her, sir, I guarantee you'll hit the bull's-eye with the first arrow.[3] How could anyone be as lucky as you, sir, to get all that dowry and a young lady to boot?"
When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard that the woman could play the moon guitar it struck a responsive note in his heart, so he asked Auntie Hsüeh, "How soon can I arrange to have a look at her?"
"I'll tell you what, sir," said Auntie Hsüeh, "having a look at her is not the first order of business. Right now the senior member of the Yang family is her husband's paternal aunt. There's also a maternal uncle of her husband, named Chang the Fourth but since he's on the distaff side, he's like the meat of the hickory nut: there's always a husk in between.[4] This old lady was originally married to Crooked-head Sun and lives in a house belonging to Eunuch Director Hsü on Half-side Street in the northern quarter of the city. Since Crooked-head died, the old lady has maintained her widowhood for thirty or forty years. She doesn't have any children of either sex and depends on her nieces and nephews for support. "It's too late to do anything about it today but tomorrow I'll come meet you, sir, and we'll go dump the whole proposition in her lap. If you appeal for help, appeal to Chang Liang: if you appoint a general, appoint Han Hsin. [5] The only thing this old lady cares about is money. She knows perfectly well that her nephew's widow is well provided for. She doesn't really care whom she marries as long as she can make a few taels of silver out of it. Promise her a little extra silver, sir, and throw in a bolt of that thin satin you have so much of at home. Then, if you go talk it over with her in person, and present her with a bearer's load of appropriate gifts, you'll knock her over with one blow.[6] If anyone else raises any objections, as long as you've this old lady behind you, there isn't much they'll dare do about it."
This single conversation with Auntie Hsüeh had such an effect on Hsi-men Ch'ing that joy manifested itself about his temples and between his brows; delight spread itself across his cheeks and smiling face.[7] The matchmakers of this world are not really interested in anything but making money for themselves. What do they care whether their clients end up dead or alive? They will describe a marriage prospect that holds no office as an officeholder and a position as concubine as though it were a position as legitimate wife. They are such inveterate liars they would attempt to deceive Heaven itself, and there is no truth whatever to be found in their asseverations. Truly:

Though the matchmaker did her utmost to promote the union;
Meng Yü-lou had already decided to marry a rich man.
Those with affinities will meet though separated by a thousand li;
Those without affinities will miss each other though face-to-face.[8]

That day Hsi-men Ch'ing agreed with Auntie Hsüeh that the next day would be a good time to buy some presents and go to the northern quarter of the city to pay a visit to Aunt Yang. When Auntie Hsüeh finished her spiel she picked up her box of trinkets and departed. Hsi-men Ch'ing went back into the shop and continued to go over the accounts with Manager Fu. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell. The next day Hsi-men Ch'ing rose early and dressed himself to befit the occasion. Then he picked out a bolt of material, bought four trays of preserved fruit, and hired a bearer to carry them. Hsi-men Ch'ing rode on horseback, accompanied by his pageboy, and Auntie Hsüeh led the way straight to the door of Aunt Yang's dwelling in the house belonging to Eunuch Director Hsü on Halfside Street in the northern quarter of the city.
Auntie Hsüeh went in first to alert Aunt Yang to the fact that she had a visitor.
"A man of property from hereabouts," she told her, "is respectfully waiting outside your door. He is interested in discussing a match with the young lady. I told him that you were the senior member of the Yang family and suggested that he should pay you a visit and discuss the matter before I would presume to take him outside the gate to see the lady herself. I brought him along with me today, and he has already dismounted and is waiting outside your door at this very moment."
"Ai-ya!" the old lady exclaimed when she heard this. "Matchmaker, why didn't you let me know ahead of time?"
On the one hand, she ordered her maidservant to sweep the parlour, tidy it up, and brew some good tea, while on the other hand, she said, "Please, invite him to come in."
Auntie Hsüeh lost no time in taking charge of the proceedings. First she had the load of gifts brought in and properly displayed, and it was only after the bearer had been dispatched with his empty containers that she invited Hsi-men Ch'ing to come in.
Hsi-men Ch'ing was wearing a large palmetto hat, a long gown fastened at the waist with a sash, and white-soled black boots. When he entered the door and met the old lady he bowed to her 4 times. Leaning on her staff, the old lady made haste to return his salutation.
Hsi-men Ch'ing would not let her proceed, protesting again and again, "Aunt, please accept my salutation."
The two of them dickered politely for a while until the old lady agreed to accept a half kowtow from him. They then sat down in the positions appropriate for guest and host while Auntie Hsüeh took her place to one side.
"What is the gentleman's name?" the old lady asked.
"I just told you," said Auntie Hsüeh, "but you've already forgotten. This is the Honourable Hsi-men Ch'ing, who is numbered among the most substantial men of property in Ch'ing-ho district. He owns the large wholesale pharmaceutical business on the street in front of the district yamen. He also engages in moneylending to both officials and functionaries. In his home:
The piles of money reach higher than the dipper,
The stores of rotting rice suggest a granary, but he lacks a wife with the ability to take charge of the household. On hearing that the young lady from your family who lives outside the South Gate wishes to remarry, he has come especially in order to discuss this match with you."
"As long as the two of you relatives-to-be are both here," Auntie Hsüeh continued:
"The holes in the water clock let it all spill out;[9]
If you have anything to say, now's the time to say it.
There's no call for you to complain about the lies of us matchmakers. Since you're the senior member of the family on the bride's side, if anyone who had anything to say didn't come talk to you first, Aunt, who else should they talk to?"
"If you wanted to discuss a match with my nephew's widow," the old lady said, "all you needed to do was drop by for a chat. What need was there to go to the trouble of buying all these presents? You put me in a position in which it would be:
Discourteous to refuse, and Embarrassing to accept."
"Worthy Aunt," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'm afraid these presents are hardly worthy of the name."
The old lady bowed to him twice, expressed her gratitude, and had the presents put away, after which Auntie Hsüeh took the trays outside to where the bearer was waiting and then returned to keep them company.
Tea was served, and after they had finished drinking it, the old lady started the conversation by saying, "As far as I'm concerned:
Not to speak up when you ought to is to be a coward.[10] When my nephew was alive he succeeded in amassing a considerable sum for himself, and now that he has, unfortunately, died it has all fallen into the hands of his widow. At the very least she is worth more than a thousand taels of silver. Whether it is your wish, sir, to make her your concubine or your legitimate wife is no concern of mine. All I care about is that a proper sutra-reading should be performed on my nephew's behalf. As his paternal aunt I am related to him by blood; it is not a distaff or marriage relationship. If you were to provide me with the cost of a coffin, it would not be as though I had made any exorbitant demands on you. In return, I'm prepared to hazard whatever face I've got left in this matter. I'll:
Cast myself in the role of a stinking rat;[11]
for the benefit of that old dog, Chang the Fourth, and stick up for the two of you, come what may. After she has been carried over your threshold, sir, if you were to permit her to pay me a visit now and then on birthdays and such occasions, and acknowledge me as a poor relation, I would endeavor not to inflict my poverty upon you."
"Madam," laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can relax on that score. I fully understand everything you've just said. Since you've broached the subject, madam, the cost of a single coffin is nothing to me. Even if it were ten coffins you wanted, I could afford it."
As he spoke, he reached inside the leg of his boot and drew out six ingots of five taels each, making a total of thirty taels of "snowflake" government silver.
Setting these down in front of her, he said, "This may not amount to much, madam but I hope you will use it to buy a cup of tea. In the future, when the bride has been carried over my threshold, I will provide another seventy taels of silver and two bolts of satin toward your funeral expenses. You will always be a welcome guest in my home at any time of the year."
Gentle reader take note: In this world, money is like the brain and spinal cord of man in that it is the one indispensable thing that governs his every move.
When the black pupils of the old vixen's eyes saw the twenty or thirty taels of shiny government silver, she said with an ingratiating smile, "Worthy sir, I don't wish to be thought avaricious but it has always been true that:
If the terms are settled at the outset,
Misunderstandings can be avoided later on."
"Madam," interjected Auntie Hsüeh from the side, "you're being more fastidious than you need to be. Such considerations are quite unnecessary in this case. The honourable gentleman is not that sort of person. After all he:
Sought to make your acquaintance with presents in hand.
You may not know it, madam but even His Honour, the prefect, and His Honour, the district magistrate, consort with him. He is acquainted with people in many walks of life from all over the empire. You're not likely to make much of a dent in his resources."
This single conversation had such an effect on the old lady that she was ready to:
Fart ferociously and pee in her pants;[12]
in her excitement. After she had entertained her guests a while longer and they had drunk a second serving of tea, Hsi-men Ch'ing indicated that he was ready to be on his way. The old lady politely endeavored to detain him but to no avail.
Auntie Hsüeh said, "Since we've been able to see you today, Aunt, and discuss this matter, tomorrow we can proceed to go outside the South Gate and take a look at the young lady."
"There's no need for the gentleman to take the trouble to pay a call in order to size up my nephew's widow," said the old lady. "Matchmaker, just tell her that I said, 'If you don't marry a man like this, what manner of man are you going to marry?' "
Hsi-men Ch'ing said his farewells and got up to go.
"Sir," said the old lady, "I didn't know you were coming, and I was unable to make proper preparations on the spur of the moment. Please forgive me for not offering you anything better."
Leaning on her staff, she accompanied him out the door and saw him several steps along his way before Hsi-men Ch'ing succeeded in persuading her to go back inside. Auntie Hsüeh remained outside to see Hsi-men Ch'ing into his saddle.
"Wasn't I right to propose this way of going about it?" she said. "It's much better to have started out by dumping the whole proposition in the old lady's lap than it would have been to rely on the good offices of anyone else. You go on home, sir," she continued. "I'm going to stay here and have another word with her. We've already agreed to meet and go outside the South Gate together first thing tomorrow."
Hsi-men Ch'ing pulled out a tael's worth of silver and handed it to Auntie Hsüeh to cover the hire of a donkey. After she had accepted the money he got on his horse and went home, while she remained behind at Aunt Yang's house, chatting and drinking wine until dark, before going home herself.
To make a long story short, the next day Hsi-men Ch'ing dressed himself to befit the occasion, slipped his betrothal gifts into his sleeve, and mounted a large white horse. Then, accompanied by his two pageboys, Tai-an and P'ing-an, and by Auntie Hsüeh, riding a donkey, he proceeded outside the South Gate to the door of the Yang family compound on Stinkwater Lane off Hogmarket Street. This establishment consisted of a twenty-four-foot-wide frontage opening onto the street and five interior courtyards, receding along a vertical axis.
Hsi-men Ch'ing reined in his horse at the gate, and Auntie Hsüeh disappeared into the interior for some time before coming out to usher him in. After he had dismounted, the first thing he confronted was a two-story structure housing the main gate that was situated on the south side of the street, facing north. Just inside the gate stood a gray screen-wall. Inside the ceremonial gate that led into the second courtyard the entrance was screened by a hedge of crape myrtle and a fence of woven bamboo splints. The courtyard itself was decorated with pomegranate trees and potted miniature plants. Along a raised platform there stood a row of indigo vats for dyeing and two benches for fulling cloth.
Auntie Hsüeh pushed open the red latticework doors of the eighteen-foot-wide, south-facing reception hall, on the centre of the back wall of which there hung in the place of honour a scroll depicting the Bodhisattva Kuan-yin of the Water Moon, accompanied by her attendant, Sudhana. [13] Landscape paintings by well-known artists hung on the other walls. There was also a marble standing screen, to either side of which stood tall, narrow-necked, bronze vases of the kind used in the game "pitch-pot."[14] All in all:
The chairs and tables were shiny, and

The screens and lattices were posh.
Auntie Hsüeh invited Hsi-men Ch'ing to take one of the seats reserved for distinguished guests and then disappeared into the interior once again.
After a while she came out and whispered in Hsi-men Ch'ing's ear, "The young lady hasn't finished her toilet yet. Please have a seat and wait a little longer, sir."
At this juncture a young servant brought out a cup of tea flavoured with fruit kernels, and after Hsi-men Ch'ing had drunk it, she took the cup and its raised saucer away again.
Auntie Hsüeh, after all, was a matchmaker by profession, so she kept up an animated monologue:
Gesticulating with both hands and feet,[15] for Hsi-men Ch'ing's benefit.
"Aside from Aunt Yang," she said, "the most important person in this family is the young lady. Of course there is her husband's younger brother but he's still a minor and doesn't understand anything. Originally, when her late husband was still running the enterprise, in a single day, not even counting the silver, they sold enough blue cotton cloth of the kind used for making shoes to take in two large basketfuls of copper cash. He used to charge thirty cash a foot for the stuff. I've seen with my own eyes that on a given day they often had to feed as many as twenty or thirty dyers, and everything was managed by the young lady.
"She has two maidservants and a pageboy at her beck and call. The older one, who's fourteen, and already dresses her hair in adult fashion, is called Lan-hsiang. The younger one's just eleven and is called Hsiao-luan. In the future, when she's carried across your threshold, they'll all come with her.
"If I succeed in bringing off this match for you, sir, I hope to be able to take out a mortgage on a couple of rooms in a better location than that out-of-the-way corner in the northern quarter where I'm living now. It's not convenient for me to get to your place from there. When you bought Ch'un-mei last year, sir, you promised me several bolts of muslin that you still haven't given me. I'll forget about that when this is all over if you'll compensate me for both occasions at once.
"On your way in just now, sir," she continued, "you must have noticed those two cabinets for displaying cloth. When Mr. Yang was still alive, I don't know how much money he put into the improvement of the retail shop that opens onto the street. This compound must also be worth seven or eight hundred taels of silver. It contains five interior courtyards and extends all the way back to the street that runs behind it. When she gets married, I'm afraid she'll have to leave it all to her young brother-in-law."
Auntie Hsüeh was still talking when a maidservant came out to summon her. Some time passed and then, lo and behold:
To the tinkling of girdle pendants,
Amid the fragrance of orchid and musk,
the woman herself appeared. She wore a kingfisher blue surcoat of figured silk, emblazoned with a mandarin square that featured an embroidered ch'i-lin,[16] over a wide-cut gown of figured scarlet silk. On her head:
Pearls and trinkets rose in piles;
A phoenix hairpin was half askew.
Hsi-men Ch'ing opened his eyes wide and took a good look at the woman. Behold:
She is tall and slender in build;
Modeled in plaster, carved of jade.
Her figure is neither plump nor thin;
Her stature is neither short nor tall.
On her face, though barely visible,
Are several inconspicuous pockmarks,
That give her an air of natural beauty;
Hidden beneath her skirt,
Are a pair of tiny golden lotuses,
That are well-formed and attractive.
Two gold rings, set with pearls,
Hang low beneath her ears;
A pair of phoenix hairpins,
Juts aslant at either temple.
She has only to move,
In order to make her openwork jade pendants tinkle;
Wherever she sits,
The reek of orchid and musk assails the nostrils.
It is just as though Ch'ang-o has come down from her palace in the moon;
She is exactly like the Goddess of Witches' Mountain descending her jasper steps.[17]
Hsi-men Ch'ing no sooner saw her than his heart was filled with delight. Auntie Hsüeh made haste to hold aside the portiere over the doorway in order to facilitate her entrance. The woman came in and:
Neither correctly nor precisely, bowed and uttered a word of greeting, after which she sat down in a seat directly across from that occupied by her visitor. Hsi-men Ch'ing scrutinized her from head to toe with such intensity that the woman lowered her head.
Then he opened the conversation by saying, "My wife has been dead for some time and I would like to make you my legitimate wife and put you in charge of the household. What do you think of this proposal?"
"How old are you, sir," the woman asked, "and how long has your wife been dead?"
"I'm twenty-seven," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and I was born on the twenty-eighth day of the seventh month, at midnight. Unfortunately my former wife has been dead now for more than a year. I hardly dare ask how old you are, young lady?"
"I'm twenty-nine," the woman replied.
"So you're two years older than I am," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Auntie Hsüeh interjected from the side:
"When the wife is two years older,
Yellow gold never moulders;
When the wife is three years older,
Yellow gold piles up like boulders."[18]
As she was speaking, a young maidservant came in carrying three servings of tea flavoured with candied kumquats in carved lacquer cups inlaid with silver and provided with silver teaspoons in the shape of apricot leaves. The woman got up, brushed away a few drops of water from the rim of the first cup with her slender fingers, and handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing. As he took the proffered cup in his hand, she bowed to him and expressed her good wishes.
Auntie Hsüeh seized the opportunity to step forward and lift the woman's skirt with her hand, revealing:
The upturned points of her tiny golden lotuses,
Barely three inches long,
But half a span in length,
Peeking out beneath her skirt.
She was wearing scarlet shoes that had tips decorated with cloud patterns of gold brocade and high white satin heels. As he beheld this sight, Hsi-men Ch'ing's heart was filled with delight.
The woman took the second cup of tea and handed it to Auntie Hsüeh, after which she took the remaining cup for herself and sat down again to keep them company while they drank.
Hsi-men Ch'ing then ordered Tai-an to present the square box containing his betrothal gifts that consisted of two embroidered handkerchiefs, a pair of jeweled hairpins, and six gold rings. When these had been transferred to a tray and taken inside, Auntie Hsüeh prompted the woman to express her gratitude to Hsi-men Ch'ing with a bow.
"When are you planning to hold the ceremony, sir," the woman went on to ask, "so that I can make the necessary preparations?"
"Since you have deigned to accept my proposal," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll present you with some further insignificant gifts on the twenty-fourth day of this month, and hold the ceremony proper on the second day of the sixth month."
"If that's the way it's to be," the woman said, "I'll send someone tomorrow to inform my late husband's paternal aunt, who lives in the northern quarter of the city."
"Yesterday," said Auntie Hsüeh, "the gentleman paid her a call in order to discuss this matter."
"What did she say?" the woman asked.
"When she heard that the gentleman was interested in this match," Auntie Hsüeh replied, "she was as happy as could be, and suggested that I should bring him here so the two of you could meet. She said, 'If you don't marry a man like this, what manner of man are you going to marry? I'll support this match, come what may, and even undertake to act as guarantor.' "
"If that's really what Aunt said, everything will be fine," the woman said.
"My dear young lady," said Auntie Hsüeh, "surely you don't mean to suggest that a matchmaker such as myself would dare to fabricate a speech like that, do you?"
When she had finished speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing said his farewells and got up to go.
Auntie Hsüeh accompanied him as far as the mouth of Stinkwater Lane and said, "Now that you've seen the young lady, sir, what do you think?"
"Auntie Hsüeh," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I am indeed deeply indebted to you."
"You go ahead, sir," said Auntie Hsüeh. "I want to have another word with the young lady before I leave."
Hsi-men Ch'ing mounted his horse and headed back into the city but Auntie Hsüeh turned around and went inside again, where she said to the woman, "Young lady, with a husband like that you'll never have anything to worry about."
"Does Hsi-men Ch'ing have any women in his household or not?" the woman asked. "And what does he do for a living?"
"My dear lady," said Auntie Hsüeh, "even if he does have a few women about the place, none of them amount to anything. If what I say isn't true, when you get there you'll find out for yourself. His reputation is known to everyone. He is numbered among the most substantial men of property in Ch'ing-ho district, and he is renowned as the Honourable Hsi-men who owns a wholesale pharmaceutical business and lends money to both officials and functionaries. Even the district magistrate and the prefect consort with him. And recently he has become related to Commander Yang of the Eastern Capital, who recognizes him as a kinsman by marriage at four removes. No one dares to cross him."
The woman entertained Auntie Hsüeh with wine and a meal. Just as they were enjoying this repast together, who should turn up but Aunt Yang's pageboy, An-t'ung, bearing a gift box containing sweetmeats that came from the country, including four slices of date cake made of glutinous millet flour, two pieces of candy, and several sugar dumplings made of glutinous rice flour.
"I've been sent to ask whether you've accepted that person's betrothal gifts or not," he reported. "My mistress says, 'If you don't marry a man like this, what manner of man are you going to marry?' "
"Please thank your mistress for her concern on my behalf," the woman said. "I have in fact already accepted his betrothal gifts."
"My Heavens!" said Auntie Hsüeh. "How lucky it is we matchmakers never tell anything but the truth. And now the good lady has sent her servant to confirm it."
The woman took the date cake and other sweetmeats out of the gift box and refilled it with a full complement of appetizers and cured meat. Then she gave it to An-t'ung along with fifty or sixty cash for himself and said, "When you get home, give my compliments to your mistress, and tell her that the other party has decided to make the formal presentation of his gifts on the twenty-fourth day of this month and to hold the wedding ceremony on the second day of the next month."
When the pageboy had left Auntie Hsüeh said, "How about giving me a little something of whatever the lady sent you to wrap up and take home with me for the children?"
The woman gave her a piece of candy and ten sugar dumplings and she went out the door with:
A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude.
But no more of this.
To resume our story, Chang the Fourth, the maternal uncle of Meng Yü-lou's deceased husband, had hopes of being able to exploit his relationship with his young nephew, Yang Tsung-pao, as a means of laying his hands on some of her property. He had a candidate of his own as a matrimonial prospect for her, for whom he was prepared to act both as advocate and guarantor. This was the widower Provincial Graduate Shang, the son of Prefectural Judge Shang who lived on Main Street. If someone else of no particular distinction had been proposed as a rival candidate he would have had a case to make; but when he heard, unexpectedly, that she was betrothed to Hsi-men Ch'ing, the owner of the wholesale pharmaceutical business in front of the district yamen, whom he knew to be possessed of clout in official circles, he felt himself to be stymied. After devoting much thought to the problem he decided that:
Of the thousand schemes and hundred plans,
The best plan is a frontal assault.
Chang the Fourth, therefore, paid the woman a visit and said to her, "Young lady, you really oughtn't to have accepted Hsi-men Ch'ing's betrothal gifts but should have gone along with my suggestion and married the son of Prefectural Judge Shang, the provincial graduate. He comes from a cultivated family that not only values poetry and propriety but also possesses enough landed property for you to live on quite comfortably.
"He would certainly be preferable to Hsi-men Ch'ing. That bastard has been throwing his weight around in official circles for years. He's a tough customer. Moreover, he's already got a legitimate wife who's the daughter of Battalion Commander Wu. You're used to being a legitimate wife, and if you marry him you'll only be a concubine; won't that be quite a comedown for you? Moreover, he's already got three or four other bedmates about the place as well as maidservants who aren't old enough to put their hair up yet. If you enter his household, as the saying goes:
When people are many, mouths are many,
and you're likely to have a hard time of it."
"It's always been true," the woman said, "that:
A multitude of boats need not clog the channel.[19]
If there's already a First Lady in his household, I'm willing to acknowledge her seniority and be a younger sister to her. Even if he does have a few other bedmates about the place, if my husband takes a fancy to me, do you think I'll try to keep him to myself? And if he doesn't take a fancy to me, I can't very well physically restrain him, can I? I'm not afraid; even if there are a hundred people to contend with, I can scull my own boat. To say nothing of the wealthy and prominent, among whom there is hardly a household without four or five concubines, when you get right down to it, even the beggars in the streets:
With boys in hand and girls in arms, often have three or four concubines tagging along at their heels. You're really making much ado about nothing. When I enter his household I'll know how to handle the situation so it won't be a problem for me."
"Young lady," said Chang the Fourth, "I've heard that this man is given to trading in human flesh and is an old hand at:
Beating his women and abusing his wives.
Whenever one of them fails to please him in any way, however slight, he calls in a go-between and disposes of her without more ado. Are you willing to expose yourself to this temper of his?"
"Old Fourth," the woman said, "you're mistaken. No matter how rough a man may be, he won't beat a wife who is diligent and knows what she's about. As a member of his household, if I manage to run a tight ship, so that:
Words spoken inside do not get out, and Words spoken outside do not get in,[20]

what can he do to me? If a wife:
Likes to eat but hates to work,
Has a big mouth and a long tongue, and Devotes herself to stirring up trouble,
then:
If her husband doesn't beat her,
Should he beat the dog instead?[21]
"But that's not all," said Chang the Fourth. "I've also heard he has a thirteen-year-old daughter at home who isn't married yet. I'm really afraid that if you enter his household you'll end up having to:
Make three nests where there's only room for two.[22]
Just remember that:
When people are many, mouths are many.
How will you ever be able to handle it?"
"Old Fourth," the woman said, "you don't know what you're talking about. As a member of his household I'll remember that:
Seniors are senior, and
Juniors are junior;
and that:
The state of the river depends on what comes downstream from the source.[23]
If I treat his children well, there's no reason to fear that my husband will think ill of me, or that his children will be disrespectful. To say nothing of a single child, even if there were ten of them, it wouldn't be a problem for me."
"As I see it," said Chang the Fourth, "this is the sort of man whose:
Conduct is lacking in rectitude.
He's always away from home:
Sleeping among the flowers and lolling
beneath the willows.[24]
Moreover, he's:
Solid without but hollow within,
and is up to his neck in debt. I'm only afraid he'll be the ruination of you."
"Old Fourth," the woman said, "you're mistaken again. Even if he does, sometimes, go out on the town and:
Careen about rather recklessly,[25]
as a woman:
I can only concern myself with what goes on within the triple gates;
I can't concern myself with whatever may happen without the triple gates.
You don't really expect me to follow him about all day long, do you? As the saying goes:
Money, in this world, is but a sometime thing;[26]
Where is the family that is long rich or forever poor?[27]
In fact, when you get right down to it, even His Majesty the Emperor himself, when he suffers from a temporary shortage of cash, has been known to appropriate the funds realized by the sale of brood mares from the Court of the Imperial Stud. [28] To say nothing of merchants that of whom would ever be content to let his money sit idly at home, or scruple to:
Depend upon his wife's connections for his daily bread;[29]
if the need should arise? There's really no need for you to be so concerned about me."
Chang the Fourth saw that the only effect his arguments were having on the woman was to bring down her countercriticisms on his own head. Feeling that he had lost face, he finished his second cup of plain tea, got up, and departed. There is a poem that testifies to this:
Chang the Fourth, in uttering his hurtful words,
was only wasting his breath;
Marriage affinities, whatever one may think,
are predetermined.
The woman of beauty felt herself predisposed in favour of Hsi-men Ch'ing;
Though he had talked himself hoarse
it would have been to no avail.
Chang the Fourth went home in a state of mortification and discussed the situation with his wife. They decided that the only thing to do was to wait until the day when the woman's trousseau was to be delivered to Hsi-men Ch'ing's household in advance of the wedding and then, making a pretext of protecting the interests of their nephew, Yang Tsung-pao, attempt to appropriate whatever they could of the woman's belongings.
To make a long story short, on the twenty-fourth day of the fifth month, Hsi-men Ch'ing arranged for the "presentation of the gifts." He invited his sister-in-law, who was married to his wife's eldest brother, to ride in the sedan chair and take charge of the gift-bearing procession. What with clothing and jewellery, formal gowns for all four seasons, preserved fruit, tea and pastries, bolts of cotton and silk, supplies of pongee and silk floss, the procession included more than twenty loads of gifts. On Meng Yü-lou's side, she invited Aunt Yang and her own elder sister to accept the gifts formally on her behalf and help to entertain the visitors but there is no need to describe this in detail.
On the twenty-sixth, Meng Yü-lou engaged twelve Buddhist monks of high repute to recite a sutra and perform a "land and water" mass for the benefit of her deceased husband, after which his spirit tablet was burned. It was Aunt Yang who insisted on these observances.
As the day approached on which the trousseau was to be delivered to Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, Chang the Fourth recruited a number of neighbours from the locality to join him in coming to have a word with the woman. That day Auntie Hsüeh showed up with a few idlers who had been hired for the purpose by Hsi-men Ch'ing and ten or twenty soldiers that he had borrowed from the commandant's yamen.
As they started inside to move the woman's beds and curtains and the trunks in which her trousseau was packed, Chang the Fourth intercepted them and said, "Matchmaker, don't carry them away yet. I've got something to say about it."
After he had invited the neighbours to come inside and sit down, Chang the Fourth opened the parley by saying, "Distinguished neighbours, listen to me. The young lady is here, and I, Chang Lung, oughtn't to have to say it but your husband, Yang Tsung-hsi, and your young brother-in-law, Yang Tsung-pao, are both my nephews, my elder sister's sons. Now, unfortunately, your husband is dead but he succeeded in amassing a considerable sum for himself while he was alive. There are people who are trying to tell you what to do in this situation, and I, as a relative on the distaff side of the family, am not in a position to interfere in your affairs. Enough said. Nevertheless, my second nephew, Yang Tsung-pao, is a young karmic encumbrance, the weight of which will fall entirely on my shoulders. He and your husband were born of the same womb. Do you mean to maintain that he is not entitled to a portion of the family property?
"Now that all these distinguished neighbours are here today to act as witnesses—and, after all, whether you've got a tidy sum of money in your hands or not, there's no way I can prevent you from marrying someone if you want to—just open up your trunks and let everyone see for themselves what you've got in there, before letting them be carried off the premises. I'm not interested in taking anything away from you but only in clarifying the situation. Young lady, what do you say?"
When the woman heard these words she started to cry and said, "Neighbours, listen to me. You are mistaken, sir. It's not as though I plotted with evil intent to murder my husband. Isn't it enough today that I have to bear the opprobrium for entering into another marriage? Whether or not my husband was successful in making money is public knowledge. But what few taels of silver he accumulated were all plowed back into this house. And the house I'm not taking with me. I'm leaving it all to my young brother-in-law. All the furnishings are being left absolutely intact. In fact, there are three or four hundred taels worth of outstanding debts, the papers for which have already been turned over to you to collect as they become due. Since when has there been any excess of silver over and above the expenditures required to maintain the establishment?"
"If you haven't any silver, then that's all there is to it," said Chang the Fourth. "All I'm asking you to do, now, is to open up your trunks in front of these witnesses so they can see for themselves whether you do indeed have any or not. Then you can carry it all off as you like. I'm not interested in taking anything away from you."
"No doubt you want to have a look at my shoes and footbindings too!" the woman said.
Just as they were beginning to wrangle, who should emerge from the rear of the house, leaning on her staff but Aunt Yang.
"Aunt Yang is here," everyone said with one voice as they bowed to her in greeting.
After Aunt Yang had returned their salutation and sat down to keep them company, she addressed them as follows, "Distinguished neighbours: As the paternal aunt, I am related by blood; this is not a distaff or marriage relationship. Would anyone suggest that I have no say in this matter? The one who is dead was my nephew; the one who is alive is also my nephew.
Every one of the ten fingers,
Hurts equally if bitten.[30]
Quite aside from the fact that her husband really didn't have any money laid by; even if he had a hundred thousand taels of silver, you wouldn't be entitled to do anything more than take a look at it. She has no children and is still:
A young and delicate lass.
If you interfere and try to prevent her from remarrying, just what do you want to keep her around for, may I ask?"
In a chorus of loud voices the neighbours responded, "What Aunt Yang says makes sense."
"You don't mean to retain what she brought with her by way of a dowry from her own family, do you?" demanded the old lady. "She hasn't given me a thing behind anybody's back, yet you suggest that I'm being partial to her. Let's be fair about it. There's no reason for me to deceive any of you. This nephew of mine was so kind and just in everything he did that his loss is hard for me to bear. He was always so considerate to me. If that were not the case I wouldn't bother to concern myself about the matter."
Chang the Fourth eyed the old lady from one side and said, "Are you out of your mind?
The phoenix doesn't deign to alight where there's no treasure to be had."
These words struck the old lady right on her sore spot. In an instant her face became purple with rage. Grabbing hold of Chang the Fourth, she started to curse him in earnest.
"Chang the Fourth," she said, "you'd better lay off that:
Wild and nonsensical talk.
I may be neither able nor talented but at least I'm a certifiable member of the Yang family. You old oily mouth! What Yang family prick were you sired by?"
"I may have a different surname," said Chang the Fourth, "but my two nephews are the offspring of my own elder sister. You old bloodsucker! Don't you know that a girl faces outward from the moment she's born?[31] You're engaged in: setting fires with one hand, and pouring water on them with the other."[32]
"You lousy, shameless, old dog-bone!" retorted Aunt Yang. "She's still:
A young and delicate lass.
Just what do you have in mind in wanting to keep her at home, may I ask? If you aren't hoping to slake your lust with her you must be plotting to fatten yourself at her expense."
"I'm not out for anybody's money," said Chang the Fourth. "But my nephew is my own sister's child, and if anything goes wrong, it's going to be me that's out of pocket, not you. You old gallows bird! You're out to:
Snatch the big, and
Snitch the little.
You may be a brown cat but you've got a black tail."[33]
"Chang the Fourth!" Aunt Yang retorted. "You old beggar! You old slave! You old mealy-mouth! If you keep on talking such rot with your deceitful mouth and duplicitous tongue, you'll die so poor your family won't be able to afford the rope to hoist your coffin with!"
"You waggle-tongued old whore!" replied Chang the Fourth. "You've had to work so hard for your money you've burnt out your tail. No wonder you don't have any children."
This sally really got under Aunt Yang's skin. "Chang the Fourth, you louse!" she cursed at him. "You whoreson old dog! I may have no children but I'm still better than your mum's. She divides her time between Buddhist and Taoist temples, humping the bonzes, and fucking the priests while you're still asleep in dreamland!"
At this point the two of them would have come to blows if the neighbours had not intervened, saying, "Old Fourth, let the lady have her say."
Meantime, Auntie Hsüeh, who had noticed that the two of them were preoccupied with their quarrel, took advantage of the confusion by placing herself at the head of Hsi-men Ch'ing's servants and hired hands, along with the soldiers who had been sent from the yamen. At her direction, they swooped down, hugger-mugger, on the woman's beds and curtains and the trunks containing her trousseau and carried them all off, any which way, like a gust of wind. When Chang the Fourth realized what had happened, his eyes swelled with rage but though he dared to be angry, he dared not speak. [34]The neighbours, for their part, seeing that there was nothing further to be done, attempted to smooth things over for a while and then went their separate ways. On the second day of the sixth month Hsi-men Ch'ing dispatched a large sedan chair and four pairs of red silk lanterns to fetch the bride. Her elder sister, Mrs. Han, acted as her escort, and she was also accompanied by her young brother-in-law, Yang Tsung-pao, who had his hair done up in a topknot, wore a long green gown, and rode on horseback as he escorted his sister-in-law on her way to the wedding ceremony. Hsi-men Ch'ing rewarded him with a bolt of satin brocade and a jade belt buckle. The bride was accompanied by her two maidservants, Lan-hsiang and Hsiao-luan, whose job it was to make the beds and fold the quilts. She also brought along to wait on her the pageboy, Ch'in-t'ung who was just 14 years old. On the third day Aunt Yang and the woman's two sisters-in-law, the wives of her brothers, Meng the Elder and Meng the Second, came to participate in the "third-day celebrations." Hsi-men Ch'ing presented Aunt Yang with seventy taels of silver and two bolts of satin, and from that time on the families enjoyed uninterrupted relations. Hsi-men Ch'ing prepared three rooms on the western side of the rear courtyard to serve as his new bride's living quarters. She was designated as the Third Lady in the hierarchy of his wife and concubines and bore the appellation Yü-lou, or Tower of Jade. Hsi-men Ch'ing gave orders that all the members of his household, from top to bottom, should address her as Third Lady. Beginning with the evening of the wedding day he spent three successive nights in her room. Truly, Within the bed-curtains of gold lamé, 2 new partners performed their perennial roles; Beneath the quilt of red brocade, 2 used objects were brought into play. [35]There is a poem that testifies to this:

To encounter close up such a paragon of feeling and romance:
Is a consummation that, "Without good fortune one can't enjoy."[36]
Wherever has Lieh-tzu allowed the wind to carry him;[37]
When night after night the beauty of the moon shines in the willow branches?

One day there came to Ximen Qing's house an old woman called Xue. She was a seller of flowers made of kingfisher feathers, and was carrying a box of them. She could not find Ximen but seeing Daian, asked him where his master was.
"My father," said the boy, "is in the shop, going through the accounts with Uncle Fu."
The old woman went straight to the shop door, pulled aside the lattice, and looked in. Ximen Qing was going through the books with his manager. With a movement of the head she signaled to him to come out. He left the shop at once, and they sought a quiet place in which to talk.
"What is your business with me?" Ximen Qing asked her.

"It is just an idea about a marriage that has come into my head," the old woman said. "The marriage I am thinking of should be satisfactory to you in every sense of the word, and it would fill the gap left in your household by the death of your Third Lady."
"Who is the lady?" Ximen asked.
"You probably know her. Her family name is Meng, and she is the widow of a cloth merchant, named Yang, who used to keep a shop outside the South Gate. She is by no means poor. She has a couple of Nanjing beds, and four or five chests so full of clothes for every season of the year that there isn't room to put a finger inside them. Her jewellery is beyond counting. She has about a thousand taels of ready money, and two or three hundred rolls of cloth woven with three shuttles. It is a year or more now since she became a widow, and she has no children of her own, only a younger brother of her husband, who is about ten years old. She is quite young, with no one to love, and her aunt thinks it is time she married again. She is about twenty-four years old this year, and very tall and beautiful. When she is dressed, she looks like a figure on a painted lantern. She is lively and charming, and just as intelligent as can be. She can govern a household, do needlework, and play backgammon and all kinds of games. There is nothing to hide. The lady's name is Meng, and she is the third of her family. She lives in Stinking Water Lane. I forgot to mention that she can play the moon guitar too. You will certainly fall in love with her the moment you see her."
Ximen was delighted when he heard that the girl could play the moon guitar. "When can I see her?" he cried.
"I don't anticipate any difficulty," the old woman said, "but one thing you must bear in mind. There is only one member of her family who counts for anything, and that is her aunt. There is indeed another relative, Zhang the Fourth but he is like a mountain walnut, all shell. Many years ago this aunt married Crooked-Headed Sun, and they used to live in Master Xu's house on the north side of the High Street. But Sun has been dead these forty years. She has no children, and is entirely dependent upon her nephew and niece.
"She is the only person we have to consider. She cares about nothing but money, and she knows quite well that her nephew's widow has property. It is nothing to her whom her niece marries, so long as she gets a few taels of silver for herself. You have plenty of excellent silk. I suggest you take a roll of it, buy some presents, and call upon this old aunt. You might give her a little silver at the same time. If you do that, you will have disposed of her once and for all. Later, if anybody should venture to raise objections, the old lady will have her way and the objector will find himself powerless."
All this pleased Ximen Qing immensely. His face beamed with delight. They decided that the next day would suit their purpose, and that he should buy some presents and take them to the house of the young lady's aunt. Xue took up her box and went off, and Ximen Qing went back into the shop and continued to go through the books with Fu.
The next morning, Ximen rose early, and dressed himself in his finest clothes. He took a roll of silk and, buying four large dishes of beautiful fruits, had them put into carrying baskets and told a man to carry them. Then, on horseback, with Daian in attendance and old woman Xue leading the way, he set out to Aunt Yang's house. Xue went in to give the old lady warning.
"One of our neighbours," she said, "a very rich man, would like to have a word with you about your niece's marriage. I told him that you are the only person of any account in the family, and that he must come and see you before he goes to see the lady. I have brought him here today, and at this moment he is at the gate waiting your pleasure."
"Oh dear!" said the old lady. "Why didn't you tell me before?" She told a maid to prepare some fine tea, and gave orders that Ximen Qing should be asked to come in. Xue suggested that the presents should be sent in first, so that the empty baskets might be brought out again, and that then he should go and see the old lady.
He was wearing a large hat of woven palm and a pair of white-soled boots. When he came into the old lady's presence he made four reverences. Leaning on her stick, she hastily prepared to return them but he would not allow this. "Please, Aunt," he said, "be so kind as to accept my greeting." They disputed amicably for some time, and the matter ended with half the required reverences. Then they sat down, hostess and guest in their proper places, and old woman Xue sat down beside them.
"May I know your honourable name, Sir?" said the old lady.
"This gentleman," answered Xue for him, "is the richest or the second richest man in Qinghe. He is Master Ximen, who keeps a medicine shop by the Town Hall. The money in his house reaches higher than the North Star, and his barns are filled with more spoiled rice than is to be found in the Imperial Storehouses. Now his household is without a mistress and, since he has heard that our lady is ready to marry, he has come expressly to talk to you about the marriage."
"Sir," the old lady said, "if you wanted my niece, you had only to come and tell me. Why have you spent your money upon a present for me? It has put me in the position that if I refuse it, I shall be impolite, and if I accept it, I shall feel ashamed."
"Most worthy Aunt," Ximen said, "this is not fit to be called a present." The old lady made two reverences as a sign of thanks and accepted the present. Tea was brought in and, as they were drinking it, the old lady said:
"You will think me lacking in intelligence if I fail to make myself quite clear. My nephew, when he was alive, was very rich but unfortunately he is dead, and all his wealth has come into my niece's hands, probably no less than a thousand taels of silver. I am not in the least concerned whether you want her for the mistress of your household or as a second wife but I should like to have a requiem sung for my nephew's soul—I am his own aunt—and a little money for my coffin. Of course, all this will cost you nothing. I would do anything to get the better of that old dog Zhang the Fourth, and I will see that this marriage is arranged. Perhaps, when you are married, you will allow her to come occasionally to see her poor old aunt, on my birthday and perhaps at the Summer Festival. I don't imagine you will find my poverty infectious."
Ximen Qing laughed. "Please make your mind quite at rest," he said. "I understand perfectly. If you arrange this matter for me, you may have a dozen coffins if you like."
He told Daian to bring his visiting box. From it he took six bars of the purest white official silver, worth thirty taels, and set them before her. "This is only a trifle, Lady but I hope you will use it to buy a cup of tea. After the marriage, I will give you another seventy taels and two rolls of silk. That may suffice for your funeral. And at the four seasons and the eight festivals, I will certainly allow her to visit you."
When the cunning old woman set her black eyes on the thirty taels of shining white silver, her face became all smiles. "Honourable Sir," she said, "don't think that I am grasping but it has always been considered the wisest plan to be quite definite at the very beginning. It avoids disputes later on."
"You are a very intelligent woman," old woman Xue said, "and, really, you need not have any fears. His Lordship is perfectly reliable. If he had not been, he would not have brought his box with him when he came to discuss the matter. Perhaps you are unaware that he is on friendly terms with the local officials. They know how open-handed he is. You need not be afraid of exhausting his resources."
The old lady was more and more delighted, and gave vent to her feelings in more ways than one. They drank two more cups of tea, and Ximen stood up to take his leave, though the old lady urged him to stay longer.
"Now that we have seen you," old woman Xue said, "we will go tomorrow to pay our respects to the young lady."
"His Lordship need not trouble to go and see my niece," the old lady said. "You go and tell her that I say if she won't marry a gentleman like this, I should like to know whom she will marry."
Ximen Qing prepared to leave.
"A poor old woman like me," the old lady said, "could never have dreamed that you, Sir, would condescend to come and see me, so I was taken unprepared. Please forgive my allowing you to go away empty-handed."
She took her stick and hobbled a few steps with him, till he begged her to return. As he was mounting his horse, Xue said, "Wasn't that a good idea? Go home now, I have a little more to say to the old lady. I will call for you early tomorrow morning."
Ximen Qing gave her a tael of silver to pay for the hire of a donkey, mounted his horse, and rode home. Xue went back again to the old lady, and they talked and drank together till the sun was setting. Then she went home.
The next morning Ximen Qing dressed himself exquisitely, put his purse in his sleeve, and rode on a white horse. His two boys, Daian and Ping'an, were in attendance, and old woman Xue rode on a donkey. They set off for the South Gate and soon reached the young lady's house.
The gatehouse was as large as an ordinary room and had a black-and-white screen. Xue asked Ximen Qing to dismount, and they went in together. They came to the inner door with another screen and a low fence of bamboo. There were flower pots with pomegranates in the courtyard and, on the steps, a row of blue jars and two long benches for beating cloth. The old woman pushed open the scarlet double doors and they went into a parlour, with seats arranged as for host and guests. The tables and chairs were new and brightly polished, and the curtains and blinds in excellent taste.
Old woman Xue told Ximen Qing to sit down, and she went to the courtyard. Very soon she returned and whispered, "The lady has not finished dressing yet. Do you mind waiting?" A boy brought in some Fujian tea and, while Ximen Qing was drinking it, the old woman with much gesticulation gave him what information she thought fit.
"Apart from the aunt, this young lady is the only person of consequence in the family. Her husband had a brother but he is still very young and ignorant. When Master Yang was alive, they used to sell enough to fill two large baskets with coins, not to speak of silver, everyday. He charged three fen a foot for the black cloth used for making shoes and twenty or thirty men were employed in the dye shop. This lady managed everything. She has two maids and a boy. The elder maid is fifteen, and has already had her hair dressed as a woman. That is Lanxiang. The little maid, Xiaoluan, is twelve. When she marries, they will go with her. If I bring off this marriage, I only ask one thing. I should like to be able to take a couple of rooms to live in."
"There will be no difficulty about that," Ximen said.
"But last year," the old woman said, "when you bought Chunmei, you promised me several rolls of silk. I have never had them. Perhaps you will remember that when you reward me on this occasion." A maid came to call her, and in a little while Ximen Qing heard the tinkling of ornaments and there came to him the fragrance of exquisite perfume. The old woman pulled up the lattice and Mistress Meng came in.
Ximen Qing was delighted with her the moment he saw her. She came into the room, modestly made a reverence, and sat down opposite him. He stared at her so fixedly that she bowed her head. "Lady," he said at last, "it is now a long time since my wife died, and I should like to take you to wife to govern my household. May I know your honourable wishes in this matter?"
The lady looked at him. He seemed a pleasant-looking fellow and she was well enough satisfied. She said to old woman Xue, "How old is this gentleman and how long is it since his lady died?"
"I have misspent twenty-eight years," Ximen Qing said, "and my wife unfortunately died more than a year ago. May I know how many fruitful springs you have seen?"
"I am thirty years old," the lady said.
"Then you are two years older than I am."
"When the wife is two years older than the husband," the old go-between said, "the yellow gold increases day by day; and when the wife is three years older, the yellow gold is piled up mountains high."
The little maid brought three cups of tea and some preserved golden oranges. Mistress Meng stood up, took one of the cups, and with her slender finger wiped the water from its rim, then offered it to Ximen Qing, at the same time making a reverence. Old woman Xue found an opportunity to lift the lady's skirt slightly, displaying her exquisite feet, three inches long and no wider than a thumb, very pointed and with high insteps. They were clad in a pair of scarlet shoes, embroidered in gold with a cloud design, with white silk high heels. Ximen Qing observed them with great satisfaction.
Mistress Meng gave a cup of tea to Xue, then took one herself and sat down. Ximen Qing told Daian to bring in the box of presents. In it were two silk handkerchiefs, a pair of jeweled pins, and six gold rings. Ximen took them out of the box and, putting them on a tray, presented them to the lady. The old woman prompted her to thank him. "When do you wish the ceremony to be performed?" she asked. "I shall have preparations to make."
"I take this as a pledge of your kind intention," Ximen Qing said. "On the twenty-fourth day of this month I will send my small gift, and I would suggest the second of next month for the wedding day."
"I must speak to my aunt about the matter," Mistress Meng said.
"His Lordship called upon your aunt yesterday, and discussed the matter," old woman Xue said.
"What did she say?" Mistress Meng asked.
"She was very pleased. Indeed, she said that if this gentleman was not good enough for you, she didn't know who would be. She will be very satisfied with you when she learns that you have agreed to marry his Lordship."
"If she really said that, all will be well."
"Ah, Lady," the old woman said, "you have to thank me for this good fortune."
Ximen Qing rose and said good-bye. Old woman Xue went with him as far as the entrance to the lane.
"Well," she said, "you have seen the lady. What do you think of her?"
"Sister," Ximen Qing said, "I thank you."
The old woman asked him to go home without her. She said that she had still something to say to Mistress Meng. Ximen mounted his horse and returned to the city, and the old woman went back to the room.
"You must feel satisfied, now that you have arranged to marry this gentleman," she said.
"But he may have a wife already for all I know," said Mistress Meng, "and I have no idea what his business is."
"My good lady," the old woman said, "supposing he is married, I can assure you that none of his ladies has any intelligence to speak of. When you marry him, you will find that I am telling the truth. As for his reputation, everybody knows that he is the famous medicine merchant, money lender to the officials, and the first or second richest man in the district. The magistrates, both of the prefecture and of the district, are on very intimate terms with him, and only recently he became a relation by marriage of Marshal Yang of the Eastern Capital. With a relative like that, who dare interfere with him?"
Mistress Meng prepared some refreshments. While they were eating, a boy came from Aunt Yang's house. He brought a box in which were four pieces of cake made of yellow rice and dates, two pieces of sweetmeat, and several dozen little pastries.
"My mistress would like to know whether you have accepted the man's proposal," the boy said. "She says if you don't accept him, she can't imagine whom you will have."
"Thank your mistress for her kind message," Mistress Meng said, "and tell her that I have accepted him."
"Now you have a proof that I was not lying to you," the old woman said. "Your aunt did know all about it."
Mistress Meng took the cakes out of the box, and gave it back filled with buns and cured meats. She gave the boy a handful of coins, and said, "Thank your mistress for me. Tell her that he is going to send his present on the twenty-fourth, and the wedding is to be on the second of next month." Then the boy went home.
"What did your aunt send you?" the old woman asked. "May I have some to take home to my children?" Mistress Meng gave her a piece of sweetmeat and a dozen pastries, and she went away.
Now, the lady's uncle, Zhang the Fourth, was very anxious to secure the guardianship of his nephew Yang Zongbao in order that he might get the woman's property into his own hands. He hoped that she would become the second wife of a certain Scholar Shang, who was the son of a local magistrate. Had it been any less important person, a few words would have settled the matter but he knew that Ximen Qing was on good terms with the officials, and dared not oppose him openly. After thinking over every possible way of dealing with the situation, he decided that the best plan was to introduce some element of discord between them. So he came to see his niece.
"You mustn't think of accepting Ximen Qing's proposal," he said. "Shang is the man for you. He is a poet of distinction, owns several farms, and enjoys a very comfortable existence. He would be a much better match than that fellow Ximen, who has had too many dealings with the officials and is a truculent upstart and a ne'er-do-well. Ximen has one wife already. She was a Miss Wu. If you marry him, you won't be the mistress of his house; you'll be nothing but an underling. He has three or four other wives, and several young maids. No, if you marry him, with so many people already in the household, I'm afraid you'll have to put up with a great deal of unpleasantness."
Meng realized that Zhang the Fourth wished her to break off her engagement, and she decided to tease him. "There is an old saying," she said, "that though there are many ships upon the water, the traffic still goes on. I see no reason why we should not all get along very well. If he has a wife already, I will gladly revere her as an elder sister. If he has other wives, I will place absolute confidence in him. If I afford my husband pleasure, I don't mind how many wives he has; if not, even if I should be his only wife, life would be utterly miserable. In every rich family there are four or five ladies. My dear old uncle, don't trouble yourself any more about the matter. When I get there, I shall know how to look after myself. I don't anticipate any trouble on that score."
"But that is not all," Zhang the Fourth continued. "He is continually beating his women and ill using his wives. He makes a business of buying and selling young people, and if anyone in his establishment gives him the slightest cause for annoyance, he sends for the go-between and gets rid of her. Are you ready to put up with that sort of treatment?"
"No, Uncle, you are mistaken," his niece said. "Even a bad-tempered husband cannot punish a wife who does her duty and keeps her wits about her. If I marry him and perform my household duties properly, and if I know when to keep my mouth and other people's mouths shut, he will find no excuse for treating me badly."
"I am told," Zhang the Fourth persisted, "yes, I am told that he has a young unmarried daughter about fourteen years old, and I can't help thinking, if you marry him, that the girl will take every possible opportunity of annoying you."
"Why do you think that, Uncle? If I marry him, old is old and young is young. I treat children very kindly. I don't believe either that my husband will be dissatisfied with me, or that my daughter will be undutiful. If he had ten daughters, it wouldn't worry me."
"One more point," said Zhang the Fourth, "and perhaps this is the most serious of all. The fellow's behavior is atrocious. Strumpets and bawdy houses are the only interest he has in life. Moreover, he is a man of straw and frightfully in debt. What I fear most of all is that he will involve you in his downfall."
"Uncle, you are mistaken again. The man is young and occasionally he may philander away from home. There is nothing extraordinary about that, and there is no way in which wives can prevent their husbands from so amusing themselves. As for his financial position, you should remember the old saying: 'Money has no roots.' We have no means of telling whether a person will always be rich or always be poor. No, Uncle, marriages are made in Heaven, please don't distress yourself so much about this one."
Zhang the Fourth was forced to realize that there was nothing he could say to change his niece's purpose. She paid no heed to anything he advised. So he made a wry face, drank two cups of plain tea, stood up, and went home extremely crestfallen.
He talked over the matter with his wife, and they decided to wait until the wedding day, and then to use their nephew Yang Zongbao as an excuse for laying hands on Mistress Meng's belongings.
On the twenty-fourth Ximen Qing sent his marriage pledge. On the twenty-sixth twelve monks came to chant a dirge for the repose of the soul of the late Master Yang, and burn his tablet. Aunt Yang was definitely on Ximen's side but, on the eve of the wedding, Zhang the Fourth asked a number of neighbours to accompany him and went to make a last attempt to dissuade his niece. Old woman Xue, with Ximen's servants and ten or twenty soldiers of the garrison, came to bring away the lady's bed, her curtains, and all her boxes. Zhang met them and stopped them. "Madam Go-between," he said, "please do not remove these things. I have a few words to say about the matter." Then he and all the neighbours went in to see Mistress Meng. They sat down and Zhang the Fourth addressed the company.
"Honourable neighbours all, please listen to what I have to say." Then he turned to his niece. "You are the mistress here, and I have nothing against that. But your husband Yang Zongxi and his younger brother Yang Zongbao were both nephews of mine. The elder of these two nephews is now dead and what he possessed has been inherited by others. That is right and fitting. But my second nephew Yang Zongbao is still a child, and the burden of this matter falls upon me. He was born of the same mother as your late husband, and has naturally a right to some share in the property. I call upon these honourable neighbours to witness. We will open all the boxes and everybody shall see what there is. Then we shall know whether there is much or nothing."
"Honourable neighbours," Mistress Meng said, beginning to cry, "now hear what I have to say." She turned to Zhang the Fourth. 'You are mistaken, old gentleman. I did not wickedly murder my husband, so that I might marry again to my dishonour. It is no secret that he had money. He laid by many taels of silver, and spent them on the building of this house. I am not taking this house away. I leave it for my young brother-in-law. I am not even taking away a single article of furniture. Three or four hundred taels of silver were due to me but I handed over to you the contracts and documents, you collected the money, and I have used it to live upon. What else could I do?"
"Doubtless you have no money," Zhang said. "I am quite ready to agree. But in the presence of these good people, let the boxes be opened so that everyone can see for himself. Even if they turn out to be full of silver, you can take it away. I don't want it."
"Perhaps you would like to see my shoes too," Mistress Meng cried.
They were in the midst of this dispute when Aunt Yang came in, leaning on her stick. "Here comes the aunt," all the neighbours cried. They saluted her respectfully. She returned their greeting and sat down. Then she began.
"Honourable neighbours here present. I am her aunt, and it is natural that I should have something to say about all this. He who is dead was my nephew, and he who lives is just as much my nephew. If any one of our fingers is bitten, it is no less painful than any other. It has been stated that her husband was rich. Well, even if he had a hundred thousand taels, you should still treat her fairly. She has no children and she is young. What right have you to prevent her marrying again?"
"Quite right, quite right," said all the neighbours.

"Do you claim the things that came to her from her own family?" the old lady continued, addressing Zhang the Fourth. "She has had no secret understanding with me. All I want is justice." She turned again to the bystanders. "If my niece had not always been so good-hearted and sweet-natured, honourable neighbours, I should not be bothering my old bones about her. I hate to see her leave this place."
Zhang the Fourth glared at the old lady. "Oh," said he, "I know how full of fine ideas your mind is. I also know that the phoenix does not lay his head where there is no treasure."
This remark infuriated the old lady. Her face became purple. She shook her finger at Zhang the Fourth. "Don't talk such rubbish, Zhang the Fourth. I may not be the rightful representative of the Yang family but as for you, old slippery tongue, what have you to do with the Yangs?"
"Even if I am not a Yang, these two nephews are my sister's sons. You biting old reptile, a woman ought to consider her husband's family. What is the use of lighting a fire with one hand and pouring water on it with the other?"
"You good-for-nothing old dog bone," the old lady cried. "She is a young and helpless woman. You wish to keep her in this house but what is it you are really after? Either you have nasty lustful designs upon her yourself, or you are devising some scheme to grow fat upon her money."
"I don't want her money," Zhang the Fourth retorted, "but there will be nothing for Yang Zongbao when he grows up. I am not your sort, ripe for the slaughter, one who takes up with the rich and deceives the humble. You are like a yellow cat with a black tail."
"Zhang the Fourth, you offshoot of generations of beggars, you miserable old slave, you old mealy mouth, how dare you be such a humbug and talk like this? What utter nonsense! There will be no cords to tie your coffin when you die."
"You garrulous old whore, you want the money yourself to put a little warmth under your tail. No wonder you never had any children!"
The old lady became more and more wild.
"Zhang the Fourth, you son of a bawd. Pig! Dog! So I've no children, eh? Well, that's better than having an old woman who goes to the temple to sleep with the monks and carry on with the priests. You don't know what you're talking about."
By this time the pair were on the point of coming to blows. Fortunately, the neighbours stopped them. "Uncle, let the lady have her say," they said to Zhang the Fourth.
Old woman Xue, while the dispute was at its height, told Ximen's servants and the soldiers to hurry in. They carried out all the chests and beds, some on their shoulders and others on poles. It was like a whirlwind. Zhang the Fourth was furious but he could only look on, speechless. The neighbours could not understand what the trouble was all about. They tried to make peace, and finally they went away. On the second day of the sixth month, Ximen Qing sent a large sedan chair, with four pairs of lanterns, for Mistress Meng. Yang Zongbao, his hair dressed in a knot, wearing green clothes, rode on a horse and acted as his sister-in-law's escort. Ximen Qing gave him a roll of silk and a piece of jade. Lanxiang and Xiaoluan, the two maids, went with her to be her chambermaids. Qintong, her boy was now 15 years old, and he too went to serve her. On the third day after the marriage, Aunt Yang and Mistress Meng's sisters-in-law called to offer their congratulations. Ximen Qing gave Aunt Yang seventy taels of silver and two rolls of silk, and from that day forward their friendship was never broken. He prepared 3 rooms in the western wing for Mistress Meng, established her as his third wife  there calling her, "Yulou" [Tower of Jade], and giving orders to his household that she must be spoken of as the Third Lady. For two nights he slept in her room. The golden hangings seemed to indicate the coming of a new bride but the story told by the scarlet silk coverlets was not new.

029

All Night Long, P'an Chin-lien yearns for Hsi-men Ch'ing, During the Tablet-burning, Monks Overhear Sounds of Venery & the Magic Diagrams

In the silent bedchamber, all by herself, she wonders;
The mandarin ducks are separated; no news of him has come.
Before the fragrance of her powder has vanished from his arm;
The p'i-p'a at the head of her bed is covered with dust.
Her face has grown so thin it scarcely registers in the phoenix mirror;
Her clouds of hair are so loose the jade hairpins are falling out.
His mettlesome steed does not come; her gazing eyes are tired;
All alone with her mandarin duck pillow, tears flood her cheeks.

from the time that Hsi-men Ch'ing took Meng Yü-lou into his household he:

Enjoyed himself with his new wife.[1]

They were:

Like glue and like lacquer.[2]

Moreover, the Ch'en family sent Auntie Wen to announce that they would like to have his daughter, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, carried across their threshold in marriage on the twelfth day of the sixth month. Hsi-men Ch'ing found himself so:

Pushed and pressured,

that he was unable to procure a bed for his daughter's trousseau in time for the occasion and had to supply her with one of the gilt lacquer Nanking beds with retractable steps that had formed part of Meng Yü-lou's dowry. What with the "third-day celebrations" and "ninth-day celebrations" attendant on this event, he was kept busy for more than a month and was unable to pay a visit to P'an Chin-lien.

As a consequence of this, everyday found her:
Leaning against one doorjamb after another,
Wearing out her eyes with constant gazing.

She twice sent Dame Wang to inquire about Hsi-men Ch'ing but the servants at his gate, who were familiar enough with the old lady and knew that she had been sent by P'an Chin-lien, paid scant attention, merely reporting that their master was busy.
The woman was frantic with longing. When the old lady reported the results of her mission, the woman vented her wrath on her stepdaughter, driving her out into the street, in her turn, to look for him. How could that little chit have dared to penetrate his:
Vast courtyards and secluded mansions?
All she did was to lurk in the vicinity of his gate a couple of times without catching sight of Hsi-men Ch'ing. When she returned home her stepmother spat in her face, slapped her, and abused her for being of no use. She even made her kneel on the floor until noon without giving her anything to eat.
At that time the summer solstice had already passed and the weather was extremely hot. The house was so uncomfortable the woman could hardly bear it and ordered Ying-erh to heat some water and prepare the tub so she could take a bath. She also put a tray of meat dumplings into the steamer so she would have something to offer him if Hsi-men Ch'ing happened to show up.
Wearing nothing but a short shift of thin floss silk, she sat on a low stool longing in vain for Hsi-men Ch'ing to come. Pouting with her lips, she cursed him a couple of times for a fickle scoundrel.
Bereft of thought or feeling,
Depressed and silent, with her slender fingers she took off her two red embroidered shoes and used them to cast a "love hexagram"[3] in the hope of ascertaining whether Hsi-men Ch'ing would come or not. Truly:
In front of others she is reluctant to declare herself too loudly;
Secretly she casts her lot with coins inquiring after her distant lover.[4]
There are two songs to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope" that testify to this:
Clad in "wave-tripping" silk stockings,
Looking almost natural,
Divested of their red-tipped shoes that now form a "love diagram,"
They are like lotus roots that have begun to sprout,
Like lotus pods that have shed their blossoms.
How were they ever bound tightly enough to make them so very tiny?
Measured with a willow wand, they are but half a span in length.
As for him,
He doesn't think of me;
As for me,
I think longingly of him.
Quietly taking down the bamboo blind,
Leaving the door to creak,
All I can do is lie underneath my quilt, cursing his name.
How can you care so much for "misty willows,"
That you won't come to my place anymore?
"My eyebrows have lost their colour; who will repaint them for me?"[5]
Before whose house has he tethered his horse to the green willows?
As for him,
He is unfaithful to me;
As for me,
I am yearning for him.[6]
At that time, after the woman had tried casting "love diagrams" for a while and realized that Hsi-men Ch'ing was not going to show up, she felt herself overcome by drowsiness, stretched out on her bed, and dozed off. When she woke up, about two hours later, she was not in the best of moods.
"I've heated the water, Mother," Ying-erh said. "Are you going to take a bath or not?"
"The dumplings must be done by now," the woman said. "Bring them in here so I can have a look."
Ying-erh hastened to obey and brought them into the bedroom. The woman counted them off, one by one, with her slender fingers. She had made a full tray of thirty dumplings but now, though she counted them back and forth a number of times, she could only count twenty-nine. There was one dumpling missing.
"What could have happened to it?" she asked.
"I haven't any idea," said Ying-erh. "You must have counted wrong, Mother."
"I counted them myself, twice," the woman said. "I made thirty dumplings so I'd have something to offer your father if he comes by. Why did you have to go and snitch one? You're spoiled rotten, you wanton little slave! I suppose you were suffering from such:
Acute consumption or avid craving, that you simply couldn't help eating this particular dumpling, while the rice I feed you:
Whether in large bowl or in small, you can barely manage to choke down. What I'm going to do next is intended to teach you a lesson."
Thereupon:
Without permitting any further explanation,
she stripped the clothing off the little chit's body and picking up a riding crop proceeded to give her twenty or thirty strokes with it. She whipped the girl until she:
Howled like a stuck pig.
"If you don't confess," she threatened, "I'll certainly give you a hundred strokes."
When the girl could stand the beating no longer she cried out, "Don't whip me any more, Mother. I was desperately hungry and took one of them to eat."
"If you took it," the woman said, "why did you claim that I had counted wrong? You're nothing but a confirmed, mischief-making little whore! When that cuckold was still alive you may have gotten away with:
Telling tales and embroidering on the facts:
but where is he now? You think you can continue to be:
Up to your preternatural pranks, right under my nose, do you? You mischief-making little whore! I'm going to beat your bottom right off for you!"
The woman whipped her a while longer and pulled her drawers back on before letting her up. Then she ordered her to stand beside her and cool her with a fan.
After she had fanned her for a while the woman said to her, "You lousy little whore! Stick your face over here, so I can give your cheeks a good scratching!"
Ying-erh really did stick her face out, and the woman gouged two bloody scratches in her cheeks with her sharp fingernails before letting her off.
After a while Chin-lien went over to her mirror stand to get dressed and put on some new makeup and then came out and stood inside the blind in the doorway. It just so happened that:
As providence would have it,
what should she see but Hsi-men Ch'ing's pageboy, Tai-an, who was riding past her door on horseback with a package wrapped in felt tucked under his arm.
The woman called him to a halt and asked, "Where are you going?"
Now this pageboy had always been glib with his tongue and had often accompanied Hsi-men Ch'ing when he visited the woman's house. She was in the habit of tipping him generously and always spoke up on his behalf when he was in hot water with Hsi-men Ch'ing. For this reason he was already on easy terms with the woman.
Dismounting from his horse, he said, "Father sent me to deliver a gift to the commandant's yamen."
The woman invited him inside and asked, "What's your father been up to at home? Why hasn't he come to see me or given me so much as a glimpse of his shadow for so long? It must be that he's found another sweetheart somewhere and put me in the position of:
The rings that hold his hairnet in place: always at the back of his head."
"Father hasn't taken up with any sweetheart," said Tai-an. "It's just that the last few days he's had so much to do at home that he hasn't been able to get away and come to see you."
"Even if he has been busy at home," the woman said, "that's no reason to neglect me for half a month at a time without sending me so much as a word of news. It's obvious that I haven't been very much on his mind. Just what is it that's keeping him so busy, anyway?" she demanded of Tai-an. "Tell me all about it."

The pageboy giggled but wouldn't tell her anything.
"There's been something to preoccupy him, that's all," he said. "Why do you insist on:
Blowing aside the hairs only to look for trouble?[7]
"My dear little oily mouth," the woman said, "if you don't tell me I'll never forgive you."
"If I tell you," the pageboy said, "you mustn't tell Father that it was I who told you."
"I won't tell him, that's all," the woman said.
Tai-an then proceeded, thus and so, to give a full account, from beginning to end, of how Hsi-men Ch'ing had taken Meng Yü-lou into his household. Nothing might have happened if the woman had not heard about this but having heard about it, she could not prevent the teardrops in her eyes from coursing down across her fragrant cheeks.
Tai-an was thrown into a panic by this response, and said, "It's precisely because you're so sensitive that I didn't want to tell you about it, and now that I have, look at the way you're carrying on."
The woman leaned against the doorjamb and gave a long sigh, saying, "Tai-an, you don't know how much love I've lavished on him, from the first day we met, and now, how can he just abandon me like this?"
As she spoke she was unable to prevent a copious fall of tears.
"Why should you torment yourself so?" said Tai-an. "At home, Mother doesn't even try to keep him in hand."
"Tai-an," the woman said, "listen to my plaint." There is another song to the previous tune that testifies to this:
My naughty lover is fickle;
He hasn't come for a month.
I've been alone beneath the mandarin duck quilt for thirty nights.
His feckless affections are otherwise engaged,
While I remain an infatuated fool.
I never should have allowed myself to become so involved.
"What is easily acquired is easily relinquished."[8]
As for him,
His passion has cooled;
As for me,
It's just my luck.[9]
No sooner was she done than she started to cry all over again.
"Don't cry," said Tai-an. "I shouldn't wonder if Father turned up during the next couple of days, on his birthday. If you write a few words to him, I'll make sure that Father sees them, and he's certain to come."
"I'll really be beholden to you," the woman said. "If you can induce him to come, I'll make a pair of nice shoes for you to wear. I'll wait for him here in order to offer my birthday congratulations. If he doesn't come, I'll hold you accountable, you little oily mouth. And if he asks you what you were doing here, how will you answer him?"
"If Father asks me," said Tai-an, "I'll say that I was watering the horse in the street when you sent Granny Wang to ask me over and gave me this note, along with the injunction to tell him how much you wanted to see him."
"You little oily mouth," the woman laughed, "you're really:
A second Hung-niang: always able to bring people together."[10]
When she had finished speaking she ordered Ying-erh to serve Tai-an a plateful of the steamed dumplings on the table, along with some tea. While this was being done she went inside, fetched a sheet of flowered notepaper, and:
Lightly grasping the jade tube, and
Gently toying with the sheep's hair brush, dashed off a lyric to the tune "Mistletoe," which read as follows:
I'm taking my heartfelt words and
Sending them to you on this flowered notepaper.
I remember the time I first cut off a lock of my black tresses for you.
I leaned against one doorjamb after another and took down the bamboo blind,
Anticipating surprise and suffering fear for you, trivial though they may have been.
And now you're actually betraying my love.
If you're not going to come, return my fragrant silk handkerchief.[11]
When she had finished composing her note she folded it into a lozenge-shaped lover's knot, sealed it, and gave it to Tai-an with the words, "Be sure to tell him, whatever he does, to come pay me a visit on his birthday. I'll be here waiting for him."
When Tai-an had finished eating his snack the woman also gave him several tens of cash.
As he was about to go outside and mount his horse she said to him, "When you get home and see your father, tell him, 'She really cursed you out.' And if he refuses to come, tell him, 'She's threatening to get into a sedan chair one of these days and come to pay you a visit herself.' "
Tai-an replied, "I feel just like:
A clapper-sounding southern salesman who runs into a dung-cake peddler and exclaims:
'Don't bother to run through your inventory;
it only gives me the creeps!'
You'd crack melon seeds astride the wooden mule[12]
en route to your own execution:
How superfluous can you get?"
When he had finished speaking he mounted his horse and departed.
Everyday the woman spent her time:
Waiting for long periods as well as short,
but it was just as though he were:
A stone sunk in the vast sea.[13]
She never caught so much as a glimpse of Hsi-men Ch'ing's shadow.
Seven days went by in this way until, finally, it was the day of his birthday. To the woman:
Each day was like three months of autumn;
Each night seemed like half a summer.[14]
She:
Waited all day,
Without any news of him;
Watched for a long time,
But caught not a glimpse of him.
Before she became aware of it she began to:
Silently gnash her silvery teeth, as
Tears overflowed her starry eyes.
When evening came she invited Dame Wang over, plied her with food and wine, and then pulled a silver hairpin with a gold head out of her hair and gave it to her, entreating her to go to Hsi-men Ch'ing's house on her behalf and press her invitation.
"If I show up this late in the day," said Dame Wang, "he'll already be:
Anticipating tea or recovering from wine, and will certainly not consent to come. I'd do better to wait until first thing tomorrow morning to go to the gentleman's mansion and extend your invitation."
"Godmother," the woman said, "be sure you don't forget."
"Since when," the old lady asked, "have I ever undertaken anything for you without carrying it through?"
At this juncture the old lady, who was the sort who:
Wouldn't do anything except for money,[15]
having accepted the hairpin for her pains and drunk until her face was bright red, proceeded to make her way home.
It so happens that, in her bedroom, the woman:
Perfumed with incense the mandarin duck quilt, and
Deftly trimmed the silver lamp's wick, but could not get to sleep. Giving vent to:
Long sighs as well as short,
she:
Tossed first this way and then that.
Truly, it is a case of:
She who is wont to diligently strum her p'i-p'a
late into the night:
When all alone in her deserted chamber can scarcely bear to play it.[16]
At this juncture, accompanying herself on the p'i-p'a, she sang a suite of four songs to the tune "Making Silk Floss," which testifies to this:
In the beginning I loved you for being so romantic;
We exchanged locks of our hair and burned incense together.
When we sported with the clouds and rain
we were perfectly suited;
Behind my husband's back I carried on an affair with you.
What did I care when people said, "Spilt water can never be recovered?"[17]
If you are really betraying
my true love,
You're: "Climbing a tree in search of fish,"[18]
and deserve whatever you get.
Who would have thought you'd have found another sweetheart?
It makes me so mad I'm:
"Half drunk and half crazy."
Leaning against the standing screen, I try to figure it out;

I don't understand it, how could you abandon me this way?
Though I: "Send letters and post notes," you still refuse to come.
If you are really betraying,
my affections,
If no one else gets to you first,
Heaven will destroy you.
I certainly never loved you just for your money;
I loved you because I found you such an appealing lover.
You knew just how to handle me;
you were always so clever.
I was a lovely flower that had just blossomed in the garden;
But once the butterfly had supped its fill it did not return.
Love of the kind that we once felt for each other,
Must have been predestined in a former life to be fulfilled in this.
I turn things over in my troubled heart
until I'm depressed.
As the sayings go, "Women are easily infatuated," And, "Lovers alone are never satisfied."
The affair I had with you
was my first;
It was a fresh flower I brought you;
how could you give it up?
Now that you've found yourself
another soul mate;
In the Temple of the God of the Sea[19]
I'll bring an action against you.[20]
It so happens that all night long the woman:
Tossed first this way and then that,
but could not get to sleep.

The next morning she said to Ying-erh, "Go next door and see if Granny Wang has gone to invite your father or not."
Ying-erh did as she was told and, before long, came back and reported, "Granny Wang left a long time ago."
To resume our story, the old lady got up early in the morning and set out as soon as she had combed her hair and washed her face.
When she arrived at Hsi-men Ch'ing's gate she asked the servants on duty, "Is the gentleman at home?" but they all said, "We don't know," so she went over and waited by the wall across the street.
Before long, Manager Fu showed up to open the shop. The old lady went up to him, bowed and uttered a word of greeting, and then said, "May I trouble you with a question? Is the gentleman at home?"
"What do you want with him," said Manager Fu, "that you should be asking me so early in the morning? If you had asked anyone else, they wouldn't have known but I'll tell you. Yesterday was the gentleman's birthday, and he spent the day entertaining guests in his home. They had been drinking all day long, and when evening came he took his friends off to the licensed quarter, where they must have made a night of it because he hasn't come home yet. That's where you ought to look if you want to find him."
After the old lady had bowed in gratitude and bade him farewell, she crossed the square in front of the district yamen and started along East Street in the direction of the lane that led into the licensed quarter. At this point, what should she see in the distance but Hsi-men Ch'ing coming toward her on horseback. He was accompanied by two pageboys and was sufficiently the worse for wear so that:
His eyes were bleary with drink,
and he was:
Rocking backward and forward,
in the saddle.
"Sir!" the old lady hailed him in a loud voice. "Why don't you have a little less to drink?"
As she spoke, she stepped forward and brought him to a halt by taking hold of the horse's bit with her hand.
"You're Godmother Wang, aren't you?" Hsi-men Ch'ing inquired drunkenly. "What have you got to say for yourself?"
The old lady had whispered no more than a few words in his ear when Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "The pageboy gave me the message when he got home. I know she must be angry with me. I'll go to her place right now."
Hsi-men Ch'ing followed the old lady, and the two of them carried on an animated dialogue all the way to their destination.
When they got to the woman's door, Dame Wang went in first and reported, "Young lady, I've got good news for you. Thanks to my efforts, in less than an hour I've succeeded in bringing the gentleman here with me."
When the woman heard that he had come, she hastily ordered Ying-erh to tidy up the room and then went out to welcome him. Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was still:
More than a little addled with wine, swaggered right in, fanning himself as he came, and bowed to the woman as he uttered a word of greeting.
The woman returned his salutation and said, "Sir:
The more eminent you are, the harder you are to see.[21]
How could you simply drop me like this, without giving me so much as a glimpse of your shadow for so long? No doubt, with your new bride to keep you company at home, you're:
Like glue and like lacquer, and scarcely have any reason to think of me. How can you still claim, sir, that you haven't had a change of heart?"
"You shouldn't pay any attention to the nonsense people talk," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What would I want with a new bride anyway? It's only because my young daughter got married that I was kept busy for a few days and didn't have the time to pay you a visit. That's all there is to it."
"You think you can pull the wool over my eyes, do you?" the woman said. "If you haven't:
Become enamored of the new and abandoned the old, or found yourself a new sweetheart somewhere, you'll have to swear an oath on that all too vigorous body of yours before I'll believe you."
"If I ever betray you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "may I be afflicted with:
Boils as big as bowls,
Three to five years of jaundice,[22] and
A bite on the balls by a centipede
as big as a carrying pole."
"You lousy two-timer," the woman said, "what does:
A bite on the balls by a centipede
as big as a carrying pole,
have to do with you?"
As she spoke she reached out with her hand, snatched the hat off his head, and threw it on the floor. Dame Wang saw that it was a brand-new, tasseled, "tile-ridge" hat, shaped like the roof of a pavilion with flaring eaves,[23] and hastily picked it up and put it on the table for him.
"Young lady," she said, "you've been complaining about my failure to invite the gentleman here for you; and now look how you're treating him! If you don't put his hat back on for him he'll catch cold."
"Fat chance!" said the woman. "If that fickle ruffian died of a venereal chill, I wouldn't care."
As she spoke she pulled a pin out of his hair and held it in her hand while she examined it. It was a polished gold hairpin with two rows of characters engraved on it that said:
The horse with the golden bridle neighs
amidst the fragrant verdure:
The visitor to the jade tower is drunk
at apricot blossom time.[24]
It had been given to him by Meng Yü-lou but the woman assumed that it was a gift from some singing girl, so she put it in her sleeve and refused to return it, saying, "And you claim not to have had a change of heart! Where did the hairpin I gave you get to, that you should be wearing this one from someone else?"
"As for that hairpin of yours," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the other day I got drunk and fell off my horse, so hard that my hat was knocked off and my hair came undone. When I looked for your pin I couldn't find it."
"You wouldn't fool a two-year-old child with that story," the woman said. "You mean to tell me you were so befuddled with drink that you couldn't even see a hairpin when it fell on the ground?"
"Young lady," interjected Dame Wang from one side, "you can't hold the gentleman to blame.
He can detect a bee defecating forty li outside the city,
But trips over a mangy elephant on his own doorstep:
He can see things at a distance,
But not close to home."
"It's bad enough to have her giving me a hard time," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "without your joining in the fun."
The woman saw that he held in his hand a fine gold-flecked Szechwan fan, with red slats and a gold hinge-joint,[25] and proceeded to snatch it away from him and hold it up to the light.
It so happens that the woman was an old hand where anything about the relations between the sexes was concerned. When she saw that there were traces of tooth-marks all over the fan, confirming her suspicion that it had been given to him by some light-of-love:
Without permitting any further explanation,
she broke it in two. By the time Hsi-men Ch'ing attempted to rescue it, it had already been torn to tatters.
"That fan was given to me by a friend named Pu Chih-tao,"[26] he protested. "I've only had it for three days, and you've torn it to tatters."
The woman had been harassing him for some time when Ying-erh came in with a cup of tea. Her stepmother told her to put it down and kowtow to Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"You've been nagging away for half the day already," said Dame Wang. "Enough is enough. Don't let yourselves miss the boat. I'll go downstairs and see to things in the kitchen."
The woman told Ying-erh to set up the table in the room where they were. In no time at all the wine and delicacies that had been prepared in advance for the celebration of Hsi-men Ch'ing's birthday, including, as might be expected, roast chicken, cooked goose, fresh fish, potted meat, fruits, and the like, were gotten ready, brought into the room, and set out on the table.
The woman opened a trunk and took out the things she had prepared for Hsi-men Ch'ing's birthday. She then arranged these on a tray and set it down in front of him, so he could see what she was giving him. There were: a pair of jet satin shoes; a pair of scent bags with the drawnwork inscription:
In secret tryst a lover's vow,
I'll follow you where'er you go;
a pair of russet satin kneepads, the borders of which were decorated with a motif of pines, bamboos, and plum blossoms, the "three cold-weather friends"; a sand-green waistband of Lu-chou pongee, decorated with the motifs of auspicious clouds and the symbolic representations of the "eight treasures," lined with watered-silk, fastened with purple cords, and enclosing a pocket filled with aromatic lysimachia and rose petals; and a hairpin in the shape of a double-headed lotus blossom, engraved with a pentasyllabic quatrain that read:
I have a lotus blossom with two heads:
To help keep your topknot in place.
As they grow from the same stem on your head,
So may we never abandon each other.
No sooner did Hsi-men Ch'ing see her gifts than his heart was filled with delight.
He pulled her into an embrace with one arm and gave her a kiss, saying, "Who would have thought you were as clever as this? Such skills are a rare thing."
The woman told Ying-erh to hold the winepot and pour a cup of wine for Hsi-men Ch'ing. Then:
Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze,
Just as though inserting a taper in its holder,

she kowtowed to him four times. Hsi-men Ch'ing hastened to pull her to her feet and the two of them:
Sat down shoulder to shoulder,
Exchanging cups as they drank.
Dame Wang took several cups of wine with them, until her face became bright red, and then said good-bye and went home, leaving the two of them to enjoy themselves as they pleased. After Ying-erh had seen Dame Wang on her way she locked the front door and went in to sit in the kitchen. The woman continued drinking wine with Hsi-men Ch'ing for some time.
Little by little evening began to fall. Behold:
Dense clouds obscure the evening peaks;
Dark mists streak the distant heavens.
Hosts of stars vie with the white moon
in their brilliance;
Green waters contend with the blue sky
in shades of aquamarine.
Monks make their way toward old temples:
Where, deep in the woods, they elicit
the cawing of crows.
Travellers head for desolate villages:
Where, among the lanes, they arouse the barking of dogs.
Perched on his branch, the cuckoo cries
at the night moon;
Within the garden, the powdered butterfly
flirts with the flowers.[27]
At this point Hsi-men Ch'ing told his pageboys to take the horse and go home since he had decided to spend the night at the woman's house. That evening the two of them were:
Just like cavorting sparrow hawks:
Exhausting themselves to please each other,
Indulging their lusts without restraint.
As the saying goes:
When joy reaches its zenith, it gives birth to sorrow;
When prosperity is at its height, adversity follows.[28]
Light and darkness alternate swiftly.
Let us now return to the story of Wu Sung. After taking charge of the district magistrate's letter and the consignment of presents, he set out from the district of Ch'ing-ho and escorted the shipment all the way to Defender-in-chief Chu Mien's establishment in the Eastern Capital. Once there, he duly turned over the consignment and engaged in several days of idle sightseeing; after which, having obtained a reply, he set out with his companions once again on the highway that led back to Shantung.
He had started out on his journey during the third or fourth month but by now, on his return trip, the heat of summer had diminished and it was already early autumn. It rained continuously along the way, and the delays that this occasioned prevented him from returning in the expected time. What with one thing and another, the round trip was going to end up taking him more than three months. Held up as he was by the rains and flooding along the route, his spirit was troubled and he felt uneasy in mind and body.
Anxious to hurry back as fast as he could in order to see his elder brother, he dispatched one of the local recruits in his party to travel ahead and inform the district magistrate of their situation. He also privately entrusted him with a family letter for his brother, Wu the Elder, in which he said he would be home before long, no later than sometime in the eighth month.
The local recruit delivered his report to the district magistrate and then set out to look for Wu the Elder's house. It just so happened that:
As providence would have it,
Dame Wang was in the front of her shop at the time.
When the local recruit saw that the door of Wu the Elder's house was shut, he was about to call for someone to open up when the old lady asked him, "Who are you looking for?"
"I've been sent by Captain Wu," replied the local recruit, "to deliver a letter to his elder brother."
"Wu the Elder's not at home," the old lady said. "They've all gone out to pay a visit to the family graves. If you've got a letter for him, you might as well give it to me. As soon as he comes home I'll see that he gets it. It's all the same whether he gets it from you or from me."
Bowing to her with an expression of gratitude, the local recruit pulled out the family letter and handed it over to Dame Wang; after which he hurriedly leapt onto his horse and flew on his way.
Dame Wang took the letter and went over to the woman's house by way of the back door that Ying-erh opened to let the old lady in. It so happened that the woman and Hsi-men Ch'ing had been at it for half the night and were sleeping late. It was almost lunchtime but they weren't up yet.
"Sir! And young lady!" Dame Wang called out to them. "Get up! There's something urgent I need to tell you about." She then proceeded:
Thus and thus, and
So and so,
to relate what had happened. "Wu the Second has sent a local recruit to deliver a letter to his elder brother, saying that he'll arrive back before long. I accepted the letter on his behalf and managed to fob off the messenger with a few words. This matter will brook no delay. You must decide on the best thing to do as soon as possible."
If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard about this, nothing might have happened but having heard these words, truly, it was just as though:
The eight-boned structure of his skull had been split asunder;
Only to have poured into it half a bucketful
of icy snow.[29]
As soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman had gotten up and put on their clothes, they invited Dame Wang into the room and offered her a seat. She took out the letter and handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing to read. Wu Sung said in the letter that he would arrive home no later than the Mid-autumn Festival, on the fifteenth day of the eighth month. This threw both of them into a panic.
"What are we going to do about this?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Godmother, please do whatever you can to protect us.
Your kindness will be amply rewarded,
We will never dare to forget it.
Right now:
Our mutual passions are as deep as the sea;
We can't bear to be parted from each other.
But when that bastard, Wu the Second, comes back we'll have to separate. What can we do?"
"Sir," said the old lady, "what's so hard about that? As I pointed out to you once before:
In one's first marriage one must obey one's parents;
In subsequent marriages one can suit oneself.
It's always been the case that:
Brothers and sisters-in-law do not ask after each other.[30]
Right now, Wu the Elder's 'hundredth day' is about to come up, and the young lady should engage a few Buddhist monks to preside over the burning of his spirit tablet. As soon as that ceremony is completed, and before Wu the Second gets back, you can pop her into a sedan chair, sir, and take her into your household as a concubine. Then, when that bastard, Wu the Second, arrives back, I'll explain the situation to him and he won't have anything to say in the matter. From then on the two of you can:
Live happily ever after,
and the whole damn business will come to nothing."
"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you're absolutely right. Truly:
If you aren't tough enough,
You will never be secure."
That day, by the time Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman had finished eating breakfast, they had decided that on the sixth day of the eighth month that was Wu the Elder's "hundredth day," they would engage monks to perform the Buddhist rites and burn the spirit tablet of the deceased; and that on the evening of the eighth day Hsi-men Ch'ing would send a sedan chair to carry the woman across his threshold. Not long after the three of them had completed their deliberations, Tai-an came back with the horse to take Hsi-men Ch'ing home. But no more of this.
Days and nights speed by like arrows;
The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.
Before long it was the sixth day of the eighth month. Hsi-men Ch'ing had brought several taels of loose silver and two pecks of polished rice to the woman's house to defray the expenses of the religious observances. He sent Dame Wang to the Pao-en Temple to engage the services of six Buddhist monks, who were to come to the house and perform a "land and water" mass for the benefit of Wu the Elder, and then preside over the burning of his spirit tablet the same evening.
The foreman of the lay workers from the temple arrived early in the morning, at the fifth watch, bearing with him the sutras that would be used in the liturgy. He prepared the consecrated space in which the ceremony would be held and hung up Buddhist effigies. Dame Wang, in the kitchen, supervised the cook who had been engaged to prepare the vegetarian offerings that would be required for the occasion. Hsi-men Ch'ing spent the preceding night at the woman's house.
Before long the monks arrived and started to sound their hand-chimes and strike their drums and cymbals as they embarked upon their declamatory recitations. The liturgy included excerpts from the Lotus Sutra[31] and the Litanies of Emperor Wu of the Liang Dynasty.[32] That morning they dispatched petitions inviting the representatives of the Three Jewels, the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha, to confer efficacy upon the ceremony by authenticating the covenant. These sacred beings were then invited to partake of the offerings presented to them. At noon the souls of the departed, on both land and water, were summoned to partake of the sustenance provided for their benefit but there is no need to describe this in detail.
To resume our story, how could P'an Chin-lien bring herself to observe the appropriate abstentions? She remained in bed with Hsi-men Ch'ing and, though the sun was already high in the sky, they had not yet arisen. It was only when the monks requested the presence of the ordainer of the rites to burn incense, sign the petitions, authenticate the covenant, and worship Buddha that she got up, washed her face and combed her hair, made a specious show of putting on mourning, and came out to pay her respects before the Buddhist effigies.
When the company of monks caught sight of Wu the Elder's wife:
Each and every one of them became oblivious to his Buddha nature and his meditative mind;
Each and every one of them lost control of
"the monkey of his mind and the horse of his will."[33]
All at sevens and eights,
They melted into a heap.
Behold:
The rector becomes flippant;
In reciting the Buddhas' names
he gets them backward.
The precentor becomes confused;
In chanting the words of the sutras
his intonation goes astray.
The incense-burning acolyte,
Knocks over the flower vase.
The candle-bearing ascetic,
Picks up the incense case instead.
The lector who declaims the covenant,
Reads the "Great Sung Empire"
as the "Great T'ang."
The teacher who enacts the rite of repentance,
Reads "Wu the Elder"
as "Grandfather Wu."
The abbot is so flustered;
He grabs the hand of an acolyte
instead of his drumstick.
The novice is so carried away;
He hammers on the pate of an old monk instead of the bronze chime.
All the merit of their former austerities comes to nothing in a moment:

Even a myriad guardian deities could not reduce them to order.[34]
As soon as the woman had burned incense before the effigies, signed the petitions, and paid homage to Buddha, she returned to her room to keep Hsi-men Ch'ing company as before. A feast of wine and meat was laid on, and they gave themselves over to pleasure.
"If anything should come up," Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Dame Wang, "just take care of it yourself. Don't let them come around and pester the lady of the house."
"You can relax, sir," the old lady said with a laugh. "Just leave those shaven-pated bastards to me. The two of you might as well enjoy yourselves."
Gentle reader take note: In this world Buddhist monks of such high virtue and attainments that they can remain:
Impervious to the temptations of the flesh;[35] are few. A man of old has said:
In one word they are "bonzes,"
In two words they are "Buddhist monks,"
In three words they are "purveyers of demonic music,"
In four words they are "sex-starved hungry ghosts."[36]
Moreover, as Su Shih[37] has said:
The untonsured are not vicious,
The unvicious are not tonsured,
The vicious are most likely to be tonsured,
The tonsured are most likely to be vicious.[38]
The subject of this disquisition is how hard it is for monks to keep their vows. Living as they do in their high halls and spacious structures, occupying their sanctuaries and dormitories, supported by the alms of their benefactors so that they can count on three meals a day without having to plant or to plow, and without a worry in the world to occupy their minds, they are able to devote all their attention to lust. Laymen, on the other hand, no matter whether they be scholars, farmers, artisans, or merchants, and even though they be wealthy, distinguished, respected, and well-favoured, are often so preoccupied with the pursuit of fame and profit or the demands of social intercourse that even though they have beautiful wives or young concubines at their disposal, the sudden recollection of some besetting problem, or the discovery that the rice-jar is empty and the woodshed short of fuel, is enough to make them lose all interest in such things. This is an arena in which they are no match for the monks.[39] There is a poem that testifies to this:
Sex-starved hungry ghosts, they are like long-haired monkeys among the beasts;
Disregarding their vows in the pursuit of lust,
they sully the way of the patriarchs.
These creatures are only fit to be seen in their natural habitat;
They should never be invited into the decorated halls of one's home.[40]
That morning when the company of monks beheld the spectacle presented by Wu the Elder's wife, it made an indelible impression on them. When they came back from the temple, to which they had returned for their midday repast and a rest from their labours, the woman was in her room drinking wine and enjoying herself with Hsi-men Ch'ing.
It so happens that the woman's bedroom was right next to the consecrated space that had been set aside for the performance of the Buddhist ceremony. There was only the single thickness of a board wall between them. One of the monks, who had arrived before the rest, went up to the basin outside the woman's bedroom window to wash his hands. Suddenly he overheard the woman:
In a trembling voice and melting tones,
Sighing and moaning,
Panting and groaning,
just as though she were engaged in the act of sexual intercourse with someone in her room. At this the monk, pretending to wash his hands, stood there eavesdropping for quite a while.
He overheard the woman appealing in a soft voice to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Daddy, how long are you going to keep on banging away like that? I'm afraid the monks may come back and hear something. Let me off for now and come as quickly as you can."
"There's no need to get so excited," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. I still haven't burnt the moxa on the top of your mons."[41]
Who would have thought that everything they said to each other was so clearly overheard by that shaven-pated rascal that he might well have ejaculated:
"Is it not delightful?"[42]
After a while, when the whole company of monks had reassembled and they resumed their performance of the liturgy, the word passed from mouth to mouth until they all knew that the woman was carrying on with a man in her room. Imperceptibly they began to reenact the imagined scene:
Miming it with their hands, and
Dancing it with their feet.[43]
By the time the Buddhist ceremony was nearing its completion that evening and the celebrants had moved outside to send the spirit of the departed on its way and burn the paper money that it would need in the other world, the woman had long since divested herself of her mourning and changed into a more colourful outfit. She and Hsi-men Ch'ing stood, shoulder to shoulder, just inside the hanging blind in the doorway, and watched the monks as they prepared to burn Wu the Elder's spirit tablet. Dame Wang brought out a bucket of water, a torch was lit, and in no time at all the spirit tablet and the Buddhist effigies were consumed by the flames.
The shaven-pated rascals with their cold eyes perceived the silhouettes of the man and the woman standing shoulder to shoulder inside the screen and were reminded of the goings-on they had overheard during the day. With one accord they fell to beating their drums and banging their cymbals as if their souls depended on it. A gust of wind blew the abbot's Vairocana hat onto the ground, exposing a bluish, finely polished, shiny pate. No one picked it up but they all continued banging their cymbals, beating their drums, and:
Falling into a heap with laughter.
"Reverend sir," called out Dame Wang, "the paper money has already been burnt. Why do you keep on banging away like that?"
"We still haven't burnt the incense on the top of the furnace,"[44] replied the monk.
When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he told Dame Wang to distribute the fee for their services as quickly as possible.
"Won't the lady who ordained the rites come out so we can thank her?" asked the abbot.
"Dame Wang," the woman said, "tell them I'd prefer to be excused."
"We'd better let her off for now," the monks replied and went their way convulsed with laughter. Truly, if one's real work had ever found favour in the eyes of one's contemporaries; one would not have had to spend money on rouge in order to paint peonies.[45] There is a poem that testifies to this:

Even while burning the spirit tablet the wanton woman is dissatisfied;
Listening by the wall-side eavesdropping monks get an earful.
If Buddhism or Taoism were really capable of absolving her of her sins;
Even the dead, on hearing of such things would be dispirited.

Higher and yet higher the red dawn
Creeps slowly up the casement.
She wakes and throws her silken wrapper
Carelessly across one breast.
Is it not strange
This rising while the sun is not yet high?
Blown by the gentle breeze
The hastening flowers wander through the tower of jade.
She could not sleep
The image of her loved one lingered always with her.

Now that Ximen Qing had married Meng Yulou, their love was so deep that they could not bear to be away from one another even for a moment. One day old woman Wen came on behalf of the Chen family to propose that the marriage arranged between their son and Ximen's daughter should be celebrated on the twelfth day of the sixth month. Ximen Qing, in a great state of excitement, took one of his new wife's gilded Nanjing beds for his daughter. For more than a month he was so busy preparing for the ceremony that he could not find time to go and see Pan Jinlian. Day after day she leaned upon the door, and looked out for him till her eyes could see no longer. At last she asked old woman Wang to go to his house. The old woman went but the servants knew whence she had come and paid no attention to her. Jinlian waited and waited but still Ximen did not come and, after old woman Wang's fruitless visit, she told Ying'er to go to the street and see if she could see him. The girl did not venture to enter the great house, or even the courtyard but stood in the gateway and peeped inside. But she too could see no sign of Ximen Qing and had to go back again. When she got home, Jinlian spat in her face, cursed and beat her, because, she said, she was no use. She made the child kneel down until midday, and would give her nothing to eat. Then, finding the hot weather very trying, she told Ying'er to heat some water that she might take a bath, and to cook some little meat pasties for Ximen Qing to eat if he should come.
Jinlian was wearing a thin gossamer shift, and she sat on her little bed. When her lover did not come, she cursed him for a fickle rogue. This made her only the more sad. With her slender fingers she took off her red embroidered shoes, and began to use them for working out the magic diagrams of love. There was no one she could talk to, and she used coins to try and find out what her absent lover was thinking of.
Jinlian played at the love diagrams for a long time. Then she tired of them and lay down to sleep. An hour later she awoke in a very bad temper. "Mother," Ying'er said, "the water is hot now; will you take your bath?"
"Are the pasties cooked?" Jinlian asked. "Bring them here and let me see." Ying'er hastily brought them, and Jinlian counted them with her dainty fingers. She had made a tray of thirty but, though she counted again and again, she could not find more than twenty-nine.
"Where is the other one?" she cried.
"I haven't seen it," Ying'er said: "you must have counted wrong."
"I have counted them twice. I want thirty for your father to eat. How dare you steal one? You are an impudent, whorish little slave. I suppose you were dying of starvation, and couldn't do without one of these particular pasties! A bowl of rice, whether large or small, is not good enough for you. Do you imagine I made them for you?"
Without giving the girl a chance to say a word, she stripped off her clothes and beat her twenty or thirty times with a whip, till she squealed like a pig being killed. "If I have to ask you again, and you still lie to me, I will most certainly beat you a hundred times."
The girl could bear no more. "Mother, don't beat me," she cried, "I was so hungry I had to take one."
"Why did you say I'd counted them wrongly, when you knew you'd stolen one? I knew it was you, you little whore, you thief. When that turtle was alive, you knew one or two things, and told him a great deal more than you really knew. Now he is not here. You play your tricks right in front of my eyes. I will break every bone in your whorish little body."
She beat the girl for some time longer, then made her put on her drawers, and told her to stand beside her and fan her. When the girl had fanned her for a long time, Jinlian cried, "Turn your face to me, you little strumpet, and I'll pinch it." Ying'er turned and the woman, with her long sharp nails, pinched it till the blood came. Then she let go. After a while, she went to the dressing table to dress again before going to stand at the door.
At last the Heavens relented. Daian on horseback, carrying a parcel, passed her door.
"Where are you going?" she cried.
The boy was by no means lacking in intelligence, and he had often come with his master to this house. Jinlian was in the habit of giving him little presents. He knew her quite well. He dismounted and said, "I have been with a present to one of the officers and now I'm going home."
"What is happening at your Father's?" Jinlian said. "Why hasn't he been here? It looks as though he had another sweetheart."
"He has no new sweetheart. But for the last few days everybody in the house has been very busy, and he couldn't get away."
"If he has been so busy, why didn't he send me word? I have been worried about him for ever so long. Tell me, what is he really doing?"
The boy smiled. He did not answer, and this made Jinlian think there must be something behind it all. Once again she asked him eagerly, "What has been happening?"
"Well, if there was anything," Daian said, smiling, "why should you want to know all about it?"
"If you don't tell me, little oily mouth, I will hate you all your life."
"If I tell you," the boy said, "you mustn't let my master know I did so."
Jinlian promised, and Daian told her how his master had married Meng Yulou. The woman could not prevent the tears from falling over her beautiful face. Daian was very much embarrassed. "Oh, Aunt," he said, "how easily upset you are. That is just why I didn't want to tell you." Jinlian leaned upon the door and sighed deeply.
"You don't understand," she said, "you don't know how fond of one another we used to be. And now he has cast me aside." Her tears fell faster and faster.
"You shouldn't let yourself be so distressed," Daian said. "Even our Great Lady can't keep him in order."
"Listen to me, Daian," said Jinlian. She sang a song to him about the fickleness of men.
Then she began to cry again. "Please don't cry," Daian said, "I'm sure he will come and see you very soon. Write him a short note and let me take it to him. He will certainly come when he gets it."
"I will, indeed," Jinlian said, "and, if you will be so kind, you shall have a fine pair of shoes for your pains. I should like him to come in time for me to congratulate him on his birthday but whether he comes or not will depend absolutely on your little oily tongue."
She told Ying'er to put some of the pasties onto a dish, and asked Daian to have some tea. Meanwhile she went into her room, took a sheet of flowered paper, and wrote with a sheep's-hair brush in a jade holder. In a few minutes she had written this poem:
The words upon this flowered paper come from my heart.
I remember that our hair once mingled on the pillow.
How often I have leaned upon the door, under the lattice, filled with countless fears.
Now, if you are false to me, if you will not come Give back to me my dainty handkerchief.
When she had written this, she folded the paper in a lover's knot and gave it to Daian. "Tell him he must come on his birthday. I shall be waiting most anxiously for him."
When the boy had eaten the cakes and the pasties, Jinlian gave him a handful of coins. As he was about to mount his horse, she said, "When you get home and see your Father, tell him that I am very angry with him. Tell him that if he does not come here, I shall get a sedan chair and come to him."
"Lady," the boy said, "you mustn't do anything of the sort. You would be like a dumpling seller trying to do business with a fortune-teller. You would never get a fair deal." He rode away.
Day after day, early and late, Jinlian waited for Ximen Qing but he did not come. It was the end of the seventh month and his birthday was approaching. To Jinlian everyday seemed like three autumns and every night like half a summer. Still no word came from him. She clenched her pearly teeth and rivers of tears flowed from her eyes. One evening she prepared a meal, and asked old woman Wang to come and see her. She took a silver pin from her hair and gave it to the old woman, entreating her to go to Ximen's house and ask him to come.
"This is no time to go," the old woman said, "he will certainly not be able to come now. I will go and see him tomorrow morning."

"You must not forget, Stepmother."
"I am not unused to such business," the old woman said. "I'm not likely to lose any time in a matter of this sort."
Old woman Wang never did anything without being paid. This time the pin was her reward. She drank till her face was very red, and then went home.
Jinlian burned incense to perfume the bedclothes, and lighted the silver lamp. Long and softly she sighed to express the inmost feelings of her heart. All through the long night she played the lute, till the silence and loneliness of the empty house made her feel that she could play no longer. And as she played, she sang. She tossed about all night, unable to sleep. As soon as it was light, she sent Ying'er to see whether old woman Wang had gone to see Ximen Qing. The little girl came back and told her that the old woman had gone.
It was still early when old woman Wang reached Ximen's gate. She asked the servants about him but they all said they knew nothing. She waited a long time, standing by the wall opposite the gate, till Clerk Fu came out and opened the shop. She went over and greeted him respectfully. "Excuse me," she said politely, "but is his Lordship at home?"
"What do you want with him?" Fu said. "Yesterday his Lordship entertained a number of guests to celebrate his birthday and, after drinking all day here, they went to the bawdy house last night. He has not come back yet, and you will probably find him still there."
The old woman thanked him and set off down East Street to the lane in which the bawdy house was. There she met Ximen, on horseback, coming from the opposite direction, and two boys attending him. He was half drunk, nodding to and fro upon his horse, and his bleary eyes could hardly see. "You ought not to get as drunk as this, Sir," old woman Wang shouted. She took hold of his bridle.
"Hello, Stepmother Wang, is that you?" Ximen Qing drunkenly mumbled. "I suppose Sister Wu has sent you to look for me?"
The old woman whispered something. "My boy said something about it some time ago," Ximen said. "I hear she is very angry with me. I'll go and see her now." He chatted with the old woman as they went along. When they came to the door, old woman Wang went in first.
"Now you ought to be happy, Lady," she said. "In less than half an hour I've brought his Lordship to you."
Jinlian was so delighted that he seemed like a visitor from Heaven. She ran downstairs to meet him. Ximen Qing waved his fan airily and went in, still neither drunk nor sober. He gave the woman a nod, and in return she made a profound reverence.
"You are indeed a nobleman, my Lord, and not the sort of man who is to be gazed upon any day. Where have you been all this time? I suppose you have been so taken up with your new wife that you haven't had time for me?"
"My new wife!" Ximen said. "What do you mean? Surely you don't believe all the tittle-tattle you hear. I have not had time to come and see you. I have been busy making arrangements for my daughter's wedding."
"Still trying to deceive me, are you?" Jinlian cried. "Well, if this is not a case of off with the old love and on with the new, you must take oath upon your body."
"If I have forgotten you," Ximen Qing said, "may my body become the size of a bowl of rice and may I suffer for three years or more from yellow sickness. May a caterpillar as large as a carrying pole bite a hole in my pocket."
"You fickle rascal, what harm will it do you if a caterpillar as large as that does bite a hole in your pocket?" She went up to him and, snatching off his hat, threw it on the floor. Old woman Wang hastily picked it up and put it on the table.
"Lady," she cried, "you were angry with me because I didn't make his Worship come, and, when he does come, you treat him like this."
Jinlian pulled a pin from his hair, held it up, and looked at it. It was of gold, with two rows of characters engraved upon it.
The horse, with golden bridle, neighs on the sweet turf.
In the season of apricot blossoms, they who dwell in the jade tower drink till they are merry.
This pin belonged to Yulou but Jinlian thought some singing girl had given it to him. She thrust it into her sleeve. "Now will you say you haven't changed? Where is the pin I gave you?"
"The other day," Ximen said, "I was rather tipsy and fell off my horse. My hat blew away and my hair was all in a mess. I looked everywhere for the pin but could not find it."
Jinlian snapped her fingers in his face. "Brother, you are so drunk you don't know what you're saying. A child of three would see through a story like that."
"Don't be so hard on his Lordship," old woman Wang said. "He is one of those men who can see a bee piddling forty miles away but not an elephant outside their very own doors."
"When she is nearly done," Ximen Qing said, "you begin."
Jinlian saw a scarlet-trimmed finely gilded fan. She snatched it from him and took it to the light to look at. She was well skilled in the arts of love, and she was sure that certain marks upon it had been caused by teeth. She came to the conclusion that some girl must have given him the fan, and without a word tore it into pieces. Before Ximen Qing could stop her it was in shreds.
"My friend Bu Zhidao gave me that fan," he said, "and I've kept it put away for a long time. I've only been using it for two or three days, and now you've gone and spoiled it."
Jinlian plagued him a little longer, and then Ying'er brought in tea. The woman told her to put down the tray and kowtow to Ximen Qing.
"You two have been quarreling quite long enough," old woman Wang said. "Don't forget that you have more important business to attend to. I'll go into the kitchen and get something ready for you."
Jinlian told Ying'er to bring wine and refreshments in honour of Ximen's birthday. The girl obeyed and soon a meal was set upon the table. Jinlian brought out her own present and, setting it on a tray, offered it to him. Besides a pair of black silk shoes, there was a pair of breeches made of purple silk, double sewn and embroidered with a design of pine, bamboo, and plum blossom, the three cold-weather friends. They were lined with green silk, scented with fragrant herbs, and the braces were again of purple. The stomacher was embroidered with roses. There was also a pin like the petals of the double lotus, on which was engraved a verse of four sentences, each sentence consisting of four characters:
A double lotus, I,
To dress your hair.
Do not forget me
Like a neglected ornament.
Ximen Qing was delighted with these presents. He caught Jinlian to him and kissed her. "I never knew you were so clever," he said.
Jinlian told Ying'er to bring the wine jar that she might offer Ximen a cup of wine. As she bowed four times in reverence before him, she seemed as graceful as a branch laden with blossoms, and each time she stood up as straight as a candle. Ximen Qing quickly lifted her up, and they sat together side by side. Old woman Wang drank several cups of wine with them and then went home, her face very red. Then they abandoned all restraint, and drank for a long time till darkness fell.
Dark clouds have gathered over the mountains
A chain of deepest mist stretches far into the distance.
Stars come out to challenge the brightness of the moon
And the green waters of the lake mirror the sky.
The monks return to their ancient temples
While, in the depths of the forest, the crows fly, crying
Caw, caw, caw.
People hasten back to the distant villages
And in the tiny hamlets the dogs bark
Bow, wow, wow.
Ximen Qing decided to stay the night with Jinlian, and ordered the boys to take his horse home. That night they spent their whole strength in the enjoyment of one another, and their passionate delight knew no bounds. Yet, as the proverb says, "When joy is at its height, there comes sad news." The time flew by.

* * *

We must now return for a while to Wu Song. He had taken the magistrate's treasure to the palace of the Grand Marshal in the Eastern Capital. When he had safely handed over the letters and the chests, he stayed some time waiting for the return letter, and then ordered his men to start back to Shandong. When he had started, it was the third or fourth month; now it was already autumn. Rain fell incessantly, and they had to halt for a few days. He had already been away about three months, and somehow, on this journey homewards, he seemed unable to rid himself of a feeling of great uneasiness. At last he made up his mind to send one of the soldiers before him to carry a report to the magistrate and a letter to his brother, Wu Da. In this he said he would be home some time during the eighth month.
The soldier arrived and, after giving the letter to the magistrate, went off to find Wu Da. It so happened that old woman Wang was standing outside her door when the soldier was just about to knock at Wu Da's house. She went across and said to him, "What is it you want?"
"I have orders from Captain Wu," the soldier said, "to give this letter to his brother."
"Master Wu Da is not at home," the old woman said. "He has gone to visit his family tombs. Give me the letter and he shall have it as soon as he comes back. That is the best thing you can do."
The soldier saluted, took out the letter, and gave it to the old woman. Then he jumped on his horse and rode away. Old woman Wang immediately brought the letter to Jinlian's back door. She and Ximen Qing were not yet up; they had spent half the night in amorous combat.
"Get up, Master and Mistress," the old woman cried, "here is news for you. Wu Song has sent a soldier with a letter for his brother to say he is coming back shortly. I took the letter and sent the soldier about his business but you will have to do something about it, and not waste any time."
Ximen Qing was feeling perfectly contented with life but, when he heard this news, it seemed to him that the eight pieces of his skull had fallen apart and somebody was pouring a great jar of ice and snow through the opening. He and Jinlian quickly leapt out of bed, threw their clothes on, and asked the old woman to come in. She gave the letter to Ximen Qing to read. It only said that Wu Song would be back not later than the Autumn Day but this was enough to make the lovers beside themselves with anxiety.
"What shall we do, Stepmother?" they cried. "If you can only think of some way out for us, we shall be so grateful that we shall find a splendid reward for you. We are so fond of one another that we cannot bear to be apart. But, if Wu Song comes back, we shall be obliged to separate, and life won't be worth living."
"Sir," said the old woman, "why all this to-do? I told you once before that first marriages were arranged for people by their parents but that second marriages are the concern of no one but the parties themselves. Nobody has ever suggested that a man and his brother's wife belong to the same family. Wu Da has been dead a hundred days or so. Lady, you must ask a few monks to come and burn his tablet before Wu Song comes back. Then you, Sir, must send a sedan chair and take her into your establishment. When Wu Song does come back, I will have a word with him, and what is there he can do? You will be able to spend all your lives together. Isn't that good enough for you?"
"You are right, Stepmother," Ximen Qing said. He and Jinlian breakfasted together, and it was decided that on the sixth day of the eighth month there should be a final requiem for Wu Da, when they would send for monks and have the tablet burned. Two days later Ximen Qing would take Jinlian into his own household. When all these arrangements had been made, Daian came with a horse and Ximen went home.
Time sped like an arrow in flight. The sun and moon crossed and recrossed like a weaver's shuttles. It was the sixth day of the eighth month. Ximen Qing brought several taels of silver to Wu Da's house, and told old woman Wang to go to the Temple of Eternal Felicity and ask six monks to come and sing a dirge for Wu Da and to burn his tablet the same evening. Before it was fully light the temple attendants came with their sacred books and instruments. They set up a lectern and hung their pictures all around, and old woman Wang in the kitchen helped the cooks to prepare vegetarian food. Ximen Qing spent the whole day there. Soon the monks arrived, tinkling their bells and beating their drums. They read their sacred books and intoned their exorcisms.
Jinlian would perform none of the due purifications. She slept with Ximen Qing till the sun was high in the heavens, and she would not have risen then, had not the monks come to invite her to burn incense, sign the documents, and make her reverence to Buddha. Finally she dressed herself in white and went to worship Buddha.
As soon as the monks saw her, their Buddhist hearts were troubled and their Buddhist natures stimulated to a furious degree, so that their passions ran away with them, and they were in such a state that they did not know what they were doing.
The precentor lost his wits and, as he read the sacred books
Knew not if they were upside down.
The holy priests went mad and read their prayers
By no means sure what line they read.
The thurifer upset the vases, and the acolyte seized the incense boat
Thinking it was his candle.
The lector should have read "The Mighty Empire of Song"
But called it "Tang" instead.
The exorcist, who should have chanted "Master Wu" cried "Mistress Wu."
The old monk's heart so wildly beat
He missed the drum and struck the young monk's hand.
The young monk's mind was so distraught
He used the drumstick on the old monk's head.
Long patient years of novicehood were all undone
And had ten thousand saints come down to earth
It would have been no better.
Jinlian burned incense before the image of Buddha, signed the papers, and made a reverence. Then she went back to her room and began again to play with Ximen Qing. She never even dreamed of abstaining from wine or any kind of food.
"If there should be anything that requires attention," Ximen said to old woman Wang, "you attend to it, and don't let anybody come to disturb the lady."
"You young people enjoy yourselves," the old woman said, laughing. "If there is anything to be done for these shaven-headed fellows, I'll do it."
Now that the monks had seen how beautiful Wu Da's widow was, they could not put her out of their minds. When they came back again from their temple after the evening meal, Jinlian was still drinking and making merry with Ximen Qing. There was only a wooden partition between her room and the temporary chapel. One of the monks had come back before the others and was washing his hands in a basin outside the window of her room when he heard soft whisperings and gentle murmurings that left him in little doubt about what was going on. He stopped washing his hands and stood still to listen. He heard Jinlian say, "Sweetheart, how long will you continue? The monks will be back soon and they may hear us. Do let me go. We must finish."
"Don't be in a hurry," Ximen's voice said. "I should like to 'set the cover on fire' just once more." It never occurred to them that there was a monk listening to every word they said.
Then all the monks came back, and they began to make music and intone their orisons. One told another, till there was none who did not know that Wu Da's widow was entertaining her lover in the house. They waved their arms and feet wildly without the slightest idea of what they were doing. Thus were the Buddhist services performed, and thus, this night, they sped Wu Da's spirit on its lonely journey.
Jinlian took off her mourning robes, dressed herself beautifully, and came to stand with Ximen Qing behind the lattice. They watched the monks preparing to burn the tablet and old woman Wang carrying water and fire. At last the tablet and the Buddhist pictures were completely consumed.
Thievish shaven-heads peered with cold eyes through the lattice. A man and a woman standing shoulder to shoulder could vaguely be seen. This brought to their minds the remembrance of what had happened before, and they struck their instruments discordantly. An old monk's hat was blown off by the wind and his bluish bald pate appeared. He did not pick up his hat but went on thumping his instrument and roaring with laughter. Old woman Wang called, "Reverend Fathers, you have finished your service. Why do you beat your instruments any longer?"
"We haven't set fire to the cover of a paper stove yet," one of the monks cried.
Ximen Qing heard this, he told the old woman, "Give them their fee and send them packing."
But the old monk insisted, "We must see the lady first and thank her."
"Please tell them that's quite unnecessary," Jinlian said.
But the monks answered with one voice, "Do let us go." Then roaring with laughter, they all went off

030

Hsi-men Ch'ing Conspires to Marry P'an Chin-lien, Captain Wu Song seeks to avenge his Brother & Mistakenly Assaults Li Wai-ch'uan

There is a lyric to the tune Partridge Sky that goes:

With lustful daring as big as the sky, they can no longer control themselves;
Their passions deep, their love fast, the two are inseparable.
Preoccupied with the present and the pleasures that they share;
How can they anticipate what future dangers lurk within their screen-walls?
Greedy for delight, they set their fancies free:
But the stouthearted hero, for his part is bent on revenge.

The Lord of Heaven has his own way of disposing such affairs;
Victory and defeat, success and failure, never cease to alternate.

By the time Hsi-men Ch'ing and P'an Chin-lien were finished with the burning of Wu the Elder's spirit tablet they had already exchanged their mourning for more colourful garments. That evening they prepared a feast to which they invited Dame Wang in order to bid her farewell. Chin-lien turned Ying-erh over to Dame Wang to look after and they then instructed her as follows: "When Wu the Second comes back, just say that the young lady had no way to support herself, and her mother urged her to take steps for the future, so she married a merchant from another town and went off with him." The woman's trunks had already been dispatched to Hsi-men Ch'ing's house the day before. The broken-down furniture and old clothes that remained were all bequeathed to Dame Wang. Hsi-men Ch'ing also rewarded her for her exertions with a tael of silver. The next day, in a single sedan chair, accompanied by four lanterns and escorted by Dame Wang and Tai-an, he had the woman carried off to his home. There was no one who lived on that street, whether far or near, who did not know about this affair but they were all afraid of Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was not above resorting to strong-arm tactics and possessed both money and influence, so who would have dared to interfere? Someone who lived in the locality composed a doggerel quatrain in commemoration of this event that sums it up very well:

Hsi-men Ch'ing's lack of shame is truly laughable;
"First seducing and then marrying,"[2] his ill fame is notorious.
Inside the sedan chair there sits a wanton whore;
While tagging at her heels, there follows an old procuress.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing took the woman into his household he had the three ground-floor rooms of the two-storied belvedere in his garden made ready to serve as her living quarters. She had a little courtyard all to herself, to which the only entrance was a postern gate, and flowers and potted miniature plants had been provided for decoration. It was an extremely secluded place where people seldom came even during the daytime. One of the rooms served as her living room and another as her bedroom.

Hsi-men Ch'ing subsequently laid out sixteen taels of silver to buy her a black lacquer bedstead, elaborately adorned with gold tracery, bed curtains of scarlet silk with gold roundels, a dressing case ornamented with floral rosettes, and a complete complement of tables, chairs, and porcelain taborets embossed with patterns of ornamental brocade.

Wu Yüeh-niang, the First Lady of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, employed two maidservants in her quarters, one of whom was named Ch'un-mei, or Spring Plum Blossom, and the other Yü-hsiao, or Jade Flute. Hsi-men Ch'ing reassigned Ch'un-mei to Chin-lien's quarters, directing her to serve her new mistress diligently and address her as Mother. He then laid out five taels of silver to buy another young maidservant, named Hsiao-yü, or Little Jade, to wait on Yüeh-niang, and a further six taels of silver to buy a scullery maid for Chin-lien, whose name was Ch'iu-chü, or Autumn Chrysanthemum.

P'an Chin-lien was designated as the Fifth Lady in the hierarchy of Hsi-men Ch'ing's wife and concubines. There was a former maidservant, named Sun Hsüeh-o, or Snow Moth, who had come into his household as part of the dowry of his deceased wife, née Ch'en. She was about nineteen years old, petite in stature, and good-looking. Hsi-men Ch'ing had already granted her the right to wear the fret on her chignon that was a mark of nonservile status and had designated her as his Fourth Lady. That is why Chin-lien was designated as the Fifth Lady. Now that this matter has been explained we will say no more about it.

No sooner had this woman been brought across the threshold than the members of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, both high and low, became unhappy about the situation.

Gentle reader take note: In this world, women with fire in their eyes are extremely numerous. No matter how worthy and intelligent a wife may be, or how much she may protest that she will not be annoyed if her husband should take a concubine, when she is actually confronted with the situation and sees her husband going off to someone else's room to enjoy the pleasure of:

Sharing the same bed and a single pillow, though she be ever so fine by nature, to a greater or lesser extent:
Her countenance will sour and her heart be ill-disposed.
Truly:
What a pity that, in its perfect fullness,
the moon of this night:
Should shed its pure radiance on other gardens,
so near and yet so far.[3]

That evening Hsi-men Ch'ing slept in Chin-lien's chambers.
Like fish sporting in the water;[4]
Their pleasure could not be exceeded.

The next day the woman combed her hair and made herself up, put on her most attractive outfit, directed Ch'un-mei to accompany her with the ceremonial tea, and set out for the quarters of the First Lady, Wu Yüeh-niang that were located in the rear of the residential compound. The purpose of this visit was to pay her respects to the ladies of the household and to present the First Lady with the customary pair of "presentation shoes," which had been made by her own hand.

From her seated position Yüeh-niang carefully scrutinized her visitor. She saw that the woman was no more than twenty-four or twenty-five years old and was very good-looking. Behold:

Her eyebrows are shaped like willow leaves
in early spring:
Forever conveying a sense of longing
for the clouds and rain.
Her face is like peach blossoms
in the third month;
Covertly suggesting thoughts of breezes and moonlight.
Her slender waist is lissome;
So constricted as to render her an idle swallow or languid oriole.
Her sandalwood mouth is dainty;
Attractive enough to drive bees to distraction
and butterflies to madness.
Her jade countenance is alluring,
a flower that can also speak;
Her fragrant visage is enticing,
a jade that exudes its own bouquet.[5]

As Wu Yüeh-niang:
Scanned her from head to foot,
Her glamour ran downward apace;
Surveyed her from foot to head,
Her glamour flowed up with her gaze.[6]
If one were to describe her glamour;
It is like a shining pearl rolling on a crystal plate.
If one were to speak of her demeanor;
It is like a red apricot on a branch-tip
caught in the morning sun.[7]

When Yüeh-niang had looked her over for a while:
From her mouth no word was uttered but
In her heart she thought to herself,
"When the servants came home they used to talk a lot about Wu the Elder's wife but I had never set eyes on her. Now I can see that she really is as good-looking as they say. No wonder that ruffian of mine is so enamored of her!"

Chin-lien first kowtowed to Yüeh-niang and presented her with the customary pair of shoes. Yüeh-niang allowed her to kowtow to her four times. After this Chin-lien also paid her respects to Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and Sun Hsüeh-o, with whom she exchanged salutations on an equal footing as sisters. When these formalities were completed she stood to one side until Yüeh-niang ordered a maidservant to bring her a seat and had her sit down. Yüeh-niang directed the maidservants and other serving women in the household to address her as Fifth Lady.

The woman sat to one side and devoted her undivided attention to sizing up her new companions. She observed that Wu Yüeh-niang was about twenty-six years old and learned that she was called Yüeh-niang, or Moon Lady, because she had been born on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, the day of the Moon Festival. She had:

A face like a silver salver;
Eyes like apricots;
Was gentle in her movements;
Sedate, and of few words.

The Second Lady, Li Chiao-erh, had been a singing girl in the licensed quarter. She was pleasingly plump, rather heavy in build, and had the habit of merely giving a little cough when she was introduced to people. Although she was well versed in all the techniques that might be used to please a patron in bed, as might be expected of a well-known courtesan, she was no match for Chin-lien at the game of breeze and moonlight.

The Third Lady was Meng Yü-lou, who was the most recent addition to the household. She was about twenty-nine years old and had:

A pear-blossom complexion;
A willowy waist;
A tall stature;
And a melon-seed face,
With the addition of a few barely perceptible pockmarks.

She was possessed of a natural beauty, to be sure but the golden lotuses that peeked out from underneath her skirt were neither all that big nor all that small.

The Fourth Lady, Sun Hsüeh-o, had entered the household as a personal maid. She was:

Petite in stature;
Dainty in demeanor;
Adept at making bouillabaisse;
And could do a pretty pirouette upon the emerald disk.[8]

Chin-lien was able to size them all up in her mind with one sweep of her eyes.

After the "third-day celebrations" were over she got up early every morning and came to Yüeh-niang's quarters, where she kept her company in doing needlework or making shoes. She always insisted on:

Fetching things, whether they were wanted or not; and
Doing things, whether they were called for or not.[9]

In giving orders to the maids and addressing Yüeh-niang, the words "First Lady" were seldom out of her mouth.

She didn't have to play up to her with every trick at her disposal very often before Yüeh-niang was so delighted she scarcely knew what to do with herself. Yüeh-niang started to address her as Sister Six because she was the sixth sibling in her generation of the family, presented her with some of her favourite articles of clothing and jewellery, and invited her to eat her meals and drink tea at the same table with her.

When Li Chiao-erh and the others saw the misguided favour that Yüeh-niang showered upon her they were not happy about it.

"We've been here a lot longer than she has," they grumbled, "but who pays any attention to us? How long has she been here, anyway, that she should be pampered so? Our elder sister doesn't know what she's doing."

Truly:
Though the preceding carriages have overturned
by the thousands;
The carriages that follow continue to overturn in the same way.
No matter how clearly one may point out the safest route;
One's honest words are misconstrued
as ill-meant advice.[10]

To resume our story, once Hsi-men Ch'ing had taken P'an Chin-lien into his household she found herself dwelling in:

Vast courtyards and secluded mansions,
and was provided with clothing and jewellery to match.
A woman of beauty and a man of talent,
Both of them were in the prime of life.
In everything they were:
Like glue and like lacquer;
She was:
Obedient to his every whim.

And as for their lewd desires, no day went by on which they were not gratified. But let us put this aside for a moment and say no more about it.

Let us now return to the story of Wu Sung. He arrived back in Ch'ing-ho district before the first ten days of the eighth month were over, reported immediately to the district yamen, and handed over the reply he had brought back from the capital. On reading it the district magistrate was very pleased to learn that his consignment of gold and other valuables had reached its destination safely. He rewarded Wu Sung with ten taels of silver and treated him to wine and food but there is no need to describe all this.

Wu Sung then returned to his lodgings, changed his clothes and shoes, put on a new hat, locked the door of his room, and headed straight for Amethyst Street. When the neighbours who lived to either side saw that Wu Sung had come back, they felt so apprehensive they broke into a sweat.

"This is one of those times when:

Catastrophe will arise within the screen-wall of the house,"

they said to themselves. "Once this wrathful god has returned he'll never be willing to call it quits. Something dire is bound to happen."

Wu Sung strode up to his elder brother's front door, pulled aside the bamboo blind, and poked his head inside. Catching sight of no one but the young girl, Ying-erh, who was twisting thread in the hallway under the stairs, he said to himself, "My eyes must be deceiving me?" He called out, "Sister-in-law," but there was no reply. He called out, "Elder Brother," but, again, there was no reply. "My ears must be playing tricks on me," he thought. "Why is it that I don't hear any response from my elder brother or my sister-in-law?"

He went up to the young girl, Ying-erh, to ask what was going on but when she saw that it was her uncle who had come back she was too frightened to say anything.

"Where have your father and mother gone?" Wu Sung demanded but Ying-erh only started to cry and made no reply.

As he continued to press his inquiry Dame Wang, next door, overheard him and realized that it was Wu the Second who had returned. Fearful lest the cat be let out of the bag, she hurried over to help Ying-erh cover up the situation as best she could.

When Wu the Second saw that it was Dame Wang from next door he made her a bow and asked, "Where has my elder brother gone? And why is my sister-in-law nowhere to be seen?"

"Brother Two," the old lady said, "have a seat and I'll tell you all about it. After you left town, sometime in the fourth month, your elder brother came down with an awkward illness and died."

"When in the fourth month did my brother die?" Wu the Second demanded to know. "What kind of an illness was it? And whose medicine did he take?"

"It was on the twentieth day of the fourth month," said Dame Wang, "that your elder brother suddenly came down with an acute case of heart trouble. He was sick for eight or nine days.

The gods were besought and diviners consulted.[11]

Every kind of medical prescription was tried but nothing availed, and so he died."

"My elder brother never suffered from such an ailment before," said Wu the Second. "How could he get heart trouble and die, just like that?"

"Captain," said Dame Wang, "how can you talk that way?

Weather is characterized by unexpected storms;
Man is subject to unpredictable vicissitudes.[12]
When you take off your shoes and socks today;
Who knows whether you will put them on tomorrow?[13]
Who can be sure that nothing will ever happen to him?"[14]

"Where is my elder brother buried at the present time?" Wu the Second demanded to know.

"By the time your elder brother breathed his last," said Dame Wang, "there wasn't a candareen left in the house. Your sister-in-law, after all, is like a legless crab. Where could she go to look for a grave site or anything like that? Fortunately a wealthy man in the neighbourhood who was barely acquainted with Wu the Elder saw fit to help out by providing a coffin. There was nothing for it. After the body had lain in state for three days, it was carried outside the town and cremated."

"Where has my sister-in-law gone to now?" Wu the Second asked.

"She's still:

A young and delicate lass,"

said Dame Wang, "and had no means of support. She managed, somehow or other, to get through her hundred days of mourning, after which her mother urged her to take steps for the future. So, last month, she married a merchant from another town and went off with him. She left this karmic encumbrance of a step-daughter behind and asked me to look after her until you came back. Now that you're here, I can turn her over to you and thus fulfill my responsibilities in the matter."

When Wu the Second had heard her out, he thought to himself in silence for some time and then, abandoning Dame Wang unceremoniously, strode out the door and headed back to his lodgings in front of the district yamen. Opening the door, he went into his room, changed into a set of plain white garments, and sent his orderly out into the street to buy a hempen sash, a pair of cotton shoes, and a mourning cap to wear on his head. He also picked up some fruits and sweetmeats, incense sticks and candles, paper money and imitation gold and silver ingots, and so forth. Returning to his brother's home, he set up a new spirit tablet to Wu the Elder, prepared the soup and rice he had brought with him, lit lamps and candles on the table in front of the tablet, laid out the sacrificial wine and delicacies, and hung up funeral streamers with appropriate quotations from the sutras inscribed on them. It took him less than four hours, all told, to complete these arrangements.

A little after the first watch Wu the Second lit the incense, prostrated himself, and kowtowed, saying, "Elder Brother, hear me, if your departed soul be not too far away! When you were in this world you were of a meek disposition, and now that you are dead the circumstances remain unclear. Look you, if you have:

Suffered injustice and harbour resentment, as the victim of a murder, appear to me in a dream. As your brother I will undertake to:

Requite your wrong and assuage your resentment."

Pouring the wine to make a libation, and burning the paper money, Wu the Second commenced to weep aloud, saying, "After all:

We came into this world by the same route."

He wept to such effect that among the neighbours to either side there were none who were not moved.

When Wu the Second had finished weeping he shared the soup and rice, wine and delicacies, with his orderly and Ying-erh. As soon as they had eaten he sought out two sleeping mats, instructed his orderly to bed down beside him in the room where they were, sent Ying-erh off to her own room, and then, taking the other mat for himself, lay down in front of the table on which Wu the Elder's spirit tablet was located.

It was around midnight and Wu the Second:

Tossed first this way and then that,

but could not get to sleep. All he could do was to give vent to long sighs. His orderly, meanwhile, lay there, snoring away, stretched out as if he were a dead man. Wu the Second got to his feet to look around and saw that the glass lamp on the table that held the spirit tablet seemed to be:

Half alight and half extinguished.

He sat down on the mat again and started to talk to himself, saying, "When my elder brother was alive he was of a meek disposition, and now that he is dead the circumstances remain unclear."

Before he had finished speaking he suddenly became aware of a gust of cold wind swirling up from underneath the table that held the spirit tablet. Behold:

Devoid of shape and form,
Neither fog nor mist;
Swirling like an eerie wind,
its chill invades the bones;
Icy as a baleful breath,
its cold penetrates the flesh.
Nebulous and dark,
It causes the lamplight before the tablet
to grow dim;
Somber and spectral,
It makes the paper money on the wall
fly every which way.
All too dimly, it conceals
the poison-eater's ghost;
With a flutter, it ruffles his soul-inducting banner:[15]

This gust of cold wind made Wu the Second's hair stand on end. When he took a close look, he saw someone climbing out from underneath the table that held the spirit tablet, who called out to him, "Younger Brother, I died a grievous death!"

Wu the Second could not see him distinctly but by the time he started forward to enquire further the cold wind had dissipated and the figure was no longer to be seen.

Wu the Second collapsed onto the mat and sat there thinking to himself, "How uncanny!

Was it a dream or not a dream?

Just now my elder brother wanted to tell me something but my vital spirits caused his soul to disperse. It seems clear that this death of his must have been the result of foul play."

As he listened he heard the watchman strike the third quarter of the third watch. He looked over at his orderly, who was still fast asleep, and then, muttering unhappily to himself, "I'll have to wait till dawn before I can do anything about it," he fell into a fitful sleep.

Eventually, at the fifth watch, the cock crowed and it began to grow light in the east. The orderly got up to heat some water. After Wu the Second had washed and rinsed out his mouth, he woke up Ying-erh, so she could look after the house, and went out, taking the orderly with him.

As he went along the street he asked the neighbours who lived in the vicinity, "How did my elder brother come to die? And who has my sister-in-law married herself off to?"

The neighbours who lived on that street knew perfectly well what had happened but they were all afraid of Hsi-men Ch'ing, so no one cared to interfere.

All they would say was, "Captain, there's no need to enquire any further. Dame Wang lives right next door. Just ask Dame Wang and you'll find out what you want to know."

A certain busybody also told him, "That Yün-ko who sells pears and Ho the Ninth, the coroner's assistant, are two people who know a good deal about it."

Wu the Second proceeded immediately to the commercial centre of town to look for Yün-ko but couldn't find him at first. Then he spotted the little monkey, carrying a basket woven out of willow osiers in his hand, on his way back from the rice store.

"Yün-ko," called out Wu the Second, "your brother salutes you."

When the young scamp saw that it was Wu the Second who accosted him, he said, "Captain Wu, you've shown up just a step too late. And another thing. My father's in his sixties and there's no one else to look after him. I can't very well let myself get involved in a lawsuit with you just for the fun of it!"

"Good Little Brother," said Wu the Second, "come with me." Leading him to the upper floor of a restaurant, he summoned the waiter and ordered him to have two meals prepared for them.

"You may be young, Little Brother," Wu the Second said to Yün-ko, "but you've got the filial desire to maintain your family. I'm afraid I don't have anything much to offer."

After groping around in his pocket, he produced five taels worth of loose silver and gave it to Yün-ko, saying. "You take this for the time being and use it to provide for your father's expenses. There's a matter in which you can be of use to me. Once it's taken care of I'll give you another ten taels or so of silver that you can employ as capital in your trade. Now tell me in detail, whom did my elder brother quarrel with? Who plotted to do him in? And who carried my sister-in-law off in marriage? Tell me everything you know about it and don't conceal anything."

Yün-ko accepted the silver with alacrity, thinking to himself as he did so, "This five taels of silver is enough to provide for my father for three to five months. So even if I get involved in a lawsuit with him it won't matter."

"Brother Two," he said, "hear me out, and try not to get too upset at what I tell you."

Thereupon he told him the whole story, from beginning to end: how he had gone looking for Hsi-men Ch'ing to peddle some pears, how he had subsequently been beaten by Dame Wang, who wouldn't let him into her room, how he had helped Wu the Elder to catch them in the act of adultery, how Hsi-men Ch'ing had kicked Wu the Elder in the solar plexus, how he had suffered from pain in the region of the heart for several days, and then died under suspicious circumstances.

When Wu the Second had heard him out, he asked, "Is what you tell me really true?" Then he asked again, "And who did my sister-in-law marry herself off to?"

"Your sister-in-law," said Yün-ko, "was carried off to his own house by Hsi-men Ch'ing, so he could knock the bottom out of her at his leisure. And you ask me if it's true or if it's false!"

"You'd better not be lying," said Wu the Second.

"Even if I have to tell it in front of the magistrate," said Yün-ko, "I'll tell it the same way."

"Little Brother," said Wu the Second, "if that's the way things stand, let's have something to eat."

In no time at all they polished off a meal served in:

Large platters and large bowls.

When Wu the Second had paid the reckoning and the two of them had come downstairs, he said to Yün-ko, "You go home now and turn over the living expenses to your father. Early tomorrow morning meet me in front of the district yamen, and be prepared to testify on my behalf." Then he went on to ask, "Where does Ho the Ninth live?"

"It's a little late in the day to be looking for Ho the Ninth," said Yün-ko. "Before you came back, three days ago, he took himself off to who knows where."

Wu the Second let Yün-ko go his own way and then went home.

The next day Wu the Second got up early in the morning and went to Master Ch'en's house for assistance in drafting a formal complaint. Then he went to the front gate of the district yamen, where he found Yün-ko was already waiting. Taking him along with him, he went straight into the courtroom, knelt down, and began loudly to complain of a case of injustice.

When the district magistrate saw him, he recognized that it was Wu Sung and asked, "What is your plea? And what injustice do you have to complain of?"

Wu the Second pled as follows: "My brother, Wu the Elder, has been the victim of collusion between the influential malefactor, Hsi-men Ch'ing, and my sister-in-law, née P'an, with whom he has been carrying on an adulterous affair. The accused, having kicked my brother in the solar plexus, then contrived, at the instigation of Dame Wang, to conspire with his paramour in his murder. Ho the Ninth connived with them by fudging the coroner's inspection and cremating the body, thereby destroying the evidence of the crime. At the present time, Hsi-men Ch'ing has sequestrated my sister-in-law by taking her into his house as a concubine. The youngster, Yün-ko, who is now present, is prepared to testify to the truth of these allegations. I trust that Your Honour will see that justice is done."

When he had finished making his plea, Wu the Second presented the written text of his complaint. The district magistrate accepted it, and then asked, "Why is Ho the Ninth not here?"

"Ho the Ninth is aware of his culpability and has decamped," Wu the Second replied. "His whereabouts are unknown."

The district magistrate took Yün-ko's verbal deposition and then withdrew from the courtroom in order to consult with his subordinates.

It so happens that the district magistrate, the vice-magistrate, the assistant magistrate, and the docket officer had all of them, high and low, been engaged in hanky-panky with Hsi-men Ch'ing. For this reason they were unanimous in concluding that this case would be a difficult one to try.

When the district magistrate came back into the tribunal he summoned Wu Sung before him and said, "You are, yourself, a police captain on the staff of this court, and yet you seem to be ignorant of the law. It has always been true that:

To prove adultery, you must nab both parties;
To prove theft, you must produce the loot;
To prove homicide, you must find the wound.[16]

The corpse of that elder brother of yours is no longer available as evidence, and you have not nabbed the accused in the act of adultery. For you to rely solely on the verbal allegations of this youngster in pressing a charge of murder against them is surely to make a travesty of justice. You ought not to act rashly but think it over to yourself.

If you decide to proceed, then proceed:
If you decide to desist, then desist."

"If Your Honour will permit me to speak," said Wu the Second, "all of these allegations are true. I have not invented a single one of them."

"You may rise, for the present," said the district magistrate. "Let me:
Consider what course would be best.
If it turns out to be feasible to do so, I will have them arrested for you."
Only then did Wu the Second get to his feet and go outside. Yün-ko, however, was detained in the yamen and not permitted to return home.
It was not long before someone reported these events to Hsi-men Ch'ing, informing him that Wu the Second had returned and had taken Yün-ko with him to court to make a formal charge against him. Hsi-men Ch'ing was sufficiently alarmed by this development to send his trusted servants, Lai-pao and Lai-wang, with their sleeves full of silver, to take care of the officials involved, all of whom were bought off.
The next morning Wu the Second showed up in the courtroom bright and early and petitioned the district magistrate to proceed with the arrest of the accused. Who would have thought that this official coveted the bribe he had received?
As soon as the case was called, he said, "Wu the Second, you oughtn't to let yourself be misled by anyone else into becoming an antagonist of Hsi-men Ch'ing. The truth in this matter is not clear, and it would be a difficult case to try. As the sage has said:
If even what one sees with one's eyes,
May be feared suspect;
How can words spoken behind one's back,
Be completely trustworthy?[1]
You ought not to act rashly, on the spur of the moment."
The docket officer, who was standing to one side, also said, "Captain, since you work in the yamen, you must be acquainted with the law. In any case involving an accusation of homicide there are five prerequisites that must be possessed by the prosecutor before he can proceed to trial: the corpse of the victim, the wound, the medical cause of death, the weapon, and evidence that implicates the accused. The corpse of that elder brother of yours is no longer available as evidence. How can such a case be tried?"
"Since Your Honour denies my suit," said Wu the Second, "you must have your reasons."
He then recovered the written text of his complaint, left the courtroom, and returned to his lodgings with Yün-ko, whom he then released from his obligation and allowed to go home.
Scarcely aware of what he was doing, he gazed up to Heaven and gave a long sigh.
Grinding and gnashing his teeth,
he kept muttering, "That damned whore!" to himself, over and over again. How was this man to find a vent for his anger?
Wu Sung headed straight for Hsi-men Ch'ing's wholesale pharmaceutical shop, with the intent of finding the culprit and taking matters into his own hands.
Manager Fu, who was in charge of the shop, was sitting inside the counter when Wu the Second strode up in an obviously belligerent mood, saluted him, and asked, "Is the Honourable Gentleman at home?"
Manager Fu recognized that it was Wu the Second and replied, "He's not at home, Captain. What have you got to say to him?"
"Walk a few steps with me, if you please," said Wu the Second. "I've got something to say to you."
Manager Fu did not dare to refuse and, coming outside, allowed Wu the Second to lead him to the mouth of an out-of-the-way alley for a chat. No sooner did they get there, however, than Wu the Second adopted a menacing manner, took hold of him by the lapel:
Opened wide his weird eyes, and demanded, "Do you want to die, or do you want to live?"
"With all due respect, Captain," said Manager Fu, "I've never done anything to offend you. What are you so angry about, Captain?"
"If you want to die," said Wu the Second, "don't bother to reply. But if you want to live, tell me the truth. Where is that bastard, Hsi-men Ch'ing, at this moment? And how long is it since he took my sister-in-law into his household? If you tell me everything I ask, I'll let you go."
Manager Fu was not a courageous man. When he saw that Wu the Second meant business, he became panic-stricken and said, "Calm yourself, Captain! My position in his household is only that of an employee whom he hires for two taels of silver a month to manage his shop. I am not privy to his private affairs. The Honourable Gentleman really isn't at home. Just a little while ago he went out with an acquaintance to have a drink at the Great Tavern on Lion Street. I wouldn't dare tell you a lie."
It was only on hearing these words that Wu the Second released his grip and, with giant strides, flew off in the direction of Lion Street, like a cloud scudding before the wind. Manager Fu was so frightened it was some time before he could stir from the spot. Wu the Second made straight for the tavern just below the bridge on Lion Street.
To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing was in the company of one of the black-robed lictors on the staff of the district yamen, who was known as Li Wai-ch'uan, or Leaky Li. This man played the role of influence peddler in both the district and the prefecture, intervening in public business on people's behalf, and keeping his ear to the ground as he ran back and forth, for a fee. If two parties were engaged in a lawsuit, he would peddle his services as a conduit of confidential information. Or if anyone wished to offer a bribe to the officials or functionaries, he would take a cut from both sides. For this reason he was known around the district yamen by the nickname Leaky Li.
That day, when he saw the district magistrate reject Wu Sung's suit, he had no sooner acquired the news than he came looking for Hsi-men Ch'ing to tell him that Wu the Second's suit had failed. Hsi-men Ch'ing had invited him to have a drink with him on the second floor of the tavern, where he presented him with five taels of silver.
Just as they were settling down to enjoy their drinks, Hsi-men Ch'ing happened to look out the window and caught sight of the formidable-looking Wu Sung, racing up toward the tavern from below the bridge. Realizing immediately that he could be up to no good, he excused himself on the pretext of going to the bathroom, leapt out a rear window, fled along the ridge of an adjacent roof, and jumped down into someone's rear courtyard.
Wu the Second dashed up to the front of the tavern and asked one of the waiters, "Is Hsi-men Ch'ing here?"
"The Honourable Hsi-men," the waiter replied, "is upstairs drinking wine with one of his acquaintances."
Quickening his pace and hiking up his clothes,
Wu the Second flew upstairs, where the only thing he saw was a man, occupying the place of honour, with a pair of painted singing girls sitting to either side of him. He recognized that it was Li Wai-ch'uan, the lictor from the district yamen, and knew that he must have come to tell Hsi-men Ch'ing the news.
Enraged, he went up to him and demanded, "Where has Hsi-men Ch'ing gone?"
When Li Wai-ch'uan saw that it was Wu the Second he was too dumbstruck to get a word out for some time. With a single movement of his leg, Wu the Second kicked over the table, smashing the cups and saucers to smithereens. The singing girls were frozen with fright. Wu the Second struck Li Wai-ch'uan right in the face with his fist.
Crying out, "Don't you...!" Li Wai-ch'uan jumped onto the bench he had been sitting on and tried to make his escape through the rear window but Wu the Second picked him up with both hands and hurled him clear through the front window, so that he fell, headfirst, into the street below, and was knocked unconscious.
When the waiters on the ground floor saw that Wu the Second was running amok they were scared out of their wits. None of them dared to intervene. The pedestrians on either side of the street all stopped and stared. Wu the Second was still on the rampage. Racing downstairs, he saw that his victim was already half dead from the impact of his fall and lay there, at full length on the ground, unable to move anything but his eyes. Thereupon, square in the crotch, he gave him two additional kicks with the result that alas and alack; he stopped breathing and died.
"Captain!" everyone exclaimed. "This man is not Hsi-men Ch'ing. You've attacked the wrong person."
"I asked him a question," said Wu the Second. "Why didn't he respond? That's why I assaulted him. Now, it appears that, without even suffering a beating, he has died."
The local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit saw that a homicide had occurred but did not dare to accost Wu the Second directly in order to place him under arrest. All they could do was to gradually edge closer to him until they had him surrounded and then keep him under strict surveillance.
The proprietor of the tavern, Wang Luan, and the two singing girls, whose surnames were Pao and Niu, were also taken into custody, after which they all proceeded to the yamen to appear before the district magistrate. By this time, all Lion Street was dumbfounded; the district of Ch'ing-ho was disturbed. The spectators who gathered in the streets could not be numbered. They all said, "Hsi-men Ch'ing must not have been fated to die. When his assailant discovered that he had made good his escape, he took out his wrath on this man instead." Truly, Mr. Chang drinks wine but Mr. Ligets drunk; the mulberry tree is cut with a knife but the willow bark is scarred.[2] While one person enjoys himself; another is haled into court. Can such things be? A poem testifies to this:

The hero, endeavouring to assuage his resentment, suffers the rigors of the law;
What can the Lord of Heaven be up to, that such murk should be allowed to spread?
In the Nine Springs the poison-eating sojourner has died in vain;
While, deep in her boudoir, Chin-lien laughs her head off.

So Ximen Qing and Pan Jinlian burned Wu Da's tablet. The next day they invited old woman Wang to a farewell party, and gave Ying'er into her charge.
"When Wu Song comes back," Ximen Qing said, "how am I to prevent his learning that I have married this lady?"
"I shall be here," the old woman said, smiling, "and no matter how inquisitive Wu Song may be, I shall have an answer ready for him. Don't worry about that."
Ximen Qing was only too glad to receive such a comforting reply, and gave the old woman three taels of silver. The same evening he took all Jinlian's belongings to his own house; the furniture and clothes were given to old woman Wang. The next day he sent a sedan chair with four lanterns, and Jinlian in her best clothes seated herself in it. Old woman Wang went with her as though she represented the bride's family, and Daian acted as escort. So Jinlian went to her new home. Everybody in the neighbourhood knew what was happening but people feared the rich and powerful Ximen Qing, and nobody dared to interfere. But someone composed a little poem in honour of the occasion.
Ximen Qing received his new bride, and had an apartment of three rooms set aside for her in the garden. There was a small gate in one of the corners of the courtyard, easily overlooked for it was hidden by flowers and flowerpots. Few people came that way. It was very secluded. One of the three rooms was furnished as a sitting room, and one as a bedroom. Ximen paid sixteen taels of silver for a bed of black lacquer and gilt with a crimson silk net. The chairs and tables were beautifully carved, and everything was arranged with excellent taste.
Wu Yueniang had two maids, Chunmei and Yuxiao. Ximen Qing directed that Chunmei should act as maid to his new wife, and paid five taels for a little girl called Xiaoyu to take her place with the Great Lady. For another six taels he bought a maid called Qiuju and gave her to Jinlian as a kitchen maid.
Ximen Qing's first wife, Chen, had brought with her a servant called Sun Xue'e. She was now about twenty years old, fairly tall and not badlooking. Ximen had allowed her to assume the position of his fourth wife, so that Jinlian ranked as the fifth of his ladies.
Now that Jinlian was actually established in his own house, Ximen spent every night with her. They played together as merrily as fishes in water, and nothing could have surpassed their pleasure in each other. On the day after her arrival Jinlian put on her finest clothes and, when Chunmei had served her with tea, went to Wu Yueniang's room to make the acquaintance of the other members of the household. She took with her as a present a pair of shoes. Yueniang sat in her place as mistress of the house, and looked closely at the new bride. She was about twenty-five years old, and very beautiful.
Yueniang looked at her from her head to her feet; every inch of that exquisite body seemed endowed with the power of fascination. She looked at her from her feet to her head; this extraordinary charm seemed to issue from her as water from a fountain. She was like a translucent pearl lying on a crystal dish, like the early morning moon shining above the topmost branches of a pink apricot tree. Yueniang gazed at her without speaking, and she said to herself, "When the boys came home, they used to say, 'How strange that Wu Da should have so beautiful a wife.' I have never seen anyone so beautiful. No wonder that brave husband of mine fell in love with her."
Jinlian kowtowed to Yueniang, and offered her a present. When the Great Lady had acknowledged her reverence, she turned to Li Jiao'er, Meng Yulou, and Sun Xue'e, and greeted them as sisters. Then she stood till Yueniang bade a maid give her a chair and speak to her as the Fifth Lady.
Jinlian sat down and secretly considered her new sisters. Yueniang was about twenty-seven years old; her face was as beautiful as a bowl of silver and her eyes were like the kernel of an apricot. Her manner was gentle and her speech careful. Li Jiao'er, who had been a singing girl at the bawdy house, was inclined to be corpulent and not so attractive. Though she had been a famous strumpet, her skill in the arts of love was not to be compared with that of Jinlian. Yulou was about thirty years old. Her face was like the pear blossom, and her waist as slender as the willow. She was tall, and her oval face was marked by a few slight scars. But she was very beautiful, and it would have been difficult to say whether the tiny feet that peeped from beneath her skirt were larger or smaller than those of Jinlian herself. Xue'e had been a maid; she was not very tall and her manner was sharp. But there was no kind of soup she could not make and her skill with dishes and plates was almost miraculous.
In a very short time Jinlian had made herself acquainted with the characteristic features of her companions.
When the first three days were over, she rose early every morning and, as soon as she was dressed, went to Yueniang's room to sew and make shoes. She pretended to be very eager to do anything she could, moving things that did not need to be moved, calling Yueniang Great Lady, as all the maids did, and giving her little presents. This delighted Yueniang. She called Jinlian Sister, and gave her some clothes and ornaments of her own that she valued highly. They always took their meals together.
Li Jiao'er and the others became very jealous of the attentions that Yueniang paid Jinlian, and in secret had much to say about it. "We are wives of old standing," they said, "but the Great Lady cares not a whit about us. This woman has been here only a few days, and she is shown all these favours. Our eldest sister is not discreet."
Ximen Qing was now married to Jinlian, living in a splendid house and wearing the finest of clothes. So close was the attachment between this fascinating woman and her dissolute bridegroom that nothing could have separated them. Everything was as merry as could be, and Ximen Qing took advantage of the situation without ceasing.
It was the beginning of the eighth month when Wu Song reached Qinghe. First, he went to the Town Hall to give the magistrate the letters he had brought from the Eastern Capital. The magistrate was glad to know that his presents had been duly delivered. He gave Wu Song ten taels of silver and entertained him. After this, Wu Song went back to his own place, changed his clothes, put on a new hat, locked the door, and went straight to Amethyst Street. The neighbours saw that he was back and were tremendously excited, breaking into a perfect sweat. "Now the trouble will begin," they said. "This prince of the haughty spirit will not let this matter pass lightly."
Wu Song went to his brother's door and pulled up the shutter. Ying'er was sitting outside the room, making thread. He called, "Brother," but there was no reply. Then he cried, "Sister," but still there was no answer. He thought, "I must be getting deaf if I can't hear one or other of them." He spoke to Ying'er but she was so terrified she could not utter a word.
"Where are your father and mother?" Wu Song said. Ying'er burst into tears.
Meanwhile old woman Wang had heard that he was back, and she was afraid that all would be discovered. She hurried over. When Wu Song saw her coming, he saluted.
"Where is my brother, and how is it my sister-in-law is not here?"
"Sit down, please," the old woman said, "and I will tell you. Some time during the fourth month, shortly after you had gone away, your brother was taken very ill, and died."
"When did he die? What did he die of? Who attended him?" Wu Song cried.
"About the twentieth of the fourth month your brother suddenly began to suffer from pains at the heart. After a week or so we went to make supplication to Heaven. We called in soothsayers, and got every medicine we could think of but it was all no use. He died."
"My brother never suffered from anything of the sort before," Wu Song said. "It is a very curious thing that he should die of heart trouble so unexpectedly."
"Captain," the old woman said, "you should not say things like that. Heaven sends its storms upon us without warning, and, though we may take off our shoes and socks tonight, who can tell whether tomorrow morning we shall put them on again? Nobody can be certain that some sudden calamity will not befall him."
"When was my brother buried?" Wu Song asked.
"When your brother gave up the ghost," the old woman said, "he had not a halfpenny in the world. His wife was no better off than a crab without feet. She could never have bought a grave for him. Fortunately, one of our more wealthy neighbours, who happened to be a friend of your brother, provided a coffin, and, when Master Wu had been dead three days, we had the funeral ceremonies and cremated him."
"Where is my sister-in-law now?" Wu Song asked.
"She was a young and tender woman, with nothing to live on, so she wore her mourning for a hundred days, and then her mother persuaded her to marry some stranger who lives a long way from here. She left this troublesome little girl in my care, and said I was to give her to you when you came back. When I have done that, I shall have done all I was called upon to do."
Wu Song listened to this story, and pondered it for a while. Then he left old woman Wang. He went to his own rooms near the Town Hall and changed into white clothes. Then he told his servant to buy a hempen cord, a pair of cotton socks, and a mourning hat. He bought fruits, cakes, candles, and paper money. Returning to Wu Da's house, he prepared a new tablet, made ready soup and food, lighted the candles, set out the wine and food, and hung up all the paper offerings. By the time he had done this, it was already the first night watch.
Then Wu Song burned incense, and knelt down and said: "Brother, may your spirit draw near. When you were on earth, you were weak and feeble. Now you are dead, and I do not know the cause of your death. If you met your death at the hands of others, and your brooding spirit can find none to avenge it, send me a dream, and I will avenge you." He poured wine upon the ground, and burned all the paper money. Then he sobbed aloud. The neighbours heard him and were sorry for him, for they knew that Wu Song was brother to Wu Da.
When all was done, he gave the wine, food, and dishes to the soldiers. Then he brought two pallets, and told the soldiers to sleep in the outer room. Ying'er was asleep in the inner room, and he himself took a pallet and lay down before Wu Da's tablet. It was now midnight. He tossed over and over, unable to sleep. He could only sigh. The soldiers were sleeping as soundly as the dead. He rose, and it seemed that the lamp on the table was flickering, half light, half dark. He sat up on his pallet and said to himself, "My brother was very weak, and there is something very mysterious about his death...." He had not finished this sentence when, over the table that supported his brother's tablet, there came an ice-cold wind.
Formless and shadowless, neither mist nor smoke
Round and round it moved,
Like a spirit wind striking cold to the marrow,
Gloomy and dark,
Like the icy mist over a war-stricken land
Chilling the flesh.

The lamp before the tablet lost its brightness
Sad and uncanny.
The paper money hanging on the wall
Whirled round and round.
It seemed as if, within this mist, the souls of all the poisoned marched,
Their ghostly standards fluttering in the wind.

The cold wind made Wu Song's hair stand on end. He stared at the tablet and it seemed to him that there slowly emerged the form of a man who cried, "Oh, younger brother, I died in agony." Wu Song could not distinguish the figure very clearly and would have gone forward to question it but, as he waited, the cold mist faded away and the figure vanished.

Wu Song sank down upon the pallet. "This is truly a strange thing," he thought, "a dream yet not a dream. My brother seemed to wish to tell me something but the vigor of my body was too much for his frail spirit. Nevertheless, I am sure there is a mystery about his death." Then he heard the watchman striking the third watch. He went to look at the soldiers but found them fast asleep. His soul was troubled. He watched till daybreak, when the cocks began to crow and the dawn broke in the eastern sky. Then the soldiers got up and heated some water for him, and he washed his face and cleansed his mouth. Calling Ying'er, he told her to look after the house, and went off with the soldiers.

As he passed down the street, he asked all the neighbours to tell him how his brother had died, and whom his sister-in-law had married. They knew all there was to be known, of course but they were afraid of Ximen Qing and did not wish to get mixed up in the matter. "Captain," they said, "it is no use asking us. Old woman Wang is the nearest neighbour, go and ask her. Then you will learn the truth." One of the more talkative added: "Yun'ge, the pear seller, and He the Ninth know all about it, too."

Wu Song went down the street to find Yun'ge. At last he found that young monkey carrying a basket, coming back from buying some rice. He hailed him. When the boy saw that it was Wu Song who called him, he said, "Captain Wu, you have come back too late. You will not find it easy to get to the bottom of the matter and, if you take it to the courts, there will be no one to look after my poor old father."

"Come with me," Wu Song said. He took the boy to an eating house, and ordered two bowls of rice. "Brother," he said, "you are not very old but I see that you pay proper respect to your father. That is as it should be." He took five taels of silver from his sleeve. "Take this for the present," he said, "and when I have attended to this matter, I will give you another ten taels to set you up in business. Now, I want you to tell me who it was who quarreled with my brother, who is responsible for his death, and who has married my sister-in-law. Tell me the whole story and don't hide anything."

Yun'ge took the silver. He decided that it would be enough to supply his father's needs for three or four months, and that he need no longer be anxious about going to the law courts. "Brother," he said, "listen but do not be impatient." Then he told the whole story from beginning to end. Wu Song listened attentively. "Is this absolutely true?" he said. "Who took my sister-in-law away?"

"Ximen Qing took your sister to his place," the boy said. "She has given herself to him absolutely. Why do you ask whether I am telling the truth?"

"It is essential that you shall not tell any lies," Wu Song said.

"What I have told you is what I shall say at the law courts," the boy replied. Wu Song called for food and, when they had finished it, he paid the reckoning and they left the shop.

"Go home and give the silver to your father," Wu Song said, "and tomorrow morning come to the Town Hall to give your evidence. Tell me, where does He the Ninth live?"

"You won't find him," the boy said, "he disappeared three days ago, as soon as he heard you had come back."

Wu Song left Yun'ge and went to his own place. The next morning, he asked Master Chen to write an accusation for him, and went to the Town Hall. Yun'ge was already waiting for him. He went into the Hall of Audience, knelt down, and presented his accusation. The magistrate recognized Wu Song at once and asked what was the accusation he wished to make.

"My brother Wu Da has been murdered by that villain Ximen Qing, who was carrying on an intrigue with my sister-in-law. First, my brother was kicked in the chest; then old woman Wang devised a plan for murdering him. After his death the undertaker He the Ninth allowed his body to be cremated without properly examining it, and now Ximen Qing has carried off my sister-in-law to be one of his concubines. This boy, Yun'ge, is here to give evidence as to the facts, and I pray your Lordship to see that justice is done."

"Why is the undertaker He the Ninth not here?" the magistrate said.

"When he knew that the secret was out he ran away," Wu Song said. "Nobody knows where he is."

The magistrate examined Yun'ge and wrote down his evidence. Then he withdrew and called together his officials. The magistrate himself, his deputy, and all the other officers were very intimate with Ximen Qing, and the case was one they did not care to decide. The magistrate came back to Wu Song and said, "You are a captain in my district, and I am surprised to find that you don't seem to know the law. In cases of alleged adultery, it has always been customary to require that the guilty pair should be caught in the act; and, in cases of murder, to insist upon direct evidence. Your brother's body has been burned, and you did not, in fact, lay hold of the adulterers. It would not be right for me to give judgment in the case simply upon the evidence of this little fellow. Think over the matter for yourself, calmly."

"Sir," Wu Song replied, "what I have told you is the simple truth, not some fantastic tale of my own imagining. I beg you to order the arrest of Ximen Qing, the woman Pan, and old woman Wang. Let the law take its ordinary course with them, and the truth will come out. If I lie, I am ready to suffer the consequences."

"Well," the magistrate said, "I must think this over. If I decide that they ought to be arrested, I will arrest them." Wu Song rose and went out, leaving Yun'ge in the court.

By this time Ximen Qing had heard what was going on. He was greatly alarmed, and at once gave large sums of money to his trusted servants, Laibao and Laiwang, and sent them to bribe the officials. The next morning, when Wu Song went to the court in the hope of persuading the magistrate to have the criminals arrested, he found that all the officials had accepted Ximen's bribes and refused to have anything to do with his accusation.

"Wu Song," one said, "don't believe busybodies who simply wish to make trouble between you and Ximen Qing. There is really no evidence in this case, and it would be impossible to give a fair judgment upon it. A wise man says: 'Things I see with my own eyes, I can hardly credit; how shall I believe what others tell me?' You must not be so impetuous."

"You work in this office," another said, "and of course you understand the law. You know all that is to be known about murders and murderers. Now, before the case can be opened, five things are essential: the corpse, the wounds, the disease, the instruments by which the crime was committed, and the traces of the crime itself. Your brother's body has already disappeared. How can we decide this case?"

"If that is how you look at it," Wu Song cried, "my brother's murder will never be avenged. It is clear that the magistrate does not intend to deal with the matter, and I must do things my own way." He took away his accusation and went back to his place, sending Yun'ge home. Then he gazed towards the heavens and sighed deeply, gnashed his teeth, and cursed his sister-in-law's wantonness. Wu Song at that moment was ferocity itself! His anger was beyond control. He set off at once for Ximen Qing's shop, with his mind made up to engage Ximen in single combat. But only Fu the manager was there.

"Is your master at home?" Wu Song said.

Fu recognized Wu Song. "No," he said, "he is not at home. Is there anything I can tell him for you, Captain?"

"I must trouble you to come here," was the only reply. Fu did not dare refuse, and went with Wu Song to a secluded place. Suddenly, Wu Song turned and caught him by the throat, glaring wildly at him.

"Do you wish to live or to die?"

"Captain," Fu cried, "I have never done you any harm. Why are you so angry?"

"If you wish to die, say nothing. If you wish to live, tell me the truth. Now, where is that fellow Ximen? When did he marry my sister-in-law? Tell me everything, and I will let you go."

Fu was a poor-spirited creature, and Wu Song's rage made him panic-stricken. "Pleas don't be so angry, Captain," he stammered; "I work in his shop and he pays me two taels a month. My business is to look after the shop, nothing else, and I have no notion how he spends his time. Truly, my master is not at home now. He and his friends have gone to a wineshop in Lion Street. I would not dare to tell you a lie."

Wu Song released Fu, and rushed off to Lion Street as though possessed of wings. Fu was so terrified that he could not move for a long time. While Wu Song was striding towards the wineshop, Ximen Qing was drinking there with a man called Li the Merchant of Secrets. This man was one of the court runners and had a finger in the pie in all the matters that came up at the District Office. He used to find out everything that was to be found out and use the knowledge to his own advantage. If any dispute arose, he would suggest courses of action to both parties, and, if they thought of bribing the magistrate, he smoothed over any little difficulties. So he came to be called Merchant of Secrets. Today, after the magistrate had rejected Wu Song's accusation, he was reporting the matter to Ximen Qing. Ximen invited him to take wine and made him a present of five taels of silver.

They were contentedly drinking their wine when Ximen Qing happened to glance around to see what was going on in the street, and saw Wu Song, like an angry god, coming over the bridge towards the inn. He knew that Wu Song could have no peaceful intent, and was frightened out of his wits. He would have escaped but could not get down the stairs in time, so he pretended he wished to change his clothes and hid himself somewhere at the back of the inn.

Wu Song came to the door and asked the waiter where Ximen was. "Master Ximen is taking wine with one of his friends upstairs." Wu Song pulled up his skirts and dashed upstairs. Ximen Qing had vanished. There was only a man sitting before a table, and a couple of singing girls on either side. Wu Song recognized the runner Li and knew that he must have been telling Ximen Qing what had happened. In a fury, he went forward and shook his fist at Li.

"You villain," he cried, "what have you done with Ximen Qing? Tell me at once or I'll give you a drubbing."

The very sight of Wu Song had terrified the runner, and, when he was spoken to so roughly, he could not get out a word in reply. Wu Song, finding that he received no answer, grew angrier and angrier, and kicked down the table. The cups and dishes were smashed. The two singing girls were so frightened that they swooned away. The runner realized that Wu Song meant him no good, and, though he did not find it easy, managed to pull himself to his feet and tried to shuffle downstairs. Wu Song pulled him back.

"I have asked you a question and you don't answer. Where do you think you're going? Be so kind as to eat one of my fists. I'll see whether you'll answer me or not." He struck Li a terrific blow in the face.

"Oh dear!" the man cried, finding his tongue at last, and agonized by the pain. "Ximen Qing has gone to the back to change his clothes. Please let me go, it has nothing to do with me."

Wu Song with both hands lifted the runner and hurled him out of the window. "If you wish to get out, there you are," he cried, and flung the merchant of secrets into the street.

Wu Song went to the back of the house to find Ximen Qing. Ximen had heard the disturbance and was in a terrible state of fright. Without giving a thought to the danger, he jumped out of the window, ran along the balcony, and found his way to somebody's courtyard. Wu Song could not find him and, thinking that Li had lied to him, he ran downstairs to where the run ner was stretched out on the ground, half dead, though his eyes still moved. Wu Song kicked him twice in the guts, and he died.

"This is runner Li," the bystanders said. "What's he done to annoy you, Captain, that you'd kill him like this?"

"It's Ximen Qing I was really after," Wu Song said, "and this ill-starred fellow happened to be with him. So he met his death at my hands." The police officer saw that a man had been killed but he did not venture to take Wu Song by force. He went slowly towards him and tried to detain him by persuasion. A bond was put on the waiter, the 2 singing girls, and they were all taken together to the town hall. The news soon spread through the street and everybody was talking about it. They did not know that Ximen Qing had escaped but thought Wu Song had killed him.

031

Wu the 2nd is Condemned to Exile in Meng-chou; Hsi-men & his Harem Revel in the Hibiscus Pavilion & Hsi-men Ch'ing and His Cronies Form the Brotherhood of 10

In the morning, you may read the yogācāra sutras;
In the evening, recite disaster-dispelling dhāranīs.
If you plant melons, you will surely harvest melons;
If you plant beans, you will surely harvest beans.
Sutras and dhāranīs have no minds of their own;
Once you have made your karma how can it be unmade?
Hell on the one hand and Heaven on the other;
Are only the consequences of our own actions.

Once Wu Sung and the others had been taken into custody by the local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit, they all proceeded to the yamen to appear before the district magistrate.

*

Let us now return to the story of Hsi-men Ch'ing. Having leapt out a rear window on the second floor of the tavern and fled along the ridge of an adjacent roof, he had concealed himself in someone's rear courtyard. It so happens that this was the residence of Old Man Hu, the doctor. While Hsi-men Ch'ing was still attempting to make himself inconspicuous, what should he see but a large, fat maidservant from Dr. Hu's household coming out to the privy to relieve herself. Just as she was in the process of jutting out her beefy behind, she suddenly caught sight of a man, on all fours, at the foot of the courtyard wall. Dashing back the way she had come, without even taking the time to put herself to rights, she screamed out, "Thief!" so lustily that Old Man Hu hurried into the courtyard to see what was the matter and recognized that it was Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Congratulations, sir!" he said. "When Wu the Second failed to find you he killed the other person instead. The local constable has already taken him to the district yamen to appear before the magistrate. There is little reason to doubt that he will be convicted of a capital crime. You are free to go home, sir. Nothing will come of it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then bade Old Man Hu a grateful farewell and swaggered off to his home, where he gave P'an Chin-lien a word-for-word account of everything that had happened. The two of them clapped their hands and laughed for joy, thinking that their only cause for worry had been eliminated.

"Spread a little extra money around, high and low," the woman advised Hsi-men Ch'ing. "See to it that they finish him off, so there'll be no danger of his ever getting free again."

Hsi-men Ch'ing sent his trusted servant, Lai-wang, to convey a set of gold and silver wine vessels and fifty taels of "snowflake" silver to the district magistrate. He also distributed a good deal of additional money, high and low, to the other functionaries, including the docket officer. The only purpose behind this largess was to see to it that Wu the Second was not treated leniently. The district magistrate accepted Hsi-men Ch'ing's bribe.

The next morning, at the early session of the court, the district magistrate took his place on the bench and the local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit escorted Wu the Second, along with the proprietor of the tavern and the singing girls who were to act as witnesses, into the courtroom and had them kneel down in front of the dais.

The district magistrate had altered his demeanor overnight. "Wu the Second, you rascal," he said. "Only yesterday you tried to bring a specious suit. I don't know how you could have shown such disrespect for the law. And now you have actually killed someone for no reason at all. What have you got to say in your defence?"

Wu the Second kowtowed and pled as follows: "I trust that Your Honour will see that justice is done on my behalf. My quarrel was really with Hsi-men Ch'ing but when I unexpectedly ran into this man on the second floor of the tavern and asked him where Hsi-men Ch'ing had gone, he refused to give me an answer. In a momentary fit of rage, I wrongly killed him."

"This rascal is talking nonsense," proclaimed the district magistrate. "How could you have failed to recognize that he was a lictor on the staff of the yamen? You must have had an ulterior motive and are refusing to tell the truth."

Then he called out to his minions, "Put him to the question.

Man is a miserable creature;
Unless you beat him he'll never confess.[2]

From either side three or four lictors and jailers appeared, bearing a full panoply of instruments of torture. They turned Wu Sung over, and the blows of the light bamboo fell on him like rain. In no time at all they had administered twenty strokes but, despite the beating, Wu the Second continued to protest, again and again, that he was being treated unjustly.

"In the past," he said, "there have been occasions when I exerted myself to the utmost on Your Honour's behalf. How can you show no pity for me now? Your Honour ought not to subject me to such cruel torture."

When the district magistrate heard these words he became even more incensed. "You scoundrel!" he replied. "You've killed someone with your own hands and you're still trying to tough it out. You can't stick anyone else with your own guilt." Then he called out, "Put the squeezers on him and give him a good squeezing."

Thereupon the finger-squeezers were applied to Wu Sung and, after being tightened in place, were struck fifty times with a heavy bamboo. He was then put into a long cangue and incarcerated in the district prison, while the witnesses in the case were temporarily detained in the gatehouse of the yamen.

Now among the vice-magistrate and other subsidiary officials there were some who had been on friendly terms with Wu the Second, who knew him to be a man of righteous and heroic cast, and who would have liked to help him out. But because they had all accepted Hsi-men Ch'ing's bribes, their mouths were sealed, and there was nothing they could do about it.

Wu Sung continued to protest that he was being treated unjustly that delayed matters for a few days but eventually he was driven into making a hugger-mugger confession. The docket officer on duty, the coroner's assistant, the head of the relevant mutual security unit, the witnesses, and so forth, were all escorted to Lion Street where a formal inquest was performed on Li Wai-ch'uan's corpse, and the inquest report form filled out. The said document read as follows:

Wu Sung demanded reparation from the deceased for the unequal division of a sum of money, and, failing to receive satisfaction, in a drunken rage, assaulted him with both fists and feet and threw him to the ground with fatal results. The left rib cage, the face, the solar plexus, and the scrotum of the deceased all exhibit livid marks produced by injuries of varying degrees of severity.

After the inquest was completed, they returned to the district yamen. One day, after a formal report of the particulars had been prepared, the prisoner was escorted under guard to Tung-p'ing prefecture to await the final disposition of his case. Now the prefect of Tung-p'ing was named Ch'en Wen-chao. [3] He was a native of Honan and was an official of absolute integrity. As soon as he learned that the prisoner had arrived, he took his position on the bench. What was this official like? Behold:

All his life he has been correct and upright;
By natural endowment, he is worthy and perspicacious.
In his youth he studied his books by light reflected from the snow;[4]
Once grown up he responded to imperial inquiries in the Palace of Golden Bells.[5]
He constantly harbours a loyal and filial heart;
He is always motivated by humane and kind considerations.

The population of his jurisdiction grows;
The taxes are honestly levied;
Common people who sing his praises fill the streets.
The number of lawsuits is diminished;
Banditry and robbery are curtailed;
The clamour of elders extolling his virtues is heard in the marketplace.
The people curb his carriage and tug at his stirrups;[6]
Enshrining his name in the history books for a millennium.
His merits are carved on stone and engraved on stelae;
So that his fame as a prefect will be acclaimed for all time.
Correct and upright, of absolute integrity, he is the father and mother of the people;
Worthy and good, square and proper, he deserves the epithet "Azure Heaven."[7]

Now the prefect, Ch'en Wen-chao, already knew something about this case and gave immediate orders that both the accused and the witnesses should be brought before him. The first thing he did, right there in the courtroom, was to examine the report of the case that had been forwarded from Ch'ing-ho district as well as the various depositions and the recommended sentence. Truly, what did this report say? The text read as follows:

Ch'ing-ho district reports a case of homicide to Tung-p'ing prefecture, as below: The accused, Wu Sung, twenty-seven years of age, is a native of Yang-ku district. Because of his unusual strength, the magistrate of Ch'ing-ho district appointed him to the post of police captain. On his return from an official mission, while preparing to make a ritual sacrifice in commemoration of his deceased elder brother, he learned that his sister-in-law, née P'an, had remarried before the expiration of her mourning period. The said Wu Sung, on making further inquiries in the streets, made his way, as he should not have done, to the second floor of Wang Luan's tavern in Lion Street, where he encountered the initially unknown but now identified Li Wai-ch'uan. Upon drunkenly demanding repayment of a prior loan of three hundred cash and meeting with a refusal from Li Wai-ch'uan, he engaged him, as he should not have done, in an affray, neither one being willing to submit to the other. In the course of being seized, beaten, kicked, and thrown to the ground, the victim suffered such severe injuries that he died on the spot. Two singing girls, surnamed Niu and Pao, were present at the time as witnesses of the affray. The accused was taken into custody by the local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit. An official was deputized to proceed to the site of the crime, summon the coroner's assistant, the head of the relevant mutual security unit, the witnesses, and so forth, and conduct an inquest. Depositions were taken, bond was posted for the witnesses, and the inquest report form was duly filled out and submitted. If no conflicting evidence is adduced during retrial, the recommended sentence is as follows: According to the article of the penal code that reads "In cases of involuntary manslaughter resulting from an affray, no matter whether the fatal injury be inflicted by hand, foot, other object, or metal blade, the penalty shall be strangulation,"[8] Wu Sung should be sentenced to death by strangulation. The testimony of the proprietor of the tavern, Wang Luan, and the singing girls surnamed Niu and Pao indicates them to be innocent of any crime. The case hereby is duly forwarded to your tribunal for final disposition.

Date: The nth day of the eighth month of the third year of the Cheng-ho reign period (1113).

Signed: Li Ta-T'ien, District Magistrate
Yüeh Ho-an, Vice-Magistrate
Hua Ho-lu, Assistant Magistrate
Hsia Kung-chi, Docket Officer
Ch'ien Lao, Clerk, Office of Punishment

When the prefect had finished reading this document he called up Wu Sung, who knelt down in front of the dais, and asked him, "Why did you kill Li Wai-ch'uan?"

Wu Sung kowtowed and appealed to the prefect, saying, "Lord 'Azure Heaven,' to appear before you is to see the light of day. If you permit me to speak, I will presume to speak."

"Pray speak up, then," the prefect responded.

"I was actually bent on avenging the death of my elder brother," said Wu Sung. "In the course of seeking out Hsi-men Ch'ing, I wrongly assaulted and killed this person."

He then gave an account of the foregoing events, concluding as follows, "The truth is that I have:

Suffered injustice and harbour resentment.

The power of Hsi-men Ch'ing's money is too great for me to withstand. The only thing that rankles is that my brother, Wu the Elder, still bears a grudge in the nether world and has lost his life for nothing."

"You need not say another word," the prefect responded. "I already know all about it."

He then called up the clerk from the office of punishment, Ch'ien Lao, and ordered him to be given twenty strokes with the light bamboo, saying, "That district magistrate of yours doesn't deserve to continue in office. How can he have put justice up for sale so flagrantly?"

Thereupon, after taking the depositions of all the witnesses once again, he picked up his brush and rewrote Wu Sung's confession.

Turning to his subsidiary officials, he said, "This man was seeking to avenge the death of his elder brother when he wrongly killed this Li Wai-ch'uan. He is a man of honour, motivated by righteous indignation. This is not an instance of 'deliberate homicide of an innocent person.' "

On the one hand, he ordered that Wu Sung's long cangue be taken off and replaced with the lighter one prescribed for lesser offences, and had him incarcerated in the prefectural prison, while he sent the witnesses back where they came from to await the final disposition of the case. On the other hand, he sent a dispatch to Ch'ing-ho district ordering the magistrate to apprehend the influential malefactor, Hsi-men Ch'ing; the sister-in-law of the accused, née P'an; Dame Wang; the youngster, Yün-ko; and the coroner's assistant, Ho the Ninth; to subject them to honest interrogation; and to report the results before taking any further action.

While Wu Sung was in prison in Tung-p'ing prefecture, since everyone knew that he was the victim of a miscarriage of justice, the jail warden and the guards actually provided him with food and wine without demanding a candareen for themselves.

It was not long before someone reported these events back to Ch'ing-ho district, and when Hsi-men Ch'ing got wind of them he was more alarmed than before. Ch'en Wen-chao was an official of absolute integrity, and he was afraid to try to bribe him. He had to go ask for help from the Ch'en family, to whom he was related by his daughter's marriage. That very night he dispatched one of their trusted servants, along with his own servants, Lai-pao and Lai-wang,[10] to travel to the Eastern Capital and deliver a letter to Yang Chien, the commander in chief of the Imperial Guard.

The commander, in his turn, sought the aid of the grand councilor and grand preceptor, Ts'ai Ching. The grand preceptor, fearing lest the reputation of District Magistrate Li be tarnished, immediately sent an urgent secret message to Ch'en Wen-chao in Tung-p'ing prefecture, directing him not to insist on haling Hsi-men Ch'ing and P'an Chin-lien into court.

Now this Ch'en Wen-chao had been the director of one of the two divisions of the Court of Judicial Review in the capital when he was promoted to the position of prefect of Tung-p'ing prefecture, and Grand Preceptor Ts'ai had been his examiner when he qualified for office by passing the civil service examinations. He was also aware that Yang Chien, as the commander in chief of the Imperial Guard, was an official who had the ear of the emperor himself. Thus:

His obligations cancelled each other out.[11]

All he could do under the circumstances was to save Wu Sung from the death penalty. His judgment was therefore rendered as follows:

Recommended sentence: that the accused shall be beaten forty strokes on the back with the heavy bamboo; that the name of his offence shall be tattooed on his face; and that he shall be condemned to military exile for life at a distance of 2,000 li.

In addition: whereas Wu the Elder is already dead; and whereas his corpse is no longer available as evidence; and whereas nothing more than suspicions have been adduced as to the circumstances of his death; the matter shall not be pursued further. All other persons involved with this case may be released and permitted to return to their homes.

The records of the case were forwarded to the Ministry of Justice in the capital, and thence to the Censorate for ratification, and, one day, a directive came down ordering that the sentence be carried out without delay. Ch'en Wen-chao had Wu Sung brought out of prison, and the imperial decree was read out loud to him in the courtroom. His cangue was then removed, and there was no way to avoid the infliction of forty strokes on the back with the heavy bamboo. He was then fastened into a seven-and-a-half catty, ironclad, round-ended cangue, and two columns of gold-coloured characters were tattooed on his face, preparatory to his removal to the prison camp at Meng-chou.

After the other persons involved in the case had been sent on their way, the prefect, right there in the courtroom, stamped the necessary documents with his seal and deputed two guards to escort Wu Sung to Meng-chou and turn him over to the authorities there.

That very day Wu Sung and the two guards left Tung-p'ing prefecture and returned to his brother's house in Ch'ing-ho district. He auctioned off whatever furnishings remained in order to provide the two guards with expense money along the way.

Then he approached a neighbour, Yao the Second, and asked him to look after Ying-erh for him, saying, "If, by imperial grace, an amnesty should ever be proclaimed that would allow me to return home:

Your kindness will be amply rewarded,
I will never dare to forget it."

The neighbours in the vicinity and the prominent householders who had been on good terms with Wu the Second, knowing that he was a man of honour who had had the misfortune to suffer this punishment, all helped him out with gifts of silver, or by providing food and wine, cash, or rice.

Wu the Second then went to his own lodgings and asked his former orderlies to bring out the bundle of his personal effects. That very day they set out on their journey, leaving Ch'ing-ho district, and wending their way along the highway toward Meng-chou. The weather was that of the middle month of autumn. With regard to this trip, truly: if one is only able somehow to preserve his foolish life; he will be happy to go hungry for the rest of his days.[12] A poem testifies to this:

The prefect, in investigating this case, maintained the utmost impartiality;
He was successful in rescuing Wu Sung from the brink of death.
Though he was condemned to military exile in a distant prison camp;
The sickly verdure recovered its health upon exposure to the genial breeze.[13]

Wu the Second set off on his way to military exile in Meng-chou. When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard that his enemy had taken to the road, he felt as though the stone on his head had finally fallen to the ground; the blockage in his heart had been miraculously removed. He was as happy as could be. Thereupon he ordered his servants, Lai-wang, Lai-pao, and Lai-hsing, to tidy up and sweep clean the Hibiscus Pavilion in the rear flower garden, set up standing screens, suspend gold-coloured partitions, and makes all the necessary preparations for a feast. Having engaged musicians to provide Wind and string instruments, song, and dance, for their entertainment, he invited the First Lady, Wu Yüeh-niang, the Second Lady, Li Chiao-erh, the Third Lady, Meng Yü-lou, the Fourth Lady, Sun Hsüeh-o, and the Fifth Lady, P'an Chin-lien, to join him in a party for the Jollification of the entire family. The wives of his household retainers, along with maidservants and waiting women, stood in attendance on either side. What were the revels like that day? Behold:

Incense smoulders in precious tripods;
Blossoms are displayed in golden vases.
The table service is an array of exotic antiques from Hsiang-chou;[14]
The hanging blinds are adorned with shining pearls from Ho-p'u.[15] Crystal platters,
Are piled high with the magic jujubes and pears that confer immortality;
Chrysoprase goblets,
Are filled to the brim with the jade and carnelian hued nectars of the gods.
There are deep-fried dragon livers,
And roast phoenix entrails;
Truly, one has but to use one's chopsticks to exhaust ten thousand cash.
There are black bears' paws,
And purple dromedaries' pads;
When these are presented after the wine their fragrance suffuses the table.

And there are:

Tenderly steamed fragrant rice garnished with red lotus blossoms;
And neatly sliced gray mullet large enough to swallow an official seal;[16]
Bream and carp from the I and Lo rivers,
Truly, more costly than beef or lamb;[17]
As well as longans and litchis,
Verily, the finest fruits of the Southeast.
As the phoenix tablets are crushed;[18]
Foaming whitecaps of brick tea break in white jade cups;
As the carnelian liquid is poured,
The pure bouquet of vintage wine bursts from the golden flagon.
In fine, the sumptuousness of this repast could put Lord Meng-ch'ang to shame,[19]
This feast, alone, required such wealth as might have beggared Shih Ch'ung.[20]

On this occasion, as soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing and Wu Yüeh-niang had occupied the positions of honour, the rest of the ladies, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, Sun Hsüeh-o, and P'an Chin-lien, arrayed themselves on either side and the drinking began:

With the raising of glasses and passing of cups;[21]
Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade.

Who should appear at this juncture but the pageboy, Tai-an, who led into their presence a young boy and a young girl, with their hair cut straight across their foreheads, prepossessing in appearance, and carrying a pair of gift boxes.

"They're from Eunuch Director Hua's house, next door," he said. "They've brought over some flowers for the ladies to put in their hair."

The two messengers went up and kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing, Yüeh-niang, and the others, and then stood to one side, saying, "Our mistress has sent us over to deliver this box of pastries and some flowers for Madam Hsi-men to wear in her hair."

Yüeh-niang pulled aside the hanging blind to take a look at the gifts. One box contained stuffed, spiced, gold-coloured pastries, of a kind reserved for use in the imperial palace. The other box contained newly picked fresh plantain lilies.

"I've been the occasion of putting your mistress to too much trouble once again, I fear," said Yüeh-niang, utterly delighted.

She saw to it that the two of them were offered something to eat and then gave the young girl a handkerchief and the young boy a hundred cash.

"Tell your mistress many thanks," she said, and then asked the young girl, "What's your name?"

"I'm called Hsiu-ch'un," she replied, "and the boy's called T'ien-fu." After they were gone, Yüeh-niang turned to Hsi-men Ch'ing and said, "This lady from the Hua household next door is really nice. She's always sending her pageboy and maidservant over here with gifts for me, and I'm afraid I haven't yet done anything to reciprocate."

"It hasn't even been two years," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "since Brother Hua the Second took this woman to wife. He tells me himself that she has a most accommodating disposition, otherwise she'd never consent to keep two such attractive young girls as personal maids."

"Not long ago," said Yüeh-niang, "in the sixth month, when the old gentleman of their household passed away, I met her by the graveside while attending the funeral. She is petite in stature and has a round face, delicately curved eyebrows, and a fair complexion. She seems very considerate by nature and must still be quite young, not more than twenty-three or twenty-four."

"You don't know the story," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She was originally the concubine of Privy Councilor Liang Shih-chieh when he was regent of the Northern Capital at Ta-ming prefecture, so her union with Hua Tzu-hsü is a case of remarriage, though she brought him a considerable fortune."

"The fact that she has sent over these gift boxes indicates a desire to get better acquainted," said Yüeh-niang. "We are next-door neighbours, after all. We mustn't be remiss in our social obligations. One of these days we'd better send something over there in return."

Gentle reader take note: It so happens that the maiden name of Hua Tzu-hsü's wife was Li. Because she was born on the fifteenth day of the first month, and someone had made her family a gift of a pair of fish-shaped vases on that day, her informal name was P'ing-erh, or Vase. She had formerly been a concubine in the household of Privy Councilor Liang Shih-chieh in Ta-ming prefecture. Privy Councilor Liang was the son-in-law of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching in the Eastern Capital. [22] His wife was extremely jealous by nature and had beaten numbers of maidservants and concubines to death and buried them in the rear flower garden. Li P'ing-erh, consequently, resided outside the women's quarters in her husband's studio, where she had a waiting woman to look after her.

It happened that on the fifteenth day of the first month of the first year of the Cheng-ho reign period,[23] during the Lantern Festival, Privy Councilor Liang and his wife were enjoying themselves on the upper floor of the Blue Cloud Tavern, when Li K'uei slaughtered their entire household, old and young alike, during a bandit raid on Ta-ming prefecture.[24] Privy Councilor Liang and his wife were forced to flee for their lives. On this occasion Li P'ing-erh managed to escape the carnage, along with her waiting woman but not before she had appropriated a necklace of one hundred large, Western Ocean [25] pearls and a pair of onyx gemstones weighing a good two ounces, with which she made her way to the Eastern Capital to seek refuge with relatives.

At that time Eunuch Director Hua had just been promoted from his post in the imperial palace to the position of grand defender of Kuang-nan. Because his nephew, Hua Tzu-hsü, was still without a mate, he sent a matchmaker to propose a marriage, and Li P'ing-erh thus entered the household as a legitimate wife. When the old eunuch departed to take up his post in Kuang-nan, he took them with him but after they had lived there for something over half a year, he unfortunately fell ill and petitioned the throne for permission to retire to his native place. Because he was originally from Ch'ing-ho district, it was there that he had come to live in retirement.

Now that Eunuch Director Hua had died, his entire estate fell into the hands of Hua Tzu-hsü, who made it a daily practice to frequent the licensed quarter with his friends, one of whom was Hsi-men Ch'ing. They had formed a club, of which Hsi-men Ch'ing was the senior member.

The second member was named Ying Po-chüeh, or Sponger Ying. He had started life as the son of Master Ying, the merchant, who owned a fine-silk-goods store but once the business had come into his hands, he had lost his capital and fallen on hard times. He now made his living by squiring young rakes about the licensed quarters and picking up whatever he could along the way. He was an expert performer at kickball and knew all there was to know about such games as backgammon and elephant chess.

The third member was named Hsieh Hsi-ta, or Tagalong Hsieh, whose courtesy name was Tzu-ch'un. He, too, was a profligate hanger-on as well as being an expert performer on the p'i-p'a. He had nothing to do everyday but to haunt the licensed quarter and live off:

The tea and rice afforded by romance.

There were also other members with names such as Chu Jih-nien, or Sticky Chu; Sun Kua-tsui, or Blabbermouth Sun; Wu Tien-en, or Heartless Wu; Yün Li-shou, or Welsher Yün; Ch'ang Shih-chieh, or Cadger Ch'ang; Pu Chih-tao, or No-account Pu; and Pai Lai-ch'iang, or Scrounger Pai. There were ten of them in all. [26] Pu Chih-tao had died recently, and Hua Tzu-hsü, or Nobody Hua, had been allowed to take his place.

Every month the ten of them met together somewhere and engaged the services of two singing girls so they could enjoy themselves:

Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade.

The other members of the club, observing that Hua Tzu-hsü was the profligate scion of a eunuch household and that he had:

Money to spend and silver to squander;[27] were anything but backward in encouraging him to patronize singing girls in the licensed quarter, with the result that he often stayed out for three or five nights in a row without going home. Truly:

On the purple roads spring is at its height;
In the red bowers the music is intoxicating.
How long a span of life are we allotted?
Not to enjoy it is to live in vain.[28]

Now that this matter has been explained, we will say no more about it.

To resume our story, that day Hsi-men Ch'ing and his wife and concubines enjoyed a feast in the Hibiscus Pavilion for the:

Jollification of the entire family.

The party did not break up until evening. By the time Hsi-men Ch'ing retired to P'an Chin-lien's quarters he was already half drunk and, exhilarated by the wine, wanted to play at clouds and rain with her. The woman hastily lit some incense and laid out the bedding, after which they:

Took off their clothes and went to bed.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, however, did not proceed directly to the clouds and rain. Knowing that the woman was partial to "toying with the flute,"[29] he sat down inside the green gauze mosquito netting and ordered her to get down on all fours beside him. After:

Lightly adjusting her golden bracelets, she took hold of his organ with both hands and popped it into her mouth. Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Bent his head in order the better to savor,
The marvelous sight as it went in and out.
She sucked it audibly for some time, until
Their lewd excitement was redoubled.

At this point Hsi-men Ch'ing called out to Ch'un-mei to come in and bring them some tea. The woman was afraid the maidservant would see what they were up to and hastily let down the bed curtains.

"What are you afraid of?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Brother Hua the Second next door," he went on, "actually has two attractive young girls as maid-servants in his rooms. The one who delivered the flowers today was the youngest. There is another one, as old as Ch'un-mei, whom Brother Hua the Second has already had his way with. I caught sight of her once, when she had followed her mistress to the front door, and could see that she has a good figure. Who would have thought that Brother Hua the Second, young as he is, would carry on that way in his own house?"

When the woman heard this, she gave him a look, saying, "You crazy good-for-nothing! I'd just be wasting my breath on you! If you want to have your way with this maidservant, go ahead and take her. What need is there to:

Beat around the bush; or point out a mountain and promise a millstone.[30]

Why drag anyone else into it? In the first place, I'm not that sort of person; and, in the second place, she's not really my maidservant to begin with. If that's the way things stand, tomorrow I'll pay a visit to the rear compound and leave the way open for you. Just call her into the room and have your way with her. That's all there is to it."

When she had finished speaking, she went back to "toying with the flute" until Hsi-men Ch'ing ejaculated. Only then did they go to sleep:

Arm around head and thigh over thigh.

Truly:

Past mistress of the intimate arts, she caters to her lover's whim;
How quick she is, and diligent, to "play the purple flute."[31]

There is a lyric to the tune "Moon on the West River" that testifies to this:

The scent of orchid and musk pervades the gauze netting;
The delicate beauty is an old hand at "playing the flute."
Her snow-white jade body is visible through the bed curtains;
It's enough to make one's "ethereal and material souls take flight."
On jade wrists she gently adjusts golden bracelets;
Both of them are passionate, "half drunk, half crazed."
The talented gentleman is moved to enjoin his partner,
"Take it easy, so you can go on sucking a little longer."[32]

The next day, sure enough, the woman went to pay a visit to Meng Yü-lou's quarters in the rear compound. Hsi-men Ch'ing called Ch'un-mei into the room and had his way with the young girl.

When spring touches the apricot and peach trees, their new buds burst into red flower;
When the breeze plays among the willow fronds, they are made to bend their green waists.[33]

From this day on, her mistress treated her with special favour, no longer sending her to the kitchen to:

Do the cooking or clean the stove but only asking her to serve inside her own rooms, to:
Make the beds and fold the quilts, or to fetch tea. She presented her with some of her favourite articles of clothing and jewellery, and encouraged her to bind her feet in order to keep them delectably tiny.

It so happens that Ch'un-mei was quite unlike Ch'iu-chü. She was naturally intelligent, enjoyed repartee, was quick on the uptake, and rather good-looking. Hsi-men Ch'ing was very partial to her. Ch'iu-chü, on the other hand, was stupid and dull, and could not be relied upon to perform her tasks. She was the one who got beaten by her mistress. Truly:

The swallows and sparrows round the pond make quite a clamour with their chatter;
All appeal to humanity and righteousness and judge each other stupid or worthy.
Though they may belong to different species, they are alike in being birds of the air;
And yet, noble and base, high and low, even they are not all the same.

Wu Song was taken by the watch to the city jail. Meanwhile Ximen Qing, who had jumped out of the wineshop window, found himself in a courtyard that belonged to old Doctor Hu. One of the maids had just gone to the privy and had lifted her skirts. Suddenly she saw a man crouching at the foot of the wall. As she could not run away, she called, "Thief! thief!" as loudly as she could, and Doctor Hu ran out to see what was the matter. He recognized Ximen Qing, and said:

"My Lord, I must congratulate you on your escape from Wu Song. He has killed a man, and they have taken him to the lockup. But you may go home now, Sir, I don't think there is likely to be any more trouble."

Ximen thanked the doctor, and went home with all the assurance in the world. He told Pan Jinlian what had happened, and they clapped their hands with delight to think that all their troubles were now over. Jinlian advised Ximen to send bribes to all the officials, so that they might make sure that Wu Song would be sentenced to death, for they by no means desired to set eyes on him again. Ximen Qing called his servant Laiwang, and told him to take the magistrate a set of gold and silver drinking cups, with fifty taels of silver, and sums of money for all the other officials, both great and small, and to ask that Wu Song should be punished with all the rigor of the law. The magistrate accepted the bribe and, the next morning, as soon as he entered the Hall of Audience, had Wu Song brought before him, with the waiter and the two singing girls. His manner had now completely changed.

"Wu Song," he said, "you are a desperate fellow and have brought accusations against perfectly innocent people. I have overlooked this more than once. Now you yourself have killed a man, without the slightest cause. Why don't you obey the laws?"

"My quarrel was really with Ximen Qing," Wu Song said, "but, as ill luck would have it, I met this man. He refused to tell me where Ximen Qing was, and I lost my temper and killed him. My Lord, I implore you to give me justice, and bring Ximen Qing to answer to the law for my brother's death. As for myself, I am ready to give my life for this dead man's."

"You are talking nonsense," the magistrate cried. "Do you mean to say you did not know he was an officer of this court? You must certainly have had some other reason for killing him. Why do you try to drag Ximen Qing into the matter? I can see that I shall never get the truth out of you without a beating."

He ordered his attendants to punish Wu Song. Three or four of them pulled him down and gave him twenty strokes of the rod, like drops of rain falling. Wu Song continued to insist that he was being unjustly dealt with. "I have done much for you," he cried, "and you should deal with me accordingly and not have me beaten so severely."

This only made the magistrate more angry. "You killed a man with your fist," he cried. "Now your boldness seems to have gone into your mouth." He ordered the thumbscrews to be put on, and Wu Song's fingers were pressed and his hands beaten fifty times, after which a cangue was put about his neck and he was returned to prison.

Some of the officers had been Wu Song's friends and knew that he was a man who had taken upon himself to avenge another's quarrel. They would have liked to clear him but, as they had accepted Ximen Qing's bribes, their mouths were sealed and they were unable to do anything. As Wu Song persisted in demanding justice, the magistrate waited a few days and then drew up a dossier without hearing any evidence. All he did was to appoint an officer to go to Lion Street to examine Li's body and fill in the necessary particulars. Then the crime sheet was drawn up as follows:

The accused Wu Song called to see Li, and there was a dispute with regard to the division of certain moneys. The parties became drunk and began to fight. The deceased was kicked and beaten and thrown from a high place. Green and red marks were found on his left side, his face, ribs, and groin.

After completing their examination, the officials went back to the office, and a document was drawn up to be sent with Wu Song to the Prefect of Dongping, where the matter would have to be further investigated and the final judgment made.

The Prefect of Dongping, His Excellency Chen Wenzhao, was a native of Henan and an official of exceptional probity. As soon as the documents were brought to him, he began the hearing of the case.

Chen Wenzhao went to his court and ordered everyone to be brought before him. He read through all the documents that had come from Qinghe and examined the depositions. The indictment said:

PREFECTURE OF DONGPING DISTRICT OF QINGHE

An Indictment

The accused Wu Song is twenty-eight years of age, formerly domiciled in the District of Yanggu. On account of his splendid physique he was appointed Captain of the Police in this District.

After returning to this District from a tour of duty, the accused visited his brother's tomb. He ascertained that his sister-in-law had not observed the required period of mourning but had remarried. The same day he inquired from people in the streets concerning the matter, and ultimately proceeded to a wineshop in Lion Street, where he met Li Waichuan. Being drunk, he endeavored to recover the sum of three hundred cash that he alleged Li had previously borrowed from him but Li refused to pay the money and the two men fought. Li was struck and kicked, and so severely injured that he died shortly afterwards.

In proof whereof the singing girls Niu and Bao are witnesses.

The watch arrested Wu Song, and officers deputed for that purpose proceeded to the place where Li's body lay and made a careful examination. We then heard Wu Song and prepared the accompanying depositions. We trust that upon further investigation you will find the particulars to be correct.

It is our submission that Wu Song fought with and killed the man, and that he should be executed in accordance with the law for the capital offence, not for fighting or the dispute over money. The waiter Wang, and the two girls Niu and Bao, appear to be guiltless in the matter, and we only await your permission to release them.

Dated this eighth day of the eighth month of the third year of Zhenghe:

Li Dadian, Magistrate
Luo He'an, Deputy Magistrate
Hua Helu, Keeper of the Archives
Xia Gongji, Prosecutor
Qian Lao, Chief Jailer

When the Prefect had read this document, he asked Wu Song how he had come to kill Li Waichuan. Wu Song kowtowed.

"My Lord of the Blue Heavens," he said, "I trust that, in your court, justice may be done. If you will allow me to speak, I will tell the truth about the matter."

"Say on," the Prefect ordered.

Wu Song told him the whole story, not omitting a single detail, from Ximen Qing's seduction of Jinlian to the rejection of his accusation at the Qinghe court. He ended by saying: "I wished only to avenge my brother, and it was Ximen Qing of whom I was in search. Unhappily, I did kill this man but the fault is not mine alone. Ximen Qing is very rich, and the officers did not dare to arrest him. I am not afraid of death. My sole desire is to avenge my murdered brother, whose remains lie in the tomb awaiting vengeance."

"I understand the case," the Prefect said. "That will do for the present." He called forward Qian Lao and ordered him to be given twenty strokes. "Your magistrate does not seem to know how to perform his duties. He should not allow himself to be moved by personal interest and sell justice in this way."

Again, he questioned Wu Song, and amended the indictment that had come from Qinghe. Finally, he said to his officers: "This fellow was anxious to avenge his brother and killed this man more or less accidentally. He seems a good man and he ought not to be treated like a common criminal."

He gave orders that the cangue should be removed from Wu Song's neck and a lighter one put in its place, and that he should be detained in the prison. The rest of the party were sent back to Qinghe with instructions to the magistrate that Ximen Qing, Jinlian, old woman Wang, Yun'ge, and He the Ninth should be sent to the Prefect to be examined. When all this had been done, the Prefect said, he would send forward the documents to the Imperial Court. Wu Song was still in prison but the officials soon found what a good fellow he was, and sent him wine and food without taking anything in return. The news reached Qinghe and, when Ximen Qing heard it, he was greatly alarmed. He knew that Chen Wenzhao was incorruptible, and did not dare to try to bribe him but he decided to send word to his relative Chen and ask for help. He told Laiwang to go to the Eastern Capital in all haste with a letter to Marshal Yang, the Provincial Commander-in-Chief, begging him to use all his influence with the Imperial Tutor Cai. When Cai heard of the matter he was afraid that the magistrate Li would suffer, so he secretly wrote to the Prefect of Dongping asking him not to proceed with the examination of Ximen Qing and Jinlian. Now Chen Wenzhao had been the chief magistrate of Dalisi before he had been appointed to the Prefecture of Dongping. He had been befriended by Cai, and knew that Marshal Yang was in high favour at court. He finally decided that the best thing he could do was to settle the matter without injury to either side. He reprieved Wu Song but ordered him to be given forty strokes, branded, and banished 2000 li. In Wu Da's case, it was declared that, as the body had been burned, the matter must be considered closed. The others were ordered to be sent home. This was all duly written down, and the documents sent, first to the Provincial Office, then to the Court. They were returned by the higher authorities with orders that the Prefect's proposals should be put into execution. Chen Wenzhao took Wu Song from the jail, read over the papers in the case, gave him forty strokes, and set a cangue upon him. Two columns of characters were branded on his face, and he was ordered to leave for Mengzhou in the charge of two officials, who took the document with them. Then the other parties in the case were dismissed. That day Wu Song, in the charge of two officers of the court, left the prefecture of Dongping for Qinghe. There, he sold all his furniture and gave the money to the officers, and asked one of his neighbours, named Yao, to look after Ying'er. "If His Majesty pardons me," he said, "I'll pay you back. I can never forget your kindness." Wu Song's neighbours knew well that he was a good man in misfortune, and they gave him, some silver, some a little wine; others offered food, money, and rice. He went once again to his own rooms and got a soldier to bring his personal belongings, and the next day they set off from Qinghe along the high road for Mengzhou.

When Ximen Qing heard that Wu Song had really started for Mengzhou, he felt secure at last. The canker that had ravaged his heart so long was now removed, and he felt completely at ease. He gave orders to Laiwang, Lai Po, and Laixing to make preparations in the garden. They set up folding screens and arranged embroidered hangings in the Hibiscus Arbour; a banquet was prepared, and a band of musicians engaged to sing and dance. Yueniang and the other ladies enjoyed the repast, and menservants, serving women, and maids waited upon them.

Incense was burned in precious censers, and flowers set out in golden vases Treasures from Xiangzhou in all their glory.
When the lattice was raised, the shining pearls from He Pu gleamed.
Flame-like dates and pears from Jiao heaped on crystal dishes
Cups of green jade filled with a precious juice, a liquid jade.
Of roasted dragon's liver, of fried phoenix giblets, one chopstick's load was worth ten thousand pence.
The palms of black bears, the hooves of purple camels
Mingled their sweet savor with the wine's, filling the air.
Then were ground the phoenix balls of tea,
And a small clear wave rose in the white jade cups.
As the precious liquid was outpoured, there came fragrance from the golden jar.
The lord Meng Chang was now outdone
The wealth of Shi Chong rivalled.

Ximen Qing and Yueniang sat in the place of honour, and the other ladies arranged themselves according to their position in the household. As they passed the cups from one to the other, they seemed as full of grace as the flowers of a posy or the pattern upon a piece of brocade.

They were drinking when Daian brought in a boy and a young maid of great beauty, whose hair was dressed in a fringe upon her brows. She was carrying two boxes.

"Our neighbours the Huas," Daian said, "have sent some flowers for the ladies."

The maid came before Ximen and Yueniang, kowtowed to them, and said, "My mistress has sent me with this box of cakes and these flowers for you." Yueniang opened the boxes. One contained pastries, some of which were stuffed with fruit, and others with peppers. They were like those made in the Imperial palaces. The other box contained freshly picked lilies. She was greatly pleased, and told the little girl to thank her mistress. After giving them something to eat, she presented the girl with a handkerchief and the boy with a hundred coins.

"Tell your Mistress," she said, "that I am most grateful to her." She asked the little girl her name.

"I am called Yingchun, and this boy is Tian Fu." Then they both withdrew.

"Mistress Hua is really very kind," Yueniang said to Ximen Qing. "She is always sending her servants with something or other for us, and I have never made her any return."

"Brother Hua married the lady two years ago," Ximen said. "He himself told me what a sweet disposition she has but that is clearly to be seen from the excellence of her maid."

"I saw her once," Yueniang said, "at her father-in-law's funeral. She is moderately tall and has a round face. She has two delicately arched eyebrows and a very clear skin. She certainly seems very gentle, and still quite young, not more than twenty-four or twenty-five, I should think."

"You may not know," Ximen said, "that before she married Hua, she was one of the second ladies of Minister Liang. She brought Hua a very good fortune."

"Well, she has sent us these two boxes," Yueniang said, "and we must not be less courteous than she is. I will send her something in return tomorrow."

The family name of Hua Zixu's wife was Li. She was born on the fifteenth day of the first month, and on that day somebody had sent the family a pair of fish-shaped vases. She was given the name of Li Ping'er. She had once been the concubine of Minister Liang of the Prefecture of Daming, a son-in-law of the Imperial Tutor Cai. His wife was a very jealous woman, and had made an end of several maids and concubines, and buried their bodies in the garden. So Li Ping'er had to live hidden away in his study, with an old woman to wait on her.

On the fifteenth of the first month in the third year of Zhenghe, Minister Liang and his wife were in the Green Jade Pavilion, when the whole family except Li Ping'er and her servant were murdered by Li Kui. They succeeded in escaping. Li Ping'er taking with her a hundred large pearls and a pair of jewels as black as a raven's wings. They went to the Eastern Capital in the hope of finding some relatives there. At that time Eunuch Hua, one of the Imperial Chamberlains, had just been appointed to the Governorship of Guangnan. His nephew Hua Zixu was unmarried, so the eunuch secured the services of a go-between and arranged a marriage between his nephew and the woman. The eunuch went to Guangnan and they with him but they had not been there very long before old Hua fell ill, had to resign his appointment, and go home again. His home was in the district of Qinghe. Then he died, and all his property came to his nephew. Everyday this gentleman and his friends frequented the bawdy houses, and he had become a member of the brotherhood that Ximen Qing had founded.

With Ying Bojue, Xie Xida, and the rest, he amused himself with singing girls, and they were all most intimate. It was well known that he was a nephew of one of the Imperial Chamberlains and very free with his money, and his friends were always dragging him away to the bawdy house. Often he did not return for three or four nights at a time.

Ximen Qing and his ladies made merry in the Hibiscus Arbour. They drank till it was late, and then went to their own apartments. Ximen Qing went to Jinlian's room. He was already half drunk, and soon wished to enjoy the delights of love with his new lady. Jinlian hastily burned incense, and they took off their clothes and went to bed. But Ximen Qing would not allow her to go too fast. He knew that she played the flute exquisitely. He sat down behind the curtains of the bed, and set her before him. Then Jinlian daintily pushed back the golden bracelets from her wrists and stimulated his penis with her lips, while he leaned forward to enjoy the delight of her movements. She continued for a long time, and all the while his delight grew greater. He called Chunmei to bring in some tea. Jinlian was afraid that her maid would see her, and hastily pulled down the bed curtains.

"What are you afraid of?" Ximen said. "Our neighbour Hua has two excellent maids. One of them, the younger, brought us those flowers today but there is another about as old as Chunmei. Brother Hua has already taken her virginity. Indeed wherever her mistress is, she is too. She is really very pretty, and of course no one can tell what a man like Brother Hua may do in the privacy of his own home."

Jinlian looked at him.

"You are a strange creature but I will not scold you," she said. "If you wish to have this girl, have her and be done with it. Why go beating about the bush, pointing at a mountain when you really are thinking about something quite different. I know you would like to have somebody else to compare with me but I am not jealous. She is not actually my maid. Tomorrow, I will go to the garden to rest for a while, and that will give you a chance. You can call her into this room and do what you like with her. Will that satisfy you?"

Ximen Qing was delighted. "You understand me so well!" he said. "How can I help loving you?" So these 2 agreed and their delight in each other and in their love could not have been greater. After she had played the flute, they kissed each other, and went to sleep. The next day Jinlian went to the apartments of Yulou, and Ximen Qing called Chunmei to his room, and had his pleasure of her. From that day, Jinlian showered favours on this girl. She would not allow her to go and wait at the kitchen but kept her to attend to her bedroom, and serve her with tea. She chose beautiful clothes and ornaments for her, and bound her feet very tightly. Chunmei was a very different kind of girl from Qiuju. She was extremely intelligent and full of fun, and she had a pretty skill with her tongue, besides being very beautiful. Ximen Qing found her irresistible. Qiuju, on the other hand, was both simple and stupid: Jinlian was always punishing her.

032

P'an Chin-lien instigates the Beating of Sun Hsüeh-o; Hsi-men Ch'ing Decides to Deflower Li Kuei-chieh/Guijie, the Singing Girl

Once P'an Chin-lien was established in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household she:

Relied on his favour to become arrogant;
Transmuting the "cold" into the "hot,"

to such effect that, day or night, there was no longer any peace and quiet to be had. She was extremely suspicious by nature and was forever:

Listening at the fence or eavesdropping by the wall, on the lookout for an excuse to make trouble. Nor was her maidservant, Ch'un-mei, any model of forbearance.

One day, as ill luck would have it, Chin-lien was upset over some insignificant matter and spoke a few intemperate words to Ch'un-mei. Ch'un-mei, having no place else to vent her spleen, went back to the kitchen in the rear compound and started:

Pounding the table and banging the pans, in no mood to be trifled with.

Sun Hsüeh-o, who found this behavior annoying, twitted her sarcastically with the words, "You crazy good-for-nothing! If you're hard up for a man, go be hard up someplace else. I can do without your high-handedness around here."

When Ch'un-mei, who was still at the height of her ill-humour, heard these words, she flared up immediately.

"Just who is insinuating that I'm on the lookout for a man?" she demanded to know.

Hsüeh-o saw that she was really out of sorts and managed to keep her mouth shut. Ch'un-mei, however, took off in a huff for the front compound, where she gave Chin-lien a provocative word-for-word account of this exchange:

Thus and thus, and
So and so,

with a few additional details thrown in for good measure, such as, "She claimed that you connive with me to share our favours with him as a means of keeping him all to ourselves."

Chin-lien had had a bellyful. She was already feeling rather tired from having to get up earlier than usual in order to see off Wu Yüeh-niang on her way to a funeral. She took a nap and then went out to sit in the pavilion in the garden.

While she was there, who should come strolling along but Meng Yü-lou, who addressed her with an ingratiating smile, saying, "Sister, how come you're so silent and glum?"

"I don't even want to talk about it," said Chin-lien. "I'm feeling all tired out this morning. Where've you come from, Sister Three?"

"I've just paid a visit to the kitchen in the rear compound," said Meng Yü-lou.

"And what did that woman have to say to you?" asked Chin-lien.

"Sister didn't have anything to say," replied Yü-lou.

Although Chin-lien said no more about it at the time, she stored up the resentment in her heart and, henceforth, regarded Sun Hsüeh-o as her enemy. But no more of this.

The two of them did some needlework together for a while when Ch'un-mei appeared with a pot of hot water and Ch'iu-chü with two cups of tea. After finishing their tea, the two of them set out the pieces of a board game and started to play with each other.

Just as they were at a critical point in their game, the pageboy, Ch'in-t'ung, whose job it was to watch the garden gate, suddenly appeared and announced, "Father has come home."

The two women made haste to put the game away but Hsi-men Ch'ing, who had already crossed the threshold of the garden, caught sight of them. They were wearing their everyday chignons enclosed in frets of silver filigree, from which two tufts of hair were allowed to escape at either temple, pendant onyx earrings, blouses of white silk, pink vests, drawnwork skirts, and two pairs of tiny shoes, the up-turned points of which were adorned with red mandarin ducks. Each of them appeared to him to be:

Modeled in plaster, carved of jade.

Without his even being aware of it, Hsi-men Ch'ing's face became wreathed in smiles, and he blurted out, "They look just like a pair of painted faces, and they'd cost a pretty penny too."

"We're no painted faces," declared Chin-lien. "But if that's what you're looking for, you can find the genuine article in the rear compound."

At this sally, Meng Yü-lou excused herself and started back toward her own quarters but Hsi-men Ch'ing caught her with one hand and said, "Where are you off to? Do you have to leave as soon as I show up? Tell me the truth, now; when I'm not at home, what do the two of you do around here?"

"We're bored to distraction," said Chin-lien, "and were only playing a couple of rounds of a board game here. We really haven't stolen anything. How were we to know that you would turn up?"

As she spoke, she helped him off with his outer clothes and then said, "You've come back from the funeral early today."

"Most of the guests at the reception," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "were either eunuchs or official colleagues of the deceased. Moreover, the weather was hot. I couldn't stick it out, so I came home before it was over."

"Why isn't our elder sister home yet?" asked Meng Yü-lou.

"Her sedan chair has probably reached the city walls by now," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've already sent two servant boys back to meet her."

When he had finished taking off his outer clothes, he sat down and asked, "What do the two of you wager when you play games together?"

"We were only playing for the fun of it," said Chin-lien. "Why should we have to wager anything?"

"Let me play a game with you," proposed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Whoever loses will have to forfeit a tael of silver and treat the rest of us."

"But we don't have any money," said Chin-lien.

"If you don't have any money," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can pull out one of your fancy hairpins and pawn it with me. It all comes to the same thing."

Thereupon, they set up the board and the three of them played a game together. P'an Chin-lien lost. While Hsi-men Ch'ing was still counting the pieces, the woman upset the board and then ran over beside a clump of sweet-smelling daphne, leaned against an ornamental rock, and pretended to busy herself picking flowers.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing located her, he said, "All right, little oily mouth! It was you who lost the game, and now you're trying to hide over here, are you?"

When the woman saw Hsi-men Ch'ing coming, she broke into giggles, saying, "You crazy good-for-nothing! It was Meng the Third who lost but you didn't dare enforce the rules on her but have come to bother me instead."

As she spoke, she tore the petals off the flowers in her hand and scattered them all over Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Stepping forward, Hsi-men Ch'ing embraced her with both arms, pushed her up against the ornamental rock:

Stuck out his clove-shaped tongue;
Mingled his sweet spittle with hers,

and began to toy with her in earnest.

At this juncture, Yü-lou appeared on the scene and called out, "Sister Six, the First Lady has arrived home. I'm going back to the rear compound."

Only then did the woman abandon Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Brother, I'll have something more to say to you later," Chin-lien said to him as she went off to accompany Yü-lou on her way back to the rear compound.

When they had paid their respects to Yüeh-niang, she asked them, "What are the two of you laughing about?"

"Today Sister Six played a board game with Father," replied Yü-lou, "and lost a tael of silver. Tomorrow she'll have to play host and invite you to join the fun."

Yüeh-niang smiled. Chin-lien, on this occasion, did no more than put in a pro forma appearance before Yüeh-niang and then head back to the front compound in order to keep Hsi-men Ch'ing company. She ordered Ch'un-mei to light some incense in her room and to prepare the bathing tub and heat some bath water so that that evening she and Hsi-men Ch'ing could:

Emulate the pleasures of fish in the water.[3]

Gentle reader take note: Although Wu Yüeh-niang was the First Lady of the house and occupied the master suite, she was sick so much of the time that she hadn't been able to take effective charge of household affairs. All she really did was to go out and pay the social calls that propriety demanded. The household expenditures and receipts were all in the hands of the excourtesan, Li Chiao-erh. Sun Hsüeh-o was in charge of the wives of the household retainers who worked in the kitchen, and it was her responsibility to supply the needed food and drink to the separate quarters of the various residents. For example, if Hsi-men Ch'ing spent the night in one of his concubine's quarters and needed anything to eat or drink, or a particular kind of soup, it was Hsüeh-o's responsibility to see that it was duly prepared, and the maidservants from the rooms in question would come to fetch it. But no more of this.

That evening Hsi-men Ch'ing remained in Chin-lien's quarters where they drank wine for a while, and then, when they had finished bathing, went to bed.

The next day was one of those occasions on which:

Something was destined to happen.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had promised Chin-lien that he would visit the fair at the Temple of the God of the Eastern Peak and buy some pearls for her to make into a headband. For this reason he rose early and expressed a desire for some lotus-blossom cakes and pickled fish and vermicelli soup for breakfast. As soon as he got up he asked Ch'un-mei to go to the kitchen and order these things for him but she refused to budge.

"Don't send her back there," said Chin-lien. "There's someone there who goes around saying that I encourage her to connive with me in sharing your favours as a means of keeping you all to ourselves. She's forever:

Pointing at the pig but cursing the dog.[4] and abusing the two of us every way she knows how. What would you want to send her back there for?"

"Who is it that says that sort of thing or abuses her?" Hsi-men Ch'ing demanded to know. "Tell me who it is."
"What's the point of talking about it?" said Chin-lien.
"Even basins and jugs have ears.[5]
Just don't send her back there but send Ch'iu-chü instead, that's all."
Hsi-men Ch'ing, therefore, called in Ch'iu-chü and told her to go back to the kitchen and give Hsüeh-o his instructions. Enough time went by in which to eat two meals; the woman had already set the table but still no food was forthcoming. By this time Hsi-men Ch'ing was getting very hot and bothered.
When the woman saw that Ch'iu-chü had not returned she turned to Ch'un-mei and said, "You go back there and see what's going on. That slave still hasn't come back. She must have:
Taken root and sent up sprouts,
by now."
Ch'un-mei was rather out of sorts to begin with and marched off to the kitchen in a huff.
When she saw that Ch'iu-chü was still waiting for the food, she started to curse at her, saying, "You lousy, sleepy-eyed slave! Mother's going to beat the legs right off you! 'Why haven't you come back?' she'd like to know. Father's being kept waiting. As soon as he's eaten he wants to go to the temple fair. There he is up front, anxious to be on his way, and getting increasingly hot and bothered. I've been sent to see if I can drag you back with me."
If Sun Hsüeh-o had not heard these words nothing might have happened but having heard them, she became enraged and started to curse, saying, "You crazy little whore! You may think I'm like:
The Mohammedan bowing to Mecca,[6]
So whoever shows up gets a bow.
But:
The saucepan is beaten out of iron;
Things take a little time to make.
The congee I had already prepared, he doesn't want to eat. Instead, all of a sudden, he comes up with a brand new idea, and expects me to start grilling cakes and making soup. How was I supposed to know what he wanted? After all, I'm not a:
Tapeworm in his belly."[7]
Ch'un-mei was incensed at her cursing and responded, "Stop talking through your cunt! If the master hadn't ordered us to come for it, who would have dared to demand anything of you? Whether you come up with it or not, we're going back up front and report. Why make such a fuss about it?"
Taking hold of Ch'iu-chü by the ear, she set off toward the front compound.
"Like mistress, like slave," muttered Hsüeh-o. "Do you think you can carry on so high-handedly, and remain in favour, forever?"
"If you've got the favour,
You might as well flaunt it," said Ch'un-mei. "I wouldn't sell the two of us short if I were you."
Thereupon, she marched off in a fit of high dudgeon.
When Chin-lien saw her come in the door, her face waxen with rage, dragging Ch'iu-chü behind her, she asked, "What's the matter?"
"Why don't you ask her?" said Ch'un-mei. "When I went, she was still mooning around in the kitchen, waiting, while the other one:
Just as slow and easy as you please,
had only started to knead the dough. Although I probably shouldn't have, I said, 'Father's up front waiting, and Mother wants to know why you haven't come back yet. She's sent me here to get you.' Whereupon that insignificant harlot started to curse me, calling me 'slave' a thousand times, if not ten thousand times. She said, 'Father seems to think I'm like:
The Mohammedan bowing to Mecca;
So whoever shows up gets a bow.
Someone must have been putting ideas in his head. The congee I had already prepared, he doesn't want to eat. Instead, out of the blue, he comes up with a brand new idea, and calls for cakes and soup.' She was so busy with her cursing in the kitchen that she couldn't get around to the cooking."
"Just as I said," interjected the woman, "you shouldn't have sent her back there. As long as someone's so ill-disposed toward her, and claims that she and I are keeping you all to ourselves here in our quarters, she's bound to get nothing but abuse for her pains."
When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he became enraged. Marching back to the kitchen:
Without permitting any further explanation,
he kicked Hsüeh-o several times and cursed her, saying, "You lousy, splay-legged whore! When I sent her here to ask after the cakes, what did you curse her for? You called her a slave, did you? Why don't you:
Piddle a bladderful of piss, and
Take a good look at yourself?"[8]
Hsüeh-o had to suffer Hsi-men Ch'ing's kicking and abuse but:
Though she dared to be angry,
She dared not speak.
Hsi-men Ch'ing had hardly gone out the kitchen door when Hsüeh-o turned to the wife of the head servant, Lai-chao, whose nickname was "The Beanpole," and said, "This must be my unlucky day! It's a good thing you were here to see it. I didn't say anything to her. She came marching in here like an avenging spirit:
Making all kinds of threatening noises,
and dragging the other maidservant away. Then she went:
Talebearing and embroidering on the facts,[9] in front of the master, so that he came storming in here and abused me this way for no reason at all. I'm going to keep my eyes peeled from now on. The two of them are like mistress, like slave. Do they think they can carry on so high-handedly forever? They'll come a cropper if they don't watch out."
Unbeknownst to her, Hsi-men Ch'ing had overheard everything she said.
He came back in and struck her several additional blows with his fist, cursing as he did so, "You lousy slave of a whore! And you still claim you weren't abusive to her, when I've heard you cursing her with my own ears?"
Hsi-men Ch'ing beat her until:
The pain was difficult to bear, and then went back to the front compound. Hsüeh-o was left in the kitchen with the tears running down her face. Convulsed with sobs, she began to cry out loud.
Wu Yüeh-niang had just gotten up and was in the master bedroom combing her hair.
"What's the ruckus in the kitchen all about?" she asked Hsiao-yü.
Hsiao-yü came back and reported, "Father wanted some cakes to eat before going to the temple fair. They say the lady in the kitchen was cursing at Ch'un-mei, from the Fifth Lady's quarters, when Father overheard her and gave her a few kicks. That's why she's started to cry."
"I don't remember his ever asking for cakes before," said Yüeh-niang. "But all she needed to do was to make them up as fast as she could and send him on his way. What need was there for her to curse the maidservant from the other quarters?"
Thereupon, she sent Hsiao-yü to the kitchen to urge Hsüeh-o and the servants' wives to hurry up with the preparation of the soup. Hsi-men Ch'ing finally ate his breakfast, mounted his horse, and set off for the temple, accompanied by one of his pageboys. But no more of this.
Sun Hsüeh-o couldn't get over her resentment at what had happened, so she went into Yüeh-niang's room and started telling her about it. But she didn't realize that Chin-lien had stolen up outside and was standing by the window, eavesdropping.
Chin-lien saw that Hsüeh-o was inside the room and overheard her saying to Yüeh-niang and Li Chiao-erh, "She's got him completely monopolized. Behind your back:
There's nothing she won't do.[10]
Mother, you don't know that whore. When you get right down to it, she's more insatiable than any mere adulteress. She can't stand to go even a single night without a man. She's always up to something behind your back.
Things no one else would do;
She can bring herself to do.[11]
Originally, when she was living in her own home, she poisoned her husband to death. And now that she's here, she's trying her best to bury the rest of us alive. She's turned our husband into an angry fighting cock who glares at us as though he doesn't even see us."
"I don't remember your ever acting this way before," said Yüeh-niang. "If he sent a maidservant from the front compound to ask for cakes, all you needed to do was to make them up as best you could and send him on his way. What need was there for you to start cursing her for no good reason?"
"I'll call her bald or blind if I like!" retorted Hsüeh-o. "Just a little while ago, when that maidservant worked for you, if she refused to do as she was told when I was on duty in the kitchen, I would give her a smack with the back of a knife. And you didn't say anything about it. But now that she's fallen into the hands of that other one, she's started to carry on as though she owns the place."
While they were still talking, Hsiao-yü came in and said, "The Fifth Lady is outside."
A minute later, Chin-lien came into the room and said to Hsüeh-o, "If I really did do in my former husband, you had no business allowing your husband to bring me into the household in the first place. That way I could never have monopolized him or taken your place away from you. As for Ch'un-mei, she wasn't even my own maid to begin with. If you're so angry about it, all you have to do is make her go back to serving the First Lady. That way if you want to quarrel with her, I won't get dragged into it. No one feels good about losing a husband and having to marry another but, right now, there's really nothing difficult about it. Just wait till he gets home and have him give me a writ of divorce. I'll go, and that will be the end of it."
"I don't know what's at the bottom of all this," said Yüeh-niang, "but it would help if the two of you would be a little more sparing of words."
"Just look at her, Mother," protested Hsüeh-o:
"Her mouth is like the Huai River in spate.[12] Nobody can get the better of her. And she's always wagging her tongue in front of our husband, turning him against us, so he scarcely recognizes us any more."
"If you had your way," she continued, turning to Chin-lien, "except for Mother, the rest of us would all be driven away, so you'd be the only one left."
Wu Yüeh-niang just sat there and let the two of them continue to trade insults, without saying a word. It didn't take long for it to heat up even further.
"You may call me a slave," said Hsüeh-o, "but it's you who are the real slave."
They were on the verge of coming to blows when Yüeh-niang decided she had had enough of it and told Hsiao-yü to drag Hsüeh-o back to the kitchen.
P'an Chin-lien, for her part, went straight back to her quarters, where she:

Took off her fancy attire,
Washed away her makeup,
Let loose her raven locks, and
Left her flowery countenance in disarray.
She wept until:
Her two eyes were the colour of peaches and threw herself down on her bed.

When the sun began to set in the west, Hsi-men Ch'ing came back from the temple fair, carrying four ounces of pearls in his sleeve. No sooner did he enter her room and see the state she was in than he asked, "What's the matter?"
The woman started to cry out loud, demanding a writ of divorce from Hsi-men Ch'ing and pouring out, thus and so, the entire story.
"I certainly never loved you just for your money, and now that I've joined my fate to yours, how can you let anyone abuse me so? She said I had done in my husband, a thousand times, if not ten thousand times. What's it to me if I:
Pick up something that I already have, or Lose something that never belonged to me?
If I have to do without a maidservant, so be it. What do I want with a maid from someone else's quarters to wait on me, if I have to take all this abuse for it? I've got one shadow too many as it is."
If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard these words nothing might have happened but having heard them:
The spirits of his Three Corpses[13] became agitated:
The breaths of his Five Viscera[14] ascended to Heaven.[15]
Like a whirlwind he descended upon the kitchen, seized Hsüeh-o by the hair, and proceeded to beat her with a short stick as hard as he could.
Luckily for her, Wu Yüeh-niang intervened, grabbing him by the hand and saying, "Why doesn't everyone take things a little easier? You're just upsetting the master of the house."
"You lousy, splay-legged whore!" exploded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I heard you cursing in the kitchen with my own ears, and you're still trying to drag other people into it. If I don't beat your bottom right off for you, I might as well forget it."
Gentle reader take note: As a direct result of the beating of Sun Hsüeh-o this day, P'an Chin-lien would find that:
Though her deeds were done in the past,
The chickens would come home to roost.
There is a poem that testifies to this:
Chin-lien, by relying on her husband's favour,
could count on his support;
But, in so doing, she aroused the deepest enmity in Sun Hsüeh-o.
It has always been true that gratitude for kindness and festering resentment;
Even in a thousand or ten thousand years will never be allowed to gather dust.[16]
On this occasion, after Hsi-men Ch'ing had beaten Hsüeh-o, he returned to the front compound and endeavored to mollify Chin-lien. He brought out from his sleeve the four ounces of pearls that he had bought at the temple fair that day and gave them to her to make into a headband. When the woman saw that her husband had taken action on her behalf and thereby enabled her to vent her spleen, there was no reason for her to be anything but delighted. From this time on:
Whatever she asked for, she received tenfold;[17] and the favour shown her was even greater than it had been before.
One day thereafter, she fulfilled her obligation by giving a little party in the garden to which she invited only Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and Hsi-men Ch'ing, so the four of them could have a drink together.
To make a long story short, Hsi-men Ch'ing had formed a club, the membership of which consisted of ten friends, who met together once a month for a drinking party.[18]
The first of them was named Ying Po-chüeh, or Sponger Ying. He was the decadent scion of what had once been a substantial family but had managed to completely squander his patrimony, and now made his living by squiring wealthy young rakes about the licensed quarters and picking up whatever he could along the way. His nickname was Beggar Ying.

The second was named Hsieh Hsi-ta, or Tagalong Hsieh. He had inherited the right to a position as a battalion commander in the Ch'ing-ho Guard but, having lost his parents while still a child, had become:
A dedicated idler, devoted to his leisure.[19]
He was an expert performer at kickball and also liked to gamble. Having abandoned his prospects of a career, he was now a confirmed hanger-on.
The third was named Wu Tien-en, or Heartless Wu. He had been a yin-yang master on the staff of the district yamen but had been removed from his post for cause. He now made his living by hanging around in front of the yamen and acting as a guarantor for loans to the local officials and functionaries. This was how he had become acquainted with Hsi-men Ch'ing.
The fourth was named Sun T'ien-hua, whose nickname was Sun Kua-tsui, or Blabbermouth Sun. He was more than fifty years old and specialized in talking his way into the brothels in the licensed quarter without purchasing their wares.[20] He made himself useful to the singing girls by:
Delivering letters and passing notes, or helping them to attract customers, thus depending for his living on the emoluments of romance.
The fifth, who was the younger brother of Assistant Regional Commander Yün, was named Yün Li-shou, or Welsher Yün.
The sixth, who was the nephew of Eunuch Director Hua, was named Hua Tzu-hsü, or Nobody Hua.
The seventh was named Chu Jih-nien, or Sticky Chu.
The eighth was named Ch'ang Shih-chieh, or Cadger Ch'ang.
The ninth was named Pai Lai-ch'iang, or Scrounger Pai.
Together with Hsi-men Ch'ing, they made ten in all. The other members of the club, out of consideration for Hsi-men Ch'ing's supply of ready cash, insisted on his taking the position of senior member. Every month they met together somewhere for a drinking party, at which they took turns playing host.
One day it was the turn of Hua Tzu-hsü to convene the club at his home that was right next door to that of Hsi-men Ch'ing. As befitted the household of a eunuch, everything was done on a lavish scale, with:
Large platters and large bowls.
The others had already arrived but Hsi-men Ch'ing was busy that day, and by midafternoon had still failed to show up, though they were careful to keep a place for him.
When Hsi-men Ch'ing finally arrived, he was immaculately dressed and accompanied by four pageboys. The whole company got up from their seats to welcome him. When they had finished with the social amenities, the host sat down in the appropriate place and Hsi-men Ch'ing took the seat of honour. A performer with a painted face and two other singing girls were there to entertain them, playing a p'i-p'a, a psaltery, and a mandola, and singing in front of the gathering. Truly, words are inadequate to describe:
The graceful beauty of the denizens of the Pear Garden,[21]
Whose beauty and talent both approached perfection.
Behold:

Their silk garments are like drifts of snow;
Their jeweled chignons are like storeyed clouds.
They have cherry mouths, apricotlike faces,
and peach-coloured cheeks;
They possess willow waists, orchidaceous hearts,
and epidendronlike natures.
The sound of their singing is melodious;
Their voices are like the warbling of orioles
as they sport upon the branch.
The style of their dancing is fastidious;
Their postures resemble the pacing of phoenixes
as they move among the flowers.
Their tunes adhere to classic standards;
Their music has the air of spontaneity.
Their dancing waylays the bright moon
into shining on the pleasure-houses of Ch'in;
Their singing diverts the moving clouds
into hovering atop the bordellos of Ch'u.
High or low, allegro or andante,
they adhere to the appropriate modes;
Spitting out jade and expectorating pearls.
Light or heavy, scherzando or legato,
they follow the prescribed melodies;
Like plangent metal or tinkling jade.
The bridges on the psaltery are ranged like wild geese;
making each note distinct.
The wood of the clappers is inlaid with red ivory;
so every beat sounds new.[22]

After a little while, when:
Three rounds of wine had been consumed; and
Two suites of songs had been performed, the three singing girls laid aside their instruments, came forward, and:
Like sprigs of blossoms swaying in the breeze;
Sent the pendants of their embroidered sashes flying,
As they kowtowed to the company. Hsi-men Ch'ing called for his pageboy, Tai-an, and instructed him to take three sealed gift packets out of his letter case. There were two mace for each of them. After they had kowtowed once again to express their gratitude, they withdrew.
Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked his host, Hua Tzu-hsü, "What's the name of this girl? She can really sing!"
Before his host could reply, Ying Po-chüeh interjected, "You're certainly becoming rather forgetful not to recognize her, sir. The one who was playing the psaltery is Brother Hua the Second's sweetheart, Wu Yin-erh, or Silver, from the back alley in the licensed quarter. The one who was playing the mandola is Greenhorn Chu's daughter, Chu Ai-ai, or Love. And this one who was playing the p'i-p'a is the daughter of Auntie Li the Third, from Second Street. She's the younger sister of Li Kuei-ch'ing and her informal name is Kuei-chieh, or Cassia. Since her paternal aunt is a member of your household, how can you pretend not to know her?"
Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, saying, "It's been six years since I saw her last, and she's grown up to be a woman already."
A little later, when they had run out of wine, the girls came out to replenish their drinks, and Kuei-chieh performed her task most ingratiatingly, engaging them in flirtatious conversation as she did so.
Hsi-men Ch'ing asked her, "What are Auntie Three and your sister, Kuei-ch'ing, doing at home these days? Why haven't they paid me a visit recently, or come to see your aunt?"
"My mother's been in bad shape since last year," said Kuei-chieh. One of her legs is partially paralyzed to this day, so she can't even walk without someone to lean on. My elder sister, Kuei-ch'ing, has been engaged by a merchant from the Huai region for the last six months. He's always taking her off to stay with him in his inn, and he won't let her come home for two or three days at a time. There's hardly anyone to be relied on at home these days. My mother is completely dependent on me to come out and sing everyday, helping to entertain the few gentlemen that we're acquainted with. It's a hard life. We simply haven't had the time to pay a visit at your house, or look in on my aunt. How is it, Father, that you haven't been inside the quarter for such a long time? And why haven't you let my aunt come home to visit with my mother?"
When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that her manner was congenial and her conversation clever and sprightly, he felt himself rather attracted to her.
"If I arranged with two of my friends to escort you back to your place today," he asked, "how would that be with you?"
"Don't joke with me, Father," said Kuei-chieh. "How could:
Such distinguished feet tread on such humble ground?"[23]
"I'm not joking," said Hsi-men Ch'ing; and he actually reached into his sleeve, pulled out his handkerchief, along with a toothpick and a box of breath-sweetening lozenges, and gave them to Kuei-chieh as a pledge.
"When do you plan to leave?" asked Kuei-chieh. "I ought to send the servant back home right away, to let them know, so they'll be able to make some preparations."
"As soon as the party breaks up," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "we can set out together."
Not long thereafter, when they had finished passing around the wine, it was lamplighting time and the party broke up. Hsi-men Ch'ing invited Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta to join him, and, without even bothering to go home, they set out, on horse and mule back, to accompany Kuei-chieh into the licensed quarter, to the Li family establishment. Truly:

Into the brocaded nest,
It is not nearly as good to venture
as it is to stay away;
Into the red floss noose,
It is easy enough to stick your head
but hard to extricate it.[24]

There is a song to the tune "The Water Nymphs" that testifies to this:

A human pitfall, secretly constructed,
like an underground dugout;
A circean cave, as artfully designed as a penitentiary;
A charnel house, openly laid out like a butcher shop;
Its sole purpose is to love you to death
while devouring you alive.
On its signboard you will find written in large characters:
"For the cost of his entertainment the patron will receive no discount;
For the expenses incurred
the madam alone will accept payment;
For the price of their favours the girls will not extend credit."[25]

When Hsi-men Ch'ing and the others had escorted Li Kuei-chieh's sedan chair to the door of her establishment, Li Kuei-ch'ing came out to meet them and ushered them into the main room. After they had finished with the appropriate amenities, they invited her old mother to come out so they could pay their respects.
Before long, the old procuress made her appearance, hobbling along with the aid of a stick, for she suffered from partial paralysis on one side of her body.
When she saw Hsi-men Ch'ing she saluted him with the words, "My Heavens! It's my distinguished kinsman. What wind has blown you this way?"
Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, saying, "I've been so busy recently I haven't been able to stop by. I hope you won't take it amiss."
"And who may these two gentlemen be?" asked the procuress.
"They're two good friends of mine," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Brother Ying the Second and Hsieh Hsi-ta. We had a meeting of our club at the Hua residence today and ran into Kuei-chieh there, so we decided to see her home together. Bring on the wine. We'd be happy to have three cups with you."
The procuress asked her three guests to be seated at the upper end of the room while she busied herself with seeing that tea was served, a dining table wiped off, and wine and delicacies prepared. In a little while a servant came in with the table, the lamps and candles were lit, and an array of wine and foodstuffs appeared.
Kuei-chieh returned to her room and changed her clothes before coming back out to help entertain them. It was truly:

A nest of breezes and moonlight;
A lair of orioles and flowers.
There was nothing for it for the two sisters but to:
Fill their golden goblets to the brim; and
Tune their jade mandolas to one melody, as they sang and served the wine. A poem testifies to this:

Inside glass goblets,
The amber fluid is rich.
From the small press the wine drips in pearls of red.
Frying dragons and roasting phoenixes weep jade fat.
Silk screens and embroidered curtains contain the perfumed air.

Blow dragon flutes!
Beat alligator drums!
Let white teeth sing!
Slender waists dance!
All the more, since verdant spring must not be spent in vain,
And silver lamps reflect the voices of alluring damsels.
No wine now wets the earth
of Liu Ling's[26] tomb.[27]

On this occasion, Li Kuei-ch'ing and Li Kuei-chieh sang a suite of songs together, while at the table the guests were having such a good time that:

Drinking vessels and game tallies lay helter-skelter.[28]

Turning to Kuei-ch'ing, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Since the two of you are both here today, and I've heard for a long time what an accomplished performer of southern melodies Kuei-chieh has become, why not ask her to sing us a song, as a means of encouraging our two guests to have another cup of wine? What do you think?"

"We really oughtn't to put her to the trouble," said Ying Po-chüeh, "but are prepared to wash our ears in hopes of hearing a superb performance."

Kuei-chieh simply sat there with a smile on her face for some time, without making a move.

It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing had gotten the idea into his head that he might like to deflower Kuei-chieh, and that was why he had first expressed a desire to hear her sing a solo. This fact did not escape the practiced eyes of the denizens of the quarter, who:

Knew a ghost when they saw one, and had already guessed 80 or 90 percent of what was afoot.

Li Kuei-ch'ing, who was sitting by her side, was the first to speak, saying, "I'm afraid our Kuei-chieh has been spoiled ever since she was a child. She's always been rather shy, by nature, and doesn't like to sing for people on a merely casual basis."

At this, Hsi-men Ch'ing called for his pageboy, Tai-an, drew a five-tael ingot of silver out of his letter case, and placed it on the table, saying, "This doesn't amount to anything but may help to defray the cost of Kuei-chieh's makeup for the time being. On another day I'll send over a few sets of brocade clothing for her."

Kuei-chieh hastily rose to her feet and expressed her thanks, after which a maidservant was directed to put the money away, on the one hand, while on the other, a small table was placed out for her, and Kuei-chieh was invited to leave her place at the main table and sing for them.

Thereupon, Kuei-chieh:

Neither hurriedly nor hastily;
Lightly raising her silken sleeves,
Setting her beige skirt in motion, and with a pink, tasseled handkerchief, decorated with a motif of:

Fallen blossoms on flowing water, dangling from the mouth of her sleeve, sang a song to the tune "Stopping the Clouds in Flight:"

Though her demeanor is nonchalant,
She has outdone every rival in the quarter to take top billing.
Her every move is escorted by a fragrant breeze,
And never fails to elicit respect.
Ch'a!
She is a piece of jade sullied in the muck;
Hardly run of the mill.
With a single, unaccompanied song,
She takes her audience by storm.
Just like the epiphany
in King Hsiang's dream.[29]
Just like the epiphany in King Hsiang's dream.[30]

By the time she had finished her song, Hsi-men Ch'ing was so delighted he scarcely knew what to do with himself. He ordered Tai-an to take the horse home with him, and that evening he spent the night in Li Kuei-ch'ing's room. Merely because Hsi-men Ch'ing felt an inclination to deflower this girl, and Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta were on the spot to aid and abet him in this enterprise, he took the bait.

The next day he sent a pageboy to his house to fetch fifty taels of silver and also to a silk goods store to buy four sets of clothing, explaining that he planned to deflower Li Kuei-chieh. When Li Chiao-erh heard that it was her own niece, from her old establishment, that he was planning to deflower, how could she have been anything but delighted? She promptly produced a silver ingot of fifty taels weight and gave it to Tai-an to deliver to the licensed quarter.

A set of jewellery was made up, clothing was tailored, tables of food were ordered, and with:

Wind and string instruments, song and dance;
Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade,

there were three days of nuptial festivities. Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta also persuaded Blabbermouth Sun, Sticky Chu, and Cadger Ch'ang to come up with five candareens each, in the way of a gift, when they came to offer their congratulations. Every last thing, including the bedding, was paid for by Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Day after day they regaled themselves in the licensed quarter with:

Unlimited quantities of meat and wine.
Amid dancers' skirts and singers' clappers he is forever seeking novelty;
But when all the yellow gold is spent nothing but his body remains.
A word of advice to wealthy young men:
"Don't spend it all too fast; the practice of economy is like good medicine, for it can cure poverty."

Pan Jinlian, now settled in her new home and confident of Ximen's favour, grew more and more arrogant, and made so much trouble that the whole place was in a turmoil. She was suspicious too, and spent much time listening at doors and peeping through windows.

Chunmei was not a model of patience. One day she had been doing some trifling thing for her mistress, and Jinlian found fault with her about it. She could not vent her bad temper upon her own mistress, so she went to the kitchen and there began to thump the table and knock the chairs about. Sun Xue'e did not appreciate such behavior, so she said:

"You strange creature, if you are so anxious to find a husband, kindly try some other place. Why come here to display your nasty temper?"

Chunmei was already very angry, and this made her even more furious. "Who is the wretch who accuses me of wanting a man?" she cried.

It was quite clear that she was in a very bad temper, and Xue'e pretended not to hear her. Chunmei, however, continued in the same strain, and finally went to the front court where, with a few additions of her own, she related the story to Jinlian, to annoy her. "She says you asked his Lordship to have me so that we could try to keep him all to ourselves."

Jinlian was herself in the worst of moods. She had been obliged to get up very early to help Yueniang to dress for a funeral. She was tired, and decided to lie down for a while. When she awoke, she went to the arbour and there met Meng Yulou, who looked as charming as ever.

"Why are you looking so miserable, Sister?" Yulou said.

"Don't ask me," Jinlian said, "I had to get up very early, and I am tired. Where have you been?"

"I have just come from the kitchen."

"And what did you hear there?"

"I didn't hear anything."

Jinlian hated Xue'e but she said nothing to Yulou. They sewed for a while in the arbour. Chunmei brought them tea and, after it, they wearied of their work and set out a chess table. Then Qintong came and told them that Ximen Qing had returned. Before they had time to clear their game away, he came through the garden gate.

The two women were wearing white silk hairnets, and their hair peeped out beneath. They had black jeweled earrings, and, in their white silk dresses, red bodices, embroidered skirts, and little red shoes, so tiny, arched, and tapering, they looked like figures carved in jade. Ximen Qing smiled at them.

"You are like a pair of singing girls," he said. "You must be worth a few hundred taels of silver."

"We are not singing girls," Jinlian said, "but if you want one you will find one in the back court."

Yulou was going to leave them but Ximen Qing pulled her back. "Where are you going?" he said. "The moment I come in, you try to run away. Tell me, what do you do when I'm not here?"

"We were both feeling very miserable," Jinlian said, "so we came here to have a game. We don't play tricks behind your back but we didn't expect you so early." She took his cloak. "The funeral was soon over," she said.

"There were many court officials at the temple, and it was so hot I couldn't stand it any longer. That is why I am home so early."

Yulou asked if Yueniang had come back, and Ximen said that he had come away before her, and had sent two boys to meet her. "I see you are playing chess," he said, sitting down. "What is the stake?"

"We are playing for love," Jinlian said. "Why should we have a stake?"

"I will play you both in turn," said Ximen, "and the loser shall spend a tael of silver, and treat us."

"We have no money," Jinlian said.

"Well, if you have no money, take one of your hairpins and pawn it with me. That will do."

The chessmen were set up, and Ximen Qing played against Jinlian. She was beaten but, as soon as Ximen began to count the pieces, she jumbled them all together and ran away to a rock garden where there were many flowers, and pretended to be gathering them.

"Here, little oily mouth," Ximen Qing cried, and ran after her, "you lose, and then you run away." Jinlian laughed at him.

"You wonderful creature," she cried, "it was Yulou you beat, go and bother her instead of coming and plaguing me."

She had some flowers in her hand and, pulling them to pieces, she threw them at him. Ximen Qing went up to her and, taking her in his arms, set her down upon the rock garden, and gave her some sweets from his own mouth. They were amusing themselves in this way when Yulou came up. She told them that Yueniang had returned, and asked Jinlian to go with her to the back court that they might greet her. Jinlian left Ximen Qing, and, as she went, she called out, "Young man, I shall have something to tell you when I come back." She and Yulou then went to make their reverence before the mistress of the house.

"What are you laughing about?" Yueniang said.

"The Fifth Lady has been having a game of chess with Father," Yulou said. "She lost a tael of silver to him. Tomorrow, she is going to give a party. Of course, you must come."

Yueniang smiled. Jinlian stayed only a few moments, and then went back to the front court to Ximen Qing. She told Chunmei to burn incense in her room and to prepare the bath, that they might enjoy the pleasures of fishes in the water that evening.

Yueniang was the first wife but she was always ill, and could not take her proper place in the management of all the household affairs. Engagements with friends and relatives and all the financial business of the household were attended to by Li Jiao'er. Xue'e acted as housekeeper and attended to the preparation of meals in the kitchen for the whole family. Wherever Ximen Qing happened to be spending the night, if he wished for anything, Xue'e would get it ready, and the maid of the lady with whom he was staying would go to the kitchen for it.

That night Ximen Qing slept in Jinlian's room. They drank wine, took a bath, and went to bed. The next morning it soon became apparent that trouble was brewing. Ximen Qing had promised Jinlian that he would go to the temple and buy a jeweled ornament for her hair. He got up very early and asked for some lotus cakes and soup. He told Chunmei to go to the kitchen for them but Chunmei did not move.

"Just as well not tell her to go," Jinlian said. "Someone has said that I allow her liberties so that she and I may keep you all for ourselves. They called us all the nasty names they could think of. It will be much better not to send her."

"Who said such a thing? Tell me," Ximen Qing said.

"I shall not tell you," Jinlian said. "The basins and jars in this house have a way of hearing things. Just don't send her, that's all. Tell Qiuju to go."

Ximen Qing told Qiuju to go to the kitchen and tell Xue'e what he wanted. A very long time passed. Jinlian set the table but there was no sign of food, and Ximen Qing grew more and more angry. Jinlian told Chunmei to go and find her fellow maid. "Go and see what that slave is doing. She doesn't seem to be coming; she must have taken root there." Chunmei went angrily to the kitchen and found Qiuju still waiting for the food.

"You thievish slave," she cried, "mother is going to take your trousers down. Why have you been all this time? Father is all ready to go to the temple, and he wants his cakes. He is in a terrible temper, and has sent me to fetch you."

Xue'e was greatly annoyed. "You marvelous little whore," she cried, "you behave like a Mohammedan Ma keeping a feast day. You think that if you want anything, you have only to run over here for it. I assure you the pans are made of iron, and things take time to cook. I made some gruel, and he won't eat it. Now he must have something new, cakes and soups and so on. I should like to know who is the worm at work in his belly."

This was too much for Chunmei. "Don't you begin any of your indecencies," she cried. "If Father hadn't sent me, I shouldn't be here. Are you going to get it ready or are you not? We will go and see what the master of the house has to say about it." She took Qiuju by the ear, and set off with her to the front court.

"Mistress and slave are far too insolent," Xue'e shouted after her, "but my time will come."

"Time or no time," Chunmei said, "we shall see what happens." She rushed off in a terrible temper.

Jinlian saw her pulling Qiuju along, and noticed that her face was very pale. She asked what was the matter.

"Ask her," Chunmei said. "When I got to the kitchen, she was acting the lady in there, waiting while they slowly stirred the flour. I just said a single sentence: 'Father is waiting, and Mother wants to know why you have not returned.' The one who lives in that little place cursed me in every way she could think of, as if I were a slave. She said Father is like some Mohammedan Ma, who thinks everyone's as devout as he is. She supposed Father had to ask permission from somebody or other before he could have anything to eat. She said they had made gruel for him, and then he has to have soup and cakes. She cursed everybody in the kitchen and would not do a thing."

"I told you so," Jinlian cried. "I told you not to make her go there, or somebody would make trouble with her, and say that we are always monopolizing you, and overwhelm us with insults."

Ximen Qing flew into a rage. He went to the kitchen and, without waiting to hear any explanation, kicked Xue'e several times.

"You crooked, thievish bone," he cried, "I told that maid to come here and ask for some cakes. What right had you to curse her? You called her a slave; but if you want to see a slave you'd better piddle and look at your own image in the pool you make."

Xue'e had to suffer Ximen's ill-usage. She was very angry but dared not offer any excuses. When he had left the kitchen, she said to the Beanpole, Laizhao's wife:

"You see what bad luck I'm having today. You heard all that went on this morning. I didn't say anything very terrible but in she came like a roaring demon and created all that disturbance. Then she dragged off the other maid, and went and told his Lordship, making a mountain out of a molehill, and he came here and made all this trouble. There's no rhyme or reason in it. But I will keep my eyes open and be on the watch for them. The mistress and the slave are both of them haughty but one of these days they will take a false step."

Unfortunately for Xue'e, Ximen Qing heard everything she said. He went back, and struck her several blows with his fist. "You thievish slave, you strumpet," he cried, "you can't say now that you didn't insult her, for I have just heard you saying things about her." He continued to chastise the poor woman, causing her considerable pain. Then he went back to the front court. Xue'e shed many tears and sobbed loudly. Yueniang had just risen and was dressing herself. She said to Xiaoyu, "What is all that noise in the kitchen?"

"Father is going to the temple and he wished for some cakes before he left," Xiaoyu said, "but the Kitchen Lady was rude to Chunmei. Father heard about it. He kicked the Kitchen Lady several times and made her cry."

"I never heard of such a thing," Yueniang cried. "If he wants anything to eat, it is her business to make it for him as soon as she can, and be done with it. There is no reason for her to be rude to the maid."
She told Xiaoyu to go to the kitchen, stir up Xue'e and the maids, and order them to make some soup at once. They did so, and sent it to Ximen Qing. Then he set off to the temple.
Xue'e could not settle down. She went to Yueniang and told her all that had happened. While she was talking, Jinlian happened to come that way and stood outside the window to listen. She heard Xue'e say: "Why should she try to get our husband all for herself and make him do everything she wishes? It seems to me, Mother, you don't realize that this strumpet is more lustful than a woman who has half a dozen husbands. She can't bear to sleep alone even for a single night. Nobody else would ever have dreamed of making such a plot. She poisoned her husband, and now she wants to bury us alive. She has made our husband like a black-eyed chicken. He looks at us but never gives us a thought."
"In my opinion, it is you who are in the wrong," Yueniang said. "He told the maid to come to you for some cakes, and, if you had given them to her, there would have been no trouble. There was no need for you to insult her."
"Well, I only brought more trouble upon myself," Xue'e said. "There was a time when that maid served in your part of the house. She was disobedient even in those days, and once I had to use the back of a knife upon her. You never said anything then, Mother. Why should she have become so high and mighty now that she belongs to the Fifth Lady?"
Then Xiaoyu came in and said, "The Fifth Lady is here," and a moment later Jinlian entered the room.
"Let us suppose I did murder my husband," she said, looking straight at Xue'e. "Why didn't you do something to prevent your husband from marrying me? There would have been no question then of my getting him all for myself and your nest being empty. Chunmei is not my maid. If you have anything against her, kindly tell the Great Lady, and let her return to her service. Then there will be no further trouble between you, and I shall be well out of the matter. As for the present state of affairs, there need be no difficulty about that. When he comes back, let him give me papers of divorce, and I will go away. Then, perhaps, you'll be satisfied."
"These squabbles are beyond me," Yueniang said, "you'd better both be quiet."
"Mother," Xue'e cried, "you must realize that her mouth is as the Huai River. There is not a person living who could get on with her. It is perfectly clear that she deceives our husband but, even if she winks, she denies it the next moment. If you had your way," she added, turning to Jinlian, "you would have us all kicked out, except, perhaps, our mistress, so that you could be in sole possession."
Yueniang sat and said nothing, letting them bandy insults as they wished. Soon they began to curse each other. "You called me a slave," Xue'e cried, "but you are the genuine article and no doubt about it." At this, there was nearly a fight but Yueniang would not allow things to go so far, and told Xiaoyu to take Xue'e to her room. Jinlian went to her own apartments, took off her beautiful dress, washed the powder from her cheeks, and pulled her dark hair about till she was hardly fit to be seen. She cried till her eyes had the colour of peaches, and then lay down on the bed.
The sun was going down in the west when Ximen Qing came back from the temple with four taels of pearls. He went to Jinlian's room and asked what was the matter but she sobbed louder than ever and demanded papers of divorce.
"From the very beginning," she cried, "I have cared nothing about your wealth. You were all I wanted. And in return you let everybody trample on me. They said I murdered my husband. If I had had no maid, there would have been no trouble. Why did you give me somebody else's maid, and then allow other people to insult her?"
Ximen Qing flew into a terrible rage. He rushed like a whirlwind to the back of the house, caught Xue'e by the hair, and thrashed her as hard as he could with a short stick until, fortunately, Yueniang came and stopped him.
"You should behave yourselves, all of you," she said. "Why do you make your master so angry?"
"You thievish, crooked bone," Ximen cried to Xue'e, "I heard you in the kitchen cursing them, yet you still try to blame other people. I don't care if I break every bone in your body."
If Jinlian had not carefully plotted the whole scheme beforehand, Ximen Qing would never have struck Xue'e that day. It was all her doing.
When he had done with Xue'e, Ximen Qing went back to Jinlian's room and gave her the pearls he had brought from the temple. Now that her husband had taken her side and vented her spite for her, there was no reason why she should remain upset, so for one loving overture on his part she repaid him tenfold. Their delight in each other grew unceasingly.
One day, it was Hua Zixu's turn to give a party in his house, next door to Ximen Qing's. There was a great feast, and all the brothers were present. Ximen Qing had another engagement, and did not arrive until the afternoon. They would not take their wine without him, and waited. When at last he came, they made reverences to one another and took their seats, with Ximen in the place of honour. Two singing girls played the lute, the cithern, and the flute.
Soon the wine had been passed three times, and the musicians had played twice. The singing girls put down their instruments, and came towards the guests. They had all the delicacy of a branch of flowers. When they had kowtowed, Ximen Qing told his servant to take two envelopes from his purse, each of which contained a small sum, and give it to them. They thanked him, and went back to their places. Then Ximen Qing said to his host, "These girls sing extraordinarily well. Who are they?" Hua said nothing but Ying Bojue replied:
"My Lord, you have a very poor memory. Don't you remember them? The one who plays the cithern is Brother Hua's sweetheart, young Wu Yin'er. She lives in one of the back streets in the bawdy district. The one who plays the lute is the girl I told you about some time ago. Her name is Li Guijie, and she is the younger sister of Li Guiqing. One of your ladies is her aunt. It's no use pretending you don't know her."
Ximen Qing smiled. "Oh, that's who she is! I haven't seen her for about six years. I never thought of her as being grown up."
A little later the girls came to pour wine for them. Guijie pressed Ximen to drink a great deal, and murmured loving words in his ear.
"What are your mother and sister doing now?" Ximen said. "Why do they never come to see your aunt?"
"Since last year," Guijie said, "my mother has not been at all well. Even now she can hardly get about, and she has to have someone to lean upon if she wishes to walk. My sister Guiqing has taken up with a merchant from Anhui, and for some months she has been staying at the inn with him. He will not allow her to come home even for a few days, so there is no one at home but me. I have to support the household by going out day after day to sing at parties, and I'm very tired of it all. We are always thinking about coming to see Aunt but really we never get an opportunity. Why have you not been to see us for so long, Father? It would be kind of you to send my aunt to see her sister one of these days."
Ximen Qing thought the girl very pleasant, and she talked intelligently. He soon found himself falling in love with her. "I think I shall invite one or two friends to help me take you home tonight," he said. "What do you say?"
"Don't make fun of me, Father," the girl said. "How can such noble feet as yours tread our unworthy ground?"
"I am not making fun of you," Ximen said. He took a handkerchief, a toothpick, arid a box of tea leaves from his sleeve, and gave them to her.
"When will you come?" Guijie asked. "I must tell the servant to go home, and give them a chance to get ready."
"We shall start as soon as the party is over."
Soon the wine was finished and it grew dark. Ximen Qing invited Ying Bojue and Xie Xida, and, without going home first, they went off together to Guijie's house in the bawdy district.

A dark, deep pit is this for man's ensnarement
Built like a prison pen, a cavern for the enticement of souls
Like a butcher's yard, with corpses piled and laid in order.
Here love brings death, and only money lives.

The sign is written in great characters:

"Here, golden brothers, you'd purchase love, pray don't offer silk for hairdressers. Before she yields her blossoms to you, Madam must've cash. In this house, sisters are to be had only for ready money."

Ximen Qing followed Guijie's sedan chair to her door. Guiqing opened it, and took them into the hall, and, after greeting them with due politeness, went to ask her mother to come and receive them. Soon the old procuress came, supporting herself on a stick, for she was almost paralyzed. As soon as she saw Ximen Qing, she cried, "Heavens, Sir, what wind has blown you here?"
Ximen Qing smiled. "Please forgive me but I have been so busy, I couldn't come."
The old woman turned to Ying Bojue and Xie Xida. "Why haven't you two been here?"
"I have been busy too," Bojue said. "We have been to a party at Hua's house today, and we met Guijie there. Master Ximen and we have brought her home. But give us some wine as quickly as you like, and let us drink a cup or two and have some fun."
The old woman made the three sit down in the place of honour, and offered them tea. Meanwhile the table was laid, and wine and refreshments set out. Candles and lamps were lighted, and a plentiful repast was set before them. Guijie changed her clothes and came to sit beside them. The two sisters, their jade wrists keeping time together, filled the golden cups. They passed the wine and sang songs.
"I have been told," Ximen said to Guiqing, "that your sister can sing songs of the South. Here are these two gentlemen. Won't you ask her to sing a song in their honour?"
"Oh, I really could not trouble her," Bojue said. "I am only basking in your reflected glory, Sir but I shall of course clean my ears the more respectfully to hear the exquisite melody."
Guijie sat and smiled but did not get up. Ximen Qing really wished to make a woman of her, and that was why he asked her to sing. Her old mother was experienced in such matters and saw what was in the wind.
"My sister," Guiqing said, "has always been very independent. She won't let anybody hear her sing unless she thinks fit."
Ximen Qing told Daian to take five taels of silver from his purse, and set it on the table. "This is a mere trifle," he said, "but it may suffice to buy you some powder and rouge. I will send you some pretty clothes one of these days."
Guijie jumped up and thanked him, and, telling the maid to take the present away, she prepared to sing. Now, though she was very young, she was much more seductive and clever than many another. There was no flurry or haste about her. She gently touched her silken sleeves, and swung her dainty skirts. A handkerchief, tasseled and embroidered with a design of flowers and water, hung from her sleeve.
When she had ended her song, Ximen Qing was delighted beyond all measure. He told Daian to take the horse home, and spent the night with Guijie. He had been ready enough to make a woman of this girl, and, when Ying Bojue and Xie Xida urged him to do so, he yielded to their suggestions without raising any difficulties.
The next day he sent a boy home for fifty taels of silver and four sets of clothes. These were to be the present customary on such occasions. When Li Jiao'er heard the news, she was delighted, for Guijie was her niece. She gave Daian a piece of silver, and he brought the clothes to the bawdy house. There a banquet was prepared, and there was singing, dancing, and wine for three days. They were all as merry as could be. Ying Bojue and Xie Xida brought along Sun Guazui, Zhu Shinian, and Chang Zhijie, and they all offered a few coins in token of congratulation. Ximen Qing provided the silken bedclothes, and everyday there was wine and food without stint. They enjoyed themselves immensely.

033
P'an Chin-lien Suffers Ignominy for Adultery with a Servant & Narrowly Escapes Disaster; Stargazer Liu Purveys Black Magic in Pursuit of Gain

How laughable is the parvenu Hsi-men Ch'ing;
Whoever possesses money is welcomed as a patron.
His whole household is in a state of disorder;
Who cares about standards of decency or propriety?
His days are spent consorting with boon companions;
His nights devoted to sleeping with a painted woman.
Though this may not be a long-lived relationship;
It still counts as "a fling in the spring breeze."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was so infatuated by Li Kuei-chieh's beauty that he lingered in the licensed quarter for nearly half a month, without going home. Wu Yüeh-niang sent a servant with his horse to bring him home on numerous occasions but the proprietors of the Li family establishment even hid his clothes and hat, so reluctant were they to let him leave the premises. As a result, the women in his household were all left at loose ends.
This might have been tolerated by the rest of them but as for P'an Chin-lien:

She was still in the springtime of her youth, not thirty years old;
The flames of her desire could not be banked but flared up ten feet high.

Modelled in plaster, carved of jade;
Displaying white teeth and red lips,

Everyday, without fail, she and Meng Yü-lou would make their way to the front gate, looking as though they were:

and lean against the doorjamb as they gazed out into the street, often remaining there until dusk.
In the evening when Chin-lien returned to her room she found that:
On her glossy pillow, amid deserted bed curtains,
There was no companion on the Phoenix Terrace.[3]
Unable to sleep, she would wander into the garden where she:
Gently paced the flower-strewn moss, and Watched the moon bobbing beneath the water;
fearful lest Hsi-men Ch'ing's:
Heart should prove as difficult to capture.
She objected to the lovemaking of the tortoiseshell cats,
For the tumult it engendered in her fragrant heart.
At the time when Meng Yü-lou had entered the household, she had brought with her a pageboy named Ch'in-t'ung, who was about fifteen years old and had just begun to wear his hair in adult style. He was:
Bright-eyed and clean-cut,
as well as being:
Artful and accomplished.
Hsi-men Ch'ing had entrusted the keys of the garden to him and made him responsible for keeping it properly swept. At night he slept in a small side chamber just outside the garden gate.
During the day, P'an Chin-lien and Meng Yü-lou often met in the pavilion in the garden and did needlework together, or played board games with each other. This pageboy was adept at performing little favours and, when he saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had arrived home, was in the habit of coming to let the women know before telling anybody else. For this reason Chin-lien was fond of him and often invited him into her room and treated him to a drink of wine. As a result, the two of them:
Morning after morning and evening after evening;
Exchanged looks with eyes and eyebrows,[4] until they both began to get ideas.
It happened that Hsi-men Ch'ing's birthday on the twenty-eighth day of the seventh month was approaching. When Wu Yüeh-niang realized that he was still in the licensed quarter, so enamored of the mist and flowers that he had no thought of return, she sent the pageboy, Tai-an, to take his horse to the Li establishment and try to bring him back home.
P'an Chin-lien secretly addressed a note to him and gave it to Tai-an, with the injunction, "Slip this to your father inconspicuously, and tell him, 'The Fifth Lady hopes you'll come home as soon as possible.' "
Tai-an did not dare to be remiss but mounted the horse and proceeded straight to the Li family establishment in the licensed quarter. What should he see when he got there but Sponger Ying, Tagalong Hsieh, Sticky Chu, Blabbermouth Sun, and Cadger Ch'ang, the whole bunch of them in fact, keeping Hsi-men Ch'ing company as he embraced his painted lady:
Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade;
Enjoying themselves as they drank up the wine.
When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that Tai-an had arrived, he asked, "What have you come for? Is everything all right at home?"
"Everything's all right at home," replied Tai-an.
"Tell Uncle Fu the Second to try to collect those unpaid bills that are still outstanding in the shop up front," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll look over the accounts when I get home."
"The last few days Uncle Fu the Second has collected quite a few of them," said Tai-an. "He'll present the accounts when you get home."
"Did you bring that outfit for your Aunt Kuei-chieh?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I've got it right here," replied Tai-an.
He then reached into his felt bag, drew out a red blouse with a blue skirt to match, and handed them to Kuei-chieh. Kuei-chieh and Kuei-ch'ing both bowed to express their thanks, and the present was put away. After which, they made haste to give orders that Tai-an should be properly entertained with food and wine in the servants' quarters.
As soon as the pageboy had finished his food and wine he came back into the main room to await his instructions, and he took advantage of the occasion to approach Hsi-men Ch'ing and:
Whisper into his ear in a low voice,[5]
"The Fifth Lady at home asked me to deliver this note. She hopes you'll come home as soon as possible."
Just as Hsi-men Ch'ing was reaching out his hand to take it, Li Kuei-chieh caught sight of the transaction and, assuming it to be a love letter from some prostitute in the front sector of the quarter, snatched it out of his hands and tore it open to see for herself. It turned out to be a sheet of fancy note paper with a diapered border, on which there were a few lines of handwriting. Kuei-chieh handed it to Sticky Chu and asked him to read it out loud to her.
Sticky Chu saw that the missive was in the form of a pair of songs to the tune "The Wind Scatters the Plum Blossoms" and proceeded to declaim them to the company, as follows:
Yearning for him at twilight,
Longing for him by day;
I've tired myself out waiting,
but my lover doesn't come.
Solely on his account, only for his sake,
I've worn myself to a frazzle.
Alas, beneath my brocade coverlet,
I sleep alone.[6]
The lamp is guttering out,
Everyone else is asleep;
All that remains, peeping through my window,
is the bright moon.
Sleeping alone, even if my heart
were hard as iron;
How could it endure the desolation of this night?[7]
The note was signed:
Respectfully,
Your favourite, P'an the Sixth
When Kuei-chieh heard the contents of this missive, she left the table, went back to her room, threw herself down on the bed, and lay there with her face to the wall.
To resume our story, as soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing realized that Kuei-chieh was upset, he took the note and tore it to shreds and then, in front of everybody, kicked Tai-an twice with his booted foot. He also sent someone twice to ask Kuei-chieh to return but she did not come back. Hsi-men Ch'ing was so flummoxed by this that he made his way back to her room himself and carried her out to rejoin the party.
Upon his return he said to Tai-an, "I order you to take the horse and go home. If any whore at my place sends you here again, no matter who it is, when I get back I'll beat her to a stinking pulp!"
Tai-an returned home in tears but we will say no more of that.
"Kuei-chieh," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "there's no need to be so upset. This note is not from anyone else, it's only from the fifth concubine back at my place, asking me to go home because there's something she needs to take up with me. That's all there is to it."
Sticky Chu continued the joke, saying, "Kuei-chieh, don't you believe him. He's only trying to fool you. This P'an the Sixth is really a prostitute from another part of the quarter that he's recently taken up with. She's a real looker. You shouldn't let him off the hook."
Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed and pretended to hit him, saying, "You goddamned louse! All you ever do is plague people to death. She's giving me enough trouble as it is without you and your nonsense on top of everything else."
"It's you who are in the wrong, brother-in-law," said Li Kuei-ch'ing. "As long as you have people at home to keep you in line, what need is there for you to deflower a painted woman in the first place? You might as well stick to the ones you've already got, period. How long have the two of you been together, after all, that you should already be prepared to abandon her?"
"You've got a point there," interjected Sponger Ying. "Sir," he continued, turning to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you'll only take my advice, you won't have to go home, on the one hand, and Kuei-chieh won't have to be upset, on the other. From this day on, let's agree that if anyone gets into such a spat again, each of the culprits will have to forfeit two taels of silver and buy meat and wine to treat the rest of us."
And sure enough, the four or five boon companions at the table:
The talkers talking,
The jokers joking;
Playing at guess-fingers or gaming at forfeits,
Enjoying themselves as they drank up the wine, finally succeeded in mollifying Kuei-chieh. Hsi-men Ch'ing embraced her and sat her on his lap with an ingratiating smile, while the two of them passed the same cup of wine back and forth between them as they drank.
Before long, seven cups of tea were brought in on a vermilion tray of bright red lacquer. The teacups were the colour of snowy linen, the teaspoons were in the shape of apricot leaves, and the tea itself that was flavoured with marinated bamboo shoots, sesame seeds, and osmanthus, was of a bewitching fragrance.
When a cup had been placed in front of each of them, Ying Po-chüeh said, "I know a song to the tune "Imperial Audience" that describes the virtues of tea:
The tender leaves,
Of this high-grade tea,
Are nourished by the spring breeze.
Though, if neglected, they will wither away;
The slightest infusion brings out their true colours.
Incomparable, extraordinary;
Hard to depict or to describe;
Often savored in the mouth;
When drunk, you long for them;
When sober, you adore them;
But a single armful will cost you a bundle.[8]
Tagalong Hsieh laughed, saying, "If the Honourable Gentleman is:
Spending his money and wasting his goods, without hoping to get such an armful, what else could he be hoping for? Now, everyone ought to pitch in, by singing a song if he knows one, or, if he can't sing, by telling a joke, to help Kuei-chieh down her wine."
Tagalong Hsieh, himself, was the first to tell a joke. "Once upon a time there was a mason who was engaged to repave a courtyard in the licensed quarter. Because the madam had been less than generous with him, he surreptitiously stuck a brick in her covered drain. [9] As a result, when it rained, her whole courtyard filled up with water. The madam, in a state of consternation, sought him out, gave him all he could eat or drink, weighed out a mace of silver, and begged him to get rid of the water for her. The mason consumed the food and wine and then stealthily removed the brick from her drain, whereupon all the water immediately drained away. 'Foreman,' asked the madam, 'what was the problem?' To which the mason replied, 'The problem with your drain was the same as it is with you:
It's only dough that makes things flow;
Without the dough, there'd be no flow.' "
It so happens that this joke reflected badly on Kuei-chieh's profession that induced her to speak up, as follows, "I've got a joke of my own with which to regale you gentlemen. Once upon a time, the Taoist adept Sun Ssu-miao [10] had prepared a feast and wished to summon his guests, so he sent the tiger who was customarily in attendance beneath his dais to invite them. The tiger proceeded to eat each and every one of the guests while they were en route to the feast. The Taoist waited until evening but not a single guest had arrived. Everyone told him, 'That tiger of yours must have eaten the guests on their way here.' Before long the tiger arrived and the Taoist asked him, 'What has become of the guests I sent you to invite?' To which the tiger, who could speak the language of men, replied, 'You should know, master, that I've never been known to invite people to partake of anything. The only thing I'm any good at is devouring people.' " [11]
This joke reflected badly on the whole bunch of them.
"It would seem," said Sponger Ying, "that all we know how to do is free-load off your patron, without being able to stand him a treat in return."
Thereupon, he extracted a silver-plated earpick from his hair that weighed one mace. Tagalong Hsieh contributed the pair of gilded rings he used to hold his hairnet in place that were found to weigh nine and a half candareens. Sticky Chu pulled an old handkerchief out of his sleeve that was assessed at a value of two hundred discounted cash. Blabbermouth Sun divested himself of the white cotton breechcloth he wore around his loins that was pawned for enough to buy two and a half jars of wine. Cadger Ch'ang had nothing he could contribute, so he asked Hsi-men Ch'ing for the loan of a full mace of good-quality silver.
The entire proceeds of the collection were handed over to Li Kuei-ch'ing, to defray the expenses of standing Hsi-men Ch'ing and Kuei-chieh a treat. Kuei-ch'ing turned the money over to the servant, who managed to buy a mace worth of crabs, a mace worth of pork, and a chicken. The Li establishment threw in a few side dishes of its own, and everything was duly prepared in the kitchen and served up in:
Large platters and large bowls.
Once the company was seated they scarcely needed an invitation before setting to.
The telling is slow;
What happened was quick.
Behold:
Everyone's mouth goes into motion,
Each of them lowers his head to the task.
Obscuring the sky and bedimming the sun,[12]
They are like a swarm of locusts
all descending at once;
Squinting their eyes and hunching their shoulders,
They are like starving prisoners
just let out of jail.
This one sets to with flailing arms,
As though it has been years since he saw food or wine;
That one holds his chopsticks together,
As if it has been ages
since he attended a feast.
One of them has sweat pouring from his face,
As he engages in a grudge match with a chicken bone;
Another wipes the oil from his lips,
As he wolfs down bristle and rind with his hog's flesh.
When they have eaten but a while,
The cups and plates are in a state of disarray;[13]
By the time they are through,
The chopsticks lie about helter-skelter.
The cups and plates are in a state of disarray;
As spic-and-span as though washed.
The chopsticks lie about helter-skelter;
As neat and clean as though scoured.
This one rates the designation
Commander in Chief of the Gourmands;
That one has earned the sobriquet
General of the Trenchermen.[14]
The wine pots are drained dry, but they continue to upend them;
The platters are quite empty,
yet they scan them in vain.
Truly:
Delicacies of every variety have perished in but a moment;

Sacrificed upon the altar
in the Temple of the Five Viscera.[15]
On this occasion, the bunch of them cleaned the place out as thoroughly as any Buddha King of Purifying Light[16] could have done. Hsi-men Ch'ing and Kuei-chieh barely had two cups of wine apiece, and a few meager gleanings from the dishes on the table, before everything was gobbled up by the ravenous horde.
That day two of the chairs at their table were broken. The pageboy who waited out front with the horse was not invited in for a snack, so he knocked the image of the tutelary god off its pedestal in the shrine by the door and deposited a bulging pile of hot shit in its place. On his way out the door, Blabbermouth Sun stuffed the gilded brass Buddha from the Li family's parlour into his waistband. Sponger Ying, pretending to kiss Kuei-chieh, snitched a gold-filled pin from her hairdo. Tagalong Hsieh pocketed Hsi-men Ch'ing's Szechwan fan. Sticky Chu went into Kuei-ch'ing's room to have a look at himself and made off with her mercury-backed mirror. Even the discount on the mace of silver that Cadger Ch'ang had borrowed from Hsi-men Ch'ing was put onto the reckoning.
It so happened that this bunch of men had nothing better to do than keep Hsi-men Ch'ing company in his revels. What a time they had together! There is a poem that testifies to this:
The prostitutes of the licensed quarter are as coquettish as monkeys;
They are only fit to be visited on the impulse of the moment.
If one allows himself to become infatuated,
with no sense of satiety;
To whom can he safely entrust
the keys to his coffers?
His boon companions continued to cluster around Hsi-men Ch'ing:
Enjoying themselves as they drank up the wine.
But let us put this aside for a moment and return to the story of Tai-an.
When the pageboy returned home with the horse, Wu Yüeh-niang was sitting in her room with Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien.
As soon as she saw Tai-an, she asked, "Have you brought your father back with you or not?"
Tai-an had been crying so hard that both his eyes were as red as could be. He gave an account, thus and so, that concluded, "I only got kicked and cursed by Father for my pains. And he also said, 'Whoever sends after me again will hear from me when I get home.' "
"Just look at him," said Yüeh-niang. "How unreasonable can you get? If he won't come home, so much for that; what business does he have abusing the pageboy? How can he allow himself to be so bewitched by that vixen?"
"It's bad enough to kick a pageboy," said Meng Yü-lou, "but how can he threaten to abuse us into the bargain?"
"Nine out of ten of those whores in the licensed quarter," said P'an Chin-lien, "don't have any real feelings for their customers. As the saying goes:
Not even shiploads of gold and silver,
Can fill up the camps of mist and flowers."
Chin-lien simply blurted out what she had to say, without remembering that:
Even if you only talk along the road,
There may be someone lurking in the grass.[17]
Ever since Tai-an had returned from the licensed quarter, Li Chiao-erh had stolen up outside and had been standing by the window, eavesdropping. When she overheard P'an Chin-lien abusing the members of her own household to Yüeh-niang and referring to them as whores a thousand times, if not ten thousand times, she secretly stored up the resentment in her heart and, henceforth, regarded Chin-lien as her enemy. But no more of this. Truly:
Honeyed words and plausible speeches can make the twelfth month warm;
Cruel words that are hurtful to others can turn the sixth month cold.[18] Chin-lien's only consideration was the need to make herself heard;
How could she anticipate that a bystander could be the cause of calamity?
We will say no more for the moment about the enmity that Chin-lien incurred in Li Chiao-erh but return to the story of that woman herself.
When Chin-lien returned to her room:
Each half hour was like three months of autumn;
Each two-hour period seemed like half a summer.
Knowing that Hsi-men Ch'ing was not coming home that night, she sent her two maidservants off to sleep, made a pretense of going out for a stroll in the garden, invited Ch'in-t'ung into her room, drank wine with him until he was drunk, closed the door:
Took off her clothes and unfastened her girdle, and proceeded to couple with him. Truly:
With lustful daring as big as the sky,
what is there to fear?
Amid mandarin duck curtains the clouds and rain:
a lifetime of passion.[19]
Behold:
One of them shows total disregard for ethical norms or distinctions of status;
The other does not discriminate between above and below or high and low.
One of them, inspired by perverse lustful daring,
Cares nothing for the severity of her husband;
The other, carried away by lecherous desires,
Ignores a clear-cut violation of the law.
One of them, breathing heavily with staring eyes,
Sounds like an ox snoring in the willow's shade;
The other, with coy words and inarticulate cries,
Reminds one of an oriole warbling among the flowers.
One of them, murmurs in her partner's ear of passions evoked by clouds and rain;
The other, swears by the pillow side to be as faithful as the hills and seas.
The garden with its hundred flowers,
Has been transformed into a pleasure ground;
The bedroom of his lawful mistress,
Has turned into a Kingdom of Cockaigne.
Almost before they know it, a glob of donkey's spunk,
Has been deposited in Chin-lien's
jadelike body.[20]
From this time on, every night the woman invited the pageboy into her room for a repeat performance and sent him on his way again before dawn. She secretly let him have two or three of her gold-headed pins to wear in his hair, and she also gave him the brocade scent bag she wore suspended at her waist, together with the gourd toggle that held it in place, so he could wear them under his clothes.
How could she have known that this pageboy:
Was not the sort to abide by his lot,[21]
but constantly went out into the street to drink and gamble with his fellow servants, where he was so indiscreet as to allow these gifts to be seen? As the saying goes:
The best way to avoid being found out,
Is not to do it in the first place.[22]
One day wind of this came to the ears of Sun Hsüeh-o and Li Chiao-erh, who said to each other, "That lousy whore is forever hypocritically protesting her own virtue. How is it, then, that today she's been caught red-handed committing adultery with a pageboy?"
The two of them went off together to tell Yüeh-niang about it but Yüeh-niang expressed herself repeatedly to be incredulous.
"It's all because the two of you are on the outs with her," she said. "But how can you help offending Sister Meng the Third by such an accusation? She'll say you're just trying to get rid of her pageboy."
This response reduced the two to silence.
Sometime after this, the woman was carrying on with the pageboy in her room one night when she forgot to close the back door. Her maidservant, Ch'iu-chü, happened to come out to relieve herself and saw what was going on. The next day she reported what she had seen to Hsiao-yü in the rear compound, and Hsiao-yü mentioned it to Hsüeh-o. Hsüeh-o and Li Chiao-erh again sought out Yüeh-niang and told her about it.
It happened to be the twenty-seventh day of the seventh month, the eve of Hsi-men Ch'ing's birthday, and he had just come back from the licensed quarter to celebrate it. The two of them recounted everything, thus and so.
"The maidservant from her own quarters has reported it with her own mouth. It's not just a case of our trying to do her in. If you won't say anything about it, we'll go tell Father ourselves. You'd do as well to forgive a whore like that as you would to forgive a scorpion!"
"He's only just come home," said Yüeh-niang, "and it's a special day for him to boot. If you two disregard me and insist on telling him about it, in a little while, when the trouble starts, you'll have to look out for yourselves."
The two of them did not take Yüeh-niang's advice but waited until Hsi-men Ch'ing came into his room and then told him all about how Chin-lien had been committing adultery with the pageboy.
If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard these words nothing might have happened but having heard them:
Anger flared up in his heart, and Malice accrued in his gall.[23]
Marching out to the front compound, he sat down and called out in a loud voice for Ch'in-t'ung.
It was not long before someone reported these events to P'an Chin-lien.
In a state of panic she sent Ch'un-mei to call the pageboy into her room, where she enjoined him, "Whatever happens, don't admit to anything!"
She demanded back the pins he was wearing in his hair but she was so flustered she forgot to recover the scent bag with the gourd toggle.
Summoned into the front reception room, the pageboy was made to kneel in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing, who ordered three or four servants to stand by with heavy bamboo canes.
"You lousy slave!" Hsi-men Ch'ing addressed him, "Do you acknowledge your crime?"
Ch'in-t'ung was too frightened to answer for some time.
Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered his minions, "Take off his hat and pull out the pins in his hair. I want to take a look at them. He's been seen sporting two gold-headed silver pins." Then, addressing him directly, he demanded, "What's become of the gold-headed silver pins you've been wearing?"
"I've never had any silver pins," said Ch'in-t'ung.
"The slave is still up to his tricks," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Strip off all his clothes and beat him with the bamboo."
The two or three servants in attendance set about their task. One of them, while engaged in stripping off his clothes, took down his trousers, disclosing the fact that underneath them he was wearing a jade-coloured damask tunic, from the waist-string of which there hung a brocade scent bag with a gourd toggle.
Hsi-men Ch'ing noticed it immediately and called out, "Bring it here so I can have a look at it."
Recognizing it as the very object that P'an Chin-lien customarily wore suspended at her waist, he became enraged.
"Where did you get this?" he demanded. "Tell me the truth. Who gave it to you?"
The pageboy was so frightened that it was some time before he could open his mouth to reply.
"It's something I picked up one day while I was sweeping in the garden," he said. "Nobody gave it to me."
Hsi-men Ch'ing gnashed his teeth in rage and shouted out the order, "Tie him up and give him a real thrashing."
Then and there Ch'in-t'ung was bound, hand and foot, and the blows of the cane fell on him like rain. In no time at all they had administered thirty strokes of the heavy bamboo, so severely that:
The skin was broken, the flesh was split, and Fresh blood flowed down his legs.[24]
Hsi-men Ch'ing also gave orders to his chief household retainer, Lai-pao: "Pluck out the hair on the slave's temples and throw him out of here. See that he never sets foot on the threshold again."
When Ch'in-t'ung had kowtowed to his master, still weeping and wailing, he was given the gate. This pageboy, only because:
Last night he flirted with the nymph who keeps the books in the Palace of the Jade Emperor;
Today, guilty of a clear-cut violation of Heaven's law,[25] is banished to the realms below.

There is a poem that testifies to this:
Tigers deploy the revenants of their prey,
birds are snared with decoys;
Chin-lien was not the sort to remain chaste within her empty boudoir.
Today she's in an untenable position for adultery with a servant;
From now on, if she encounters criticism
she has no one to blame but herself.
On this occasion, Hsi-men Ch'ing had Ch'in-t'ung beaten and then ejected him from the household.
When P'an Chin-lien, in her room, heard what had happened, it was:
Just as though she had been dunked in a tub of ice water.
Before long, Hsi-men Ch'ing came into her quarters. The woman trembled with fright as if the pulse had stopped beating in her body. When she went up to him, obsequiously, to take his outer garments, Hsi-men Ch'ing slapped her in the face so hard he knocked her down. He ordered Ch'un-mei to lock the front and back gates and not let anyone in. Then he got himself a small chair, sat down in the courtyard underneath the flower arbour, pulled out a riding crop, and, brandishing it in his hand, commanded, "Whore! Take off your clothes and get down on your knees."
The woman, troubled as she was by a bad conscience, did not dare to disobey. She actually took off all her clothes, above and below, and knelt down before him:
Hanging her powdered face in shame, not daring to utter a sound.
"You lousy whore!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "There's no use pretending you're:
Still asleep in dreamland.
I've just gotten the truth out of that slave. He's confessed to everything. Tell me the truth. While I've been away from home, how many times have you made out with him?"
"My Heavens!" the woman wept. "You really do me a mortal injustice, that's all there is to it. During the whole time you've been away from home the last half month or so, I've spent my days in the company of Sister Meng the Third, doing needlework together, and in the evenings I've locked the gate early and gone to bed. Without some reason I haven't presumed to step outside the postern gate. If you don't believe me, just ask Ch'un-mei, that's all. If I'd been indulging in any:
Illicit salt or illicit vinegar,[26]
she could hardly fail to know about it." Then, calling to Ch'un-mei, she said, "Sister, come over here and tell your father all about it."
"You lousy whore!" Hsi-men Ch'ing cursed. "They say you gave two or three of your gold-headed hairpins to that pageboy on the sly. How can you deny it?"
"They do me a mortal injustice, that's all there is to it," the woman said. "It's all the doing of some backbiting whore, who will come to a bad end, eating her heart out when she sees how often you come to my room to spend the night, and angry enough to try to nail me with such a preposterous [27] story. As for the hairpins you've given me, there are only so many of them, and every last one is accounted for. Take a look for yourself. What could I be thinking of to give them to that slave for no reason at all? Someone like that, who hardly even makes the grade as a slave! He's such a babe in the woods it would be no exaggeration to say he hasn't even learned to piss yet. It's all a story someone has made up out of whole cloth to get back at me."
"Forget about the hairpins," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, reaching into his sleeve and pulling out Ch'in-t'ung's scent bag. "This is something that belongs to you. How did it come to be discovered hanging underneath the clothes of that pageboy? Brazen that out if you can."
As he spoke, the gorge rose within him and he brought down the riding crop, with a whistling slash, across her pale and fragrant flesh. He struck the woman so hard that:
The pain was difficult to bear, and Tears streaked her powdered face.
"Please, Father!" she blubbered. "If you let me speak, I'll speak. If you don't let me speak, you can beat me to death if you like, and make a stinking mess of the place. As for this scent bag and its gourd toggle; while you were away from home one day, I was going past the banksia rose trellis, on my way into the garden to do some needlework with Sister Meng the Third, when my girdle came undone. It must have fallen off at that time. I've looked for it everywhere. Who could have known that this slave would pick it up? I certainly never gave it to him."
This explanation happened to accord perfectly with what Ch'in-t'ung had just stated in the front reception room when he said he had picked it up in the garden. Moreover, when Hsi-men Ch'ing saw the woman's flowerlike body that had been stripped stark naked, kneeling before him as she uttered her:
Winsome sobs and melting words,[28]
His anger flew to Java, and he became 80 or 90 percent disposed to clemency.
Calling over Ch'un-mei, he sat her in his lap, and asked her, "Has the whore really been engaged in hanky-panky with the pageboy or not? If you tell me to forgive the whore, I'll forgive her."
Affecting the:
Coquetry and petulance of a spoiled child,[29]
Ch'un-mei sat down in his lap and said, "As for that, Father, needless to say, all day long Mother and I have been:
As inseparable as the lip and the cheek.[30]
How could she have had anything to do with that slave? This is all something fabricated by someone who is jealous of Mother and me. Father, you ought to think what you're doing, or you'll only make an ugly reputation for yourself that won't sound any too good when it gets abroad."
With these few words she succeeded in reducing Hsi-men Ch'ing to silence. Throwing aside the riding crop, he told Chin-lien to get up and put on her clothes, on the one hand, while he also gave orders to Ch'iu-chü to fetch something to eat and set the table so they could have a drink.
The woman thereupon filled a cup of wine to the brim and, holding it in front of her with both hands, knelt down on the ground:
Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze;
Sending the pendants of her embroidered sash flying,
as she offered it up to him.
Hsi-men Ch'ing admonished her as follows: "I'll forgive you this once. But whenever I'm away from home, I want you to:
Cleanse your heart and reform your ways.[31]
Lock the doors early and don't allow yourself to:
Give way to foolish fancies.[32]
If I find out anything, I certainly won't forgive you again."
"I hear and I obey," the woman said, and then:
Just as though inserting a taper in its holder,
she kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing four times. Only then did she take her place at the table and keep him company as they drank wine together. Truly:
If you're going to be a human being,
don't be a woman;
Or your every joy and sorrow will be dependent on another.[33]
This woman, P'an Chin-lien, had been so favoured by Hsi-men Ch'ing in the past as to lose all sense of decorum but today she had brought this shameful ignominy on herself. There is a poem that testifies to this:
No matter how congenial and compliant
Chin-lien might appear;
She flaunted her favour to compete for affection and thereby aroused enmity.
Had it not been for Ch'un-mei's intervention on the day in question;
How could her parents' legacy of skin and flesh have borne up under the lash?
While Hsi-men Ch'ing was still drinking wine in Chin-lien's room, they were interrupted by the sound of a pageboy knocking at the gate, who announced that Hsi-men Ch'ing's brothers-in-law, Wu Yüeh-niang's eldest brother Wu K'ai [34] and second brother Wu the Second, along with his shop manager, Fu Ming, his daughter and son-in-law, and other relatives, had arrived in the front reception room to offer presents and wish him a happy birthday. Only then did Hsi-men Ch'ing relinquish Chin-lien, readjust his clothing, and go out front to entertain his guests.
On this occasion, there were gifts from Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, and the other members of the club, and Li Kuei-chieh's establishment in the licensed quarter also sent a servant with a gift. Hsi-men Ch'ing was kept busy in the front compound, acknowledging the presents people had sent and issuing invitations. But no more of this.
To resume our story, when Meng Yü-lou heard that Chin-lien had been thus humiliated, she waited until Hsi-men Ch'ing was out of the house, took pains to evade the notice of Li Chiao-erh and Sun Hsüeh-o, and came to pay Chin-lien a visit.
Finding her lying on her bed, she asked, "Sister Six, what's the real story behind this? Tell me all about it."
Her eyes brimming over with tears, Chin-lien sobbed out, "Sister Three, just look at what that insignificant whore has done. Today, behind my back, she's provoked our husband into giving me such a beating. From now on, the enmity between those two whores and me will be as deep as the sea."
"Even if you had a bone to pick with them," said Yü-lou, "you didn't have to do it in such a way that my pageboy got thrown out of the household, did you? Sister Six, don't let yourself get too depressed about it. After all, it's not as though our husband will no longer listen to anything we have to say. If he doesn't come into my quarters someday soon, there won't be anything I can do about it but if he does come into my quarters, I'll see if I can't put in a good word for you."
"Many thanks for your help, Sister," said Chin-lien. She then called in Ch'un-mei to bring them some tea, and they sat down and chatted together for a while, until Yü-lou said good-bye and returned to her own quarters.
That evening, because Wu Yüeh-niang's sister-in-law, Wu K'ai's wife, was visiting in the master suite, Hsi-men Ch'ing went to Yü-lou's quarters to spend the night.
Yü-lou took the opportunity to say to him, "You really oughtn't to flout Sister Six's feelings for you. She never did anything like that. It's all because, in the past, she's had words with Li Chiao-erh and Sun Hsüeh-o, and now, for no reason at all, these charges have been trumped up against my pageboy. Without so much as enquiring into the:
Blue or red, black or white,[35] of the situation, you've done him an injustice. You mustn't blame Sister Six. You've really been too hard on her. I'm prepared to swear an oath on her behalf. If anything like that had really happened, do you think Elder Sister wouldn't have told you?"
"I asked Ch'un-mei about it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and she said the same thing."
"She's in her room right now," said Yü-lou, "feeling miserable. Why don't you go look in on her?"
"I know," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll go to her quarters tomorrow."
Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.
The next day was Hsi-men Ch'ing's birthday, and a lot of distinguished guests had been invited to attend a party, including the commandant, Chou Hsiu, [36] the judicial commissioner, Hsia Yen-ling, the militia commander, Chang Kuan, and Hsi-men Ch'ing's brother-in-law, Wu K'ai. A sedan chair was dispatched to bring Li Kuei-chieh, and the services of two other singing girls were also engaged, to sing at the daylong celebration.
When Li Chiao-erh saw that her niece had come, she led her in to meet Yüeh-niang and the others, and she was invited to sit down in the master suite and have a cup of tea. She asked to meet P'an Chin-lien, and maidservants were sent after her twice but Chin-lien refused to put in an appearance, claiming that she felt out of sorts.
In the evening, when Kuei-chieh was about to go home, she came to say goodbye to Yüeh-niang, who gave her a vest of cloud-patterned damask, a handkerchief, and some other trinkets, and, together with Li Chiao-erh, accompanied her to the main gate.
On their way, Kuei-chieh herself went up to Chin-lien's postern gate in the garden, saying, "Come what may, I'd really like to meet the Fifth Lady."
When Chin-lien heard she had come, she sent Ch'un-mei to shut the postern gate and:
Lock it tight as an iron bucket, so that
Not even Fan K'uai himself could get through,[37]
while repeating, quite audibly, the words, "I won't let her in."
As a result of this rebuff, the prostitute returned home:
Her face crimson with mortification.
Truly:
Distribute your favours widely;
In this life you never know where you will meet again.
If you make a lot of enemies;
You'll encounter them in a tight spot where there's no escape.[38]
We will say no more for the moment about how Li Kuei-chieh went home but return to the story of Hsi-men Ch'ing. That evening he appeared in Chin-lien's quarters and she met him at the door with her:
Cloudy locks in disarray, and her Flowery countenance dispirited, as she helped him off with his clothes. She waited on him with tea and hot water to wash his feet, playing up to him with every trick at her disposal in the endeavor to please him. That night as they shared pillow and mat:
Like fish sporting in the water;
She humbled herself to the most shameful acts.
There was no length to which she would not go.[39]
"Darling," she said, "who is there in the whole household who really loves you? Out of all these cases of:
Cohabitation amid the dewdrops,[40] among all these 'remarried goods,' you and I are the only ones who really understand each other. When the others see how much you care for me, and how much time you spend with me, it makes them angry, and they fabricate things behind my back and try to make trouble between us. My foolish lover, what have you been thinking of, to allow yourself to be made the instrument of someone else's revenge? How could you have treated the person you love with such heartless cruelty? As the saying goes:

If you beat domestic fowl, they'll hop around in circles;
If you beat wildfowl,
they'll fly high into the sky.[41]
Even if you were to beat me to death, I'd still be right here in this room. Where else would I dare go? Just the other day, for example, when you were in the licensed quarter and kicked and cursed your pageboy—fortunately Elder Sister from the master suite and Sister Meng the Third were there to corroborate this—didn't I say something—and it was well-intentioned—about my fears that the painted woman in that establishment would exhaust your vitality—that the singing girls in the licensed quarter are only in it for the money and don't have any real feelings for their customers—what do they really care for you? How was I to know that this would be overheard by an interested party and that the two of them would connive against me behind my back? It's always been the case that:
When other people are out to get you it's seldom fatal;
It's only when Heaven is out to get you that it's fatal.
Later on:
With the passage of time the truth will become clear.[42]
The only thing is you've got to stand up for me, that's all."
On this occasion, with no more than these few words she succeeded in mollifying Hsi-men Ch'ing. That night the two of them:
Indulged their lusts without restraint.
The next day Hsi-men Ch'ing had his horse prepared and set off for the licensed quarter with the two pageboys, Tai-an and P'ing-an, in attendance.
To resume our story, Li Kuei-chieh was all dressed up and engaged in entertaining a customer. When she heard that Hsi-men Ch'ing had arrived, she hastily returned to her room, where she:
Washed away her makeup,
Took off her pins and earrings,
Threw herself down on the bed, and Pulled the coverlet over her head.
Upon his arrival, Hsi-men Ch'ing had to wait a long time before anyone came out to keep him company. At long last, the old lady appeared, bowed to him in greeting, and offered him a seat.
"How now, Kinsman?" the madam said. "It's been days since you've paid us a visit."
"It's only on account of all the busywork in connection with my birthday," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "There isn't anyone to be relied on at home."
"My daughter imposed on your hospitality the other day," said the madam.
"Why didn't her elder sister, Kuei-ch'ing, come with her that day?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"Kuei-ch'ing is not at home," the madam replied. "Her patron has taken her to stay with him in his inn and hasn't let her come home the last few days."
They talked for a long time. After a while, someone brought tea and she kept him company while he drank it.
"What's become of Kuei-chieh?" Hsi-men Ch'ing finally asked.
"You mean you don't know about it, Kinsman?" the madam asked. "It's childish of her, and I don't know what it was that happened but she was upset about something when she came home that day. She's been out of sorts ever since and has taken to her bed. In fact, she hasn't set foot outside her room from that time to this. It's really too cruel of you, Kinsman, not to have come to see her."
"Is that so?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I didn't know anything about it." And he went on to ask, "Which room is she in? I'll go pay her a visit."
"She's sleeping in her bedroom at the back of the house," the madam replied, and immediately ordered a maidservant to show him the way.
Hsi-men Ch'ing went back to her room, where he found the painted woman with:
Raven locks in disarray, and Pale countenance unadorned, sitting on the bed, with the coverlet wrapped around her, and her face to the wall. When she saw it was Hsi-men Ch'ing, she made no response of any kind.
"What went wrong when you were at my place the other day?" he asked.
Receiving no reply, he asked again, "Who was it who upset you? Tell me all about it."
He kept on asking for a long time before Kuei-chieh replied, saying, "Well, anyway, it was the Fifth Lady of your household. Since you've already got someone who's so good at:
Playing up to people and trading on her looks, what need is there for you to bother yourself with whores like me? We may have been born to the trade but when we put our legs in the air we do a better job of it than any of those amateurs on the outside, no matter what their social standing. I wasn't there in my professional capacity the other day, to provide entertainment but came to bring you a gift, like the other guests. The First Lady treated me very cordially, as did the other two ladies, and presented me with clothes and trinkets. Under the circumstances, if I hadn't asked to be introduced to her, she would have said that we denizens of the licensed quarter were ignorant of the rules of proper behavior. Having heard people say there was a Fifth Lady in your household, I assumed I might ask to be introduced to her. But she refused to make an appearance. When I was about to come home, together with my aunt, I went to say goodbye to her but she sent her maidservant to shut the gate in my face. Really:
She wouldn't know a favour if she saw one."
"Don't hold it against her," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She was really feeling out of sorts that day. If she had been feeling all right, she could hardly have refused to come out and meet you. What a whore she is! Why, several times, on account of her backbiting and troublemaking, I've been on the verge of giving her a beating."
Kuei-chieh brushed Hsi-men Ch'ing across the face facetiously with the back of her hand and said, "What a shameless fellow! You'd actually beat her, would you?"
"You don't know what I'm capable of," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Except for my regular wife, it's nothing for me to give any one of the other concubines or maidservants a beating. When you get right down to it, if twenty or thirty strokes with a riding crop are not enough to subdue them, I'll even go so far as to cut off their hair, whether they like it or not."
"Decapitation's too good for you," said Kuei-chieh. "This calls for 'delinguification,' if there's any such thing. You probably:
Bow down to them thrice, and Say yes to them twice,[43] for all I know. If you're really up to it, when you get home, just cut off a single hank of hair, and bring it here to show me. Only then will I acknowledge your claim to fame as a real devotee of the licensed quarters."
"Are you willing to shake on it?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"I'd shake on it a hundred times," said Kuei-chieh.
That day Hsi-men Ch'ing spent the night in the licensed quarter. The next day, around dusk, he said goodbye to Kuei-chieh and mounted his horse to return home.
Kuei-chieh said:
"My eyes are on the lookout for the flag of victory,
My ears are always on the alert for good tidings.
Darling, if the quest for this object proves unsuccessful, you needn't expect to see me again."
Hsi-men Ch'ing's dander was up as a result of her needling, and he was already inebriated by the time he returned home. He didn't go anywhere else but headed straight for P'an Chin-lien's quarters in the front compound. When the woman saw that he was in his cups, she waited on him with more than usual care. In reply to her questions, he said he didn't want any food or wine but ordered Ch'un-mei to wipe off the cool bamboo bed mat and then close the door and leave them alone.
Sitting down on the bed, he ordered the woman to take off his boots. The woman did not dare to refuse. In no time at all she had taken off his boots and helped him into bed. But Hsi-men Ch'ing did not go to sleep. Sitting up on a pillow, he ordered the woman to take off her clothes and kneel down on the surface of the bed before him.
The woman was so apprehensive she broke into a sweat. Without any idea what it was all about, she knelt down on the bed and began to weep out loud in a quavery voice, saying, "Father, if you'd only give me a clear-cut idea of what's going on:
I'd be prepared to die if I must.[44]
Even when you:
Keep me on tenterhooks,[45]
all evening and I do my level best to watch my step, I don't seem to be able to suit your fancy. How can I bear it when all you do is saw away at me with a blunt knife?"
"You lousy whore!" cursed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If you don't take off your clothes I'm going to lose my patience."
"The riding crop's hanging on the other side of the door," he called out to Ch'un-mei. "Bring it here for me, will you?"
Ch'un-mei deliberately refused to come into the room. Only after he had called for some time did she push open the door and come in:
Just as slow and easy as you please.
She saw the woman kneeling on the surface of the bed in the lamplight, with her hair tumbled before her like oil pouring from an overturned table. Hsi-men Ch'ing repeated his order but she didn't budge.
"Ch'un-mei, my sister," the woman pled with her. "Help me! He's going to beat me."
"Little oily mouth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Don't pay any attention to her. Just fetch me the riding crop so I can give this whore a beating."
"Father, how can you carry on so shamelessly?" demanded Ch'un-mei. "What business of yours has Mother ever ruined, that you should take the word of some whore, whose only interest is to:
Stir up a storm in untroubled waters,[46] and persist in making such capricious demands on her? How can you expect anyone to be:
Of one heart and one mind, with you under the circumstances? You'll be lucky if they give you a second glance."
Ch'un-mei refused to obey him, latched the door behind her, and went off to the front of the compound.
Hsi-men Ch'ing, finding himself:
At a loss for what to do next, laughed loudly and said to Chin-lien, "I won't beat you then. You can get up. If I ask you for something, will you give it to me, or won't you?"
"Darling," the woman said, "my whole body, bones and flesh alike, is completely at your disposal. Whatever it is you may want, I could not refuse to comply. But I don't know what it is you've set your heart on."
"What I want," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is a lock of the best hair from the crown of your head."
"Dear heart," the woman said, "any part of my body is yours for the asking. You can burn it with moxa wherever you like and I'll go along with you. But to cut off my hair is out of the question. The very thought of it scares me to death. From the time I left my mother's womb twenty-five years ago, I've never done anything like that. On top of which, recently the hair has already begun to thin out on the crown of my head. You really ought to take pity on me, that's all."
"You were upset at my annoyance with you just now," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but when I ask you for something, you refuse to comply."
"If I didn't comply with your desires," said the woman, "with whose should I comply?" She then went on to ask, "Tell me the truth. What do you want this hair of mine for, anyway?"
"I want to make a hairnet," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"If you want to make a hairnet," said the woman, "I'll make it for you. Just don't give it to that whore so she can use it to cast a spell on me."
"I won't give it to anybody, that's all," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I only want your hair to make the main cord of a hairnet to bind my topknot with."
"If all you want it for is to make a cord for your topknot," said the woman, "I'll cut it off for you."
Thereupon, the woman undid her hair and let Hsi-men Ch'ing himself take a pair of scissors and neatly cut off a large lock from the crown of her head. He wrapped it in paper and put it in his wallet.
The woman then fell into Hsi-men Ch'ing's arms and, weeping coquettishly, said, "I'll do anything you want. I only hope you don't forget your feelings for me. No matter how stuck you become on anyone in the quarter, just don't abandon me."
That night they:
Enjoyed each other even more than usual.
The next day Hsi-men Ch'ing got up and, as soon as the woman had fed him his breakfast, went outside, mounted his horse, and headed straight for the licensed quarter.
"Where's the hair you've cut off her head," Kuei-chieh demanded.
"I've got it right here," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing. He then reached into his wallet, pulled it out, and handed it to Kuei-chieh. She opened it and took a look, and when she saw that it was really a lock of beautiful hair, as glossy and black as oil, she promptly tucked it into her sleeve.
"Now that you've seen it, give it back to me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Last night she made all kinds of difficulties about cutting this hair. It was only when I changed countenance and got angry that she let me cut off this single lock of it. I fooled her by saying I only wanted it to make the main cord of a hairnet to bind my topknot with, and then brought it straight here to show you. You can see, I'm as good as my word."
"What sort of a rarity is this," said Kuei-chieh, "to have put you into such a state? When you're ready to go home I'll give it back to you. If you're as afraid of her as all that, you shouldn't have cut it off in the first place."
"Who's afraid of her?" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It's just that I don't want to go back on my word."
Kuei-chieh induced Kuei-ch'ing to keep him company for a drink of wine, and then, as soon as she was out of sight, inserted the woman's hair into the linings of her shoes, so she could trample her underfoot everyday. But no more of this.
Now that she had Hsi-men Ch'ing in her clutches, she kept him there for several consecutive days, without letting him go home.
From the time that Chin-lien allowed the cutting off of this lock of her hair, she became dispirited. Everyday she:
Confined herself to her room,
Too languid to consume tea or food.
Wu Yüeh-niang, consequently, sent a pageboy after a certain Dame Liu, whose services were frequently called upon in the household, to come and take a look at her.
"Madam has contracted a black humour," the old lady said, "which continues to rankle in the heart and can't be eliminated. Your head aches, you feel nauseous, and you have no appetite."
On the one hand, she opened her medicine bag and left behind two doses of medicine, in the form of black pills that were to be taken in the evening along with a decoction of ginger, while, on the other hand, she said, "I'll get my old man to come by tomorrow and ascertain whether or not you're fated to suffer any calamities during the current year of your horoscope."
"So your old man can also tell fortunes, can he?" said Chin-lien.
"Even though he's blind," said Dame Liu, "there are two or three things he can do. First of all, he's an expert at the Yin-yang School of fortune-telling and can either avert peoples' calamities or offer them protection against them. Secondly, he's well versed in acupuncture, moxabustion, and the treatment of pyogenic infections of the skin. His third skill is one that I really shouldn't talk about but he's always helping people to perform 'turnabouts.' "
"What does the word 'turnabout' mean?" asked the woman.

"Well, for example," said Dame Liu, "if a father and son are at odds, or two brothers are not getting along harmoniously, or a legitimate wife and a concubine are quarreling with each other; if one of the parties calls on the services of my old man, he can employ a counteractive agent on his or her behalf in order to keep the other party in check, or provide him or her with a philter containing a counteractive spell that, if given to the other party to drink, will cause, within three days, the father and son to become intimate, the brothers to become harmonious, or the wife and concubine to cease to quarrel. Or if someone's business is not doing well, or his real estate is not prospering, he can 'open the door to wealth' for him, or enable him to 'turn a profit.' And as for such things as the treatment of disease, the performance of ritual purification, the exorcism of the spirits of baleful stars, [47] or the invocation of the Great Dipper, he's good at all of them. For this reason people all call him Stargazer Liu.

"There was one case, I remember, of a newly married daughter-in-law, of humble social origin, who was somewhat light-fingered and was constantly stealing things from her mother-in-law's household and taking them back to her own family. Whenever her husband found out about it she was regularly beaten. My old man was able to perform a 'turnabout' for her, by writing two spells that were burnt, and the ashes buried under the water jar. The whole family drank water from the jar, after which the daughter-in-law could steal things right in front of their eyes without their noticing it. He also provided her with a counteractive agent that was placed under her pillow, with the result that whenever her husband slept on that pillow it was just as though his hands had been restrained and he no longer beat her."

When P'an Chin-lien heard this, she took it to heart and ordered her maidservant to provide Dame Liu with tea and something to eat. When the latter was about to leave, Chin-lien wrapped up three mace of silver for her medical services. She also weighed out an additional five mace to enable her to buy paper money and other ritual objects, and asked her to bring her blind husband back with her at breakfast time the next day to burn the spirit money for her. Dame Liu then took her leave and went home.

The next day, sure enough, bright and early in the morning, Dame Liu showed up with the blind rascal in tow and proceeded to come straight in through the front gate. That day Hsi-men Ch'ing was still in the licensed quarter, from which he had not yet returned home.

The pageboy in charge of the gate asked the blind man where he thought he was going, to which Dame Liu replied, "Today we've come to burn paper for the Fifth Lady."

"Dame Liu," said the pageboy, "if you've come to burn paper for the Fifth Lady, you can lead him right in but look out for the dog."

The old lady took her husband by the hand and led him straight to P'an Chin-lien's parlour, where they had to wait a long time before the woman finally appeared. The blind man saluted her and then sat down.

The woman told him the eight characters that determined her horoscope,[48] and after the blind rascal had performed some calculations on the fingers of his hand, he said, "Madam was born in a keng-ch'en year, in a keng-yin month, on an i-hai day, during the hour chi-ch'ou. Since the solar term 'Spring Begins' fell on the eighth day of the first month that year, one day before the day of your birth, your horoscope begins in the first month of the year. According to the orthodox interpretation of the Tzu-p'ing School,[49] although this horoscope of yours is certainly splendid and remarkable, you will not, in this life, receive any support from your 'husband star,' which corresponds to the stem keng. There will also be some difficulty as far as your 'children star' is concerned. The element wood, associated with the stem i in the combination i-hai that designates the day of your birth, is the governing element in your horoscope but your horoscopic 'body' cannot be said to 'flourish' when this element occurs in the first month. If the effect of this unpropitious factor is not counteracted, the element is likely to burn itself up. Moreover, the reduplication of the element metal, associated with the stem keng in the combinations keng-ch'en and keng-yin that designate the year and month of your birth, indicates that the influence of the baleful star Yang-jen, or Ram's Blade, is too great. This will create difficulties for your 'husband star.' Only after you have gained the ascendancy over two husbands will you be all right."

"I already have," the woman said.

The blind rascal then continued, "As for this horoscope of yours, madam, excuse me for saying so but the Tzu-p'ing School attaches great importance to the horoscopic categories called the 'killer' and the 'seal,' which would correspond, in your case, to the elements metal and water. These two elements would normally be quite compatible but the presence of the element water, associated with the stem kuei, in the 'one-sided seal' pertaining to the combination i-hai that designates the day of your birth, and the recurrence of the same element in the horoscopic category called 'injurer of the official' pertaining to the combination keng-ch'en that designates the year of your birth, indicates an excess of water that produces a 'collision' with your governing element of wood. This is inadequately compensated for by the presence of the element earth, associated with the stem chi in the combination chi-ch'ou that designates the hour of your birth. Since the stem keng that is your 'official,' and the stem hsin that is your 'killer,' are both associated with the element metal, they conflict with each other. As the authorities say:

If the 'killer' is in the ascendant for a man,
he will exercise authority and power;
If the 'killer' is in the ascendant for a woman,
she is sure to 'punish' her husband.

"All of this indicates that you must be intelligent, adept at adapting yourself to changing circumstances, and sure to attract the favourable or unfavourable attention of others. But there is one problem. This year of your horoscope is a chia-wu[50] year, and the indications are that during this 'annual fatal period' calamities are likely to occur. You are fated to suffer difficulties resulting from encounters with the influence of the two baleful stars Hsiao-hao, or Little Waster, and Kou-chiao, or Strangler. Although you may escape unharmed, the indications are that there will be disharmony resulting from the 'matched shoulders' between your governing element and that associated with the stem chia in the designation of this year in your horoscope, both of which are wood. The wagging tongues of petty persons may often cost you some groaning and discomfort."

When the woman had heard him out, she said, "I'd be much obliged to you, sir, if you could do whatever you can to effect a 'turnabout' on my behalf. I've got a tael of silver here for you, sir, as a token of my gratitude. I hope it will suffice to buy you a cup of tea. I don't ask for anything else; all I want is to keep petty persons at a distance, and to be assured of the love and respect of my husband."

Retiring into her bedroom, she pulled out two of her hair ornaments and handed them to the blind rascal, who accepted them and tucked them into his sleeve.

"If you want me to effect a 'turnabout,' " he said, "I'll take a piece of willow wood and carve a pair of male and female effigies out of it. They must be inscribed, respectively, with the sets of eight characters that determine your and your husband's horoscopes, and then bound together with seven times seven, or forty-nine, strands of red thread. A strip of red gauze must be fastened over the eyes of the male effigy, love grass must be stuffed into its heart cavity, its hands must be secured with needles, and, below, its feet must be stuck together with glue. The effigy must then be concealed inside the pillow on which he sleeps. In addition to this, I will write a spell for you, using vermilion ink that you must burn to ashes, and surreptitiously stir into a cup of strong tea. If your husband drinks the tea and sleeps, the same night, on the pillow, in no more than three days, the magic will naturally take effect."

"Please, sir," the woman asked, "tell me, what's the significance of these four things?"

"I'll explain them to you, madam," the blind rascal said. "The fastening of the gauze around the eyes is to make you appear in your husband's sight as captivating and voluptuous as Hsi-shih. The stuffing of the heart cavity with love grass is to make him love you in his heart. The securing of the hands with needles is to prevent him from daring to strike you, no matter what you do, so that, in fact, he'll even get down on his knees to you. The sticking together of the feet with glue is to make it impossible for him to go out and sow any more wild oats."

When the woman heard tell that:

Such things could be,
she was utterly delighted. Thereupon, the incense, candles, and paper money were all prepared and the ceremony of burning spirit money on the woman's behalf was duly carried out.

The next day Stargazer Liu sent his wife to deliver the spell for the making of the philter and the other counteractive agents that he had promised. The woman took care of everything just as she had been told. Having burnt the spell to ashes, she stirred it into some good tea and, when Hsi-men Ch'ing came home, had Ch'un-mei serve it to him. That night the two of them:

Shared a single pillow on the same bed.
As time passed:
One day became two,
Two days became three, and they became:
As inseparable as fish from water, and Enjoyed each other as usual.

Gentle reader take note: No matter whether your household be great or small, it is best to avoid the services of priests and nuns, Buddhists and Taoists, wet nurses and go-betweens. There is no telling what they will do behind your back. A poet of yore has left us some words of admonition, in the form of a quatrain, that express this very well:

To the formal reception room of your house never admit female professionals;
Always keep your back door securely locked in order to deny them admission.
If you have a well in your courtyard, repair even the slightest fissure;
Then your catastrophes will be few and your stars of good fortune many.

The tree is pitiful that stands alone
Its branches fragile and its roots uncertain.
The dew may give it moisture but the wind
Blows it to one side and the other.
There is none to raise the silken coverlet
I must sit and keep my watch from night to morning.
Sorrow has made me thin
No loving wish of yours has given me
This slender waist.

Ximen Qing was so delighted with Guijie's beauty that he stayed at the bawdy house for several days. Many times Wu Yueniang sent servants with horses to bring him back but Guijie's family hid his hat and clothes, and would not let him go. The ladies of his own household were for once at a loss for something to do. Most of them were quite content but Pan Jinlian was still not thirty years old, and her passions were by no means under control. Day after day, she made herself look as pretty as a jade carving, and stood at the main gate with gleaming teeth and scarlet lips, leaning upon the door and waiting for her husband to return. Not until evening did she go to her room, and there the pillow seemed deserted, and the curtains forlorn, and there was none to share the joys of her dressing table. Sleep would not come to her, and she went to the garden, walking delicately upon the flowers and moss and, when she saw the moon reflected in the water, she thought of the uncertainty of Ximen's nature, and as she watched the tortoiseshell cats enjoying each other's company, it brought only disturbance to her own sweet heart.

Qintong, the boy who had accompanied Meng Yulou when she married Ximen Qing, was now sixteen years old, and for the first time took his place in the household as a full-grown youth. He had finely arched eyebrows and eyes full of intelligence, and was indeed both clever and attractive. Ximen Qing had entrusted him with the care of the garden, and he slept every night in a small room there. Jinlian and Yulou sometimes sewed or played chess in an arbour in the garden, and at such times Qintong waited upon them attentively, and, whenever Ximen Qing was about, would come and give them warning. Jinlian liked him and often summoned him to her room and gave him wine. So morning after morning, and evening after evening, they exchanged understanding glances, and were not entirely indifferent to one another.

It was now about the seventh month and Ximen's birthday was drawing near. Yueniang was well aware of her husband's doings, and once again told Daian to take a horse and go for him. Jinlian privately wrote a note, and told the boy to give it to Ximen Qing in secret. "Tell him," she said, "that I hope it will not be long before he comes back." Daian rode off to the bawdy house, and there found all Ximen's boon companions keeping company with him, kissing the girls, and being very merry.

"What has brought you here?" Ximen Qing said, when he saw Daian. "Is there anything wrong at home?" "No," said Daian. "Well, tell your uncle Fu to collect the money that is owing, and, when I come back, I'll settle up with him."

"He has been collecting some during the last few days," the boy said, "and he is only waiting for you to come home to go through the accounts."

"Did you bring the clothes for your Aunt Guijie?"

"Yes," the boy replied, "here they are." He took a red vest and a blue skirt from a parcel, and gave them to the girl. She made a reverence to him, and called for food and wine to be given him. When he had finished, he came over to Ximen and whispered in his ear: "The Fifth Lady has given me a note for you, asking you to go home soon."

Ximen Qing was just about to take the note when Guijie saw it. She thought it was a love letter from some other girl, and made a dash for it. When she opened it, she found a sheet of patterned paper, with several columns written in black ink, and handed it to Zhu Shinian, asking him to read it for her.

I think of him as evening falls; I think of him when the sky is bright.
I think about my lover till my thoughts overwhelm me, and I faint
Yet still he does not come.
For him I am wounded; for him my spirit faints.
Oh, it is sad.
I lie alone under the figured coverlets; the flickering lamp is nearly out.
The world is sleeping, and the moonbeams creep across the window.
That heart is unrelenting, like a wolf's
How can I bear this agony another night?

Guijie listened to this, then left them and went to her room, where she threw herself face downwards on the bed. Ximen Qing saw that she was upset, tore the note to pieces, and kicked Daian. Twice he implored Guijie to come back but she paid no heed. Finally, getting more and more excited, he went to her room and carried her out.

"Get on your horse and go home," he said to Daian. "As for the strumpet who told you to come, when I get home, I'll beat her till she comes to a disgusting end." Daian went home with tears in his eyes. "Please don't be so angry," Ximen said, "it is only from my fifth wife. She wants me to go home to talk about something or other. There is nothing else."

Zhu Shinian teased them. "Don't believe him, Guijie. He is deceiving you. Jinlian is his latest flame, a very pretty girl too. Don't let him go."

Ximen Qing slapped him. "You ruffian! You'll be the death of somebody with these silly jokes of yours. She is angry enough without your talking rubbish."

"Brother," Guiqing said, "you are not fair. If you were a good husband, you would not run about teaching singing girls the arts of love, you should stay at home. Then all would be well. Why, you've only been here a few hours, and now you're getting ready to go away again."

"That's quite true," Bojue said. "You had better take my advice, both of you. Your Lordship must stay here, and you, Guijie, must not lose your temper. The first person to leave will have to spend a couple of taels and treat the rest of us."

Ximen Qing took Guijie on his knee, and they drank together happily. Soon afterwards seven cups of the most delicious tea were brought and handed around.

"Now we'll have a song from everyone who can sing," Xie Xida said. "He who can't sing must tell a funny story, and we'll persuade Guijie to take a little more wine with us. I'll begin."

"Once, a bricklayer was doing some paving in a house, and the lady of the house treated him shabbily. So he quietly took a brick or two and stopped up the drain. Not very long afterwards it began to rain and, of course, the water flooded the whole place. The woman didn't know what on earth to do, and ran to find the bricklayer. This time she gave him a meal, and offered him some money, and got him to make the water flow again. When he had eaten his fill, he went to the gutter, took the bricks out, and the water flowed away at once. "What was the matter with it?" the lady of the house asked him. "Just what is the matter with you," the bricklayer replied. "If there is any money about, the water gate will open; but, if not, there will be no admission."

Guijie thought that this story was aimed at her, and she lost no time before retaliating.

"I should like to tell you a story," she said. "Once upon a time, Sun, the Immortal, thought he would give a banquet to his friends, and sent his tiger around to invite them. As ill luck would have it, the tiger gobbled them all up on the way. The Immortal waited until it was dark but nobody came. At last the tiger came back. 'Where are my guests?' the Immortal said. 'Master,' said the tiger, 'I fear I am not a success at inviting people. Somehow I seem much better at eating them up.' "

This did not please the brothers at all. "Oh, indeed," Ying Bojue said, "so we are always sponging, are we?" He took a small silver pin from his hair. Xie Xida found in his hat a pair of gilt rings of no great value. Zhu Shin-ian took from his sleeve a tattered old handkerchief worth a pittance. Sun Guazui took a white apron from around his waist. Chang Zhijie had nothing, so he borrowed a small piece of silver from Ximen Qing. They handed all these things to Guiqing, and asked her to provide a feast in honour of Ximen Qing and Guijie. She turned them over to a servant to buy some pork and a chicken but all the rest she had to pay for herself. Soon everything was brought in, and they sat down. The order was given: "Chopsticks into action." Our description must take time but there was nothing slow about the movements we describe.

Then every mouth was opened wide and every head was bent.
No sun or sky was to be seen; it was like a cloud of locusts.
They blinked their eyes, their shoulders heaved.
Starvelings they might have been, from some dark dungeon.
One quickly snatched a piece of leg, as though no food
Had passed his lips for years.
One waved his chopsticks thrice, it was as though for years and years
He had not seen a meal.
Sweat trickled down the cheeks of one, he carved a chicken bone
As though inspired by hatred.
Gravy adorned his comrade's lips. With copious drafts of spittle

He gobbled down the pork, with hair and skin.
They ate, and in a flash, the cups and plates were clean
It might have been a den of wolves.
They ate, and in a flash again, the flying chopsticks
Crossed and recrossed the table.
This is the marshal of the King of Gluttons
This, the general of the Lickers-up.
Though it has long been empty, from the wine jar
They try to fill their cups.
Though all the food has gone long since,
They search and search again.
The luscious meal, with all its hundred flavours
Has vanished in a moment.
To worship has it gone,
To worship in the temple of the belly.

They cleared up everything till the plates and dishes looked like the head of a shining bald-pated Buddha. Ximen Qing and Guijie could get nothing but a cup of wine each. They did indeed pick out a few pieces of food but the others snatched them away. Two of the chairs were broken. The boys, who were looking after the horses, could not get in to share in the repast, and contented themselves by pulling down the statue of the divinity of the place and piddling upon it. When the time came for them to go away, Sun Guazui took a gilded image of Buddha that was venerated in an inner room, and slipped it inside his trousers. Ying Bojue pretended to kiss Guijie, and stole a gold pin from her hair. Xie Xida went off with Ximen's fan. Zhu Shinian went secretly to Guiqing's room and stole her mirror. As for Chang Zhijie, he did not hand over the money he had borrowed from Ximen Qing but had the sum put down to his account. They were all in the highest spirits. When Daian reached home, he found Yueniang, Yulou, and Jinlian sitting together. They asked him if his master was coming. "Father kicked me and cursed me," the boy said, his eyes still red. "He says that anyone who tries to get him away will find herself in trouble."

"What an outrageous fellow he is," Yueniang cried. "It is quite bad enough that he refuses to come, without ill-treating this poor boy."

"It was bad enough for him to kick the boy but why should he threaten us?" Yulou said.

"The affection of a dozen of these strumpets wouldn't amount to anything," Jinlian said. "There is an old saying that a shipload of gold and silver would never satisfy people of their sort."

Li Jiao'er had seen Daian return, and, as Jinlian was speaking, she came to the window and listened. They could not see her. She heard Jinlian speak of her family as a host of strumpets. After that, she hated Jinlian from the bottom of her heart, and there was always enmity between them.

Jinlian, while Ximen was away, found that the days passed very slowly. When she realized that he did not mean to return, she waited till her two maids had gone to bed and then, making believe to go and walk in the garden, called Qintong to her room and made him drunk. Then she shut her door, undressed, and the pair made love together.

After this, she called the boy to her room every night and kept him there until daybreak. She gave him two or three of her golden pins, and put them in his hair. On another occasion she gave him a perfume box that she wore on her skirt. Unfortunately, the boy was not very discreet and, as he frequently went drinking and gambling with his fellow servants, it was not long before the affair became known. As the proverb says: "If you would have none to know your secret, you must do no evil." One day the rumour came to the ears of Xue'e and Li Jiao'er.

"That thievish strumpet has been high and mighty for a long time," they said, "but now we have her." They went and told Yueniang. She would not believe a word they said.

"You only wish to make things unpleasant for her," she said, "but you will annoy the Third Lady, and she will say you are slandering her boy." They said no more, and went away.

That evening Jinlian and the boy were amusing themselves. The woman had forgotten to shut the kitchen door. The maid Qiuju chanced to use that door on her way to the privy, and saw everything that was going on. The next morning, she told Xiaoyu, and Xiaoyu told Sun Xue'e.

Once again Xue'e and Li Jiao'er went to tell Yueniang. They gave her all the details, and added: "Her own maid told us about it; it is not something we have invented to get her into trouble. If you will not do anything in the matter, we will tell Father ourselves. If he can forgive a whore like this, he can forgive a scorpion."

It was the twenty-seventh day of the seventh month when Ximen Qing came back from the bawdy house to celebrate his birthday.

"He has just come back," Yueniang said to the two women, "and this should be a happy day for him. If you will not listen to me, and are still determined to tell him, I will not be responsible for the consequences."

They paid no attention to her, and, as soon as Ximen came in, they both ran up and told him that Jinlian was carrying on with one of the boys. Ximen Qing had been in an amiable mood but at this he flew into a towering rage. He went to the front court, and called, "Qintong! Qintong!" over and over again. Jinlian had heard what was happening, and, with trembling hands and feet, she told Chunmei to call the boy to her room. She begged him not to say a word to his master, and took the pins out of his hair but she was so excited that she forgot the perfume box.

Ximen Qing ordered the boy to the hall, and made him kneel down. Then he told some of the other servants to get a large bamboo and make it ready for use.

"You rascally slave," he cried, "do you confess your guilt?" Qintong made no reply.

"Take out his pins and let me see them," Ximen said to the boys. They looked but could not find any.

"What have you done with the silver pin with a golden head?"

"I have no silver pin," Qintong said.

"Ah, you slave, you think you will deceive me, do you?" Ximen said, and ordered the boys to take down his trousers. Three or four of them stripped Qintong. On the jade-coloured short trousers he was wearing the perfume box hung. As soon as Ximen caught sight of it, he made the boys show it to him, and recognized at once that it was the same one that used to hang on Jinlian's skirt.

"Where did you get this?" he cried in a fury. "Tell me the truth. Who gave it to you?"

The boy was so terrified that it was a long time before he could speak but at last he said, "I was tidying the garden one day, and picked it up. Nobody gave it to me."

This reply made Ximen still more angry. He bit his lips, and told his servants to beat the boy with all their strength. Qintong was bound and given thirty terrible stripes till his flesh was torn and the blood ran down his legs. Then Ximen told Laibao to cut the boy's hair at the temples and turn him out, and on no account to allow him to return. Qintong kowtowed, wept, and went away.

Jinlian soon heard all that had happened and felt as though a stream of icy water had been poured over her. It was not long before Ximen Qing arrived. She was so frightened that she trembled, and the blood in her veins seemed to freeze. She went forward to take his clothes but Ximen Qing boxed her ears so hard that he knocked her down. Then he told Chunmei to shut all the doors and keep everybody out. He took a small chair, went out, and sat in the courtyard in a shady place. Then he took a horse whip, and made the woman take off her clothes and kneel before him. She bowed her white face but did not dare to make a sound.

"You rascally whore," Ximen cried, "don't pretend you are dreaming. I have questioned that slave and he has confessed everything. You had better tell me the truth. When I was away, how many times did you play your games with that boy?"

"Oh, Heavens! Heavens!" Jinlian said, sobbing, "somebody has been telling lies about me, and I shall die if you believe them. All these days you've been away, I have spent my whole time sewing with Yulou. As soon as it was dark, I locked my door and went to bed. Unless there was something very urgent, I never even ventured to go beyond the corner door. If you don't believe me, ask Chunmei. There was nothing I could do without her seeing." She called to Chunmei: "Sister, come here and tell your Father all about it."

"You rascally whore," Ximen said again, "I know you gave the boy two or three gold pins. Why don't you admit it?"

"These suspicions will be the death of me," Jinlian cried. "Some nasty-minded strumpet who will come to a foul end has been telling you lies. I suppose she was jealous because she saw you always coming to sleep in my room. You know how many pins there were, there is not one missing. Count them yourself, and see. How can you suspect me of being so base as to carry on with a slave? If he were a full-grown slave, they would probably tell the same story but this short-haired lad is hardly out of his cradle. There is not a word of truth in the story. They have made up the whole chapter of scandal."

"We will leave the pins out of it," Ximen said, taking the perfume box from his sleeve. "This, I think, belongs to you. How do I come to find it on that boy's person? Now perhaps you will not have so much to say."

And with these words, Crash! fell the whip on her delicate white body. The pain was so great that she burst into tears. "Oh, dear good Father," she cried, "you mustn't treat me like this. If you will only give me a chance, I can explain everything. If you won't give me the chance but beat me to death, you'll make a very nasty mess here. As for that perfume box, one day when you were away Yulou and I were doing some needlework in the garden. It wasn't firmly attached, and it must've fallen down as I was going through the flower arbour. I looked everywhere for it but the boy must have picked it up. I'm sure I did not give it to him."

This certainly seemed to agree with what Qintong had said. Ximen looked again at the woman. Her flower-like body, unclothed, was kneeling as she uttered these softening words and wept so touchingly. His anger flew to Java, and he began to cool down. He called Chunmei and kissed her.

"Did she play heads and tails with that boy? If you tell me I ought to forgive the little strumpet, I will do so."

Chunmei sat on his knee, and made herself most charming and affectionate. "Father," she said, "you are making a fool of yourself. Mother and I never left one another the whole time. How can you possibly imagine that she would have anything to do with that slave? No, the whole thing is a plot made up by somebody, who is jealous. You must deal with the matter yourself, Father. If the story gets about, and you make yourself a laughingstock, that won't be very pleasant."

Ximen Qing could say no more. He told Jinlian to stand up and dress, and bade Qiuju prepare a meal. Jinlian poured out a full cup of wine and, offering it to him with both hands, knelt to wait for its return.

"This time I forgive you," Ximen said. "Whenever I am away, you must keep your mind pure and your ways clean. Shut your door early, and be on your guard against thoughts of evil. If I ever hear of anything of this sort again, there will be no more forgiveness."

"Your word is my law," Jinlian said meekly. She kowtowed four times, and sat down to drink with him.

So Jinlian, despite the high favour in which she was held by her husband, brought shame upon herself.

Ximen Qing was drinking wine in Jinlian's room when a boy knocked at the door and told him that Yueniang's two brothers, Fu, the manager of his shop, Ximen's daughter Ximen Dajie and her husband, and several other relatives had called to congratulate him on his birthday. He left Jinlian and went to receive his guests. Ying Bojue, Xie Xida, and the other brothers had also brought presents. Even Guijie had sent a servant with a gift. Ximen Qing was soon very busy receiving all his presents and sending out letters of invitation in return.

Meanwhile Meng Yulou, who had heard all about Jinlian's trouble, seized the opportunity while Ximen was not there, and went to see her without the others knowing anything about it. When she came, Jinlian was lying on the bed.

"Do tell me what it is all about, Sister," she said.

Jinlian cried bitterly. "That little strumpet has been telling tales about me. She made our husband so angry that he thrashed me. I hate those two whores with a hate as deep as the ocean."

"If you had to play tricks with the boy," Yulou said, "you might at least have made sure that I shouldn't lose him. But don't be unhappy. Our husband is bound to look at things from our point of view. If he comes to see me tomorrow, I shall tell him what I think about him."

"It is good of you to trouble about me," Jinlian said. She called Chunmei, and told her to serve tea. They chatted for a while, and Yulou went back to her own rooms. That night, Mistress Wu was staying with Yueniang and Ximen Qing went to sleep with Yulou.

"It was very wrong of you to distress Jinlian so unreasonably," Yulou said. "She did not do anything. This trouble has all come from her quarrel with Xue'e and Li Jiao'er. Without taking the trouble to make any inquiries, you had my boy beaten. You have certainly been most unjust, and it makes things very awkward for the poor woman. Do you imagine our mistress would not have told you, if there had been any truth in the story?"

"I did ask Chunmei," Ximen Qing said, "and she said exactly what you say."

"The Fifth Lady is very much upset," Yulou said. "Why don't you go and see her?"

"I will go and see her tomorrow," Ximen promised.

The next day was Ximen's birthday, and many visitors came to take wine with him, Major Zhou, the magistrate Xia, Captain Zhang, and Uncle Wu, Yueniang's brother. Ximen Qing sent a sedan chair for Guijie, and engaged two singing girls, who performed throughout the day.

As soon as her niece arrived, Li Jiao'er took her to visit Yueniang and the others, and she drank tea with them. They asked Jinlian to come and see her, and twice a maid went to her room to invite her but she said she was not very well and refused to come. Later in the evening, when Guijie was about to go home, Yueniang gave her a silk handkerchief and some artificial flowers, and went with Li Jiao'er to see her off. Guijie was anxious to go to the garden and pay her respects to Jinlian but as soon as Jinlian heard she was coming, she told Chunmei to bolt and bar the corner door. When Guijie got there, Chunmei said, "My Mistress's orders. I dare not open the door." Guijie had to go away, greatly abashed.

That evening Ximen Qing went to see Jinlian. Her beautiful tresses were all in disorder, and she seemed very weary and faded. But when he came, she took her clothes, served him with tea, and hot water to wash his feet, and showed him a hundred signs of affection. That night, as they played together, she did for him whatever he asked of her.

"Brother," she said, "who in all this household really cares about you? They are all just stale married women, nothing more. I am the only one who understands you, and you understand me. The others see that you show me favour and spend most of your time here; it makes them jealous, and they try to vent their spite on me. How could you be caught by such talk, and treat me so unkindly? There is an old saying: 'When a farmyard chicken is beaten, it turns round and round; a wild one flies away.' You may beat me to death but I shall never run away. The other day, when you were at the bawdy house and kicked Daian, I never complained. The Great Lady and Yulou know that quite well. I said I was afraid the girls there would do you no good. I said singing girls in places like that care for nothing but money. What is true love to them? Is there a single one of them who really loves you? That is all I said. Somebody came slyly up and secretly listened, and then they plotted together to get me in disgrace. Fortunately, while people may injure others, they cannot kill them; it is only those whom Heaven wishes to destroy who die. In the future you will realize that I am speaking the truth, and you will know what to do if such a thing happens again."

Ximen Qing was completely won over, and his delight in her was greater than ever.

Some days afterwards he mounted his horse and went off to the bawdy house, attended by Daian and Ping'an. Guijie had other visitors but as soon as she heard he was coming, she went to her room, washed off her powder, removed her rings and ornaments, lay down on the bed, and pulled the bedclothes over her. Ximen Qing came in. He waited for a long time before the old woman appeared and made a reverence to him.

"Why is it so long since you were here?" the old lady said. She asked him to take a seat.

"I was very busy on my birthday," Ximen Qing said, "and there is no one at home who seems able to attend to things."

"I am afraid my daughter must have been a trouble to you," the old lady said.

Ximen asked why Guiqing did not come to see him on his birthday. The old woman told him that she had been away; a traveller had taken her to stay with him at the inn, and she was still there. They talked for a while, and the old woman offered him tea.

"Where is Guijie?" Ximen said at length. "Don't you know, Sir!" the old woman said. "Ever since the child came back from your house, she has been terribly overwrought. She is not at all well. I can't tell you what is the matter with her but she has stayed in bed all the time and refused to leave her room. You must have a heart like a wolf's not to have been to see her before."

"This is the first I have heard of it," Ximen said. "Where is she? I will go and see her."

"She is lying down in her bedroom," the old lady said. She told a maid to go and raise the lattice. Ximen Qing went into the room. Guijie, covered with the bedclothes, was sitting on the bed, her face turned to the wall; her hair was in disorder and she seemed in a sad way. She did not move when Ximen came in.

"Why have you been ill since you were at my place?" Ximen said. The girl did not reply.

"What has made you so angry? Tell me." He questioned her for a long time, and at last she said:

"It is all your Fifth Lady's doing. Since you have someone in your own home who is as good as any strumpet, I can't imagine why you come here and make love to a wicked girl like me. I may have been brought up in this house but I don't believe I'm any worse than some in other houses I could mention. I did not go as a singing girl that day; I came to give you a present. Your great lady was very kind and gave me flowers and clothes, and when I heard you had a fifth lady, I asked to be allowed to pay my respects to her. If I hadn't done so, she would have said that the girls from the bawdy house are very ill-mannered but I did ask, and she refused to see me. When I was leaving your house, I asked once more, and she ordered her maid to shut the door in my face. Really she is lacking in the very elements of politeness."

"You mustn't blame her too much," Ximen Qing said. "She wasn't very well that day. If she had been, I'm sure she wouldn't have refused to come and see you. But I've often felt like giving that little strumpet a beating. She's always hurting somebody with that sharp tongue of hers."

Guijie slapped him lightly on the face. "Why haven't you beaten her, then, you shameless fellow?"

"You don't know how severe I can be," Ximen Qing said. "I have punished most unmercifully all the women and maids in my house, except, of course, my first wife. Sometimes I use a whip upon them twenty or thirty times or even more, and sometimes I cut their hair off."

"Oh," said Guijie, "I've met men before who talk about cutting the hair off their womenfolk but never one who did more than brag about it. You may have bowed three times and made reverence twice to them for all anybody could prove. If you mean what you say, go home and cut off a single tress, bring it here, and show it to me. If you do that, I'll believe you are the greatest hero there is in this part of the world."

"Your hand upon it," Ximen cried.

"A hundred times, if it pleases you."

Ximen Qing spent the night with Guijie, and the next day, as he was mounting his horse to go home, she called after him: "If you don't bring it to me, don't dare to show your face here again."

This made Ximen very excited, especially as he was already half drunk. As soon as he got home, he went straight to Jinlian's room. She saw that he had had some wine, and was most careful in her attentions. She offered him something to eat but he would have none of it. He told Chunmei to make the bed, then sent her away and shut the door. He sat on the bed and ordered the woman to take off his shoes. She took them off. Then he got on to the bed but he would not go to sleep, and sat on a pillow. He bade Jinlian undress and kneel down. She was so terrified that the sweat rolled down her body. She had not the faintest notion what was amiss, and could only kneel down sobbing quietly.

"Father," she said, "tell me what is wrong, even if it kills me. I have been so careful all day, and still I don't seem to satisfy you. You are just sawing me asunder with a blunt knife. How can I bear it?"

"You rascally little whore," Ximen cried, "if you don't take your clothes off, I will show you no mercy." He called to Chunmei: "Bring me the whip that is hanging behind the door."

Chunmei would not go into the room, and he had to call for a long time before she slowly pushed the door open and went in. Jinlian was on her knees, and the lamp had fallen down beside the table. In spite of Ximen's orders, the maid did not obey him.

"Chunmei, Sister, please help me," Jinlian cried, "he is going to beat me again."

"Don't worry about her, little oily mouth," Ximen said. "Give me the whip. I am going to beat the strumpet."

"How can you be so shameless, Father?" Chunmei cried. "What has Mother done wrong? You seem to listen to anything any bad woman likes to tell you, making a storm in a teacup all the time. Mother is one heart and mind with you. What makes you so changeable? I shall not do what you say." She shut the door and went out. Ximen Qing could only burst out laughing.
"I won't beat you this time," he said to Jinlian. "Come here. I want you to give me something. Will you give it me or not?"
"My precious darling," Jinlian said, "I belong to you, heart and soul. Whatever you ask, it is yours. What do you want?"
"I want some of your hair," Ximen said.
"Heavens!" Jinlian cried, "if you had asked me to set myself on fire, I would have done it. But to cut off my hair... that is too much. You must wish to frighten me to death. From the day of my birth, twenty-six years until this very day, I have never done such a thing. And lately my hair has been falling out of its own accord. Do, please, spare me that indignity."
"You are always complaining about my bad tempers," Ximen Qing said, "yet you won't do a single thing I ask you."
"If I don't obey you, I don't obey anybody. But tell me, why do you want my hair?"
"I am thinking of having a hairnet made," Ximen said.
"If you want a net, I will make one for you but you must not take my hair to that strumpet to lay a spell on me."
"I won't give it to anybody," Ximen said, "but I must have your hair to make the foundation for a net."
"Very well," Jinlian said, "in that case I will let you cut some off." She parted her hair. Ximen took a pair of scissors and cut a large tress from the crown of her head. He wrapped it in paper, and put it in his sleeve. Jinlian pressed close to him and wept quietly.
"I will do anything you wish," she said. "The only thing I ask is that you love me always. You may play with others as much as you please but you must not forget me."
That night their joy in each other seemed more glorious than ever. The next morning, when Ximen Qing got up, she served him with tea; then he mounted his horse and rode to the bawdy house.
"Where is the hair you were going to cut off?" Guijie cried.
"Here you are," said Ximen. He took the hair from his sleeve, and handed it to her. She opened the packet. It contained a tress of beautiful hair, as black as the blackest coal. She put it into her sleeve.
"You have seen it now," Ximen said. "Give it back to me. She was terribly upset because I insisted on cutting off that hair, and, until I changed countenance and frightened her, she wouldn't hear of my cutting it off. I told her I wanted it to make a net. You see, I have brought it to you. Perhaps now you will believe that I always do what I say."
"I don't see why you should be so alarmed," Guijie said. "There is nothing so very extraordinary about it. I'll let you have it before you go. You shouldn't have taken it, if you are so frightened of her."
"What makes you think I'm afraid of her?" Ximen Qing said, laughing. "If I were, I shouldn't tell anybody."
Guijie asked her sister to take wine with Ximen Qing, and, going to a quiet place, put some of the hair into her shoe, that she might tread it underfoot everyday. She kept Ximen a prisoner for several days and would not allow him to go home.
Jinlian was very unhappy for several days after her hair had been cut. She refused to leave her room and seemed too languid to take food or tea. Yueniang sent one of the boys to bring old woman Liu, an old favourite of hers, to see what was the matter.
"The lady is suffering from some secret grief," the old woman said, "and because the trouble is insistent and she can't free herself from it, she has headaches and gnawing pains at the heart, and does not feel inclined to take her food."
She opened her medicine box, and, taking out two black pills, told Jinlian to take them in the evening with some ginger water. "I will bring my husband tomorrow," she said. "He will tell your fortune for the coming year and see whether there is any bad luck in store."
"Can your husband really see what is in one's life?" Jinlian asked.
"He is blind," the old woman said, "but there are three things he can do. He can tell fortunes and read the Yin-Yang, and so save people from misadventure. He can bleed the sick, cauterize, and cure wens. The third thing is only to be mentioned with discretion but, as a matter of fact, he can make philters to change people's hearts."
"What are these philters for?" Jinlian said.
"Well," old woman Liu said, "suppose father and son do not agree as well as they might, or there is a slight misunderstanding between brothers, or a quarrel between wives, if my husband is told the true state of affairs, he will make a spell and write a charm. This is put in water, and the people concerned are given it to drink. Three days after drinking this water, father and son will love one another again, brothers will reach a perfect understanding, and wives will live in harmony together.
"Again, when a man is unsuccessful in business, or his lands and family are not doing very well, my husband can produce the necessary money and increase profits. And when it comes to curing illnesses and making people immune, praying to the stars and invoking the planets, my husband is absolutely a master. People call him Liu the Master of the Stars. I remember the case of a household where there was a new wife who came from a family that was none too well off. She was inclined to be light-fingered, and was always stealing things from her mother-in-law to give to her own people. When her husband found her out, he beat her. My husband exercised his art on her behalf, made a charm, and when it had been burned to ashes, the ashes were put into the cistern. The whole family drank the water from this cistern, and afterwards, even if they actually saw her stealing, they didn't seem to realize what she was about. He also put another charm under her pillow, and when her husband had once slept on that pillow, his hands might have been tied, for he could not beat her any more."
Jinlian listened to this and stored it away in her mind. She told the maid to give the old woman some tea and cakes, and, when she was about to take her departure, she gave her not only three qian of silver for her fee but five more to buy the materials needed for making a charm. She told her to bring the blind man early the next day so that he could burn the charm. The old woman went home, and next morning very early she brought the blind old rascal to the gate, and was about to go to the inner court. Ximen Qing was standing in the courtyard, and the gatekeeper asked the blind man what his business was.
"We have come to burn some papers for the Fifth Lady," the old woman said.
"Very well, in you go," the boy said, "but mind the dog doesn't bite you."
The old woman led her husband to Jinlian's apartments, and they waited some time for her. When she came, the blind man made a reverence to her; then they sat down, and Jinlian told him the eight characters of her destiny. The blind rascal reckoned for a while on his fingers, and said; "Lady, I will now interpret the eight characters of your destiny. They are Gengchen for the year, Gengyin for the month, Yihai for the day, and Jichou for the hour of your birth. The eighth of the month is the Spring Day, we must reckon your fate as from the first month. According to the admirable doctrine of Zi Ping, though your eight characters are indeed both clear and remarkable, you will never have the husband star in a favourable conjunction. The question of children, too, does not seem to be decided in your favour. The Yi tree grows in the first month and, though this would seem to show that you will enjoy good health, you must be careful lest you overdo things. Geng gold appears twice, and the Yangren star is unduly prominent, while the husband star is very troublesome. I should say that you will only reach contentment when you have outlived two husbands."
"I have already outlived one," Jinlian said.
"I beg you to excuse me, Lady," the blind rascal went on, "but though your life appears to be of the type known as Shayin, you are handicapped by the fact that there is the water of Gui in the Hai as well as in the Chou. This is decidedly a superabundance of water, and it rushes out of a single Ji earth. The stars Guan and Sha are confused. In the case of a man, if the influence of the Sha star is predominant, he will attain to dignity and prominence but, in the case of a woman, such a state of affairs indicates that she will be dangerous to her husbands. The fact that you belong to this class shows that you know very well what you're about and that you attract men.
"With regard to your fortune for the present year, this year is Jiachen in the cycle, and this is a sign of coming calamity. The two stars Xiaohao and Goujiao are influencing you, and, though this does not indicate any real catastrophe, you will have trouble from friends and relations, and backbiters will prove a nuisance."
"It is kind of you to have gone so carefully into all this for me," Jinlian said, "and now I should like you to make a spell for me. Here is a tael of silver to spend on a cup of tea. All I want is that backbiters shall leave me in peace, and that my husband shall have a high esteem for me." She went to her room, found a couple of hair ornaments, and gave them to the blind man. He put them in his sleeve.
"If you would like me to make a spell," he said, "I shall take a piece of willow wood and fashion it into two figures, one male and the other female. On one I shall write your husband's eight characters and on the other your own. Then I shall bind them together with forty-nine red threads. I shall cover the man's eyes with a piece of red cloth and stuff him with the leaves of artemisia. I shall put a needle through his hands and stick the feet with gum. You must put the figures under his pillow, secretly. I shall also write a charm in red ink, and the ashes of this you must put into his tea. Then providing he sleeps on this pillow, you will see the result in three days at the utmost."
"What is the meaning of all this?" Jinlian said.
"I'll explain," the old rogue replied. "The covering of the eyes with cloth will make you appear to him as beautiful as Xi Shi. Stuffing the figure with artemisia will make him love you. If I put a needle through the hands, that will ensure that, whatever your faults, he will not be able to raise his hand against you. Finally, the sticking of the feet with gum will prevent his wandering away from you."
Jinlian found this extremely satisfactory, and she wasted no time in getting candles and paper to burn the charms. The next day old woman Liu brought them, with water and the spell figures. Jinlian did with them as she had been told. She burned the charm to ashes, and prepared some of the best tea. When Ximen Qing came back, she told Chunmei to give him some of the tea. That night they slept on the same pillow. Two or three days passed, and their happiness was as great as that of fishes sporting in the water. Every household, no matter whether it be great or small, should make a rule that nuns, priests, nurses, and procuresses like these should always be kept at a distance.

034
Li P'ing-erh Makes a Secret Tryst over the Garden Wall; the Maid Ying-ch'un Peeks through a Crack and Gets an Eyeful

Since there's no such thing in this life as complete satisfaction;
In one's way of coping with the world do not be too demanding.[1]
It's a good thing always to pay heed only to the words of superior men;
When disputes arise never listen to the words of petty persons.[2]
Only regard the customs of the age as a source of amusement;
While respecting the intentions of others by keeping them at a distance.
If one were to address perceptive women with a word to the wise;
It would be, "Don't ever confide your troubles to your sweetheart."[3]

One day earlier that summer,[4] on the fourteenth day of the sixth month, when Hsi-men Ch'ing came in from the front compound and went into Yüeh-niang's room, she said to him, "While you were out today, the Hua household sent a pageboy over with a note inviting you for a drink. 'Ask him to come over whenever he gets home,' he said."
Hsi-men Ch'ing looked at the invitation that read, "Can you join me for a chat at Wu Yin-erh's place in the licensed quarter at noon today? Come over to my place so we can go together. I do hope you can make it."
Hsi-men Ch'ing thereupon dressed himself to befit the occasion, ordered two of his attendants to prepare his best horse, and proceeded directly to the Hua household next door. How could he have known that Hua Tzu-hsü would not be at home? His wife, Li P'ing-erh, was standing on the raised stone platform just inside the second gate, the unfinished vamp of a sand-green Lu-chou pongee shoe in her hand. She was wearing a summer outfit that consisted of:
A chignon enclosed in a fret of silver filigree,
Pendant amethyst earrings in gold settings,
A blouse of pale lavender silk, opening down the middle,
And a white silk skirt with drawnwork borders,
Beneath which there peeked out a pair of tiny shoes,
The points of which bore the beaks of red phoenixes.
Hsi-men Ch'ing, quite unaware of what was in store for him, proceeded through the gate, and the two of them ran smack into each other.
Hsi-men Ch'ing had already had her on his mind for some time. Although he had caught a glimpse of her by the graveside at the old Eunuch Director's funeral the previous summer, he had not yet had a chance to savor the details. Now that he was able to meet her face to face and saw that she had a naturally fair complexion, was petite in stature, and had a face shaped like a melon seed and delicately curved eyebrows, before he knew it:
His ethereal souls flew beyond the sky, and
His material souls dispersed among the nine heavens.[5]
Stepping forward with alacrity, he gave her a deep bow, and the woman returned his salute, after which she turned around and disappeared into the interior of the house. But she sent out the maidservant with her hair cut straight across her forehead, named Hsiu-ch'un, to ask Hsi-men Ch'ing to take a seat in the parlour, while she herself stood just inside the postern gate:
Half revealing her captivating countenance, and addressed him, saying, "Please sit down for a little while, sir. He's gone out on an errand just now but he'll be back any minute."
Before long she sent out a maidservant with a cup of tea, and while Hsi-men Ch'ing was drinking it, she conversed with him from the other side of the gate, saying, "At this drinking party over there that he's invited you to today, sir, whatever happens, for my sake, couldn't you urge him to come home a little earlier than usual? Our two menservants will both accompany him, leaving only these two maidservants and myself, so there won't be anyone to be relied on at home."
"Sister-in-law," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you're certainly in the right. My brother really ought to:
Pay more attention to his family affairs.
Since you have so instructed me, Sister-in-law, I'll be sure to stick by his side.
Together we'll go and together return.
How could I do anything detrimental to my brother's interests?"
While they were still speaking, who should appear but Hua Tzu-hsü himself, and the woman returned to her own quarters.
Hua Tzu-hsü saluted Hsi-men Ch'ing and then said, "How good of you to accept my invitation. Something came up just now that I simply had to run out and take care of. Forgive me for not being here to greet you myself."
Thereupon, they took their places as guest and host, and a pageboy was ordered to bring tea.
It was not long until they had done with the tea, and Hua Tzu-hsü instructed the pageboy, "Tell Mother to prepare the refreshments. I'm going to share three cups of wine with Mr. Hsi-men here before we set off."
Then, turning to his guest, he continued, "Today is the birthday of Wu Yin-erh from the licensed quarter, and so I've invited you to join me in paying her a visit in order to celebrate the occasion."
"My Good Brother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "why didn't you say so before?"
Turning to Tai-an, he ordered, "Go home at once, get five mace of silver put into a sealed packet, and bring it back to me here."
"What need is there for you to put yourself to such trouble, Brother?" protested Hua Tzu-hsü. "I'm afraid I'm to blame."
When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that the servants were setting up a table, he said, "Brother, there's no need to entertain me here. Let's go into the quarter and do our drinking there."
"I wouldn't presume to detain you," said Hua Tzu-hsü. "Just stay a little longer."
Whereupon, in:
Large platters and large bowls,
such delicacies as chicken feet and fresh pork were set before them. A high-stemmed silver goblet in the shape of a sunflower was provided for each of them. There were also four "spring rolls" left over when they had finished eating that they saved as a treat for the boys who tended their horses.
Before long, after Tai-an had returned with the requested gratuity, the two of them mounted their horses and set off together. Hsi-men Ch'ing was accompanied by Tai-an and P'ing-an, and Hua Tzu-hsü by T'ien-fu and T'ien-hsi, so they had four pageboys in their retinue as they made their way directly to Madam Wu the Fourth's establishment in the back alley of the licensed quarter in order to celebrate Wu Yin-erh's birthday.
After they got there:
Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade,
Song and dance and wind and string instruments, they continued drinking until the first watch before the party broke up. Hsi-men Ch'ing saw to it that Hua Tzu-hsü got stinking drunk, while at the same time, in response to Li P'ing-erh's request, he actually accompanied him on his way home. When the calls of the pageboys had succeeded in getting someone to open the front gate, they helped their master into the parlour and set him down. Li P'ing-erh and her maidservants, carrying lamps and candles, came out and supported Hua Tzu-hsü on his way into the interior of the house.
His mission accomplished, Hsi-men Ch'ing was about to take his leave when the woman came back out to thank him.
"My poor husband is a sorry lot and something of a sot," she said. "It's very kind of you to have put up with him for my sake and to have brought him home with you. Please don't laugh at my solicitude, sir."
"How would I dare?" replied Hsi-men Ch'ing, hastening to make a low bow in response to her salutation. "Since you gave me my marching orders this morning, Sister-in-law, I have shown myself capable of:

Leading the army forth, and
Leading it back again.
How could your wish that I should accompany your husband home be anything but:
Imprinted in my heart and engraved on my bones?[6]
Had I failed to do so, it would not only have added to your worries but would have shown me to be:
Undependable in the performance of my task.
The people at that establishment would have had Brother in their clutches if I hadn't insisted on urging him to leave. But as we passed by the gate of the Star of Joy establishment—the one that features the painted face, Cheng Ai-hsiang, whose nickname is Cheng Kuan-yin, or Goddess of Mercy Cheng, and who's quite a looker—Brother would have ventured in there, if I hadn't done everything in my power to stop him. 'Brother,' I said to him, 'let's go home. There's time enough to come another day. Sister-in-law's at home worried to death about you.' It was only then that he consented to come straight home with me. Otherwise, if he'd gone into the Cheng place, he wouldn't have been home all night.
"With all due respect, Sister-in-law—I really shouldn't say this sort of thing—but Brother's a fool. With such a young wife and such a large house to look after, how can he simply abandon you and stay away from home for whole nights at a time? It doesn't make any sense."
"It's just as you say," the woman responded. "Simply because of this philandering of his, and his refusal to take anyone's advice, I get so upset here at home that my body aches all over. From now on, sir, whenever you run into him in the licensed quarter, whatever happens, for my sake, urge him to come home as soon as possible.
Your kindness will be amply rewarded,
I will never dare to forget it."
Now this Hsi-men Ch'ing was the sort of man of whom it is said:
If you hit him on the top of his head,
The soles of his feet will ring.
He had been a habitué of the world of breeze and moonlight for so many years that there wasn't much he didn't know about anything. Therefore, on this particular day, the fact that the woman was opening up a wide avenue of approach to herself was not lost on him.
His face wreathed in smiles, he laughed, saying, "How can you talk that way, Sister-in-law? Really! What are friends for, anyway? I'll certainly do my best to admonish my brother. You can rest assured, Sister-in-law."
The woman bowed to him again to express her thanks and also directed a young maidservant to bring out a cup of tea, flavoured with fruit kernels, in a carved lacquer cup with a silver spoon.
When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished the tea, he said, "I'd better be on my way. Be careful not to let anyone into the house."
Whereupon, he took his leave and went home.
From this time on, Hsi-men Ch'ing made up his mind that he would contrive to make a conquest of this woman. Time and again he saw to it that Sponger Ying, Tagalong Hsieh, and the rest of that crowd detained Hua Tzu-hsü in the licensed quarter, carousing all night long, while he slipped out and made his way back to his own home. Once there, he would stand around in front of the gate until the woman and her two maidservants appeared at the front gate next door. She noticed that it was Hsi-men Ch'ing, who gave a discreet cough as he passed in front of her door. First he would head east, then turn around and go west, or come to a halt in front of the gateway across the street and stare fixedly in the direction of her door. The woman would show herself in the doorway and then, when she saw him coming, duck inside, only to stick her head out again as soon as he had passed by. As for:
The messages in their eyes and the expectations
in their hearts;
There was no longer any need to express them in words.
One day, as Hsi-men Ch'ing was standing in front of his gate, the woman sent her young maidservant, Hsiu-ch'un, to invite him over.
"What are you inviting me for, Sister?" Hsi-men Ch'ing pointedly asked. "Is your father at home or not?"
"Father's not at home," Hsiu-ch'un replied. "It's Mother that's inviting you, sir. There's something she wants to ask you."
This was just the signal Hsi-men Ch'ing had been waiting for. He complied with alacrity, was shown into the parlour, and took a seat.
After some time, the woman came out and saluted him, saying as she did so, "I'm extremely grateful for your consideration the other day.
It is imprinted in my heart,
My gratitude knows no bounds.
Since my poor husband went out last, it's been two days in a row now that he hasn't come home. I wonder if you happen to have come across him or not, sir?"
"Yesterday, along with three or four others, he was drinking in the Cheng family establishment," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Something happened to come up that brought me home, and today I haven't had a chance to go into the quarter, so I don't know whether he's still there or not. If I'd been there I could hardly have failed to urge him to come home as early as possible. I'm well aware how upsetting it is for you, Sister-in-law."
"It's just as you say," the woman responded. "I suffer constantly from his refusal to take anyone's advice, his frequent resort to the quarter:
Sleeping among the flowers and lolling
beneath the willows,
and his refusal to pay any attention to family affairs."
"If one had to assess Brother's character," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "he's certainly humane and righteous enough but he does have this one flaw."
As they were talking, the young maidservant brought tea, and they drank it together. Hsi-men Ch'ing was afraid Hua Tzu-hsü might come home and thought it imprudent to linger, so he prepared to take his leave.
The woman, for her part, begged Hsi-men Ch'ing, in no uncertain terms, "If you happen to go there tomorrow, whatever happens, urge him to come home as soon as possible. Your kindness will be rewarded. You can be sure I'll make it worth your while, sir."
"Say no more, Sister-in-law," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "After all, Brother and I are just like that together."
After saying which, Hsi-men Ch'ing went home.
The next day, when Hua Tzu-hsü came back from the licensed quarter, the woman complained to him, saying. "While you've been out:
Indulging your taste for wine and sex,
we've become more than a little obligated to our next-door neighbour, the Honourable Hsi-men, who has, more than once, helped to see you safely home. You really ought to buy him a present of some kind to express your gratitude if you don't want to fall behind in your social obligations."
Hua Tzu-hsü immediately bought four boxes of presents and a jar of wine and sent the pageboy, T'ien-hsi, to deliver them to Hsi-men Ch'ing's household. Hsi-men Ch'ing accepted them and gave the messenger a generous tip but we will say no more of this.
Wu Yüeh-niang, who was present on this occasion, asked, "What is the Hua household sending you this batch of presents for?"
Hsi-men Ch'ing replied, "This must be because, the other day, when Brother Hua the Second invited me to join him in the licensed quarter to help celebrate Wu Yin-erh's birthday, he got drunk, and I had to help him to get home. And also because his wife is aware that I constantly urge him not to spend the night in the quarter but to go home as early as possible, and she can't get over her feelings of gratitude at my consideration. I imagine she must have suggested to Brother Hua the Second that he buy these presents in order to thank me."
Wu Yüeh-niang folded her hands in front of her chest and made him a bow in the manner of a Buddhist priest, saying, "Brother, you really ought to take a good look at yourself. You're just like:
The earthenware idol preaching to the idol of clay.
You, too, stay away from home for days at a time:
Seducing people's daughters and carrying on with their wives, and you have the face to preach to someone else's husband."
"I don't suppose," she continued, "that you're planning to simply accept these presents from them without doing anything in return. Whose name was written on the card that came with the gifts, anyway? If it was his wife's name, then we can write an invitation in my name today and invite her over for a visit. She's been anxious to make our acquaintance for some time. If it was her husband's name, invite him or not, as you please. It's no business of mine."
"It was in Brother Hua the Second's name," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll invite him over tomorrow, that's all."
The next day, sure enough, Hsi-men Ch'ing made the necessary preparations and invited Hua Tzu-hsü over for a visit. They spent the better part of the day drinking together.
When he got home, Li P'ing-erh said to him, "We mustn't be remiss in our social obligations. We sent him a set of presents and he has reciprocated by inviting you over for a drink. Some day soon you ought to make the necessary preparations and invite him back over here for a drink. Turnabout is fair play."
Light and darkness alternate swiftly.
Before long the Double Yang festival,[7] on the ninth day of the ninth month, rolled around. Hua Tzu-hsü took advantage of the occasion to engage the services of two singing girls, and sent an invitation to Hsi-men Ch'ing to come over and enjoy the chrysanthemums with him. He also invited Sponger Ying, Tagalong Hsieh, Sticky Chu, and Blabbermouth Sun to keep them company. Playing the game:
"Passing the Flower to the Beat of the Drum,"[8] they:
Enjoyed themselves as they drank up the wine.
There is a poem that testifies to this:
The raven and the hare[9] move in their orbits
as swiftly as arrows;
Among the festivals in the human world
it is again the Double Yang.
The red leaves on a thousand branches supply autumn colour;
The yellow blossoms on the garden paths emit unusual fragrance.
But the black-hatted young official is not seen ascending the heights;
He is still dreaming of a silk-clad young lady offering him wine.
Amid embroidered hangings, behind latticed doors,
they gaze at each other;
From this time on, their mutual love will never be forgotten.
That day the bunch of them continued to drink until after the lamps had been lighted. At this juncture Hsi-men Ch'ing happened to get up from his place and go outside to relieve himself. He did not anticipate that Li P'ing-erh would be standing there, eavesdropping, just on the other side of the latticework partition, and the two of them ran smack into each other. Before Hsi-men Ch'ing could get out of the way, the woman, who had hastily withdrawn behind the postern gate on the west side of the courtyard, surreptitiously sent her maidservant, Hsiu-ch'un, to waylay him in the shadows.
"Mother has sent me to ask you, sir," she whispered, "if you won't take it easy on the wine and go home as early as you can. Right now she's contriving a way to hustle Father off to the quarter to spend the night. This evening, thus and so, Mother would like to have a word with you."
When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this:
His delight knew no bounds.
He returned to the party, after relieving himself, and from that point on surreptitiously disposed of his drinks, concealing what he was doing behind his sleeve. As the singing girls continued to play their instruments, sing, and ply the guests with wine, he pretended to be too drunk to have any more.
Before long it was already the first watch, and Li P'ing-erh kept coming back impatiently to eavesdrop outside the screen. She saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing was sitting in the place of honour, pretending to have fallen asleep, while Sponger Ying and Tagalong Hsieh were sitting there, as if their bodies were nailed to their chairs. They were so drunk they bobbed about like the float valve in an oil jar but they wouldn't get up to go. It got so bad that Sticky Chu and Blabbermouth Sun finally left but the two of them still wouldn't budge. Li P'ing-erh was beside herself.
Hsi-men Ch'ing eventually got up to go but Hua Tzu-hsü wouldn't let him get away.
"I must not have done my duty as a host today," he said. "Brother, how can you refuse to stay a little longer?"
"I'm really drunk," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I can't swallow another drop." Whereupon, making a deliberate display of:
Swaying to the east and tumbling to the west,
he prevailed upon his two pageboys to help him back home.
"I don't know what's the matter with him today," said Sponger Ying, "that he kept refusing to have anything more. He got drunk when he'd hardly had anything to drink. But since our host has gone to so much trouble on our behalf, let's ask our two sisters here to bring out some larger cups, and we'll have another forty or fifty rounds before breaking up."
When Li P'ing-erh heard this, from her vantage point on the other side of the screen, she cursed them unremittingly for a pair of slobber-pussed jailbirds, and inconspicuously sent the pageboy, T'ien-hsi, to call Hua Tzu-hsü out for a word with her.
"If you want to go on drinking with that bunch," she told him, in no uncertain terms, "you can take yourselves into the licensed quarter, this minute, and do your drinking there. Don't stick around the house and bother me anymore. Before I know it, it'll be:
The third watch in the middle of the night,
and you'll still be:
Burning oil and wasting fuel.
I've had enough of it."
"If I go into the licensed quarter with them at this hour," said Hua Tzu-hsü, "I'll never make it back home tonight. You'd better not give me a hard time about it."
"You go ahead," the woman said. "I'll not give you a hard time about it, that's all."
This was just the signal Hua Tzu-hsü had been waiting for. He came back and told the others about it, thus and so, saying, "Let's go into the licensed quarter."
"Really?" said Sponger Ying. "Sister-in-law said that? It's no use trying to fool us. You'd better go back and ask Sister-in-law again before we get going."
"My wife just spoke to me about it a minute ago," said Hua Tzu-hsü. "She told me not to come home till tomorrow."
"I've got it," said Tagalong Hsieh. "She just couldn't take any more of Beggar Ying's palaver. Now that our brother's succeeded in getting her permission, we can go without anything to worry about."
Thereupon, along with the two singing girls, the whole party set off for the licensed quarter. T'ien-fu and T'ien-hsi accompanied their master, Hua Tzu-hsü, and his two guests. When they arrived at Wu Yin-erh's place in the back alley of the quarter it was already the second watch. They called until someone opened the gate. Wu Yin-erh had already gone to bed but she got up, lit some candles in the reception room, and invited them to come in and have a seat.
"The patron of your establishment," explained Sponger Ying, "invited us to his place to enjoy the chrysanthemums and have a drink today. Having already drunk to the point where we can't stop, he's also invited us to look in on you here in the quarter. Whatever you've got in the house to drink, serve it up, so we can continue drinking."
We will say no more, for the moment, about Hua Tzu-hsü's drinking bout in the licensed quarter but return to the story of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When he arrived home, still feigning drunkenness, he went into P'an Chin-lien's quarters. No sooner had he taken off his outer clothes, however, than he went out into the front garden and sat down to await a signal from Li P'ing-erh's side of the wall. After some time had passed, he heard them chasing the dog and locking the gate on the other side. Not long after this, what should appear in the dark shadows over the wall but the maidservant, Ying-ch'un. She pretended to be calling a cat but when she saw Hsi-men Ch'ing sitting in the pavilion, she gave him a message. Hsi-men Ch'ing then moved over a table and a bench and, by mounting on top of them, was able to get over the wall. A ladder had already been put in place on the other side.
Now that Hua Tzu-hsü was out of the way, Li P'ing-erh had already:
Removed her headdress,
Carelessly coiled her raven locks, and Adorned herself with demure elegance, before coming out to stand in the veranda. When she saw Hsi-men Ch'ing come over the wall:
Her delight knew no bounds.
She welcomed him into her room that was brightly illuminated by lamps and candles, and where she had already laid out a magnificent spread of wine and delicacies, condiments and appetizers.
There was a small pot:
Filled to the brim with fragrant wine.
The woman:
Lifting high a jade goblet,
with both hands, allowed Ying-ch'un to fill it from the wine pot, and then offered it to Hsi-men Ch'ing with a deep bow, saying, "We've been obligated to you in the past, sir, and you have even gone to the trouble of entertaining us. It's enough to make me:
Uneasy in my heart.
Today I took it upon myself to prepare this cup of watery wine and invite you over, sir, as a means of expressing some small part of my inadequate feelings. And then I've had to contend with the refusal of those two goddamned slobber-pusses to leave. I was really beside myself. But now I've succeeded in packing them all off to the licensed quarter."
"My only fear is that Brother Two might come home," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"I've already told him to spend the night there and not come back," said the woman. "The two menservants have both gone with him. There's no one else left at home but these two maidservants and Old Mother Feng, who looks after the gate. She's been a servant in my family since I was a child and is completely trustworthy. The front and back gates are already locked."
When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he was completely delighted. The two of them then sat down together:
Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh,
Exchanging cups as they drank,
while Ying-ch'un stood at their side to pour the wine and Hsiu-ch'un went back and forth to serve the food. When they began to feel the effects of the wine; within the brocade bed curtains, the maids:
Perfumed with incense the mandarin duck quilt, and
Put in its place the coral pillow.
The servants then removed the table at which they had been drinking and put the latch on the door, after which the two of them:
Got into bed and engaged each other in amorous sport.
It so happens that well-to-do households are equipped with double windows, the outer layers of which are called shutters, and the inner layers, casements. When the woman sent her maidservants out of the room, she closed the two casements on the inside, so that even though the room was illuminated by lamps and candles, no one could see in from the outside.
Now the maidservant, Ying-ch'un, was already sixteen years old and knew something of the world. When she saw that the two of them were going to engage in an illicit liaison that night, she stealthily pulled a hairpin out of her headdress, poked a hole in the paper of the lower part of the casement, and peeped inside.
Truly, what were the two of them doing with each other? Behold:
By the gleam of lamplight,
Amid mermaid silk curtains:
One comes, the other goes,
One butts, the other lunges.
One of them stirs his jade arms into motion,
The other raises her golden lotuses on high.
This one gives vent to the warbling of an oriole,
That one gives voice to the twittering of a swallow.
It is just like Chang Chün-jui's rendezvous with Ts'ui Ying-ying;[11]
It much resembles Sung Yü's secret tryst with the Goddess of Witches' Mountain.[11]
Promises to be as faithful as the hills and seas,
Still resonate within their ears;
The butterfly is enamored, the bee distraught,
They are not yet willing to call a halt.
The engagement is protracted,
The coverlet disturbed by crimson waves;[12]
Until the transfusing touch of the "magic rhinoceros horn[13] penetrates her creamy breast;
The battle is prolonged,
The bed curtains clipped by silver hooks,
Until the twin arcs of her painted eyebrows
wilt on her jade face.
Truly:
The third time that lip meets lip
passion is stronger than ever;
A single melting sensation suffuses the body
when lovers meet in secret.
While the two of them were in the room playing at clouds and rain, who would have thought that everything they did was so clearly seen and heard by Ying-ch'un from her vantage point outside the window that she might well have exclaimed:
"Is it not delightful?"[14]
She could hear everything that they said.
"How old are you?" Hsi-men Ch'ing asked the woman.
"I was born in the year of the ram," said Li P'ing-erh, "so, this year, I'm twenty-two."
She then went on to ask, "How old is your first lady?"
"My wife was born in the year of the dragon," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "which would make her twenty-five."
"So she's three years older than I am," said the woman. "One of these days I ought to buy a set of presents and go pay a call on your First Lady. My only fear is that she may not be any too friendly."
"My wife has always had a most accommodating disposition," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If that were not the case, how could I ever manage to keep so many bedmates around the place?"
"When you came over here, just now," the woman went on to ask, "did the First Lady know about it or not? If she should ask you about it, what would you say?"
"My wives all live in the rear compound," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "four courtyards back from the front of the house. The only exception is my fifth concubine, née P'an, who lives all by herself in a two-storied belvedere in the front garden but she doesn't dare interfere with me."
"And how old is the Fifth Lady?" the woman asked.
"She was born in the same year as my wife," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"That's good," the woman said. "If she doesn't think it presumptuous of me, I'd like to acknowledge her as an elder sister. Someday soon, if you can get hold of the outlines of the First Lady's and the Fifth Lady's feet for me, I'll make two pairs of shoes for them, myself, and take them over with me, as a token of my feelings."
The woman then pulled out two gold pins from among those that held her headdress in place and gave them to Hsi-men Ch'ing, enjoining him, "If you should go into the licensed quarter, don't let Hua Tzu-hsü see them."
"I understand," Hsi-men Ch'ing promised.
Thereupon, the two of them:
Like glue and like lacquer,
dallied with each other until the fifth watch, when:
The cock crowed outside the window, and
The eastern horizon began to grow light.
Hsi-men Ch'ing, fearing that Hua Tzu-hsü might come home, got up and put his clothes in order.
"You can climb over the wall the same way you came," the woman said.
The two of them agreed on a set of signals between themselves. Whenever Hua Tzu-hsü was safely out of the way, a maidservant on this side would look over the wall and give a surreptitious cough as a signal, or first throw a piece of tile over the wall to see if the coast was clear before climbing up to communicate with him. Hsi-men Ch'ing could then use a ladder to climb over the wall, where he would find another already in place to receive him. The two of them could thus:
Communicate across the intervening wall,[15]
as they engaged in:
Pilfering jade and purloining perfume.[16]
As long as they did not go in and out the main gates, there would be no way for the neighbours in the vicinity to find out about their clandestine affair.
There is a poem that testifies to this:
In your eating, go easy on the salt and vinegar;
Don't bother to go places where you don't belong.
If you want to be respected, study diligently;
If you don't want a deed discovered, don't do it.[17]
To resume our story, as the day dawned, Hsi-men Ch'ing climbed back over the wall the way he had come and went to P'an Chin-lien's room.
Chin-lien, who was still in bed, asked him, "Where did you go off to yesterday without anyone's knowing it? You didn't come home all night, and you didn't tell me where you were going."
"Once again," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it was Brother Hua the Second who sent a pageboy over to invite me to join him on an excursion into the licensed quarter. We've been drinking half the night, and I came home as soon as I could tear myself away."
Although Chin-lien believed him, the shadow of a doubt still lingered in her mind.
One day, after dinner, she and Meng Yü-lou were sitting in the pavilion in the garden doing some needlework together when a piece of tile came flying over the wall and landed right in front of them. Meng Yü-lou was so preoccupied with stitching the sole of the shoe she was working on that she didn't notice anything. But P'an Chin-lien swiftly surveyed the scene and caught an indistinct glimpse of a white face that poked over the top of the wall and then immediately withdrew.
Chin-lien nudged Yü-lou, pointing to the place where the head had appeared, and said, "Look, Sister Three, that was the older of the two maidservants in the Hua household next door. She must have climbed up to look at our flowers over the wall and then, on seeing us here, gotten down again."
Although this is all that she said at the time, she didn't let it go at that.
Later the same evening, Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived home after a social engagement and came into Chin-lien's quarters. When she helped him off with his outer garments and asked if he wanted anything, he expressed no interest in food or tea of any kind but made a beeline for the front garden. P'an Chin-lien, on the principle that:
One thief knoweth another, decided to spy on him and observed that, after he had sat there for some time, the same maidservant as before peeked over the wall, whereupon Hsi-men Ch'ing clambered up a ladder and disappeared over the wall himself.
Once there, he was met by Li P'ing-erh, who conducted him into her room for a rendezvous but there is no need to describe this in detail.
P'an Chin-lien returned to her room where, all night long, she:
Tossed first this way and then that,
but could not get to sleep.
At dawn the next day, who should appear but Hsi-men Ch'ing, who pushed open the door to her room and came inside. The woman pretended to be asleep and did not pay him any attention. Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was already feeling somewhat uneasy about the situation, came up and sat down beside her on the edge of the bed.
When the woman saw what he was doing, she jumped up into a sitting position herself, took hold of him by the ear with one hand, and berated him, saying, "You unfaithful scoundrel! Where did you really go off to last night, anyway; leaving your old mother to fret the whole night through?"
"No sooner do I let you out of my sight," she continued, "than you're up to your old tricks. But I already know all about them, and you're beginning to try my patience. Tell me the truth at once, all this while, how many times have you made out with that whore in the Hua household next door? If you confess to everything, I may let you off the hook; but if you try to deceive me by so much as a single word, the next time you set one foot over there, I'll raise such a hue and cry before you can get your other foot over the threshold, you fickle jailbird, that:
You'll die without a plot to be buried in.[18]
"You've been arranging to have your cronies latch onto her husband and keep him overnight in the licensed quarter while you're here making out with his wife. If it's trouble you want, I'll give you enough so that:

When you've had your fill, there'll be enough left over for you to wrap up and take home with you.
No wonder, yesterday, when Sister Meng the Third and I were in the garden doing our needlework, what should appear but that elder maidservant from her place:
Sticking out her head and craning her neck, over the wall? It turns out she was nothing but a ghost-snatching demon sent by that whore to snatch you away. You think you can fool your old mother, do you? The other night when that cuckold of hers supposedly invited you to join him for an excursion into the licensed quarter, it was his own home that was the licensed quarter, wasn't it?"
If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard these words nothing might have happened but having heard them, he was flustered enough to adopt the posture of a dwarf.
Stamping his feet in exasperation, he knelt down on the ground with an ingratiating laugh and pleaded with her, saying, "You crazy little oily mouth! Not so loud! The truth of the matter is that, thus and so, she asked how old the two of you were and said that, someday soon, if she can get hold of the outlines of your feet, she'll make a pair of shoes for each of you. She'd also like to acknowledge you both as elder sisters. She's quite content to be a younger sister to you."
"I don't need that whore to acknowledge me as any older brother or older sister," exclaimed Chin-lien. "She steals other people's husbands and then comes around offering to do them little favours as a means of cementing the relationship. Your old mother is:
Not the sort of person to let dust
be thrown in her eyes.[18]
She thinks she can get away with that kind of mischief right under my nose, does she?"
As she spoke, she pulled open his trousers with one hand, exposing to view his limp and flaccid organ that still had a silver clasp fastened around it.
"Tell me the truth," she demanded. "How many times did you make out with that whore last night?"
"Only once that would really count," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"You'll have to swear an oath on that all too vigorous body of yours before you can get me to believe that," said the woman. "One time only and it's:
As soft as driveling snot and thick as gravy.[19]
It might as well have been stricken with paralysis. The slightest sign of vitality would be cause for hope."
As she spoke, she removed the clasp with a single motion of her hand, and continued to berate him, saying, "You shameless ruffian!
You may be a brown cat but you've got a black tail.
No wonder I turned the place upside down looking for it, and all the time it was you who had spirited the thing away in order to screw around with that whore."
Affecting an ingratiating smile, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "You crazy little whore! You'll be the death of me yet. She has repeatedly asked me to convey the message that someday soon she'll come over and kowtow to you. And she's going to make a pair of shoes for you too. Yesterday she sent her maidservant over for an outline of the feet of the one from the Wu family. And today she asked me to deliver this pair of hairpins in the shape of the character for long life to you as a present."
Thereupon he took off his cap, pulled them out of his headdress, and presented them to Chin-lien. Taking them into her hand and looking them over, Chin-lien saw that they were a pair of gold, openwork pins, in the shape of the character for long life that had been deeply chased in intaglio and inset with azurite. It was obvious from the extraordinary intricacy of the craftsmanship that they had been manufactured for imperial use and came from the palace.
Chin-lien was utterly delighted and said, "Well, if that's the way things stand, I won't say any more about it, that's all. When you go over there in the future, I'll act as a lookout, so the two of you can screw away to your hearts' content. How would that be?"
Hsi-men Ch'ing was so delighted he put both arms around her and said, "My precious child, if you really do that, it will prove the truth of the adage:
You don't raise a child in the hope it will shit gold and piss silver;
All you can hope for is that it will respond empathetically to you.[20]
Tomorrow I'll go myself and buy you a set of patterned clothing to express my gratitude."
"I don't trust that:
Honeyed mouth and sugared tongue, of yours," the woman responded. "If you want your old mother to fix things up for the two of you, you'll have to agree to three conditions."
"No matter how many conditions you impose, I'll agree to them all," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"The first condition," the woman said, "is that you will have to give up frequenting the licensed quarter. The second condition is that you must do as I say. The third condition is that when you go over to sleep with her, when you come home, you must tell me all about it, without deceiving me by so much as a single word."
"Those conditions are no obstacle," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll agree to all of them, and make an end to it."
From this time on, whenever Hsi-men Ch'ing came back after spending the night next door, he would regale the woman with an account of his adventures.
"Li P'ing-erh has a naturally fair complexion," he would say. "Her face is shaped like a melon seed. She's very amorous and she drinks like a fish. We often bring a box of delicacies inside the bed curtains and play cards there and drink for half the night before going to sleep."
One day, he reached into his sleeve and pulled out an object that he handed to Chin-lien to look at, saying. "This is an album of paintings from the Palace Treasury that the old eunuch director obtained during his service in the Imperial Household Department. The two of us consult it by lamplight and then attempt to emulate the proceedings."
Chin-lien took the album in her hand and opened it up to take a look. There is a lyric that testifies to this:
Mounted on patterned damask in the imperial palace,
Fastened with ivory pins on brocade ribbons;
Vividly traced in outlines of gold, enhanced by blue and green colours;
The square painting on each folio leaf is neatly framed.
The women vie with the Goddess of Witches' Mountain,
The men resemble that handsome paragon, Sung Yü.[22]
Pair by pair, within the bed curtains, they show themselves to be practiced combatants.
The names of the positions are twenty-four in number;[23]
Each one designed to arouse the lust of the beholder.
Chin-lien, having perused it from beginning to end, was reluctant to let it out of her hands and, turning it over to Ch'un-mei, said, "Put it away safely in my trunk so we can amuse ourselves with it whenever we want to."
"You can look it over for a few days," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but then you'll have to return it to me. This is a prized possession, belonging to someone else that I borrowed to bring home and look at, on condition that I return it to her afterward."
"If it belongs to her, what's it doing in my house?" demanded Chin-lien. "I didn't take it out of her hands. And even if I had, she couldn't get it out of me now."
"It wasn't you who asked her for it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It was I who borrowed it. You crazy little slave. Stop fooling around."
As he spoke, he went after her and tried to wrest the album out of her hand.
"If you try to grab it," said Chin-lien, "I'll go you one better. I'll tear it to shreds and then nobody will be able to enjoy it."
"I guess I'm outmaneuvered," said Hsi-men Ch'ing with a laugh. "Do as you like with it but return it when you're through, that's all. If you give this back to her, she's got another remarkable object I can borrow for you in the future."
"My child, whoever taught you to be so disingenuous?" said Chin-lien. "Bring it here first, and then I'll let you have this album back."
The 2 of them continued their badinage for some time. That evening, in her room, Chin-lien perfumed with incense the mandarin duck quilt, deftly trimmed the silver lamp's wick, Made herself up alluringly, washed her private parts, and, together with Hsi-men Ch'ing, opened up the album inside the bed curtains, preparatory to enjoying the pleasures of connubial bliss. Black magic and sorcery have existed since ancient times. If you look at the way in which Chin-lien, from the time she prevailed upon the blind Stargazer Liu to effect a "turnabout" on her behalf, in no time at all contrived to so complicate the situation that Hsi-men Ch'ing's annoyance and anger were transformed into favour, while he seclusion and disgrace were transmuted to joy with the result that he no longer dared to control her; can the existence of such arts be doubted? Truly, though you may be as devious as any demon, one will drink the water she's washed her feet in. There is a lyric to the tune Partridge Sky that testifies to this:

She remembers that time in the studio when they had just met;
The clouds and rain they enjoyed together were known to only a few.
When evening came, the phoenix and his mate alighted on adjacent pillows;
Left untrimmed, the silver lamp-shed only a half-light.
Thinking of the past, her dreaming soul deluded;
Tonight she is all too happy to enjoy the pleasures of connubial bliss.
Tumbled and tossed like male and female phoenixes, their pleasure knows no bounds.
From this time on, surely, the pair of them will never be separated.

One day, when Ximen Qing went to Wu Yueniang's room, his wife told him that Master Hua had sent a boy to invite him to take wine that day. Ximen looked at the message. It said: "Come and talk with me this afternoon at Wu Yin'er's house. Call for me, and we will go together. I greet you heartily."
He dressed quickly and, summoning two boys to attend him, set off upon a fine horse to call on Master Hua. He was surprised to find that Hua was not at home but Li Ping'er was standing on the steps that led to the inner part of the house. She wore a silken hairnet, with golden earrings set with amethysts, a coat with white trimmings, and an embroidered skirt, beneath which peeped forth a pair of dainty little feet. Ximen had entered hurriedly, and they bumped into one another.
Although he had seen her once before, in the country, he had not paid any particular attention to her but she had made some impression upon him. Now they met face to face. She was pale and clear-skinned, rather short, with a face as oval as a melon seed, long, with two finely arched eyebrows. He was enraptured.
Quickly he went forward and made a reverence to her, and she as quickly returned his greeting. Then she turned and went to the inner court. She sent to him a maid whose name was Xiuchun, a girl who had just grown out of childhood, and told her to ask Ximen to take a seat in the hall. She herself stood at the door of the courtyard, so that only half her charming face was visible.
"Pray sit down for a while, my lord," she said. "My husband has gone out but he will be back in a few moments."
The maid brought Ximen a cup of tea.
"My husband has asked you to take wine with him today," Mistress Hua said, "but please, for my sake, persuade him to come home early. The two boys will be with him, and there will be nobody here but the two maids and myself."
"You have every right to speak as you do," Ximen Qing said. "The claims of a man's household should have his first attention. Since you wish it, we will not only go together but come back together."
At that moment Hua Zixu returned, and his wife retired to her own room. The two men exchanged greetings.
"It was very good of you to come," Hua said. "I had to go out for a moment on business, and I hope you will forgive me for not being here to welcome you."
They sat down in the places appointed for host and guest, and Hua ordered a servant to bring tea. When they had drunk it, he said to the boy: "Ask your mistress to prepare some refreshments for us. I should like to drink some wine with Master Ximen before we go." He turned to Ximen and said, "It is Wu Yin'er's birthday today. That is why I asked you to come and have a little amusement."
"Why didn't you tell me earlier?" Ximen said. He told Daian to go home at once and bring five qian of silver. The servants were setting the table but he said, "Don't let us stay any longer. We might as well take our wine at the bawdy house."
"I will keep you a very short time," Hua Zixu said, "but stay for a minute or two."
In a few moments refreshments were brought, and they drank a few cups of wine together. The cups were of silver with long stems like a sunflower. They ate some little buns, and gave what were left to the servant. When Daian had brought the silver, they went out and, mounting their horses, rode to Wu Yin'er's house to celebrate her birthday. There was singing, dancing, and music, and they were as happy as the flowers in a posy, drinking wine together till the first night watch. Ximen Qing deliberately made Hua very drunk, and then took him home, as Li Ping'er had asked him. The boys called for the gate to be opened, and they helped Master Hua to a chair in the hall. Li Ping'er and one of the maids brought a lamp, and took him to the inner part of the house.
Ximen Qing told her all that had happened, and was going away when she thanked him again.
"My foolish husband," she said, "has very little sense. He is too fond of wine, and I am afraid you must have found him a nuisance. It was out of kindness to me that you brought him back. Please, my lord, do not be too scornful of him."
"Not at all," Ximen said, bowing politely, "it was your desire. How could I do other than set your words in my heart and engrave them on my bones? If I had not brought him back, not only would you have been uneasy but I should have shown myself no gentleman. My brother went to the bawdy house and they tried to keep him there but I made him come home. When we were passing the Hall of the Joyful Star, he saw one of the girls standing outside. She was a very pretty girl and he would have liked to go in but I would not let him. I told him that you were waiting anxiously for his return, and we came on together. If he had stayed there, he would not have come back tonight. Sister-in-law, it is not for me to say that my brother is a fool but you are so young, and this is such a large house to be in. He ought not to leave you here alone at night. It is not right."
"No, indeed," Li Ping'er said. "He is always roaming about and making a fool of himself. I have reproached him till I have made myself quite ill. I do beg of you, my lord, if you meet him at the bawdy house, do, for my sake, persuade him to come home early. I shall always be grateful to you."
There never was a man more clever in the ways of women than Ximen Qing. He had spent many years pursuing them, and there was very little about such matters he did not know. It was perfectly clear to him that the woman was making overtures, and he appreciated the situation admirably. He smiled.
"Sister-in-law," he said, "there is really no need for you to say this. What are friends for? I cannot help feeling that my brother is very much to blame but do not worry about it a moment longer."
Li Ping'er made a reverence to him, and told a maid to bring tea and fruits. Ximen drank the tea. "I must go home now," he said. "I hope you will see that all the doors are shut safely after me." Then he said good-night and went home.
From that day Ximen Qing racked his brains for a plan whereby he might make this woman his own. Several times he got Ying Bojue, Xie Xida, and the others to take Hua to the bawdy house to drink and pass the night but he himself escaped from them and went home. He used to stand outside his own gate, and Li Ping'er, with her two maids, would stand outside hers. When he saw her, he would cough affectedly and walk up and down, or he would stand outside his gate and look towards her. When she saw him, Li Ping'er used to hide inside her gate, and put the door between them but, as soon as he went away, she would put her head out to look after him. They longed for each other in their hearts but showed their feelings only with their eyes.
One day Ximen Qing was standing outside the gate when Xiuchun brought him an invitation.
"Why does your lady invite me?" he said, pretending not to know. "Is your master at home?"
"Master is not at home," the maid said, "but my mistress would like to have a chat with you."
Ximen Qing did not wait for more but set out at once. He went into the hall and sat down. After some time Li Ping'er came to him, made a reverence, and said: "I am extremely grateful for your kindness the other day. Indeed I have engraved it on my heart, for my gratitude is beyond expression. My husband has now been away two days. Perhaps you have seen him?"
"He was at the Zhengs' house yesterday, drinking with a few friends," said Ximen, "but I had some business to attend to and came away. Today I haven't been there, so I don't know whether he is still there or not. If I had been there, I should have considered myself in honour bound to persuade him to come home and not to make you so unhappy."
"He will not do a single thing I ask, and it is almost more than I can bear," Li Ping'er said. "He spends all his time playing with women of that sort and cares nothing at all about his home."
"If it were not for that one failing," Ximen said, "my brother's character would be beyond reproach."
The maid brought tea but Ximen was afraid that Hua Zixu might return, and did not venture to stay very long. Li Ping'er said to him, "Whenever you do see my husband, please beg him to come home, and I shall be eternally grateful to you."

"We are such good friends," Ximen said, "that I should do so without your asking." He went home.
Next day Hua Zixu came back from the bawdy house. "All you care about," his wife said, "is strong wine and strange women. It is a good thing our neighbour, Master Ximen, has more than once taken some interest in our establishment. If you wish to keep his friendship, I should advise you to buy him a present to show your gratitude."
Hua wasted no time but bought four boxes of presents and a jar of wine, and sent a servant with them to Ximen Qing. When he had accepted them and given the boy a present, Yueniang asked: "Why has Hua sent you these things?"
"Some time ago," Ximen said, "Brother Hua asked me to go with him to celebrate the Wu Yin'er's birthday. He got drunk, and I brought him home. Indeed, more than once I have urged him not to stay so late at the bawdy house but to go home early. His lady seemed very grateful, and I imagine she must have told him to send me this present."
Yueniang folded her hands in an attitude of devotion. "I think you might begin by practicing a little self-control yourself. To me this seems a, case of a Buddha made of clay preaching to a Buddha made of mud. Why, there isn't a day when you don't go off to play with some woman or other, and here you are giving pious exhortations to other people's husbands. We can't accept this present without making some return. Whose name is written on the card? If it is Mistress Hua's, I must write and ask her to call. I'm sure she would like to come. If it is his name, you can invite him or not as you please. It is no concern of mine."
"It is Brother Hua's name," Ximen said; "I will ask him to come tomorrow." He sent an invitation to Hua Zixu to come and take wine with him.
"We must not be lacking in politeness," Mistress Hua said, when her husband returned. "We sent him a few small presents and in return he has asked you to take wine with him. Next time, you must get some wine and ask him."
The days passed quickly. It was the Feast of the Ancestral Tombs. Hua Zixu engaged two singing girls and sent to ask Ximen Qing to come and admire the chrysanthemums. He also sent invitations to Ying Bojue, Xie Xida, Zhu Shinian, and Sun Tianhua to come and play at passing the flower while the drums beat. So, in the best of good spirits, they drank their wine.
They drank till the lamps were brought. Then Ximen Qing left the table and went out to wash his hands. Li Ping'er was standing behind a screen peeping in at them. Ximen did not see her until he had almost run into her. She went to a door in the corner and told her maid Xiuchun to go over in the shadow to Ximen Qing and whisper, "My mistress asks you not to drink much wine but to go home early. She has something to tell you tonight."
No message could have been more welcome to Ximen Qing, and though, after washing his hands, he went back to the table, he would not drink. The singing girls pressed wine upon him but he pretended to be drunk and would have no more. It was about the first night watch. Li Ping'er paced up and down on the other side of the screen. She could see Ximen Qing lolling in his chair pretending to be half asleep. Ying Bojue and Xie Xida showed not the slightest intention of leaving, and sat there as if they were nailed to their chairs. Even when Zhu Shinian and Sun Guazui took their leave, the others still did not move, much to Mistress Hua's annoyance. Once Ximen Qing started to leave but Hua Zixu stopped him. "It must be that I have not yet offered you becoming entertainment," he said.
"Really, I'm quite drunk already," Ximen said. "I can't possibly drink any more. He rolled about till Hua sent him home with two boys to assist him.
"I can't think what's wrong with him today," Ying Bojue said. "He won't drink. He has taken very little, yet he's drunk. You have been very kind, and so have these two good little sisters. May I have a large cup? We must drink ever so much more before we think of parting."
At this Li Ping'er, who was on the other side of the screen, secretly cursed them as a set of unprincipled ruffians, and told Tian Xi, one of the boys, to ask her husband to come out and speak to her.
"If you must drink with rascals like these," she said, "get off to the bawdy house at once. Don't stay here making yourselves a nuisance. It is midnight, and you have wasted fire and oil enough. This sort of behavior I will not have."
"You encourage me to go to the bawdy house as late as this?" said Hua Zixu. "Very well. If I can't get back, you mustn't blame me afterwards."
"Run along. I won't blame you."
Hua Zixu was only too pleased to receive such instructions. He went back to the others and said, "Now we will go to the bawdy house."
"Really?" cried Ying Bojue. "Don't try to be funny. You must see what your lady has to say about it first."
"I have spoken to her," Hua said, "and she says I may stay until tomorrow."
"Of course," put in Xie Xida, "Beggar Ying is too clever. Master Hua knows what he is about. Let us go without more ado." With the two singing girls they set off to the bawdy house. The two boys Tian Fu and Tian Xi went with them. It was about the second night watch.
Ximen Qing had gone home, pretending to be drunk. He went to Jinlian's room but, as soon as he had changed his clothes, he went and sat down in the garden. There he waited for a summons from Li Ping'er. Some time passed; he heard the dog being driven out and the gate fastened next door. Then the maid Yingchun climbed up on the wall in a dark place, pretending to call the cat. Seeing Ximen Qing sitting in the arbour, she made a sign to him. He took a bench, mounted it, and got down a ladder that had been placed for him on the other side of the wall.
When Li Ping'er had made sure that her husband had gone, she took off her headdress and allowed the clouds of black hair to fall about her. Dressed simply but still charming, she stood in an arbour. When Ximen came, she was delighted and quickly took him indoors. She had already prepared a table with wine, refreshments of various sorts, and fruit. The lamp was burning brightly. The wine jar was filled with a most fragrant wine, and, taking a jade cup in her hands, she offered it to Ximen Qing and made a most profound reverence.
"I have been anxious to show my gratitude to you for a long time," she said, "but you have given us present after present and put yourself out so much that I feel unbearably embarrassed. Today I have made ready this poor cup of wine and asked you to come so that I may at least give some expression to my feelings. Unfortunately those two shameless rogues stayed on and on, till I grew angry and packed them out of the house."
"I suppose Brother Hua will be coming back," Ximen said.
"He will not come back," the woman replied. "I told him to spend the night somewhere else. Both the boys have gone with him. There are only my two maids here, and old woman Feng who acts as doorkeeper. She is my old nurse and absolutely devoted to me. All the doors have been bolted."
This was all very pleasing to Ximen Qing. They sat as closely together as they could and drank each from the other's cup. Yingchun served the wine, and Xiuchun came in and out to take away the dishes. Under the silken net incense perfumed a coral bridal bed. When they had drunk together long enough, the two maids took away the jar and the dessert, and shut the door. The lovers went to bed to enjoy what pleasure they might.
The houses of wealthy families usually have double windows, the outer of which is called the window proper and the inner the casement. When Li Ping'er sent the maids away, she shut the casement so that, though there were lights in the room, they could not be overlooked from outside. But Yingchun was seventeen years old and not without experience. Realizing that her mistress and Ximen Qing were enjoying their unlawful loves, she quietly went between the windows and made a hole in the paper with a pin, so that she could see all that happened. The lovers accomplished their destiny, and all they did was seen by Yingchun as she stood outside the window.
"May I ask your age?" Ximen said.
"I am twenty-three." Li Ping'er said. "What is your lady's honourable age?"
"She is twenty-six."
"Three years older than I am. I should like to buy a present and call upon her but perhaps she does not care to make friends."
"She is extremely good-natured."
"Does she know you come here?" Li Ping'er said. "What will you say if she asks you questions?"
"She lives well within the house," Ximen said. "My fifth wife, Jinlian, lives in the garden where she has a little house all to herself. But she dare not interfere."
"What is the honourable age of your Fifth Lady?" Li Ping'er said.
"She is the same age as my first wife."
"Good! Unless she considers my poor self too unworthy, I shall be happy to call her Sister. Tomorrow I will ask the size in shoes of your two ladies and make two pairs as a sign of affection." Then she took two golden pins and put them on Ximen's head. "Don't let Hua Zixu see them, if you go to the bawdy house."
Ximen Qing promised. Then they renewed their pleasures together as though they would never part. It was the fifth night watch. Outside the window a cock crew, and the light flooded the eastern sky. Ximen Qing was afraid lest Hua Zixu should take it into his head to come back, so he dressed and climbed back over the wall. Before he went they agreed upon a secret signal. When Hua Zixu was not at home, one of the maids should come to the wall and cough, or throw over a piece of brick, and, if there were nobody about on Ximen's side of the wall, she should climb up and he should get a ladder and come over. So this naughty couple made love over the wall, stealing hours of happiness together. Since they never went around by the gate, the neighbours could not possibly know what was going on.
The moonbeams shine upon the flowers
The water clock seems very slow.
They meet. It seems like Gao Tang's dream.
She takes the silver lamp to light them
In the deep night.
Fearful lest, through the crevices, the light should pass.
When Ximen Qing had climbed over the wall, he went to Jinlian's room. She was in bed.
"Where have you been?" she asked. "You have been away all night and you never told me where you were going."
"Brother Hua sent a boy," Ximen said, "and asked me to go with him to the bawdy house. We drank till the small hours of the morning, and then I was able to get away."
Jinlian suspected him but she pretended to be satisfied. One day, however, when she and Yulou were sewing in the arbour after dinner, a piece of brick suddenly seemed to drop from the skies quite close to them. Yulou was bending down to fasten her shoe and did not see it but Jinlian looked everywhere till at last she saw a pale face at the wall. She could not be certain whose it was. The face appeared once and vanished. Jinlian pulled Yulou by the sleeve.
"Look there! There's the elder of Hua's two maids. She must have been admiring our flowers, and jumped down as soon as she saw that we were here." They thought no more about it.
That evening when Ximen Qing came home from a party, he went to Jinlian's room. She took his clothes and asked if he would like anything to eat but he said no. She offered him tea but he would not drink it. He paced to and fro in the garden, and Jinlian watched him quietly. Soon the maid's face appeared again over the top of the wall. Ximen Qing took a ladder and climbed over to join Li Ping'er, who was waiting for him on the other side. Jinlian went to her room and tossed about on her bed. She did not sleep the whole night through. At daybreak Ximen Qing came back. He opened the door but Jinlian pretended to be asleep and did not speak. Ximen, somewhat embarrassed, went and sat on her bed. Jinlian jumped up and caught him by the ear.
"You fickle scamp!" she cried. "Where have you been? All night long I have been worried about you but now things are so clear that I don't need to ask you for an explanation. The best thing you can do is to tell me the truth at once. What have you been doing with that strumpet who lives next door, and how many times did you do it? Tell me every little thing and I'll forgive you but miss out a single word and tomorrow you shall march in front, and I'll march behind and I'll tell the whole world what you've been up to. You disgraceful rogue, I'll make you so dead you won't need to be buried. You have got a lot of fellows to keep her husband in the bawdy house, while you go and visit her. Very well but I'll show you what's what. No wonder yesterday when Yulou and I were sewing, we saw that maid bobbing up and down over the wall, and in full daylight too. She is playing the part of the devil who runs after lost souls, and enticing you away to that whore. You don't think you can deceive me any longer. Only the day before yesterday that turtle of a fellow fetched you away in the middle of the night to go to the bawdy house. Why! his own house would have done as well."
This was extremely disturbing to Ximen Qing. He knelt down as though to make himself small.
"You funny little oily mouth," he said, smiling. "Don't speak so loud. I won't tell you any lies. She asked me how old you are, and one of these days she is going to find out your size in shoes and make you a pair. She would love to consider you her elder sister."
"I don't want a strumpet like her to consider me a sister, or a brother either for that matter. First she seduces another woman's husband, and then tries to offer some insignificant courtesy in return. I will not have dust thrown in my eyes. Why should I let people play such tricks on me?"
She pulled down Ximen's trousers and perceived that the warrior seemed anything but ready for the strife, though he still wore his silver armor.
"Tell me the truth," she cried, "how many times has this fellow returned to the attack?"
"That is an easy question to answer," Ximen said. "Once was enough for him."
"Will you swear that it was only once?" Jinlian said. "Why should he be so dejected, then? He seems half paralyzed. If he showed the slightest sign of courage, I might credit his master with some manly qualities at least." She stripped the warrior of his armor, and cursed him.
"You abandoned scoundrel. There cannot be another like you in all the world. You take this thing with you on the sly when you go to play with that wicked creature."
"You funny little strumpet," Ximen cried, "you are enough to drive a man crazy. She asked me several times to tell you that she is coming to kowtow to you, and she is going to make you a pair of shoes. Yesterday she sent a maid to find out what size Yueniang takes, and today she has given me this pair of pins, with the character Shou engraved upon them, for you." He removed his hat, took the pins from his hair, and gave them to Jinlian. She examined them. The lucky character was designed in gold upon an emerald ground. They were of very fine workmanship, for they had been made in a royal palace. She was delighted with them.
"Ah well," she said, "if that is how the land lies, I'll say no more about it. Indeed, when you go to call on her, I'll keep a lookout for you on this side, and the pair of you can enjoy yourselves in peace. Now what do you say?"
Ximen Qing was delighted. He took Jinlian in his arms. "You are a darling," he said. "The sort of baby I like is one who knows how to deal with a situation when it arises, as you do, not a miraculous creature who brings forth gold and silver when he performs his natural functions in the privy. Tomorrow I will show what I think about you by buying you a suit of fine embroidered clothes."
"I don't believe that honeyed tongue and that sugary mouth of yours," Jinlian said; "if you want me to help the pair of you, you must promise three things."
"I promise," said Ximen; "ask what you will."
"To begin with, I forbid you the bawdy house. Secondly, when I ask you to do anything, you must do it. And thirdly, every time you go to visit your sweetheart, I must know all that happens; you must not keep a single thing back."
"That will be easy," Ximen said. "I agree to all your conditions."
The next time Ximen Qing went to spend the night with Li Ping'er, he told Jinlian how white and flawless was the body of his lady love, as yielding as the softest down; how amorous her temperament; and how she loved wine. "We took a basket of fruits into the net with us," he said, "and played dominoes and drank wine, before we went to sleep." He took something from his sleeve and handed it to Jinlian.
"Her father-in-law brought this from the palace and, when we had lighted the lamp, we used it as a model of deportment."
Jinlian unfastened the roll of pictures and looked at it from end to end. Twenty-four subjects were painted upon it, and it was most exciting. She decided to keep it. She handed it to Chunmei and said, "Put this away in my chest. No doubt I shall find much to learn from it."
"You may have it for a few days," Ximen Qing said, "but I must have it back again. She thinks a great deal of it, and I only borrowed it to look at. I must return it to her."
"You shouldn't have given it to me, then," Jinlian said. "I didn't steal it from her. You will find it loves me so much it won't leave me."
"Little slave," Ximen cried, "don't be such a tease." He tried to take back the roll.
"If you try to snatch it," Jinlian said, "we will have a snatching match. I'll tear it into shreds and then it will be lost to all of us forever."
Ximen Qing laughed. "Have it your own way. I can't help myself but I beg you to give it back to her when you've done with it. She has something else that is very interesting and, if you let her have this back, I'll ask her to let me show you the other."
"I wonder who trained you in artfulness, young man," Jinlian said. "You'll have this back when you bring me the other." They talked for a long time, and that night Ximen stayed with Jinlian. She perfumed the bed and lighted the silver lamp. She dressed herself with all the skill at her command, performing her most intimate toilet, and they looked at the roll so that they might emulate the lovers who were painted upon it. The wonders of witchcraft have been known to us since the most remote periods of antiquity. Very soon, after the blind Liu had made a spell for Jinlian, her shame was turned to happiness and Ximen's displeasure to favour. He dared refuse her nothing. Though he had all the cunning of a ghost, he was compelled to drink the water in which she washed her feet.

035

Hua Tzu-hsü the Cuckold Succumbs to Chagrin & Loses his Life; Li P'ing-erh invites Seduction & Attends a Party

The message in her eyes and expectation in her heart will brook no further delay;
She is not content merely to fiddle with her hairpin of jade.[1]
When spring blooms on her smiling countenance the flowers look seductive;
At the slightest perturbation of her delicate brows
the willows droop in sorrow.
While blushes suffuse her peachlike cheeks
she dreams of matrimony;
As the chill invades her orchid-scented chamber she longs for togetherness.
If only she could contrive to comply with Ssu-ma Hsiang-ju's wishes;
Without suffering the fate of Cho Wen-chün when she sang the "Song of White Hair."

One day when Wu Yüeh-niang was feeling out of sorts, her sister-in-law, the wife of Wu K'ai, came to pay her a visit and she invited her to stay overnight.
While she was entertaining her visitor in her room, the pageboy, Tai-an, happened to come in, carrying his master's felt bag, and reported, "Father's come home."
Wu K'ai's wife promptly moved over to Li Chiao-erh's quarters in order to get out of the way.
Before long, Hsi-men Ch'ing came in, took off his outer garments, and sat down. Hsiao-yü brought him a cup of tea but he didn't drink it.
Yüeh-niang noticed that he looked rather worried and asked, "Why is it that you've come home so early from your club meeting today?"
"It was Ch'ang Shih-chieh's turn to entertain us today," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but he doesn't have room in his own house, so he invited us to make an excursion to the Temple of Eternal Felicity, at Wu-li Yüan, outside the South Gate. Then Brother Hua the Second invited Brother Ying the Second and several of the rest of us, four or five in all, to join him for a drink at Cheng Ai-hsiang's place in the licensed quarter. Just as we were beginning to enjoy ourselves, all of a sudden, a group of official lictors appeared, and:
Without permitting any further explanation, arrested Brother Hua the Second and took him into custody. This development caught all of us completely off guard, and in my alarm I fled to Li Kuei-chieh's place and hid out for a while. Still uneasy about it, I sent someone to make inquiries.
"It turns out that Hua the Elder, Hua the Third, and Hua the Fourth, from Brother Hua the Second's branch of the old eunuch's family, are suing him for a share of the family property. They have filed a suit in the prefectural yamen at K'ai-feng, the Eastern Capital, and, since the suit has been accepted, the authorities in this district have been ordered to arrest the defendant. It was only after ascertaining the facts that we felt secure enough to break up and come home."
When Yüeh-niang had heard him out, she said, "It serves you right! You've been spending altogether too much of your time hanging around and playing the god with that bunch, without so much as thinking of coming home. All you want to do is fool around outside. It's only appropriate that something like this today should happen before you're ready to call it quits. If you don't give it over now, sooner or later you're going to get involved in a brawl in which they'll drag you off somewhere and:
Pound you into a bloody sheep's head;[3] before you abandon this kind of behavior once and for all.
"When your legitimate wife, at home, gives you her well-meant advice, you seldom pay any attention. But whenever a whore in the licensed quarter says a few words to you, you prick up your donkey's ears and do as she says. Truly:
The words of your family
are wind in your ears;
The words of outsiders
are sutras in letters of gold."
"Who would have the:
Seven heads and eight galls,
to assault me?" scoffed Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"You good-for-nothing," Yüeh-niang responded. "You're given to shooting off your mouth at home all right but if it came to the crunch, you'd be so terrified your tongue would hang out."
As they were talking, who should come in but Tai-an, who reported, "Hua the Second's wife, next door, has sent T'ien-fu to ask Father if he would step over there to have a word with her."
This was just the signal Hsi-men Ch'ing had been waiting for, and he lost no time in starting on his way.
"One of these days," said Yüeh-niang, "if you don't watch out, it's going to be you that gets nabbed."
"It's right next door," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What harm can it do? I'll just go over and see what she has to say."
Thereupon, he went over to Hua Tzu-hsü's place. Li P'ing-erh sent a pageboy to invite him into the rear of the house for a talk. What should he see when he got there but the woman, with her:
Silk tunic in disarray, and
Pale countenance unadorned, coming out of her room, so frightened her face had turned as sallow as wax?
Kneeling down before Hsi-men Ch'ing and making repeated supplications, she said, "Sir, there's no help for it!
If you won't do it for the priest's sake,
do it for the Buddha's.[4]
As the saying goes:
When calamities strike the home,
Neighbours help each other out.
It's all because of my poor husband's refusal to take anyone's advice, coupled with his unwillingness to pay any attention to serious family affairs. He reposes his trust in the people he fools around with outside and stays away from home for days at a time. It's only appropriate that today he should have allowed himself to be taken advantage of and gotten himself into this kind of a fix.
"And now that it's come to the crunch, at this late date, he sends his pageboy to me and wants me to pull strings and get him off the hook. I'm only a woman, after all, about as much good as a legless crab; where does he think I'm going to go to find the strings to pull on his behalf? I get so angry when I think of his refusal to take anyone's advice, I'm tempted to let him be dragged off to the Eastern Capital and beaten to a pulp. It would serve him right. The only thing that deters me is that it would reflect unfavourably on the late old eunuch director's reputation.
"I hadn't any alternative, sir but to ask you to come over and appeal to your generosity. Forget about him! But if you could only find it in you, for my poor sake: if you know of any strings to pull, whatever happens, be good enough to pull one. I just don't want to see him abused, that's all."
When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw the woman kneeling before him, he quickly said, "Sister-in-law, please get up. It's no problem. At first, today, I didn't know what was going on. We were all at the Cheng establishment drinking wine together when a group of official lictors suddenly appeared and carried brother off to the Eastern Capital."
"It's a long story,"
the woman said. "The trouble is being caused by the nephews of my father-in-law, the late eunuch director, who belong to the same collateral branch of the family as the one from which my husband was adopted. The eldest nephew, Hua the Elder, Hua the Third, Hua the Fourth, and my husband are all natural brothers. The eldest is called Hua Tzu-yu, the third is called Hua Tzu-kuang, the fourth is called Hua Tzu-hua, and my husband is called Hua Tzu-hsü. They are all the consanguineous nephews of the old eunuch director.
"Although the old gentleman had succeeded in amassing a tidy fortune for himself, he saw clearly enough that this husband of mine would not amount to anything; so, when he came back from Kwangtung, he put his property into my hands for safekeeping. He even went so far, at times, as to give my husband a regular caning. The other nephews, too, had tasted enough of the stick at his hands not to dare to interfere.
"Last year, when the old gentleman died, Hua the Elder, Hua the Third, and Hua the Fourth were given something in the way of furniture and household effects to take home with them but they didn't receive so much as a candareen's worth of silver. I said at the time, 'We'd better take care of them by giving them a little something.' But this husband of mine spent all his time fooling around on the outside and was unwilling to pay any attention at all to serious matters. Now, today, they've been able to:
Act so quietly not a breath of air escaped,
and he's allowed himself to be undone."
When she had finished speaking, she let herself go and began to weep out loud.
"Don't worry, Sister-in-law," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I was afraid it would be something big. But, as it turns out, it's only a case of members of the same branch of the family suing each other over the division of property. It shouldn't be too difficult to handle. As long as you want me to, I'll:
Treat my brother's affairs as my own, and
Treat my own affairs as my brother's.
No matter what you ask of me, I'll be only too happy to comply."
"If you'll only deign to help out, sir," the woman said, "everything will be fine. I'll need to know, though, how much money will be required in order to pull the necessary strings, so I can get it ready."
"It won't require all that much," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I understand that Prefect Yang, who presides over the prefectural yamen in K'ai-feng, the Eastern Capital, is a protégé of the grand preceptor, Ts'ai Ching. Grand Preceptor Ts'ai, along with my kinsman by marriage at four removes, the commander in chief of the Imperial Guard, Yang Chien, are both people who have the ear of the reigning emperor himself. If these two men can be induced to interest themselves on your behalf, and they both speak to Prefect Yang, he could hardly refuse to comply. No matter how important a matter it might be, that ought to take care of it. Now we will certainly need to make a present to Grand Preceptor Ts'ai but since Commander in Chief Yang is related to me by marriage, he will probably refuse to accept anything."
The woman then went into her room, opened a trunk, and brought out sixty large ingots of silver, weighing fifty taels each, making a total of three thousand taels that she handed over to Hsi-men Ch'ing to expend, both high and low, as he saw fit, in the endeavor to pull the necessary strings.
"Half of that would do," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What need is there to use so much?"
"If there's anything left over, you can keep it for me, sir," the woman said. "Concealed behind my bed there are four lacquer chests decorated with gold tracery that contain python robes, jade-ornamented girdles, jeweled cap buttons, chatelaines, pendants, and bracelets, as well as valuable jewels and objets d'art. If you could take these off my hands at the same time, sir, and keep them over at your place, I could ask for them whenever I need anything. If I don't take precautions ahead of time but leave everything to him, we're going to end up having trouble making ends meet. It's obvious that:
Three fists are no match for four hands.[5]
If we let ourselves be outnumbered, sooner or later they'll get the better of us and make off with the property, and I'll be left in the lurch with nowhere to turn."
"But what will happen when Brother Hua the Second comes home and starts looking for this stuff?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"These are all things," the woman replied, "that the old gentleman, while he was still alive, personally handed over to me for safekeeping. My husband doesn't know a thing about them. You can feel free to take charge of them, sir."
"If that's what you want me to do," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll send someone over to move them as soon as I get home."
Thereupon, he went straight home and consulted with Yüeh-niang about it.
"As for the silver," said Yüeh-niang, "we can send pageboys over to carry it back in food boxes. But if we bring the stuff in the chests in at the front door, we can hardly avoid attracting the attention of the neighbours. The best thing to do is, thus and so; if we hoist it over the wall at night, it will be less conspicuous."
Hsi-men Ch'ing was greatly delighted by this suggestion and immediately dispatched the four servants, Lai-wang, Tai-an, Lai-hsing, and P'ing-an, with two sets of food boxes, to carry the three thousand taels of silver over to his house on their carrying poles. Later that evening, when the moon rose, Li P'ing-erh, on her side, together with her two maidservants, Ying-ch'un and Hsiu-ch'un, by putting a bench on top of a table, managed to hoist the chests up to the top of the wall. Hsi-men Ch'ing, on his side, accompanied only by Yüeh-niang, Chin-lien, and Ch'un-mei, set up a ladder to receive them. They spread a strip of felt over the top of the wall and then hoisted the chests over the top, one at a time, and deposited them in Yüeh-niang's room.
You may well ask:
"Can such things be?"
If you want to get rich,
You've got to take risks.
There is a poem that testifies to this:
Wealth and success are often attained
by strokes of good luck;
Profit and fame, on the other hand,
bring troubles of their own.
If you are destined to attain them,
you will do so in the end;
If you are not destined to attain them,
no amount of effort will avail.[6]
Hsi-men Ch'ing had succeeded in taking into his own possession a considerable quantity of his neighbour's disposable wealth, in the form of gold and silver and other valuables, without the other residents of the neighbourhood being any the wiser. The same day he had the requisite monies packed up, requested a letter of introduction from his son-in-law's family, the Ch'en household, and sent a servant off to deliver them to the Eastern Capital.
Along the way this messenger:
Each morning took to the purple road;
Each evening tramped the red dust;[7] until, one day, he arrived in the Eastern Capital and turned over the letter and presents to the commander in chief of the Imperial Guard, Yang Chien. The latter, in his turn, requested the grand councilor and grand preceptor, Ts'ai Ching, to send a note to Prefect Yang in the prefectural yamen at K'ai-feng.
Now this prefect was named Yang Shih,[8] his courtesy name was Kueishan, and he was a native of Hung-nung district in the province of Shensi. He had passed the chin-shih examination in the year 1103 and had risen to the position of chief minister of the Court of Judicial Review before receiving his current appointment as prefect of K'ai-feng. He was an official of absolute integrity. But the grand preceptor, Ts'ai Ching, had been his examiner in the chin-shih examination and Yang Chien was a favoured and highly placed official, so he could hardly refuse to do the requested favour.
At the same time Hsi-men Ch'ing had also dispatched a letter to Hua Tzu-hsü, informing him of the steps that were being taken on his behalf, and saying, "The officials involved have all been taken care of. When you appear in court and are interrogated about the whereabouts of the inherited property, simply say that all of the money has been spent and that nothing remains but the houses and real estate."
To resume our story, one day Prefect Yang Shih ascended the tribunal, and the functionaries of the six local offices stood in attendance. Behold:
His official conduct is honest and correct:
His actions reveal integrity and intelligence.
He always harbours a compassionate disposition;
He constantly possesses benevolent intentions.
In cases of disputes over the ownership of land,
He distinguishes between the crooked and the straight before taking action.
In instances of mutual contention or affrays,
He weighs the lightness or heaviness of the offense before passing sentence.
In moments of leisure he fingers the zither
or entertains guests;
He also devotes himself to the investigation of the condition of the people.
Despite the fact that he is a presiding official in the capital,
He really is a father and a mother to the people
in his jurisdiction.[9]
That day, Prefect Yang Shih ascended the tribunal and ordered that Hua Tzu-hsü be taken out of the lockup and brought before him. When the parties to the suit had been assembled in the courtroom and knelt down before the dais, the prefect began his interrogation as to the whereabouts of the inherited property.

All Hua Tzu-hsü would say was, "After the death of the old eunuch director, the money was all expended on the funeral and services for the dead. All that remains are two houses and a country estate. As for the furniture and household effects, they have all been divided up among the other members of the family."
"It is difficult to ascertain anything about the property of eunuchs," pronounced Prefect Yang. "It is a case of:
Easy come, easy go.[11]
Since the money has apparently all been spent, I hereby rule that the presiding magistrate of Ch'ing-ho district be ordered to depute functionaries to assess Eunuch Director Hua's two houses and country estate, to sell them off for their market value, to divide up the proceeds among Hua Tzu-yu and the other two plaintiffs, and to report back to me in writing."
Hua Tzu-yu and the others wanted to kneel down before the tribunal and petition the prefect to continue to hold Hua Tzu-hsü in custody until the whereabouts of the missing money could be determined but Prefect Yang angrily rejected their petition, saying, "You rascals are lucky to have escaped a beating. When this eunuch director of yours died, why didn't you bring a suit at that time, instead of waiting until now when:
The affair is over and the circumstances have changed, to kick up such a fuss and waste the paper and brushes required to file a suit?"
Thereupon, without beating Hua Tzu-hsü a single stroke, he signed an order authorizing the return of the defendant to Ch'ing-ho district, and the assessment of the real estate. But no more of this.
No sooner did Hsi-men Ch'ing's retainer, Lai-pao, ascertain the facts about the disposition of the case than he traveled back, post haste, to report to his master. When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard that the prefect, Yang Shih, had proven responsive to pressure and had released Hua Tzu-hsü and allowed him to return home, he was extremely pleased.
Li P'ing-erh invited Hsi-men Ch'ing over to her place to discuss the matter and said to him, "Why don't you get together a few taels of silver and buy the house we're living in? After all, it won't be long now before I'm completely yours."
Hsi-men Ch'ing went home and broached the issue with Wu Yüeh-niang.
"No matter what it's officially assessed at," Yüeh-niang said, "you ought not to enter into an agreement to buy that house. What will you do if her husband should start to suspect something?"
Hsi-men Ch'ing made a mental note of what she had said.
Not many days thereafter, Hua Tzu-hsü arrived home. The district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho deputed Vice Magistrate Yüeh to carry out the assessment, with the following results. The eunuch director's mansion, located on Main Street in An-ch'ing ward, was evaluated at 700 taels of silver. It was sold to a distaff relative of the imperial family named Wang. The country estate outside the South Gate was evaluated at 655 taels of silver. It was sold to the commandant, Chou Hsiu. All that remained was the modest house in which Hua Tzu-hsü was currently residing. It was evaluated at 540 taels of silver but because it was right next door to Hsi-men Ch'ing's property, no one dared to buy it.
Hua Tzu-hsü repeatedly sent people over to make representations but Hsi-men Ch'ing stalled, maintaining that he couldn't afford it, and refused to rise to the bait. The district magistrate was anxious to settle the matter so that he could file the required written report. Li P'ing-erh, in desperation, secretly sent Old Mother Feng over to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place to suggest that he use 540 taels of the silver she had deposited with him to make the purchase. Only then did Hsi-men Ch'ing agree, and the silver was duly weighed out in the presence of the officials. Hua the Elder even signed the paper that formalized the transaction.
That very day the necessary documents were completed and a report was sent up to the higher authorities. The sale of the old eunuch's real estate holdings had produced, in all, a total of 1,895 taels of silver that was evenly divided among the three plaintiffs.
Hua Tzu-hsü had come out of this lawsuit without anything for himself. His money, his houses, and his landed property were all gone. Not a trace remained of the 3,000 taels of silver, in large ingots, that had been stored in his coffers.
In a state of severe perturbation he demanded an accounting of Li P'ing-erh. "How was the silver that you provided to Hsi-men Ch'ing actually spent? And how much of it is left over? After all, we have to come up with the money to buy another house."
The only result of these queries was that he had to endure four or five days of abuse at the hands of his wife.
"Phooey! You muddleheaded troll!" she railed at him. "Day after day you neglected your proper concerns, going out and:
Sleeping among the flowers and lolling
beneath the willows,
without bothering to come home. It only serves you right that someone should have been lying in wait for you and succeeded in luring you into this trap.
"Once you landed in jail, you sent someone to speak to me, urging me to pull strings on your behalf. I'm only a woman, after all. I've scarcely ventured out so far as the front gate.
I may be able to run but I can't fly.[11]
What do I know about such things? Who do I know, anyway, that might be able to pull strings for you?
Even if I were made of iron, how many nails could you get out of me?
I had to run all over the place, saying 'Please sir' and 'I beg you, madam,' before I could find anyone that could be of any use. If you haven't planted any seeds in the past, when the going gets rough, who's going to pay any attention to you?
"Thank goodness, our next-door neighbour, Hsi-men Ch'ing, out of consideration for our former relationship, was willing, despite the coldness of the weather and the ugly winds that were blowing, to send his servant all the way to the Eastern Capital, where he succeeded in bringing this affair of yours to a satisfactory conclusion.
"But now that you've escaped the clutches of the law and find yourself with:
Both feet on level ground again,[12]
what do you do but:
Once your life's been saved, think of money;
Once your wound's been healed, forget the pain,
and come home to demand an accounting of your wife?
"Even if there were anything left over, it wouldn't be yours to fritter away on your own gratification. After all, I've still got the note you sent me. If I didn't have your written authorization, it's not very likely that I'd have laid out your money in order to pull strings for you entirely on my own hook, or have simply handed it over to somebody, is it?"
"Of course I sent you that note," said Hua Tzu-hsü. "But the truth of the matter is I was hoping there would be something left over. We've got to come up with enough money to buy another house and have something to live on before we can worry about anything else."
"Phooey!" his wife exclaimed. "What a nincompoop! I'm just wasting my breath on you. If you'd only paid some attention a little bit earlier, instead of:
Ignoring things when you're flush, and
Starting to worry when you're in the hole!
You may accuse me of spending too much a thousand times, or ten thousand times if you like but where do you suppose those three thousand taels of yours went, anyway? I wouldn't underestimate the appetites of people like the grand preceptor, Ts'ai Ching, or the commander in chief of the Imperial Guard, Yang Chien, if I were you. If they had been offered any less, do you suppose you could have escaped with impunity from your bout with the law, without suffering so much as a lash with a wisp of straw on your cuckold's body, only so you could come home and shoot off your mouth?
"Hsi-men Ch'ing is no connection of yours. You've got no claim on him. And which of your beloved relatives or friends would have been willing to:
Travel north and journey south, or go to such lengths or spend so much money, in order to come to your rescue? When you got home you should have laid on a feast and invited him over to express your appreciation, instead of:
Trying to sweep it all under the rug with a single stroke of the broom;[13] or demanding that everything be accounted for after the fact."
It did not take very many such pointed and derisive speeches to reduce Hua Tzu-hsü to silence.
The next day Hsi-men Ch'ing sent Tai-an over with a gift to Hua Tzu-hsü to help calm his flustered spirits. Hua Tzu-hsü reciprocated by preparing a feast, hiring two singing girls, and extending an invitation to Hsi-men Ch'ing to express his gratitude. He intended to take advantage of the occasion to ask what had become of his money, and he hoped to be able to rely on Hsi-men Ch'ing for the return of several hundred taels of silver that would enable him to buy another house.
Li P'ing-erh did not want this to happen, so she secretly sent Old Mother Feng over to say to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Don't accept this invitation. Provide him with a false account of how the money was spent, claiming that it was all used up in taking care of the officials involved in the case, both high and low."
Hua Tzu-hsü did not catch on but sent his servant over two or three times to press the invitation. Hsi-men Ch'ing actually went so far as to hide out in the licensed quarter, while ordering his servants to report that he was not at home. Hua Tzu-hsü was giddy with rage at this treatment but all he could do was stamp his feet in frustration.
Gentle reader take note: As a rule, when a wife has had a change of heart and no longer sees eye to eye with her husband, even a man with the strength and resolution to chew up nails will find it difficult to defend himself against her secret wiles. It has always been true that:
Man is responsible for what lies outside the household;
Woman is responsible for what lies within it.[14]
Yet, on many occasions a man's reputation is ruined by a woman. Why is this so? It is always because he doesn't know how to handle her. To sum it up in a nutshell, the secret lies in the saying:
The husband sings and the wife follows.[15]
Where:
Beauty and virtue attract each other,
Affinities are mutually compatible,
The man admires the woman, and
The woman admires the man, one can, perhaps, be confident that there will be no problem. But, if the slightest distrust develops between them, it will soon turn into revulsion and hatred. As for the likes of Hua Tzu-hsü, who spent his days in:
Insensate dissipation, and Unrestrained license;
for such a man to hope that his wife would not get other ideas into her head, was futile indeed. Truly:
If one's own resolution is supported,
There is no tempest that can shake it.[16]
There is a poem that testifies to this:
If success and accomplishment could be won by intelligence and effort;
In ancient times Tao Chih[17] would have been made a marquis.
If one's actions are righteous, one is truly deserving of respect;
If one is lustful and uncaring, how can one fail to be ashamed?[18]
The scion of the Hsi-men family was given over to lust and dissipation;
His adulterous and fickle paramour was nothing but a captivating wench.
Hua Tzu-hsü became so engorged with rage
his tender guts gave way;
But another day, in the court of the underworld,
he would be revenged.
To make a long story short, Hua Tzu-hsü could only scrape together 250 taels of silver, with which he bought a house on Lion Street for them to live in. He was already suffering from the ill effects of his rage, and no sooner had they completed their move than he was unfortunate enough to come down with an acute intestinal fever.
He took to his bed early in the eleventh month and was unable to get up again thereafter. Li P'ing-erh responded to his entreaties by calling in Dr. Hu from Main Street but later had to dispense with him in order to save money. From then on it was merely a matter of time.
One day became two,
Two days became three,
until finally, on the last day of the month:
Alas and alack;
He stopped breathing and died.
At the time of his death he was twenty-three years of age. No sooner had he taken to his bed than his eldest servant, T'ien-hsi, absconded with five taels of silver and vanished without leaving a trace.
Once Hua Tzu-hsü was dead, Li P'ing-erh lost no time in sending Old Mother Feng to ask Hsi-men Ch'ing over for a consultation. A casket was purchased, the encoffining ceremony completed, sutras were duly recited, and Hua Tzu-hsü's body was escorted out to the graveyard and buried. Hua the Elder, Hua the Third, and Hua the Fourth, together with their wives, all came to offer their condolences, and after they had returned from accompanying the coffin to its final resting place they went their separate ways.
On the day of the funeral Hsi-men Ch'ing also had Wu Yüeh-niang arrange for a table of food and wine in their name so that they could offer a sacrifice at the graveside of the deceased.
That day, when Li P'ing-erh had returned home in her sedan chair, she procured a spirit tablet for her dead husband and set it up in her room. But, although she went through the motions of keeping vigil for him, all she could think of was Hsi-men Ch'ing. Even while Hua Tzu-hsü was still alive she had encouraged Hsi-men Ch'ing to make free with her two maidservants, and now that he was dead the two families became closer than ever.
Before long it was the ninth day of the first month and Li P'ing-erh had ascertained that it was P'an Chin-lien's birthday. Even though the fifth of the seven weekly commemorations of Hua Tzu-hsü's death had not yet been observed, she bought presents, got into her sedan chair, all dressed up in a white satin jacket over a skirt of blue brocade, with a white hempen snood over her chignon, held in place with a pearl headband, and came to pay a call in honour of Chin-lien's birthday. Old Mother Feng carried her felt bag, and T'ien-fu escorted her sedan chair.
The first thing she did after crossing the threshold was to kowtow to Wu Yüeh-niang four times:
Just as though inserting a taper in its holder, saying as she did so, "The other day at the graveside I'm afraid I provided you with but meager fare. And thank you very much for your lavish present."
After she had paid her respects to Yüeh-niang, she asked to be presented in turn to Li Chiao-erh and Meng Yü-lou. It was only then that P'an Chin-lien came in.
"So this is the Fifth Lady," the visitor exclaimed, as she kowtowed once again, repeating as she did so, "Elder Sister, please accept my salutation."
Chin-lien demurred at first and the two of them dickered politely for a while until they settled the matter by kowtowing to each other. Chin-lien thanked her for her birthday presents. The visitor was also introduced to Wu Yüeh-niang's sister-in-law, the wife of her elder brother, Wu K'ai, and to Chin-lien's mother, Old Mrs. P'an.
Li P'ing-erh then asked to be allowed to pay her respects to Hsi-men Ch'ing but Yüeh-niang told her, "Today he's gone to the Temple of the Jade Emperor outside the Eastern Gate to attend the chiao rites of cosmic renewal[19] in honour of the Jade Emperor's birthday."

She urged her visitor to sit down, and another serving of tea was called for and consumed. After some time had passed, who should come wandering in but Sun Hsüeh-o.
Li P'ing-erh, observing that she was slightly less well dressed than the others, got up and asked, "Who might this lady be? Since I did not know of her, I'm afraid I didn't ask to be presented to her."
"She's just one of my husband's young ladies," said Yüeh-niang.
Li P'ing-erh hastily prepared to kowtow to her but Yüeh-niang intervened, saying, "There's no need for you to go to all that trouble. A bow to each other will be quite sufficient."
When the two of them had finished saluting each other as directed, Yüeh-niang invited Li P'ing-erh into her own room to change her clothes and instructed a maidservant to set up a table in the parlour and serve tea.
Before long wine was brought in, and they:
Drew round the newly replenished brazier, and
Decanted the finest Yang-kao[20] vintage.
Thereupon, Wu K'ai's wife, Old Mrs. P'an, and Li P'ing-erh, took the seats of honour, Yüeh-niang and Li Chiao-erh assumed the role of hosts, Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien sat to one side, and Sun Hsüeh-o, not daring to presume on their company for too long, went back to look after things in the kitchen.
Yüeh-niang, observing that Li P'ing-erh never refused a drink, served a round of wine herself and then directed Li Chiao-erh and the others each to serve a round in turn.
They joshed with their guest freely, saying, "Mrs. Hua, you've moved so far away that we sisters must:
Spend more time apart than together.[21]
You no longer give us a thought. It would really be too cruel of you if you don't promise to visit us again."
"If it hadn't been for P'an the Sixth's birthday," said Meng Yü-lou, "you wouldn't even have come to see us today."
"My dear First Lady, and Third Lady," said Li P'ing-erh, "thanks to the kindness all of you have shown me, I've wanted to come and pay you a visit for a long time. But, on the one hand, I'm still in mourning, and on the other hand, after my poor husband's death, there's been no one to look after the place. In fact, I've hardly observed my husband's fifth weekly commemoration yet. If I hadn't been afraid of offending the Fifth Lady, I wouldn't have ventured to come today."
She then went on to ask, "First Lady, when does your birthday come?"
"It's a bit early yet for my birthday," said Yüeh-niang.
"The First Lady's birthday," said P'an Chin-lien, taking over the conversational lead, "is on the fifteenth day of the eighth month. I hope, whatever happens, you'll be able to come visit us then."
"Needless to say," said Li P'ing-erh, "I'll be sure to come."
"Now that you're here," said Meng Yü-lou, "why don't you give us the pleasure of your company by making a night of it, and not bothering to go home?"
"I really would welcome the chance to have a good talk with all of you," said Li P'ing-erh. "To tell you the truth, I find myself living in reduced circumstances, a newcomer to the neighbourhood, and ever since my poor husband died, there's been no one to look after the place. The back wall of my house abuts on the garden of that distaff relative of the imperial family named Ch'iao. It's as desolate as can be, and at night there are often fox spirits about:
Pitching bricks and tossing tiles,[22] and I'm afraid. We used to have two pageboys but the eldest of them has run away. T'ien-fu, here, looks after the front gate but the back of the house is completely deserted. I'm entirely dependent on Old Feng. She's been with me a long time, and she often comes over to do the laundry and help the maidservants make shoes. I'm really beholden to her."
"How old is Mother Feng?" asked Yüeh-niang. "She certainly looks like a good, dependable body. I've never even heard her raise her voice."
"She's fifty-five years old this year," said Li P'ing-erh. "She was born in the year of the dog. She has no children of her own, either male or female, and depends on matchmaking for her living. I supply her with clothes from time to time. Ever since the recent death of my poor husband I've asked her to come over and keep me company. At night she sleeps on the same k'ang with the maidservants."
"There you are," said P'an Chin-lien, who was always quick on the uptake, "as long as you've got Old Feng to look after the house for you, you might just as well spend the night here. After all, since Mr. Hua is dead, there's no longer anyone to tell you what to do."
"If you'll do as I say," said Meng Yü-lou, "you'll send Old Feng home with the sedan chair and forget about going yourself."
Li P'ing-erh only smiled, without uttering a sound.
As they were talking:
Several rounds of wine had been consumed.
Old Mrs. P'an was the first to get up and make her way toward the front of the compound. P'an Chin-lien then followed in her mother's wake and went off to her own quarters.
"I've already had enough wine," Li P'ing-erh kept insisting, as she refused to accept any more but Li Chiao-erh said, "How is it that you've been willing enough to drink at the hands of the First Lady and the Third Lady but when I offer you wine, you refuse to drink any? It's really too discriminatory."
Thereupon, she picked up a larger cup and proceeded to fill it.
"My dear Second Lady," protested Li P'ing-erh, "I really can't manage any more. I'm not just pretending."
"After you've finished this cup," said Yüeh-niang, "you can rest awhile."
Only then did Li P'ing-erh accept the proffered cup and put it down in front of her while she continued to engage them in animated conversation.
Meng Yü-lou, noticing that Ch'un-mei was standing to one side, asked her, "What's your mother doing up front, anyway? You go up there and invite both your mother and Old Mrs. P'an to come back here. Tell them that the First Lady invites them back to help her keep Mrs. Hua company while she drinks wine."
Ch'un-mei had not been gone for long when she returned and said, "Old Mrs. P'an is not feeling well and has gone to bed. Mother is in her room putting on her makeup. She'll be here any minute."
"I've never seen anything like it," said Yüeh-niang. "After all, you're one of the hostesses, and yet, before anyone even knows what you're up to, you abandon your guest and run off to your own room. I don't know how many times a day this sister of mine has to redo her face. Whenever she feels like it she runs off to do it again. She's fine enough in other respects but about this one thing she's still rather childish."
While she was still speaking, who should appear but P'an Chin-lien. She was wearing a saffron-coloured jacket of Lu-chou silk that opened down the middle and was decorated with a motif of wild geese holding bulrushes in their mouths. It had a stiff-standing white satin collar with purfled edging and gilt buttons that depicted honeybees rifling chrysanthemum blossoms. Beneath this she wore a drawnwork skirt with a foot-wide, gold-spangled border representing sea horses sporting in the waves, shoes of scarlet silk with high white satin heels, and figured ankle leggings. She also sported pendant onyx earrings and a pearl headband. In fact, she was dressed identically with Meng Yü-lou. Yüeh-niang, on the other hand, had on a scarlet silk jacket, a plain blue satin cloak, and a skirt of sand-green pongee, while on her head she wore a fret over her chignon, enclosed in a sable toque.
Meng Yü-lou was the first of the party to catch sight of Chin-lien as she made a conspicuous entrance:
Heavily made up and richly attired, with a gold pin in the shape of the character for long life carelessly stuck in the hair over her temple.
She proceeded to josh her, saying, "A fine wench you are, Slavey Five. You're the one who was you know what 'under a lucky star'[23] this very day, yet you've abandoned your guest and run off to hide in your room. And you call yourself a human being!"
Chin-lien laughed loudly and gave her a playful slap.
"You're a pretty nervy wench, Slavey Five," exclaimed Yü-lou. "It's your turn to offer our guest a drink."
"I've already had more than a little at the hands of the Third Lady," said Li P'ing-erh. "I've reached my limit."
"What you had to suffer at her hands is her business," said Chin-lien. "I, too, make bold to offer you a cup."
Thereupon, she tucked up her sleeves, filled a large cup to the brim, and presented it to Li P'ing-erh, who merely allowed it to sit in front of her, without venturing to take a drink.
Yüeh-niang, who had withdrawn into the master suite with her sister-in-law, Wu K'ai's wife, came out and saw that Chin-lien had sat down to help entertain Li P'ing-erh.
"Why doesn't Old Mrs. P'an come out and provide some company for our guest?" she asked.
"My mother isn't feeling well," replied Chin-lien. "She's stretched out in my room, and even if you send for her, she won't come."
Yüeh-niang caught sight of one of the pins in the shape of the character for long life that was visible in the hair over Chin-lien's temple and asked Li P'ing-erh, "Where was this pair of pins that you gave Sister Six made? They're really very fine. In the future I'd like to get them reproduced so we could each have a pair to wear."
"If you'd like some, First Lady, I still have a few more of them at home," said Li P'ing-erh. "One day soon I'll send over an additional pair for each of you. They are made to imperial specifications and were smuggled out of the palace by the old eunuch, my late father-in-law. Workmanship of this kind is not to be found on the outside."
"I was only having a little joke at your expense," said Yüeh-niang. "There are such a lot of us, you could scarcely be expected to have that many to give away."
As the group of womenfolk continued to drink and amuse themselves, the sun was gradually sinking in the west. Old Mother Feng, who had been plied with wine in Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters at the rear of the compound, came out with a very red face and urged Li P'ing-erh to make up her mind either to leave or, if not, to send the sedan chair back home.
"Don't go," said Yüeh-niang to her guest. "Just tell Old Feng to go home with the sedan chair."
Li P'ing-erh merely said, "There's no one to look after the place. I'll come again sometime soon to pay my respects to all of you. There'll be time enough for me to stay the night another day."
"Why be so insistent on having your own way?" said Meng Yü-lou. "It looks as though none of us carries much weight with you but if you won't send the sedan chair off, just wait until Father comes home in a little while; you can be sure he'll try to persuade you to stay, too."
This argument had the effect of overcoming Li P'ing-erh's objections. Taking out the keys to the house, she handed them to Old Mother Feng, saying, "Since all these ladies are so insistent on my staying, if I were to refuse, it would only show that:
I didn't know a favour when I saw one.
You can dismiss the sedan chair for today but tell the bearers to come back for me tomorrow. When you and the pageboy get home, be careful not to let anyone into the house."
She also called Old Mother Feng over to her and:
Whispered into her ear in a low voice,
"Tell my head maid, Ying-ch'un, to get the keys to the trunk in my bedroom and take four pairs of pins in the shape of the character for long life out of the small jewelry box with the gold tracery on it. Bring these to me first thing tomorrow morning. I want to give them to the four ladies here."
When Old Mother Feng had received her instructions she took formal leave of Yüeh-niang.
"Have something to drink before you go," Yüeh-niang said.
"I've had both food and wine just now in the quarters of the young lady at the rear of the compound," said Old Mother Feng. "I'll be back first thing tomorrow morning."
Whereupon, with:
A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude,
she made her exit. But no more of this.
Shortly thereafter, when Li P'ing-erh refused to have anything more to drink, Yüeh-niang invited her into the master suite to have some tea with her sister-in-law.
All of a sudden, who should come in but the pageboy, Tai-an, carrying his master's felt bag. Hsi-men Ch'ing had come home, and his first words upon lifting aside the portiere and entering the room were, "So Mrs. Hua is here."
Li P'ing-erh jumped hastily to her feet and the two of them exchanged salutations, after which she sat back down again. Yüeh-niang called Yü-hsiao to help Hsi-men Ch'ing off with his things.
Turning to Wu K'ai's wife and Li P'ing-erh, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Today I've been attending the chiao rites of cosmic renewal in celebration of the birthday of the Jade Emperor at his temple outside the Eastern Gate. It was my turn to preside this year. Otherwise, I would have come home after the vegetarian feast at noon. As a consequence I had to join the others in going over the accounts in Abbot Wu's room and, what with one thing and another, have been tied up all this time."
He then went on to ask, "I take it that Mrs. Hua is not going to go home today?"
"She kept refusing our invitations and proposing to leave," said Meng Yü-lou, "until, by combining our efforts, we carried the day by main force."
"There's no one to look after the place," said Li P'ing-erh. "I can't help worrying about it."
"Don't talk such rot!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The night patrols have been very strict recently. What is there to be afraid of anyway?
If the wind so much as stirs a blade of grass, all I'd have to do is send a note to Commandant Chou Hsiu and he'd:
Act upon it even in defiance of the law.[24]
"Why have you been neglecting Mrs. Hua so?" he added. "Has she been given anything to drink, or hasn't she?"
"All of us have been trying our hands at persuading her," said Meng Yü-lou, "but she affects an inability to drink."
"You're not up to the task," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Let me give it a try. She's got no mean capacity."
Although Li P'ing-erh said the words, "I can't handle any more," she made no effort to withdraw.
Thereupon, the maidservants were instructed to reset the table and an elaborate spread of meat and vegetable dishes, along with other dainties of every kind that had been prepared in anticipation of Hsi-men Ch'ing's return, was laid before them. Sister-in-law Wu, sensing that the time had come to take flight, asserted that she did not wish to have any more wine and withdrew to Li Chiao-erh's quarters to get out of the way.
Thereupon, Li P'ing-erh was seated in the place of honour, Hsi-men Ch'ing drew up a chair across from her and assumed the role of host, Wu Yüeh-niang sat on the k'ang with her feet on the frame of the brazier, and Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien sat down at the other two sides of the table. As soon as the five of them had taken their places they started to decant the wine. They didn't use small cups either but called for large goblets of chased silver.
It was a case of:
First a cup for you,
Then a cup for me.
As the saying goes:
Romantic affairs are consummated over tea, and
Wine is the go-between of lust.
As the cups passed back and forth, the woman continued to drink until:
Her painted eyebrows drooped low, and
Amorous glances escaped the corners of her eyes.
Truly:
A pair of peach blossoms bloomed upon her cheeks,[25]
Her brows and eyes proclaiming her a wanton wench.
When Yüeh-niang saw that the two of them were:
As stuck on one another as sugar candy,[26]
and that:
The conversation was becoming rather risqué,[27]
she found it so offensive that she withdrew to her own room and sent for her sister-in-law to keep her company, leaving the other three to entertain their guest.
They continued drinking until the third watch. By that time Li P'ing-erh's:

Starry eyes were all a blur.
Hardly able to stand on her own legs, she asked Chin-lien to accompany her to the bathroom in the rear of the compound.
Hsi-men Ch'ing, too, was:
Swaying to the east and tumbling to the west,
as he went into Yüeh-niang's room to ask her where they should put their guest for the night.
"Let her sleep in the room of the one whose birthday she came to celebrate," said Yüeh-niang.
"Where shall I spend the night, then?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"Spend the night wherever you like," said Yüeh-niang. "Or, better yet, go spend it with her if you want."
"Whoever heard of such a thing?" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing, and he called for Hsiao-yü to help him off with his clothes. "I'll sleep in here tonight, then."
"Don't be so delirious," said Yüeh-niang. "Or do you want to provoke me into a real tirade? If you stay here, where do you suppose my sister-in-law is going to sleep?"
"Enough! Enough!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll go and sleep with Meng the Third." Whereupon, he went off to Yü-lou's quarters to spend the night.
After she had accompanied Li P'ing-erh to the bathroom, P'an Chin-lien took her up to her own quarters in the front part of the compound, and that night she shared a bed with Old Mrs. P'an.
The next morning Li P'ing-erh got up and was combing her hair in front of the mirror when Ch'un-mei brought her some hot water to wash her face and helped her with her toilet. She noticed how clever Ch'un-mei was and, knowing that she was a maidservant who had enjoyed Hsi-men Ch'ing's sexual favours, she made her a present of a gold chatelaine with three pendant charms in the shape of three miniature toilet articles.
Ch'un-mei immediately reported this gift to her mistress and Chin-lien was profuse in her thanks, saying, "I've put you to the additional expense of being so generous to her."
"You really are lucky, Fifth Lady, to have such a fine maid," said Li P'ing-erh.
That morning Chin-lien had Ch'un-mei open the gate to the garden and took Li P'ing-erh and Old Mrs. P'an on an extended tour of the entire premises.
Li P'ing-erh noticed that a gate had been opened in the wall that had formerly separated Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence from hers, and asked, "When is Father Hsi-men going to start construction on the new building?"
"Recently he had the yin-yang master come over to give him an appraisal," said Chin-lien. "He's planning to:
Break ground and start construction,
Put it up and top it off, in the second month. He's going to tear down your old house and combine the two pieces of property into one, erect an artificial hill and a summer-house in the front, and make a large garden out of it. Then he's planning to build another three-room belvedere, to be called the Flower-viewing Tower that will be lined up with my own to form one boundary of the grounds."
Li P'ing-erh made a mental note of everything she was told.
While the two of them were still talking together, Yüeh-niang sent Hsiao-yü to invite them back to the rear of the compound for some tea. The three of them then made their way to the master suite where they found Wu Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, and Meng Yü-lou keeping Sister-in-law Wu company as they waited for them, with the tea things already laid out.
Just as everyone was enjoying the tea and the snacks that accompanied it, who should suddenly appear but Old Mother Feng. When they had offered her a seat and served her some tea, Old Mother Feng pulled an old kerchief out of her sleeve, in which the four pairs of pins in the shape of the character for long life were wrapped, and handed it to Li P'ing-erh. No sooner had she accepted them than she presented one pair to Yüeh-niang, and afterward, a pair each to Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and Sun Hsüeh-o.
"These must have cost you a pretty penny," said Yüeh-niang. "This will never do."
"My dear First Lady," laughed Li P'ing-erh, "It's not as though they were genuine rarities. I'm only offering them to you to give away to someone if you like."
Yüeh-niang and the others bowed in gratitude before venturing to stick the pins in their hair.
"I hear that your front door opens right on the Lantern Market," said Yüeh-niang. "It must be quite exciting. If we go for a look at the lanterns someday soon, we'll come pay you a visit. Pray don't pretend you're not at home."
"Let me extend an invitation to all of you ladies for that day," said Li P'ing-erh.
"You may not know it, elder sister," said Chin-lien, "but I've heard that the fifteenth is actually our guest's birthday."
"That settles it," said Yüeh-niang. "If it's really your birthday, every last one of us will come to wish you many happy returns."
"My humble abode is scarcely fit to accommodate a snail," laughed Li P'ing-erh, "but if you ladies deign to visit me, consider yourselves invited."
It was not long before they finished their morning repast, after which wine was served and they fell to drinking again. The time passed swiftly as they enjoyed each other's company until the sun began to sink in the west and the sedan chair came back to pick her up. Li P'ing-erh said her farewells and her sorority of hostesses could not persuade her to stay any longer. Before leaving, she asked if she might be permitted to say goodbye to Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He had to get up early this morning," said Yüeh-niang, "and go outside the city gate to see off the district vice-magistrate." Only then, with 1000 thanks and 10000 expressions of gratitude, did Li P'ing-erh get into her sedan chair and go home. Truly, the coupled halves of the peach stone serve to evoke a chuckle; because inside, it will be found, lie yet another couple.

One day, Wu Yueniang was not feeling well, and her brother's wife came to see her. Yueniang pressed her to stay a few days, and they were sitting together in her room when Ping'an came to announce his master's return. Mistress Wu went to Li Jiao'er's room.
Ximen Qing came in, took off his cloak, and sat down. Xiaoyu brought tea but he did not drink it, and his wife noticed that he was very pale.
"Why have you come back so early?" she said.
"It was Brother Chang's turn today," he replied, "but his house is not very large, and he asked us to go to the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the city. Brother Hua and Brother Ying—there were four or five of us in all—went to the Zhengs' bawdy house for some wine. We were enjoying ourselves when several constables appeared. Without a word they seized Hua and took him off with them. This scared us all. I went to Guijie's house, and hid there for a long time. I was so worried that I sent a man to find out what had happened. It seems that Hua's brothers have some grievance about the disposal of the family property. They made complaint at the Eastern Capital, and the courts have sent an order for Hua's arrest. When I had heard this, I didn't worry so much, and the rest of us came back."
"The best thing you could do," Yueniang said. "You have been going with those scamps day after day, gadding about and neglecting your home. Now, you see, there has been trouble. After this, I trust you will break with them completely. If you don't, you will find yourself involved in squabbles and disasters, and you will end by being beaten till you look like a rotten sheep's head. You will never believe what I tell you and stop this unbecoming manner of life but the whores in the bawdy house can tell you any old story and you'll listen to them with your donkey's ears. You are the kind of man who lets the advice of his own people go in at one ear and out at the other, and treats everything outsiders tell him as if it were written in the golden characters of a sacred book."
"Who do you imagine would have courage enough to strike me?" Ximen said, laughing.
"Oh, you are a splendid braggart by your own fireside," Yueniang said.
Daian came in. "Our neighbour, Mistress Hua, has sent her boy to ask Father to go and talk to her."
Ximen Qing tried to escape as quietly as he could.
"Aren't you afraid people will talk about you?" Yueniang said.
"We are only neighbours. There's nothing in it. I must go and see what she has to say." He went to Hua's house.
Li Ping'er had given instructions that he was to be taken at once to the inner part of the house, and there Ximen Qing found her, wearing a silken gown. She looked disheveled and weary, and her face was as pale as wax. She came and knelt down before him.
"My lord," she said, "the priest may be nothing to you but I pray you consider the glory of Buddha. There is an old maxim that when disaster overtakes a household, neighbours should do what they can to help. My husband has never paid any attention to me; he has never troubled in the least about domestic affairs but has always gone elsewhere and played the fool. Now he has got into serious trouble and is in a difficulty, he sends one of the servants to say that I must get him out of it. I am a woman, and no more use than a crab without feet. How am I to find anybody who will take the trouble to do anything for him? When I realize how he has always refused to listen to me, I can't help thinking that it serves him right even if he is sent to the Eastern Capital and beaten till he rots. But my father-in-law's memory must be considered, and this would bring disgrace upon him. I feel bound to ask you to help me to persuade the officials not to send him there. Think of my poor face, and plead for him. I should not like him to suffer hardship."
Ximen Qing saw her kneeling before him and asked her to get up. "It can't be anything very serious," he said, "but so far I don't know what the trouble is."
"It will take some explanation," Li Ping'er said.
"My late father-in-law had four nephews. Ziyu was the eldest, Ziguang the third, and Zihua the fourth. My husband was the second. They are all blood relations. My father-in-law was very wealthy but he knew that my husband was a fool and, when he came back from Guangnan, gave everything into my charge. The other three had all annoyed him in some way, and never dared to visit the old man. Last year, my father-in-law died. The other brothers divided between them a good deal of the furniture and some of the beds and curtains but they got none of the money. I told my husband several times that he should give them something but he would do nothing at all in the matter. Now, he has got himself into a hopeless situation, and the others have the whip hand." She burst into tears.
"Sister," Ximen Qing said, "don't distress yourself about it any more. I was under the impression that the matter was really serious but it is only a family squabble. You have told me what you wish, and I will give my brother's business as much attention as if it were my own. Tell me what you wish me to do and I will do it."
"My lord," Li Ping'er said, "if you are really willing to undertake this, I could wish for nothing better. Tell me how much you will need for presents, and I will get it ready for you at once."
"Not very much," Ximen said. "I believe the Governor of Kaifengfu is a ward of the Imperial Tutor Cai. Both Cai and my relative, Marshal Yang, have a certain influence with his Majesty. If we send two presents and get those gentlemen to speak to Governor Yang, I don't think he will refuse anything they ask, no matter how serious the case may be. We must send a present to the Imperial Tutor but, as Marshal Yang is a relative of mine, he can hardly accept a present from me."
Li Ping'er went to her room and took from a chest sixty large bars of silver each worth fifty taels. She gave them to Ximen Qing. The total value was three thousand taels of silver.
"Half of this will be enough," Ximen said. "Why do you give me so much?"
"Keep anything that is left for me," Li Ping'er said. "There are four chests behind my bed, full of the finest embroidered ceremonial clothes, jade girdles, and so on, without mentioning cap buttons, jewelry, and things of that sort. They are worth a great deal of money. Will you look after them for me and keep them in your house, so that when I want anything I can ask you for it? I feel very unsafe with all this stuff here. If anybody should come and take it away from me, I should be in a desperate fix."
"But what will you say when Brother Hua comes back and asks questions?" Ximen said.
"My father-in-law gave me all these things secretly," Li Ping'er said. "My husband knows nothing about them. You can take them without hesitation."
"I must go and see what my wife says," Ximen Qing said. "When I get home, I will send somebody for them." He went home to discuss the matter with Yueniang.
"We can tell the boys to take food boxes for the silver," she said, "but the chests and big things we must bring over the wall when it is dark. Then we shall be sure that the matter is kept secret; for, if we bring the stuff around by the gate, everybody in the neighbourhood will know what is happening."
Ximen Qing thought this an excellent plan. He told Daian, Laiwang, Laixing and Ping'an to take two food boxes and bring the three thousand taels of silver. That evening, when the moon had risen, Li Ping'er and her two maids, Yingchun and Xiuchun, brought benches to the wall and lifted up the chests. On Ximen's side, Yueniang, Jinlian, and Chunmei set up a ladder and put a blanket on the top of the wall to receive the various articles one by one. Everything was taken to Yueniang's room.
In this manner Ximen Qing got into possession of many fine and delicate things, both gold and silver, while his neighbours had not the faintest inkling of what was afoot. He quickly prepared several loads of presents, and, after getting someone to write a letter to go with them, sent Laibao to the Eastern Capital. He was to ask Marshal Yang to send the presents to the Imperial Tutor, asking him to communicate with Governor Yang of Kaifengfu.
The Governor's name was Yang Shi, and he was also known as Guishan. Born at Hongnong in Shaanxi, he had obtained the third literary degree in the period of Guiwei. He had formerly been an official at Dalisi, and had been promoted to his present position at the Eastern Capital. He was an honest and fair-dealing official but the Imperial Tutor had been his guardian, and Marshal Yang was in high favour at the palace, so he could not but fall in with their wishes.
When the presents arrived, the Governor went into his hall and, bringing Hua Zixu and the others from prison, questioned them about their property. Hua Zixu had received a message from Ximen Qing, so he knew how matters stood.
"When my worthy ancestor departed this life," he said to the Governor, "I spent what money there was upon his funeral expenses and the reading of the Buddhist sutras. There was nothing else beyond a parcel of land and a couple of houses. The furniture has already been distributed among the members of the family."
"It is never possible," the Governor said, "to be quite certain about the amount of a chamberlain's wealth. It comes easily but it goes easily too. If you have spent all you had, I will send instructions to the magistrate at Qinghe to put up for sale your two houses and the parcel of land, and to share the proceeds between Ziyu and the others."
Hua Ziyu pleaded that his brother should be made to hand over to them all his property but the request irritated the Governor. "You seem to be asking for trouble," he said. "When the chamberlain died, you made no complaint. Why are you trying to rake up matters that are over and done with?"
Hua Zixu escaped without the chastisement he had anticipated. The Governor sent a document to Qinghe, ordering the officials there to make a valuation of the houses and land, and dispose of them.
As soon as Laibao had heard the decision, he traveled posthaste to give the news to Ximen Qing, who was delighted to hear that Hua Zixu was free and on his way back. Li Ping'er sent for him to talk over the situation, and suggested that he should take some of her money and buy the house. "I shall be yours entirely then," she said. Ximen again went home to discuss the matter with Yueniang.
"I don't see how her husband can fail to have his suspicions," Yueniang said, "if he finds that you intend to buy his house. How do you propose to manage it?"
Ximen Qing considered what she said but he did not answer.
In a few days Hua Zixu returned, and the magistrate of Qinghe appointed his deputy to make an inventory of the old chamberlain's estate. One house in the Street of Peace and Good Fortune was sold to the princely family of Wang for seven hundred taels, and the land by the South Gate to Major Zhou for six hundred and fifty-five taels. The house in which Hua Zixu had been living was valued at five hundred and forty taels but nobody made an offer for it, because it was so near to Ximen Qing's house. More than once, Hua Zixu sent a messenger to ask Ximen to buy it but he always said he had no money and didn't care to pass the transaction through his accounts. Meanwhile, seeing that the local authorities seemed anxious to get the matter over and done with, Li Ping'er grew more and more anxious, and secretly sent old woman Feng to Ximen to beg him to take five hundred and forty taels from the money that she had left in his care. Finally Ximen consented, and paid the money to the officials. Hua Zixu hurriedly signed all the documents, and his three brothers divided the eighteen hundred and ninety-five taels between them.
Hua Zixu was at last clear of the law but he had not a penny to bless himself with, and both houses and land had been taken from him. The large bars of silver, amounting to three thousand taels that he had had in his two chests, seemed to have completely vanished, a circumstance that he found exceedingly annoying and disturbing. He wished Li Ping'er to ask Ximen how much had been spent on his behalf and what was left, so that he could buy a house with the remainder but the only reply he got from his wife was ill humor for several days.
"You idiot," she cried, "you have never paid the slightest attention to your own affairs; you have spent all your time chasing after women, and as a result you found yourself in a hole and were thrown into jail. You then condescended to ask me to find somebody to help you. I am not a woman given to gadding about. What do I know about matters of this sort? Whom do I know and where should I have found anybody to do anything for you? I am a creature of such insignificance that, if my body were made of iron, very few nails could be made out of me. All I could do was to go around like a baby, appealing for help, and, fortunately for you, Master Ximen remembered that you had once been his friend, and when things looked cold and bleak for you, sent his servant to the Eastern Capital to get everything settled for you. It was exceedingly kind and thoughtful of him. Now you are out of the mess and your feet are once more on dry land, you begin to think about money, though your life has only just been given back to you. As soon as your troubles are over, you forget all you have gone through, come back to rake up a business that has already been done with, and want to know whether there is any money left.
"Here is a letter from you, written in your own hand. Without this authority I should never have dared to spend your money on getting assistance for you. I am not so bold that I would steal your money and give it away."
"Although I said so in my letter," Hua Zixu said, "I did hope to keep a little something, sufficient, at least, to buy a house to live in."
"Pah, you dirty fool!" Li Ping'er cried, "you ought to have thought about that before. When you had money, you never gave it a thought; but it seems a very different matter now. You keep on saying that I have spent too much money. What was three thousand taels? Do you imagine that the Imperial Tutor Cai and Marshal Yang are so moderate in their desires? If I hadn't sent them a handsome present, do you think they would have attended to the matter so effectively that you never even felt the weight of a straw on your turtle's body but got off scot-free? And you are proud of the fact! You have no influence with them. You are no relative of theirs that they should trouble to be kind to you. Unless it was for something worthwhile, why should they go tearing about to save your skin? Yet you come home, and instead of preparing a banquet and showing your gratitude by entertaining Ximen Qing, you brush everybody on one side and only think about reopening the whole business."
This was like a blow in the face to Hua Zixu. He said no more. Next day Ximen Qing sent Daian with a present to console him in his distress. In return he prepared wine, and invited Ximen Qing, hoping that he might get an opportunity to ask him about the money. As a matter of fact, Ximen would gladly have sent him a few hundred taels to buy a house with but Li Ping'er would not hear of it. She sent old woman Feng to tell him not to come, and to send her husband a falsified account, making it appear that all the money had been spent.
Hua Zixu had not brains enough to see through the trick. He sent repeated invitations to Ximen Qing. But Ximen went off to the bawdy house, and told his servants to say that he was not at home whenever a message came for him. This so upset Hua Zixu that he almost fainted, yet he could do nothing but stamp his feet with impatience.
Readers, if a woman once ceases to love her husband and becomes unfaithful to him, he will never be able to find out her secrets, though he have strength enough to bite through iron. It is traditionally a man's duty to attend to matters outside the household and a woman's to govern within it but over and over again a man's good repute has been brought to nothing by his wife. Why is this? It is because he has not treated his wife as the Sacred Principle requires. The relations between husband and wife should be based upon a generosity of spirit that gives rise to mutual understanding and brings their feelings into complete accord. When this is the case, the husband sets the tune and the wife follows; there is no reason to anticipate trouble. Hua Zixu lost his head and was blown hither and thither by every wind; he had no ideas at all about the management of a household. This being so, it could hardly be expected that he would exercise any control over his wife's doings.
Soon after this Hua Zixu succeeded in borrowing two hundred and fifty taels of silver and bought a house in Lion Street. But he was still smarting beneath a load of anger, and had not long been in his new house before he fell ill of a fever. At the beginning of the eleventh month he took to his bed, and never rose from it again. Early in his illness he was attended by a doctor but he objected to the expense and allowed the illness to run its course till, on the twentieth, he breathed his last. He was only twenty-four. While he was ill, Tian Xi, one of his boys, stole five taels of silver and made off.

Hua Zixu was no sooner dead than his wife sent old woman Feng to ask Ximen Qing to come and talk to her. A coffin was bought, Hua was put into it, monks were engaged, and the coffin was sent to the tomb. The brothers Hua with their wives all came in deep mourning to assist at the funeral. Ximen Qing asked Yueniang to prepare a funeral offering of wine and food. Li Ping'er went to the funeral and returned in a sedan chair. She set up a tablet in her room but, though it was a time when she should have respected her husband's memory, she could think of nobody but Ximen Qing.

While Hua Zixu was still alive, Ximen Qing had taken over the two maids but after his death the two households were practically united. One day Li Ping'er heard that it was Pan Jinlian's birthday, and, though it was not five weeks after her husband's death, she bought some presents and went in a sedan chair to offer her congratulations. She wore a white silk gown and a blue skirt with gold embroidery, and upon her head was a white covering adorned with pearls. Old woman Feng attended her, and Tian Fu walked behind the sedan chair.

Li Ping'er kowtowed four times to Yueniang. "I am sorry," she said, "that at the graveside I had nothing better to offer you. It was kind of you to send such a handsome offering." After her reverence to Yueniang, she asked to see Li Jiao'er and Meng Yulou. Jinlian came in.

"Is this the Fifth Lady?" Li Ping'er said, preparing to kowtow to her. She repeatedly called her Elder Sister, and begged her to accept her reverence. But Jinlian would not do so, and, after disputing amicably for a long time, they ended by making equal reverences. Jinlian thanked her for her birthday present. After greeting Mistress Wu and Madam Pan, Li Ping'er asked after Ximen Qing.

"He has gone to make his devotions at the Temple of the Jade Emperor," Yueniang said. She asked Li Ping'er to sit down, and offered her tea. A little later Sun Xue'e came in. Li Ping'er saw that her attire was not so rich as that of the others but she stood up. "Who is this lady?" she said, "I should have asked to be presented, had I known there was anyone else."

"She is one of my husband's ladies," Yueniang said. Li Ping'er would have made a reverence to Xue'e but Yueniang would not allow her to do so. "Lady," she said, "you should make the reverence of an equal." So they greeted each other. Yueniang took Li Ping'er to her own room to change her clothes, and ordered the maids to set a table in the middle room. Charcoal was put into the brazier, and wine and food were brought. Mistress Wu, Madam Pan, and Li Ping'er sat in the place of honour; Yueniang and Li Jiao'er in the hostess's place, and Yulou and Jinlian sat at the side. Xue'e went to the kitchen to see to the serving of the meal, and it was some time before she took her own place.

Yueniang saw that Li Ping'er never refused any cup of wine that was offered. She herself poured wine for everyone, and told Li Jiao'er and the others that they must do so in their turn.

"Mistress Hua," she said, "since you have gone so far away, we do not see so much of one another but I often think about you. It has been cruel of you not to come to see us."

"You would not have come today," Yulou said, "if it had not been the Fifth Lady's birthday."

"Good ladies," Li Ping'er said, "it is very good of you to say such kind words. I should have been only too glad to come but I am still in deep mourning and there is nobody to leave at home. Even now it is only about five weeks since my husband died, and if I had not been afraid of incurring the Fifth Lady's displeasure, I should not have come today." She turned to Yueniang, and asked the date of her birthday.

"It is still a long way off," Yueniang said but Jinlian contradicted her.

"Our Great Lady's birthday is the fifteenth day of the eighth month. You must come and see us that day." Li Ping'er promised to come. Yulou suggested that she should spend the night with them.

I should enjoy the pleasure of your company very much indeed," Li Ping'er said, "but, as you know, I have only just removed to this new place and, since my husband died, there is not a soul in the house. The back of my house adjoins the garden of the princely family Qiao; it is very lonely and desolate. There are many nights when foxes come and throw bricks and tiles into my house, and it makes me very nervous. I used to have two serving boys but the older of them has run away, and there is only young Tian Fu to attend to the front door and no one at all to keep watch at the back. Very fortunately for me, old woman Feng, an old friend, comes in frequently to do my washing."

"How old is Madam Feng?" Yueniang said. "She seems a very decent quiet old body."

"She is fifty-six this year," Li Ping'er replied. "She has no children but lives upon her earnings as a go-between and what she makes by washing clothes for me. When my husband died, I asked her to come and live with me, and now she and the maid sleep in the same bed."

"Since there is old woman Feng to look after your house," Jinlian said, "there can be no possible reason why you should not spend the night here. In any case, Master Hua is dead, and you are not answerable to anybody but yourself."

"Do what I tell you," Yulou said, "and tell old woman Feng to send the sedan chair away. You don't go back today."

Li Ping'er laughed but said nothing.

The wine had now gone around several times. Old woman Pan was the first to rise, and she went to the front court with her daughter. Li Ping'er repeatedly declined to drink any more but Li Jiao'er said, "Mistress Hua, you drank everything the other ladies offered you, yet you refuse me. That isn't fair." She took a large cup and filled it to the brim.

"My dear lady," Mistress Hua said, "I can't drink any more. I am not pretending."

"Just one cup more," Yueniang said, "and then we will let you off."

Li Ping'er took the cup, and put it down on the table. She went on talking to the ladies. Suddenly Yulou noticed Chunmei standing beside her.

"What is your mistress doing in the front court?" she said. "Go and tell her and old lady Pan to come back at once. The Great Lady wishes them to help to entertain Mistress Hua."

Chunmei went away but was soon back again. "The old lady is not very well and has gone to bed," she said. "My mistress will be back in a moment. She is powdering her face."

"I never saw such a hostess," Yueniang said, "running away and leaving her guest like this. She is a good soul but she behaves like a child at times."

When Jinlian came back, Yulou saw that she had dressed herself in her most beautiful clothes. She certainly looked very charming.

"Fifth Maid," Yulou said, jokingly, "my good woman, this is the feast of your donkey and horse, yet you ran away to your own room and left your guest behind. Do you call yourself a human being?"

Jinlian laughed, and slapped her playfully.

"You hussy of a fifth maid," Yulou cried, "come and pour out the wine." "The Third Lady has given me too much wine already," Li Ping'er said, "I have had as much as I can take."

"What she gave you is her affair," Jinlian said, "but you must take a cup from me." She poured out a large cup for her guest. Li Ping'er took it but did not drink it. Yueniang noticed that Jinlian was wearing in her hair a pin with the lucky character in gold. "Where did you buy your lucky character pins?" she said to Li Ping'er. "They are exactly like those the Fifth Lady is wearing. I must get a pair with the same design."

"If you would like some," Li Ping'er said, "I have several more pairs, and tomorrow I shall be delighted to offer a pair to each of you. They are some that my late father-in-law brought from the palace, and it is impossible to buy them outside the Court."

"You mustn't take me seriously," Yueniang said, there are too many of us. You can't possibly give us so many pins."

The ladies laughed and drank till the sun went down in the west. Old woman Feng had been drinking in the kitchen with Xue'e, and her face was very red. At last she went into the room and said to Li Ping'er, "Are you ready to go now? I must arrange about the chair."

"Don't go, Mistress Hua," Yueniang said. "Tell Madam Feng to send the chair away."

"There is no one at home," Li Ping'er persisted. "I will come and see you again some other day."

"You are very obstinate, Mistress Hua," Yulou said. "It looks as though you don't care in the least what we should like, since you won't send the chair away. If Father had been here, he would soon have persuaded you."

They finally persuaded her to give her key to old woman Feng. "These ladies have all urged me to stay," she said to the old woman, "and if I don't, it will be discourteous on my part. Send the sedan chair away and tell the men to call for me tomorrow. You take the boy home, and see that all the doors are shut." She added in a whisper: "Tell Yingchun to unlock the small box in my room. There is a little gilt case in it, and I want her to take four pairs of gold lucky-character pins out of it. Bring them to me tomorrow morning. I wish to make a present of them to these four ladies."

Old woman Feng made a reverence to Yueniang and went home. A little later, seeing that Li Ping'er would not drink any more, Yueniang asked her to go to the upper room and take tea with Mistress Wu.

Shortly afterwards Daian brought in the wrapper, and Ximen Qing came in. He pulled up the lattice and, as he entered the room, said, "Surely this is Mistress Hua!" Li Ping'er rose and made a reverence to him. Yueniang told Yuxiao to take his clothes.

"I have been outside the city to worship at the Temple of the Jade Emperor," Ximen Qing said. "I have to preside this year, and the Abbot and I had to go through the accounts in great detail. That is why I am so late. Are you staying the night, Mistress Hua?"

"Mistress Hua has made several attempts to get away," Yulou said, "but we succeeded in persuading her to stay."

"My only reason for wishing to go was that there is no one to look after my house," Li Ping'er said.

"That is nonsense," Ximen Qing said. "The constables have been very active lately, and there is nothing to be afraid of. If you should feel the least bit anxious, I would send my card to Major Zhou. He will do anything I ask him. But why do you sit there like a mouse, Lady Hua? Have you had any wine?"

"We have tried to persuade her to drink some but she would not," Yulou said.

"You are none of you any good," Ximen cried. "Let me see what I can do. She can really drink quite a lot more."

Li Ping'er kept declaring that she could not drink another drop but her objections were only half-hearted, and the maids once more set the table. Some dishes and dessert had been kept for Ximen Qing, and these were now brought out. Mistress Wu declined to drink any more, and went to Li Jiao'er's room. Li Ping'er now sat in the seat of honour, with Ximen Qing opposite to her, and Yueniang sat on the bed and warmed her feet at a small brazier. Yulou and Jinlian sat at the side. The wine was poured again, and they pledged each other in large cups. They drank so long that Mistress Hua's eyebrows grew heavy and her eyes could hardly see.

When Yueniang saw that both her husband and Li Ping'er had drunk more than was good for them, and were chattering nonsense to each other, she waited no longer but went to join her sister. The others stayed drinking till the third night watch, and then Li Ping'er could neither see straight nor stand upright. Jinlian helped her to the back court to wash her hands, and Ximen Qing, who was rolling in all directions, went to Yueniang's room.

"Where is she going to sleep?" he asked.

"In her hostess's room, I imagine," said his wife.

"Where shall I sleep, then?" Ximen said.

"Anywhere you like, though I expect you will go after her," Yueniang said.

"Nonsense," Ximen Qing said, laughing, "I'll stay here." He called Xiaoyu to help him undress.

'Don't be dirty," Yueniang said. "Where is my sister-in-law going to sleep if you stay here? Don't provoke me or I shall tell you what I think about you."

"All right! all right!" Ximen cried. "I'll go and sleep with Yulou." He went off to her room.

When Jinlian had shown her guest where to wash her hands, she took her to the front court and they slept with old woman Pan. Next morning Li Ping'er got up and dressed with the aid of Chunmei. She knew that the girl had passed through Ximen Qing's hands. She gave her a set of golden hair ornaments. Chunmei immediately went to tell Jinlian, and the Fifth Lady thanked her guest most effusively.

"I feel as though we were imposing on you, Mistress Hua," she said "Not at all, Fifth Lady, you are fortunate to have so admirable a maid." When they were dressed, Jinlian took her and old woman Pan into the garden, sending Chunmei to open the gate. Li Ping'er saw that a new gate had been made in the wall, and asked when Ximen was going to rebuild the house.

"The Master of the Yin Yang has been here," Jinlian said, "and he suggests our starting on the foundations in the middle of the second month. His Lordship proposes to make your old house and ours into one. In the front he is going to build an artificial mound, a pergola, and a large garden. At the back he will build a garden house of three rooms like mine."

Li Ping'er listened attentively. Then Yueniang sent Xiaoyu to invite them to take tea in the back court, and the three women went to her room. Yueniang, Li Jiao'er, Yulou, and Mistress Wu were waiting for them.

While they were having breakfast old woman Feng came in. She took an old handkerchief from her sleeve, in which were wrapped four pairs of gold pins, and gave the pins to her mistress. Li Ping'er gave them in turn to Yueniang, Li Jiao'er, Yulou, and Xue'e.

"I feel that I ought not to accept them," Yueniang said. "It is really too kind of you."

Li Ping'er smiled. "There is nothing very wonderful about them," she said, "I only offer them as playthings." Yueniang and the others thanked her, and put them in their hair.

"I believe the Feast of Lanterns is to be held near your house," Yueniang said. "It will be very lovely, and, when I go to see it, I will pay you a call. That is, unless you tell me you won't have me."

"I shall be only too glad to invite you all," Li Ping'er said.

"Perhaps you do not know, Sister," Jinlian said to Yueniang, "that it will be Mistress Hua's birthday on the fifteenth."

"In that case," Yueniang said, "we will make a definite arrangement now to come and offer our congratulations that day."

"My little room's no better than a snail's," Li Ping'er said, smiling, "but if you'll condescend to come, I'll be only too happy." They finished their breakfast, and wine was brought. It was now late in the morning, and the sedan chair came for Li Ping'er. She said goodbye to them all and though they urged her to stay still longer, she prepared to go. As she was about to start, she asked for Ximen Qing but Yueniang told her that he had gone early to say farewell to one of his friends who was going away. Li Ping'er got into her sedan chair and went home.

036

Beauties Enjoy the Sights in the Feast of Lanterns-Viewing Belvedere; Hangers-on Abet Debauchery in the Verdant Spring Bordello

As the sun sinks amid the western hills, the moon rises in the east;
Even the span of a hundred years is like wind-blown tumbleweed.
Before one knows it, the red-cheeked lad one so admires,
In the twinkling of an eye turns into a white-haired gentleman.
Do not waste the fullness of your youth, so quickly does it pass;[2]
Even Heaven-scaling wealth and success are as evanescent as clouds.
One might as well seek to divert oneself among scarlet skirts;
Hugging the turquoise and cuddling the red in houses of pleasure.

Light and darkness alternate swiftly, and before anyone knew it, the fifteenth day of the first month was at hand. The day before, Hsi-men Ch'ing sent his pageboy, Tai-an, to deliver four trays of preserved fruit, two trays of sweetmeats in the shape of birthday peaches, a jug of wine, a tray of birthday noodles, and a set of heavy silk brocade clothing to Li P'ing-erh in honour of her birthday. The gifts were sent in Wu Yüeh-niang's name, accompanied by a card that read, "Respectfully presented with straightened skirts by the lady, née Wu, of the Hsi-men household."

Li P'ing-erh had just gotten up and she was still engaged in doing her toilet. Calling Tai-an into her bedroom, she said, "I'm afraid I imposed upon your First Lady's hospitality the other day, and now she has gone to the further trouble of sending me these gifts."

"Mother sends her greetings," said Tai-an, "and Father sends his greetings too. They told me to say, 'It's only a little something for you to give away to someone if you like,' "

Li P'ing-erh told Ying-ch'un to set up a small table outside in the parlour. There Tai-an was entertained with tea and four little boxes of delicacies. As he was about to leave, she gave him two mace of silver and a handkerchief of shot silk decorated with the symbolic representations of the "eight treasures."

"When you get home," she said, "please convey my greetings to all the ladies of the house. I'll send Old Mother Feng around with written invitations. Whatever happens, I hope they will all condescend to pay me a visit tomorrow."

When Tai-an kowtowed and went outside she also gave him a hundred cash for the two carriers who had brought the boxes containing her presents. Li P'ing-erh lost no time in dispatching Old Mother Feng with a letterbox containing five written invitations, inviting Wu Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Sun Hsüeh-o to visit her on the fifteenth. At the same time she also sent Hsi-men Ch'ing a private note asking him to drop in on her later that evening to help celebrate her birthday.

The next day Wu Yüeh-niang, having told Sun Hsüeh-o to stay behind and look after the house, set out with Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and P'an Chin-lien in four sedan chairs. All of them were dressed in clothing of figured brocade. Accompanied by the pageboys Lai-hsing, P'ing-an, [3] Tai-an, and Hua-t'ung, they arrived in front of Li P'ing-erh's newly purchased house that was located in the Lantern Market on Lion Street.

The house consisted of a twenty-four-foot-wide frontage and three interior courtyards, receding along a vertical axis. The first part of the building was a two-story structure with windows on the upper floor that opened directly over the street. Inside the ceremonial gate that led into the second courtyard there was a row of three rooms on either side and a formal reception hall. A passageway through an antechamber led into the third courtyard that contained three bedrooms and a kitchen. The open space behind the third courtyard, abutted directly on the garden of a distaff relative of the imperial family named Ch'iao.

Li P'ing-erh, knowing that Wu Yüeh-niang and the others were coming to see the lanterns, had furnished the second-story room that overlooked the street with standing screens, chairs and tables, and an array of decorated lanterns. She first ushered her guests into the formal reception hall and then, after they had performed the customary exchange of greetings, invited them back to the parlour in the rear courtyard for some tea. When they had finished changing their clothes in her room, tea was served but there is no need to describe this in detail.

At noontime Li P'ing-erh invited her guests to return to the reception hall where four place settings had been provided and two singing girls, named Tung Chiao-erh and Han Chin-ch'uan, had been engaged to entertain them as they enjoyed the feast. After:

Five rounds of wine had been consumed: and
Three main courses had been served,

Wu Yüeh-niang and the others were invited to go up to the second-story room that overlooked the street to enjoy the display of lanterns as they continued their feast.

Hanging blinds of speckled bamboo had been let down under the eaves, from which an array of brightly coloured lanterns were suspended. Wu Yüeh-niang was wearing a full-sleeved jacket of figured scarlet material, a stylish green silk skirt, and a sable cloak. Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and P'an Chin-lien all wore white satin jackets and blue silk skirts, over which Li Chiao-erh also wore a brocaded aloeswood-coloured vest, Meng Yü-lou a brocaded green vest, and P'an Chin-lien a brocaded scarlet vest. On their heads:

Pearls and trinkets rose in piles;
Phoenix hairpins were half askew, while, from just behind the hair over their temples, there dangled innumerable pendant earrings in the shape of miniature lanterns of every description.

Leaning out of the windows of the second-story room, they looked down on the Lantern Market below where:
Crowds of people had congregated; and
The merrymaking was at its height.
Several tens of elaborate lantern-stands had been erected in the street, and peddlers were busy hawking their wares on all sides.
The men and women come to see the lanterns;
Were red as flowers and green as willows.
Carriages and horses rumbled like thunder;
Hills of lanterns soared into the Milky Way.[4]
What did this wonderful Lantern Market look like? Behold:
Insinuating themselves among the mountain rocks, a pair of dragons sports in the water;
Concealed amid the sunset clouds, a solitary crane
ascends to the heavens.
Golden Lotus lanterns,
Tower of Jade lanterns,
Scintillate like a cluster of pearls;
Lotus blossom lanterns,
Hibiscus lanterns,
Scatter a thousand embroidered rosettes.[5]
Hydrangea lanterns,
Are chaste and immaculate;
Snowflake lanterns,
Are tumbled and tossed.
Scholar lanterns,
Bow and scrape, advance and retreat,
Preserving the manners of Confucius and Mencius;
Housewife lanterns,
Display virtuous demeanors and gentle dispositions,
Emulating the fidelity and resolve of Meng Chiang.[6]
There is a Buddhist monk lantern,
Depicting Yüeh-ming and the courtesan Liu Ts'ui;[7]
And an underworld assessor lantern,
Showing Chung K'uei seated with his little sister.[8]
There is a shamaness lantern,
Fluttering her feathered fan,
Pretending to subdue evil spirits;
And a Liu Hai lantern,
Bearing the golden three-footed toad on his back,
As it gobbles its string of cash.[9]
There are camel lanterns,
And green lion lanterns,
Bearing priceless rarities,
Snorting and roaring;
As well as gibbon lanterns,
And white elephant lanterns,
Proffering treasures fit to ransom cities,
Gamboling and playing.
All arms and legs,
Crab lanterns,
Cavort in the clear waves;
With gaping mouths and long beards,
Catfish lanterns,
Gulp down green algae.
Silver moths vie with one another in brilliance,
Snowy willows compete with each other in beauty;
Pair by pair, they follow in the wake of brocade sashes
and dangling pomanders,
Branch by branch, they brush against decorated pennants and turquoise carriage curtains.[10]
Fish and dragons sport on the sand,
As the Seven Perfected Ones and the Five Ancients[11]
present their vermilion texts;
Tasseled portieres are suspended,
While the Nine Barbarians and the Eight Tribes
come to offer their tribute.
Parading village mummers,
Troupe after troupe, drum up a dreadful din;
Peddlers of toys and knickknacks,
Item by item, tout the uniqueness of their wares.
Among the revolving lanterns,
One comes, the other goes;
Amid the suspended lanterns,
One bobs up, another down.
There are vitreous vases,
Depicting only a beautiful woman or rare flower;
As well as mica screens,
Portraying paradises on both mountains and seas.
To the east,
There are bedsteads of carved lacquer,
And bedsteads of inlaid mother-of-pearl,
The golds and greens of which blend their hues;
To the west,
There are lanterns spangled with gold,
And lanterns striped with colours,
Producing brocade effects that dazzle the eye.
To the north,
There are exhibited antiques and curios;
To the south,
Calligraphy, painting, vases, and incense burners.
Patrician youths are out in force,
From beneath low balustrades their kickballs
rise into the clouds;
Wellborn young ladies escort each other,
As within lofty belvederes they show off their good looks.
The booths of the fortune-tellers are massed like clouds,
The stalls of the physiognomists are arrayed like stars;
They are prepared to expatiate on one's fortune
in the impending spring,
Or determine the success or failure of a lifetime
with sure precision.
Then there are those,
Professional storytellers,
Who, standing on a slope,
Relate in doggerel and song the exploits of Yang Yeh;[12]
And see those others,
Itinerant Buddhist monks,
Who, clapping their sounding cymbals,
Elaborate upon the adventures of Tripitaka.[13]
The sellers of Lantern Festival dumplings,
Make imposing piles of their ingredients;
The makers of artificial plum blossoms,
Attach them ubiquitously to dead branches.
Paper cutouts of spring moths,
Stuck rakishly in the hair over the temples,
quiver in the east wind;
Gold-flecked gimcrack hairpins,
Twinkle atop chignons with a glitter
that rivals the sun's.
Standing screens depict the extravagant Shih Ch'ung

and his brocaded windbreak.[14]
Beaded portieres display the twin perfections of plum blossom and moonlight.
Though the attractions of the hills of lanterns cannot be exhaustively ennumerated;
They surely must portend a bumper harvest
and a happy year to come.
Wu Yüeh-niang contemplated the spectacle for a while, after which, observing that the crowd below was getting rowdy, she and Li Chiao-erh withdrew to the table and sat down to enjoy their wine. P'an Chin-lien and Meng Yü-lou, however, along with the two singing girls, continued to lean out over the windowsills and gaze at the scene below. P'an Chin-lien went so far as to tuck up the sleeves of her white satin jacket, revealing the brocaded lining and exposing her ten slender fingers that sported six gold stirrup-shaped rings. Leaning halfway out the window, she cracked melon seeds with her teeth and spit the empty shells onto the heads of the people below. All the while she and Meng Yü-lou maintained a steady stream of laughter and banter.
One minute she called out, "Elder Sister, come and see. Look at the two hydrangea lanterns hanging from the eaves of the house over there:
One comes, the other goes;
Bobbing up, bobbing down.
They're really something to see."
The next minute she said, "Second Sister, come and see. On the stand just across the street there's a big fish lantern with all kinds of small fry, turtles, shrimp, crabs, and so forth, tagging at its heels. They're really fun to watch."
A minute later she called to Meng Yü-lou, saying, "Third Sister, just look at the old lady lantern and the old man lantern over here."
As she spoke, a sudden gust of wind blew up and tore a gaping hole in the abdomen of the old lady lantern. When Chin-lien saw what had happened she laughed uproariously.
This had the effect of attracting the attention of the sightseers below.
Rubbing shoulders and nudging backs,
Lifting their heads and gazing upward;
Jammed together into an indivisible mass,
Treading on one another's heels, in no time at all a considerable crowd of onlookers had gathered. Among them were to be found some dissolute young scamps who were not averse to offering their own assessments of the situation.
One said, "They must be dependents of some princely or noble household on an outing."
Another hazarded, "They must be the seductive concubines of some relative of the imperial family, come to see the lanterns. Otherwise, what are they doing dressed in palace style?"
Another ventured, "They must be whores from the licensed quarter that some big spender has engaged to entertain him while he enjoys the lanterns."
Still another strolled over and said, "I'm the only one who can identify them. None of you will ever guess right. If you take them for whores, how do you account for the other four at the back? I'll tell you who they are: those two women don't belong to just anybody. They might as well be mates of King Yama himself or concubines of the General of the Five Ways. They're the womenfolk of the Honourable Hsi-men Ch'ing who owns the wholesale pharmaceutical business on the street in front of the district yamen and engages in moneylending to both officials and functionaries. You'd be well-advised to leave them alone. They must have come here along with his wife to see the lanterns.
"The one wearing the brocaded green vest I don't recognize but the one wearing the brocaded scarlet vest with the turquoise beauty patch on her face looks like the wife of Wu the Elder who used to peddle steamed wheat cakes on the street. When Wu the Elder tried to catch her in the act of adultery in Dame Wang's teashop, the Honourable Gentleman just mentioned gave him such a kick that he died of the effects, after which he took her into his household as a concubine. Later on, her brother-in-law, Wu Sung, came back from the Eastern Capital and lodged a complaint against him but ended up killing the lictor, Li Wai-ch'uan, by mistake, so that Hsi-men Ch'ing was able to get his assailant condemned to military exile, while he himself got out of the affair completely unscathed. She hasn't shown herself in public for the last year or two but she's looking better than ever."
At this point another busybody chimed in, saying, "What's the point of wasting our time talking about the likes of them? Let's move along."
When Wu Yüeh-niang, from her vantage point in the upstairs room, became aware that a large crowd had assembled below, she told Chin-lien and Yü-lou to come back and join her at the table, where they listened to the two singing girls perform songs in celebration of the lantern festival while they drank their wine.
After a while, Yüeh-niang indicated that she was ready to make her departure by saying to her hostess, "I've had enough to drink. The Second Lady and I will go ahead home but we'll leave our two sisters behind to keep you company a little longer and show our appreciation for your hospitality. Our husband isn't at home today, so there's no one to look after the place. When only the maidservants are there, I can't help worrying about it."
Li P'ing-erh could hardly let them go without a protest.
"My dear First Lady," she said, "I've scarcely had a chance to show my respects to you. Since your arrival today I haven't even had the opportunity to help you to a proper serving of anything. It's a festival occasion, after all, and yet you want to go home before the lanterns are lit or dinner is served. Even if Father Hsi-men is out today, as long as the young ladies are there, what is there to worry about? Wait until the moon rises, at least, and I'll see you all home myself."
"It's not that," said Yüeh-niang. "It's just that I'm not accustomed to drinking so much. If I leave my two sisters behind it will be just as though I were here myself."
"Even if you don't want any more yourself," said Li P'ing-erh, "that's no reason why the Second Lady shouldn't have another cup. The other day, at your house, I accepted cup after cup without demur, and you ladies refused to let me off. Now that you've been good enough to visit these cramped quarters of mine, though I have nothing to offer, you must let me do the best I can."
Thereupon, she took a large silver goblet and handed it to Li Chiao-erh, saying, "Second Lady, you must have a cup, no matter what. I know the First Lady has had enough, so I don't dare offer her a big one but only a little one."
So saying, she filled a cup to the brim and offered it to Yüeh-niang, and then did the same for Li Chiao-erh, encouraging her as she did so with the words, "Second Lady, do drain this cup."
Yüeh-niang gave two mace of silver to each of the singing girls, and then, after waiting for Li Chiao-erh to finish her wine, got up to go.
Turning to Yü-lou and Chin-lien, she said, "The two of us will go on ahead. When we get home, I'll send a pageboy back with a lantern to fetch you. Do come home then; there's no one to look after the place."
Yü-lou assented to this suggestion. Li P'ing-erh then saw Yüeh-niang and Li Chiao-erh out the door and into their sedan chairs before returning upstairs to keep Yü-lou and Chin-lien company as they continued to drink wine. Gradually, as it grew late:
The jade hare rose in the east.[15] and the lanterns on the second floor were lit. The singing girls entertained them with songs as they drank their wine. But no more of this.
To resume our story, that day Hsi-men Ch'ing had invited Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta to dine with him at home, after which they set out together to enjoy the sights in the Lantern Market. When they arrived at the eastern end of Lion Street Hsi-men Ch'ing, because he knew that Yüeh-niang and the others were being entertained in the front second floor room of Li P'ing-erh's house and he didn't want his companions to see them, did not proceed to the western end of the street where the big lanterns were displayed but came to a halt when he had gotten no further than the shop that sold gauze lanterns.
No sooner had he turned around than he ran into Blabbermouth Sun and Sticky Chu, who saluted him with the words, "We haven't seen you for ages, Brother but you've been very much in our thoughts."
Seeing that he was accompanied by Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta, they upbraided them, saying, "A goddamned fine couple of fellows you are; going out on the town with our elder brother without giving us the word!"
"Brother Chu," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you're doing them an injustice. We've only just run into each other on the street."
"Well now, where are you headed, then, after you've seen the lanterns?" asked Sticky Chu.
"We might as well go to the Great Tavern right here on Lion Street and have a few drinks together," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'd invite you all home with me if it weren't for the fact that my womenfolk are all out at a party today."
"Rather than letting you treat us to a round at the tavern," said Sticky Chu, "why don't we all go into the licensed quarter together and pay a visit to Li Kuei-chieh? It's only appropriate on a festival occasion like this that we should go wish her a happy new year and have some fun together. The other day when we were over at her place she appealed to us, and actually broke down and cried, saying that ever since she became indisposed last month not even your shadow has been into the quarter to see her. All we could do was to say that you must be busy in order to cover up for you. Since you're free today, we'll be happy to accompany you inside to pay her a visit."
Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was preoccupied by his assignation with Li P'ing-erh later that evening, tried to excuse himself, saying, "I'm afraid I can't make it today; I've got something to do. How about tomorrow?"
But he was quite unable to withstand the urgings of his cronies who:
Dragged him off, dead or alive.
Thereupon, he consented to go into the licensed quarter with them. Truly:
The shadows of the flowers under the willows hold down the dust on the road;
Each time one sets out to enjoy them one's pleasure is renewed.
If one could only assess the sums spent for a smile in the metropolis;
Who knows how many commoners' households
they would serve to support?[16]
When Hsi-men Ch'ing and his companions arrived at the Li family establishment they found Li Kuei-ch'ing, all made up, standing in the doorway. She ushered them into the main room and greeted each of them in turn.
Sticky Chu then called out in a loud voice, "Invite Auntie Li the Third to come out at once! It's only thanks to our combined efforts that we've induced the Honourable Gentleman to pay you a visit."
Before long, the old procuress made her appearance, hobbling along with the aid of a stick.
After they had finished with the appropriate amenities, she said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I hope we haven't been remiss in the entertainment we've provided you, Kinsman. How is it that you haven't dropped in to see my daughter for such a long time? You must have taken up with a new sweetheart somewhere else."
"You've hit the nail on the head, madam," interjected Sticky Chu. "The Honourable Gentleman has recently had his eye on another tart of incomparable beauty and has been spending all his free time at her place. He doesn't give a thought to your Kuei-chieh any longer. In fact, if the two of us hadn't run into him in the Lantern Market just now and dragged him along with us, he wouldn't be here now. If you don't believe me, just ask Blabbermouth Sun here." Then, pointing at Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta, he continued, "And this goddamned pair, for their part, are:
Deities of the same persuasion.[17]
When the old procuress heard these words she cackled out loud, saying, "Well, Brother Ying, we've never done anything to get on the wrong side of you. Why don't you use your good offices to put in a word for us with our kinsman here? However complicated his affairs in the quarter may be, as the saying goes:
A practiced profligate doesn't confine his attentions to a single whore;
A practiced whore doesn't reserve her blandishments for a single patron.
The hole in the cash has much the same shape
wherever you find it.
There's no need for me to boast about our Kuei-chieh's looks. The gentleman has eyes of his own and doesn't require anyone to point out the obvious to him."
"To tell the truth," interposed Blabbermouth Sun, "this new tart that Brother's taken up with isn't even an inhabitant of the quarter. She's an outsider who doesn't give a fuck for the insiders."
When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he chased Blabbermouth Sun around the room, pretending to hit him, exclaiming as he did so, "Madam, don't pay any attention to this:
God-damned and man-condemned;[18] old oily mouth! All he ever does is plague people to death."
This exhibition only caused Blabbermouth Sun and the rest to collapse in a heap with laughter.
Hsi-men Ch'ing then proceeded to pull three taels of silver out of his sleeve and hand them to Li Kuei-ch'ing, saying, "On this festival occasion I'd like to stand my friends a treat."
"I really couldn't agree to such a thing," Kuei-ch'ing affected to reply. "Give it to my mother."
"How now?" Auntie Li responded. "My kinsman must think so little of us that he doesn't think we can afford to furnish a feast, even on a festival occasion, for the entertainment of his distinguished friends. If you have to reach into your own pocket to defray the expenses, it will look as though we denizens of the licensed quarter are only interested in money after all."
At this juncture Ying Po-chüeh interrupted her, saying, "Auntie, if I were you I'd take what you're offered. As the saying goes:
Don't risk your luck by refusing the first gleanings
of the New Year: stash them away.
Just bring on the wine, now, as quickly as you can."
"That will never do," said the procuress but even as she persisted in her protestations she accepted the silver and slipped it into her sleeve.
Making a deep bow, she said, "Thank you for your generosity, Kinsman."
"Wait a minute, Auntie," said Ying Po-chüeh. "I've got a story for you. A certain young man was having an affair with a prostitute in the licensed quarter. One day, just for the fun of it, he disguised himself as a pauper and paid a visit to his regular establishment. When the madam saw how shabby his clothing was, she paid him no attention and let him sit there for some time without even offering him a cup of tea. The young man said, 'Auntie, I'm hungry. If you've got any rice, please bring me something to eat.' To which the old procuress replied, 'The bin is completely dry. Where would I get you any rice from?' 'Since you're out of rice,' the young man said, 'If you have any water, please bring me a little to wash my face with.' To which the old procuress replied, 'We haven't been able to pay the water carrier, so he hasn't delivered any water the last few days.' At this, the young man reached into his sleeve, pulled out a silver ingot weighing ten taels, put it on the table in front of him, and told her to buy rice and order water with it. This flustered the old procuress so much that she blurted out, 'Kinsman, would you rather eat your face before washing your rice, or wash your rice before eating your face?' "
Everyone laughed uproariously at this.
"I see you're still as quick to make fun of people as ever," said Auntie Li. "It so happens that, as the saying goes:
Such a thing may be said but
It ain't necessarily so."
"Lend an ear," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I've got something else to tell you. The Honourable Gentleman has recently engaged the services of Brother Hua the Second's former sweetheart, Wu Yin-erh, from the back alley of the quarter. He isn't interested in your Kuei-chieh any longer. If we hadn't dragged him along with us today, do you think he'd be here now?"
"I don't believe you," laughed the procuress. "Our Kuei-chieh can be said, without exaggeration, to be superior to Wu Yin-erh in every way. Our establishment and our kinsman's family are bound together by ties that:
The sharpest knife could never sever.
What do you take our kinsman for, anyway? He's seen enough of the world, if you get right down to it, to know the value of true gold when he sees it."
When they had finished with their palaver, four folding armchairs were set up in the parlour, on which Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Sticky Chu, and Blabbermouth Sun sat down, in the positions of honour, while Hsi-men Ch'ing assumed the place of host, across from them. The old lady then excused herself in order to supervise the preparation of the wine and accompanying delicacies for the party.
Sometime after her departure, Li Kuei-chieh herself finally appeared. Her hair was done up in a casual "bag of silk" chignon in the Hang-chou style, fastened in place with a gold filigree pin. Her coiffure was further augmented by plum-blossom-shaped ornaments with kingfisher feather inlays, a pearl headband, and gold lantern earrings. She was wearing a white satin jacket that opened down the middle, with purfled edging and green brocade sleeve linings, over a red silk skirt. Indeed, she was so made up as to look as though she were:
Modeled in plaster, carved of jade.
After having:

Neither correctly nor precisely,
made a bow to the company and uttered a word of greeting. Kuei-chieh sat down with Kuei-ch'ing at the two unoccupied ends of the table. Before long, one of the girls of the establishment brought in seven cups of tea on a square tray of painted lacquer. The teacups were the colour of snowy linen, the silver teaspoons were in the shape of apricot leaves, and the tea itself that was flavoured with attar of roses and the kernels of melon seeds, was of a bewitching fragrance. Kuei-ch'ing and Kuei-chieh served a cup to each of their guests and kept them company until the tea was finished and the raised saucers were cleared away.
A servant then came in to wipe off the table and began to lay out the delicacies to go with the wine. Just at this juncture, from behind the hanging blind over the door, a number of shabbily dressed young men, known to the trade as "cribbers," were observed:
Sticking out their heads and craning their necks, awaiting the right moment to make their way inside and kneel down in front of the company.
They held three or four pints of melon seeds in their hands that they presented to the host with the words, "A humble offering to Your Honour on this festival occasion."
Hsi-men Ch'ing recognized their leader as a fellow called Yü Ch'un, or Stupid Yü, and asked him, "Which of you are here today?"
"Tuan Mien, or Half-baked Tuan, Sha San, or Yokel Sha, and Nieh Yüeh, or Tiptoe Nieh, are just outside," replied Stupid.
Half-baked Tuan and the others then came inside and, noticing that Ying Po-chüeh was one of the company, kowtowed to him, saying, "Master Ying, you're here too."
Hsi-men Ch'ing stood up, announced that he would take the melon seeds, and then, rummaging in his purse for a tael's worth of silver, tossed it on the floor.
When Stupid Yü had picked it up, he and his companions kowtowed on their hands and knees, saying, "Thank you for your generosity, sir," and beat a hasty retreat.
There is a song to the tune "Imperial Audience" that describes the conduct of these "cribbers."
Assembling at one place,
Congregating at another,
Their status may be low but their pretensions are great.
If you rub them the wrong way, they'll give you a hard time.
No part of the licensed quarter is off their beat.
At parties they'll join the fun,
Ever ready with idle conversation;
Only after doing their turn will they disperse.
The money they make isn't much,
So why do they make such a fuss?
They live off the spittle licked from the tiger's mouth.[19]
As soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing had gotten rid of the "cribbers," wine was served and the party settled down to drink. Kuei-chieh:
Filled the golden cups to the brim,
Dangling her pair of red sleeves.
Dainties were prepared of the rarest kind,
Fruits were provided just in season.
Hugging the turqoise and cuddling the red,
The flowers were gorgeous and the wine heady.
After:
Two rounds of wine had been consumed,
Kuei-ch'ing and Kuei-chieh, one playing the psaltery and the other the p'i-p'a, accompanied themselves as they sang the song suite on the beauties of spring, the first number of which, to the northern style tune "Flowers in Brocade," begins with the words:
The fair weather is balmy:[20]
Spring is at its most beautiful.
Now lightly warm, now lightly cool.
It reveals itself in flowering branches.
Deep in secluded courtyards,
The swallows suddenly return.
On purple roads and fragrant streets,
Fine steeds with golden bridles neigh.
Parks and woods are bright with silks,
Peach and apricot blossoms vie in fragrance.
The sounds of imperial music,
Drift across the Dragon Pool.
Fragrant verdure gradually blends into the green mist.
Truly, on such a fine day,
One revels joyously in the beautiful scene.
TO THE TUNE "GOLD LAMÉ CURTAINS" (SOUTHERN STYLE):
The lingering cold is chilly;
Layers of emerald curtains are drawn.
Throughout the imperial capital, spring has returned.
The east wind grows more importunate.
The scene is at its most beautiful;
Bright with silks and jewels.
Having moistened the flowers, the rain has cleared.
The rain has cleared,
And the flowering branches reach to the ground.
The smell of flowers permeates the fragrant streets;
Subtly invading the sleeves of the passersby.
On Bronze Camel Street, they have roamed everywhere.
They have roamed everywhere,
In love with the long days and genial sun.
TO THE TUNE "PLUCKING THE CASSIA" (NORTHERN STYLE):
On the roads of the pleasure quarter
lissome willows are trailing;
On the banks of the Wei River
the genial sun lingers.
Reds and purples exude fragrance;
Plum branches lose their powdery blooms;
Peach trees venture into flower;
Crab apples and pears vie with their snowy blossoms.
Blowing the willow catkins
the fragrant breeze is gentle;
Embracing the roving wheels
the emerald grass is luxuriant.
Let carnelian goblets overflow;
Exchange songs and lyrics.
Meeting with times of peace and glorious days;
In every place they celebrate the season of the flowers.
TO THE TUNE "RIVER WATER" (SOUTHERN STYLE):
Spring colours live up to the revelers' desires;
The fragrant breeze penetrates their silks.
See how they compete to display flowery lanterns;
How the light of the moon shines refulgently;
And how, clustering on the branches of fiery trees,
Tens of thousands of candles envelop them.
The silver river and pearly dipper grow dim.
This festive day, the fifteenth of the first month,
Surpasses the revels at the Jasper Pool.
Bright lotus lamps illuminate the hills of lanterns,
Truly, they are magnificent.
Crowds surge about vermilion wheels, traffic on the celestial streets is slow.
Reining in their jeweled horses are the imperial guards by their ten thousands,
Watching until the shadows of the trees fall east and the moon sinks west.
TO THE BINARY TUNES "WILD GEESE ALIGHT" AND "VICTORY SONG" (NORTHERN STYLE):
Arabesques of incense float from jeweled censers;
The oriole's song shatters the silence of dawn.
Spring breezes waft the fragrance of flowery plants;
Lingering sunlight enhances rivers and mountains.
Frowning-eyebrow willow leaves expand their greens;
Rain-drenched crab apple blossoms drip in threads.
Village mummers and country folk enjoy themselves;
At the Lustration Festival wine cups are set afloat.
Everyone must know,
The myriad nations are now all at peace;
Upon prescribed topics,
One must compose poetry on phoenix notepaper.
TO THE BINARY TUNES "REITERATIVE BROCADE" AND "INTOXICATED IN THE EAST WIND" (SOUTHERN STYLE):

Our only fear is that greens darken the alleyways,
And spring will soon depart.
Our only fear is that greens darken the alleyways,
And spring will soon depart.
The cuckoo cries,
Only causing the flowers to fall and the willow catkins to fly.
The effects of the east wind permeate everything;
On these fine days when spring is in its glory,
Half the flowers have already fallen,
Leaving only a few branches of peony behind.
Outside the painted pavilions,
One is surrounded by misty peaks and emerald waves.
Behold: swings kick into view behind the walls,
Revealing pearls and kingfisher feather ornaments,
Which set off to perfection golden bridle trappings.
Our only fear is that greens darken the alleyways,
And spring will soon depart.
Climbing high towers, leaning on all the balustrades,
On the eve of the spring festival, fires are prohibited, one eats cold food.
Windblown red petals stick to the picnic mats.
In the I-ch'un Park there is banqueting.
Begrudging what remains of spring,
One lies intoxicated in the slanting sunlight.
In the shadow of the weeping willow trees,
The calls of auspicious birds awaken the slumberer.
As one traverses the twenty-four divisions of the flowering cycle,
One can calculate how much of the glorious season has already gone by.
TO THE BINARY TUNES "RIVER-BOBBED OARS" AND "SEVEN BROTHERS" (NORTHERN STYLE):
Traversing willow paths,
Crossing peach tree streams,
Skimming the clear waves,
Pairs of swallows fly.
Fragrant verdure grows wild and luxuriant;
Fallen willow catkins lie soiled in mud.
Cuckoos cry incessantly,
But cannot call a halt to spring's wending way.
Only the myriad willow fronds impede its progress.
The beautiful scene basks in genial sunlight.
Truly: as greens darken reds dwindle.
The most touching element is a pair of orioles,
Warbling to the humans.
Harmonizing with the notes of pipe and song.
As the sun moves, flower shadows traverse hanging painted screens.
Truly: Chinese and barbarians alike share in the enjoyment of these years of peace.
TO THE TUNE "WAVE-BOBBING OARS" (SOUTHERN STYLE):
The realm of luxury,
Is apparent in the picturelike towers and terraces.
Beside the dance floors, swallows kick blossoms into flight.
Performing new music, the mandola and psaltery are tuned to a low pitch.
As though calling to the revelers, orioles compete in song.
TO THE BINARY TUNES "PLUM BLOSSOM WINE" AND "ENJOYING THE SOUTH" (NORTHERN STYLE):
See how in spring pools,
Brocadelike carp leap.
Hear how in green trees,
Yellow orioles warble.
Everything conveys the idea of spring.
Each is content;
Each is happy.
The east wind blows the willow catkins,
Skidding over the green verdure,
As far as the horizon.
They cannot be restrained,
Seeing spring on its way,
Alighting on the fallen blossoms,
Entangled in floating gossamer.
Outside the ornate mansion,
West of the little bridge,
The new plums are like beans,
The willow leaves like eyebrows.
Remember mid-spring in the Southern Park, homeward bound, treading the green;
After doing a stint on the swing, showing off one's silken garments.
Slowly singing "Golden Threads" and toasting with golden goblets;
Idly apostrophizing the peonies and appreciating the yellow roses.
Truly: an auspicious festival in a glorious season,
Thanks to the unification of the Great Ming, favouring Chinese and barbarian alike.
CODA:
Of all the beauteous seasons of the year,
one must remember,
Throughout the human world, the glory of spring is most enjoyable.
May the good fortune and long life of our Sage Sovereign equal Heaven.

Just as they were in full voice, three young men appeared, wearing black clothing and brown leather boots, who were known to the trade as "ball clubbers."

They held a gift box containing a roast goose and two bottles of vintage wine in their hands that they presented to the company, after making a half obeisance, with the words, "A humble offering to Your Honour and his distinguished friends on this festival occasion."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was already acquainted with them. The first was called Pai T'u-tzu, or Baldy Pai, also known as Mohammedan Pai, the second, Hsiao Chang Hsien, or Trifler Chang, and the third, Lo Hui-tzu, or Mohammedan Lo.

"Wait outside a little while," he said to them, "until we've finished our wine. Then we'll come out and kick three rounds with you."

So saying, he sent them on their way with four plates of delicacies from the table, a large jug of wine, and a saucerful of savories for their refreshment.

When the "ball clubbers" had eaten their fill and inflated their ball, Hsi-men Ch'ing came outside and played a round of kick-about with them in the courtyard. After him it was Kuei-chieh's turn, and she joined a pair of them to form a triangular threesome in which the other two faced off as receivers to field her endeavors. As she did her best to "hook" and "chip" with her kicks, they were lavish with meretricious praise, and whenever she made a mistake they were quick to retrieve the ball for her.

When they were through, they made up to Hsi-men Ch'ing in the hope of reward, saying, "Kuei-chieh's 'ball-handling' is more professional than ever. When she 'volleys' with a 'flick pass' or a 'chip kick' we hardly know what to do with ourselves. In another year or two she and her sister will rank among the best 'ball-handlers' on this side of the quarter. There won't be another 'hooker' or 'chippy' in the same league. Already they're ten times better than the girls from the Tung establishment on Second Street."

By the time Kuei-chieh had kicked two rounds:

Dust had settled about her eyebrows,
Sweat had moistened her cheeks;
She was panting and puffing, and
Her limbs ached with exhaustion.

Extracting a folding fan from her sleeve, she endeavored to cool herself with it while she stood hand-in-hand with Hsi-men Ch'ing and watched Kuei-ch'ing engage Hsieh Hsi-ta and Trifler Chang in the same three-cornered game of kick-about. Baldy Pai and Mohammedan Lo stood on the sidelines, emptily gesturing with their feet and running back and forth to retrieve the ball when any of the players made an error.

There is another song to the tune "Imperial Audience" that describes the conduct of these "ball clubbers."

Idle when at home,
Forever on the make,
No honest trade for them,
Yet their kickballs are never far from their sides.

Everyday they haunt the street corners,
Paying no heed to the poor,
But toadying to the rich.
From early morning till late at night,
They seldom eat a full meal.
Though they never make much money,
They make ends meet by hiring out the favours of their wives.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was still in the licensed quarter, looking on at his companions as they challenged each other to backgammon, played at kickball, and drank wine, when Tai-an arrived on horseback to fetch him. Approaching his master as inconspicuously as possible he Whispered into his ear in a low voice, "The First Lady and the Second Lady have already gone home. Mrs. Hua told me to ask you to come over as soon as you can." On hearing this message, Hsi-men Ch'ing gave Tai-an whispered instructions to take the horse around to the back door and wait for him there. Then, without even taking another drink, he accompanied Kuei-chieh back to her room and sat down with her for only a few minutes, after which, feigning the need to answer a call of nature, he came out to the back door, jumped on his horse, and disappeared in a cloud of dust. Before he had made good his departure, Ying Po-chüeh sent the servant of the house out to intercept him but Hsi-men Ch'ing merely said, "I've something to attend to at home," and refused to return. He did remember, however, to leave Tai-an a tael and five mace of silver with which to take care of the three "ball clubbers." The proprietors of the Li family establishment were so worried lest Hsi-men Ch'ing be on his way to visit Wu Yin-erh's place in the back alley that they sent a maidservant after him who tailed him all the way to the gate of the quarter before coming home. Ying Po-chüeh and the rest continued drinking, and it was not until the second watch that the party finally broke up. Truly, if any curse me, curse away; I'll have my pleasures anyway.

The days passed quickly. It was the birthday of Li Ping'er on the fifteenth of the eleventh month. The day before it Ximen Qing told Daian to get ready four courses of food, a large jar of wine, birthday cakes, and pastries. He himself added a suit of quilted silken clothes embroidered in gold. He wrote Wu Yueniang's name on a card, and sent everything as a birthday present from Yueniang to Li Ping'er.

Mistress Hua was dressing when Daian brought the present. She ordered the boy to be brought to her.

"It is only a few days," she said to him, "since your lady last troubled herself on my account. Now she has placed me in her debt again by sending this magnificent present."

"I was told to say that this is only a trifle that you may well pass on to your maids."

Li Ping'er told Xiuchun to give Daian some cakes. As he was about to go, she gave him two qian and a coloured handkerchief. "Tell your ladies," she said, "that I am going to send old woman Feng to ask them all to brighten my poor house by their presence."

Daian kowtowed and went away. Li Ping'er paid the porters, and sent old woman Feng with five cards of invitation to ask the ladies to come the following evening. Secretly she was to ask Ximen Qing to come later and take wine with her.

The next day Yueniang left Sun Xue'e to look after the house. She and the other ladies, all most charmingly dressed, got into their sedan chairs to go to Lion Street, where the Feast of Lanterns was being held. Laixing, Laian, Daian, and Huatong escorted them.

The house in which Li Ping'er now lived had three rooms at the front, and went back for the same distance. On the street it was two stores high, and, as one entered the gate, there were rooms on either side. Three formed a hall and one served as a passage to the third court, where there were three bedrooms and a kitchen. At the back of the house a wall separated the property of Li Ping'er from the garden belonging to the princely family of Qiao.

Yueniang and the others were coming specially to see the lanterns, and Li Ping'er set out screens, tables, and cushions, and hung up floral lanterns in the rooms that overlooked the street. When her guests arrived, she welcomed them and took them to the inner court for tea. They sat down, and two singing girls, Dong Jiao'er and Han Jinchuan, sang for them and served the wine. Afterwards refreshments were set out in the upper rooms, and she invited her guests to go upstairs and look at the lanterns. The windows had been decorated with bamboo shades, lanterns, and silken streamers.

Yueniang was dressed in a red-quilted cloak with an emerald green skirt, and she wore a mantle of leopard skin. Li Jiao'er, Meng Yulou, and Pan Jinlian were wearing white silk gowns and blue skirts. Li Jiao'er had a brown wrap embroidered in gold, Yulou a green one, and Jinlian a red one. They all wore masses of pearls and jade on their heads, and phoenix pins peeped out from their hair. They looked out of the window at the fair.

There were hosts of people at the fair, and it was a wonderful sight. Dozens of arches, with lanterns hanging all around them, had been set up in the street. There were all kinds of booths, surrounded by crowds of men and women admiring the lanterns, some red as roses, and some green as willows. Horses and carriages made a noise like thunder.

Dragons flit through mountain peaks and sport in couples in the water.
Lonely storks gaze at the skies, shining as the clouds themselves.
Lanterns of the golden lotus; lanterns like towers of jade, glimmering like a mass of jewels.
Lanterns of mimosa, lotus lanterns, shedding a thousand radiant hues.
Lanterns of gossamer, light and dainty; sunflower lanterns, bobbing in the wind Student lanterns, bowing back and forth, attentive to the bidding of Confucius and Mencius.
Wife lanterns, tender and obedient, picturing the virtues of Meng Jiang.
Monkish lanterns, with Yue Ming and Liu Cui standing side by side.
Lanterns of the Scribe of Hell, Zhong Kui and his sisters, sitting down together.
Lanterns like witches with fluttering fans, conjuring up evil spirits.
Lanterns of Liu Hai, with a golden frog, devouring precious treasure.
Camel lanterns and green lion lanterns bearing gifts beyond price.
Monkey lanterns and white elephant lanterns, with treasure worth the ransom of many cities.
Crabs sporting with the incoming breakers, on their backs, all hands and feet.
Bull-headed fishes, with monstrous mouths and long beards, swallowing the river plants.
Silver moths, vying in beauty; snow-white willows, each more glorious than the last.
Fishes and dragons playing on the sands.
The seven immortals and the five ancients with their sacred books
The nine barbarians and the eight uncivilized coming to offer precious gifts.
The drums at the fair beat sharply twice.
A hundred toys, each more cunning than its neighbour
The lanterns move round and round
The hanging lanterns bob up and down
There are glass vases painted with delicate maidens and exquisite flowers
There are screens of tortoiseshell, with Ying Zhou and Lang Yuan painted on them.
The young men gather at the rails where the ball is kicked as high as the eyes.
Hand in hand the maidens go to the upper floors that the beauty of their charms may be seen.
The booths of the palmists are like the clouds, and the tents of the readers of faces like the stars
They tell the fortunes of the coming year and read in the lives of men the joy and sadness that are to come.
They who sing the song of Yang Gong stand on the slopes.
Elsewhere, the wandering priests strike their cymbals and tell the story of San Cang.
There are sellers of Yuan Xiao, their pastries stuffed with fruits
And sellers of plum blossom with the dried branches cut away.
Hair ornaments sporting with the winds of spring; cold weather ornaments brightening the hair, their golden glory gleaming in the sun.
Round screens, painted with the gorgeous net of Shi Chong.
Lattices of mother of pearl, adorned with plum blossom and crescent moon, charming to the eyes.
We may not see all the beauties of Ao Shan
But before us is a year of happiness and joyful living.

Yueniang looked out upon the lanterns until the noise became too great for her. Then she and Li Jiao'er went back to their places to drink for a while. Jinlian, Yulou, and the two singing girls, stayed and still looked out of the window at the fair.

Jinlian flaunted her silken sleeves and pointed with her fine fingers, showing off the gold rings on them. She leaned half out of the window, biting melon seeds and throwing the skins at the passersby. She and Yulou laughed all the time. She pointed to something in the street, and cried, "Great Sister, come and look at the two hydrangea-lanterns over at that house. They look so pretty, as the wind blows them to and fro." Then: "Second Sister, come and look at the great fish lanterns hanging over that door, and all the little fishes, crabs, and lobsters below. They are ever so funny." And again: "Third Sister, come and look at the old-man-and-woman lanterns."

Suddenly a gust of wind made a large hole in the lower part of the old-woman-lantern, and Jinlian laughed merrily. People standing below the window stared up at her, crowding till they almost trampled on each other. There were several dissolute young fellows among them. They pointed at the woman, and began to discuss her.

"She must have come from the palace of some duke or earl," one said.

"She is a concubine of one of the princely households, come to see the lanterns," another said. "She must be, or she would not be dressed in such splendid style."

"She is one of the little girls from the bawdy house, and some nobleman has engaged her to come here and sing," said a third.

Then another young man spoke. "You will never guess who they are. But I know. Those two women indeed belong to a distinguished family: they are the wives of the King of Hades, concubines of the General of the Five Directions. In other words, they belong to Master Ximen who keeps a medicine shop near the Town Hall and lends money to the officials. He is not at all the sort of man to fall out with. Probably they have come with the mistress of their household to see the lanterns. I don't know the one wearing the green wrapper but the other, in red with the artificial flowers, looks like the wife of Wu Da the cake seller. Wu Da caught them misbehaving in old woman Wang's tea shop. His Lordship kicked Wu Da to death, and then took the woman to be one of his ladies. Her brother-in-law, Wu Song, went to the courts to bring an accusation but, in mistake, killed the runner Li, and his Lordship had him punished. It is a year or two since I saw her last. She has certainly become very beautiful."

Yueniang saw that a crowd was collecting in the street, and told Jinlian and Yulou to come and sit down. They drank wine and the two singing girls sang the Lantern Song to them.

Yueniang was anxious to go home. "I have had as much wine as I can drink," she said, "and I and the Second Lady must leave you. But the others may stay and entertain you, Mistress Hua. My husband is not at home today, and there are only a few maids to look after things. I can't help being anxious."

Li Ping'er tried to persuade her to stay. "Good lady," she said, "if you go, it must be because I have entertained you so poorly. Today is a great holiday, and the lamps are not yet lighted or the food prepared. You mustn't think of going home. Even if Master Ximen is out, you have a number of maids. Why should you be uneasy? As soon as the moon rises, I will see you all home."

"Mistress Hua," Yueniang said, "I am afraid that is impossible. I never drink much wine. But I will leave the others here to take my place."

"Great Lady and Second Lady," Li Ping'er said. "Neither of you will drink with me. It is not fair. When I was at your house, your ladies would not let me off though I drank one cup after another. Today you have come to this poor place of mine, and though I can offer nothing worthy of you, I should like to do something to show my feelings."

She took a great silver cup, and asked Li Jiao'er to drink. Then she turned to Yueniang. "I dare not offer you so large a cup," she said, "but here is a small one." She poured out a cup of wine and offered it.

Yueniang gave each of the singing girls two qian of silver and, when Li Jiao'er had finished her wine, they prepared to leave. "We will go first," Yueniang said to Yulou and Jinlian, "and I will send the boys with lanterns to bring you home. You must not be too late, for there are not many of us at home." Li Ping'er took Yueniang and Li Jiao'er to the door, and saw them off in their sedan chairs. Then she came back to drink wine with Yulou and Jinlian. It was getting dark, and the lamps in the room were lighted. As they drank, they listened to the playing and singing of the two girls.

Ximen Qing dined at home with Ying Bojue and Xie Xida, and afterwards they set out to the Lantern Fair. When they reached the end of Lion Street, Ximen was afraid his companions might see the ladies drinking wine at Mistress Hua's house, so he turned aside into another street to look at the large lanterns. They went as far as one of the great booths and then came back. They met Sun Guazui and Zhu Shinian.

"It is a very long time since we saw you last," the newcomers said. "Our hearts were thirsting for the sight of you." They turned to Ying Bojue and Xie Xida. "You are a fine pair of rascals! You have been enjoying yourselves with our brother and never said a word to us about it."

"You are unfair to them," Ximen said. "I only met them in the street a moment ago."

"Well," Zhu Shinian said, "now that we've had enough of the lanterns, where shall we go?"

"Let us go to the wineshop and drink," Ximen Qing said. "I will not ask you to my place, because all my women have gone to a party."

"Why a wineshop?" Zhu Shinian said. "Why not call on Li Guijie? This is a great occasion. We will go and wish her a Happy New Year and enjoy ourselves at the same time. A few days ago we were at her place, and the very thought of you brought tears to her eyes. She told us she had been ill ever since the twelfth month but not even your shadow had crossed her threshold. Brother, you have nothing else to do, and we shall be very glad to go with you."

Ximen Qing remembered that he had to go and see Li Ping'er that evening. He declined. "I have certain matters to attend to today," he said, "I'll go with you tomorrow." But they hustled him and dragged him till he found himself at the bawdy house in spite of himself.

When Ximen Qing and his companions reached the house, Guiqing, dressed very daintily, was standing outside the door. She brought them into the hall and made a reverence to each in turn.

"Come here at once, Mother," Zhu Shinian cried at the top of his voice. "We have been lucky enough to persuade his Lordship to come." The old procuress came, hobbling along with the help of her stick. She greeted Ximen Qing.

"I am a poor old body who has never done you any wrong," she said. "Why have you kept away from your sisters so long? Perhaps you have another girl somewhere."

"A good guess," Zhu Shinian said. "His Lordship has made the acquaintance of a very pretty girl, and he goes to see her everyday. Now you know why he never bothers about Guijie any more. If we hadn't run into him at the Feast of Lanterns and dragged him along, he would not be here now. If you don't believe me, ask Sun." He pointed to Ying Bojue and Xie Xida. "Those unholy rascals belong to the same family of immortals as Master Ximen himself."

The old woman found this very amusing. "Good brother Ying," she said, "I have always treated you well. Why couldn't you speak for us to his Lordship? He is a busy man, and, of course, as the proverb says, a young man is never faithful to one girl. All the coins in the world are made with the same sort of hole. I don't mean to boast but my daughter is a good-looking girl. Your own eyes, Sir, will tell you that much."

"Let me explain," Sun Guazui said. "His new girl does not live in any bawdy house. She is independent."

Ximen Qing ran after Sun Guazui and slapped him. "Don't believe this old oily mouth and all his crazy stories. His proper place is the slaughterhouse."

Sun and the others roared with laughter. Ximen took three taels of silver from his sleeve and offered it to Guiqing, saying that he would like to give his friends a treat on this festival day. Guiqing would have nothing to do with it; she passed it on to the old procuress.

"What does this mean?" the old woman cried. "Do you think that on a festival day like this I cannot myself entertain your friends? If you offer me this silver, it is quite clear you believe we never think of anything but money."

Ying Bojue went to her. "Take my advice and accept the money," he said, "and get us some wine at once."

"It is not right," the old woman mumbled, still pretending to refuse the money, though she put it into her sleeve. Finally she thanked Ximen Qing, and made a profound reverence to him.

"Wait a moment, Mother," Bojue cried. "I have a funny story to tell you. There was once a young man who kept a girl at the bawdy house, and one day, when he called to see her, he pretended to have been ruined. The old woman saw how shabby his clothes were and would have nothing to say to him. He sat for a long time, and she never even offered him a cup of tea. 'May I have some rice, Mother?' the young man said at last. 'I am very hungry.' 'My rice bin is empty,' the old woman replied. 'Where shall I find rice for you?' 'If you have no rice,' said the young man, 'perhaps you will give me a little water to wash my face?' But the old woman said, 'I can't afford to buy any water; we have had none for days.' But then the young man produced a piece of silver, about ten taels in weight, and put it on the table. Again he asked for rice and water. The old woman became quite excited. 'Eat your face and wash your rice, Brother,' she cried, 'and when you have washed your rice, eat your face."

They laughed. "You are trying to make fun of me," the old woman said. "I have heard stories like that before but I don't believe a word of them."

"Listen," Bojue said, "I'll tell you something. This girl his Lordship has been courting is Brother Hua's girl, Wu Yin'er, who lives in the back lane. He doesn't care for Guijie any more."

"I don't believe you," the old woman said, laughing. "I don't wish to boast but my daughter is certainly as good-looking as Wu Yin'er. Brother is so wrapped up in us that not even the sharpest of knives could cut him away from us. And he is not a fool either. He can tell real gold when he sees it." With this, she went to see about the preparation of the feast.
In a short time Guijie came in. Her hair was dressed in the Hangzhou style, with pins inlaid with gold, and green plum ornaments. She wore a pearl headdress, a pair of golden earrings, a crimson silk skirt and a white silk coat. She looked as beautiful as a carving in jade. When she had greeted them all, she sat down by the side of her sister, and a little later tea was brought in. Guijie handed the tea and kept a cup for herself. Then a maid came to clear away the tea things and set the table.
Suddenly several men, whose dress showed that they were of low degree, appeared before the lattice, and looked in on them. Then they came in and knelt down. They brought three or four measures of melon seeds.
"We bring you this present," their spokesman said, "in honour of the festival."
"Who are you?" Ximen asked. He only recognized the leader, Yu Chun.
"Nie Yue is outside," said Yu Chun. "He belongs to our party."
Nie Yue came in. When he saw Ying Bojue, he said, "So you are here, Master Ying." He kowtowed.
Ximen Qing took the melon seeds and threw a tael of silver to Yu Chun. Then the fellows thanked him politely and went away.
When Ximen Qing had got rid of them, he settled down to his wine. Guijie filled the golden cups, making great play with her crimson sleeves. The food was of the rarest and the dessert of seasonable fruits. The men reveled in the fragrance of the two girls, and the wine they drank only seemed to add to the charm. The cups were filled twice, then Guijie and her sister sang "The Sweetness of the Glorious Day," one playing the cithern and the other the lute.
While they were singing, three members of the Ball Club came in, wearing dark clothes and bringing two roast geese and a couple of jars of wine. They made a profound reverence to Ximen Qing, and offered their gifts. Ximen knew them all. There were Bai Tuzi, little Zhang Xian, and Muslim Luo. "Wait for us outside," he said, "and, as soon as we have finished our wine, we will come and have a game with you." He gave them four dishes of food, a large jar of wine, and some cakes. They got their ball ready and waited. When Ximen had drunk a little more wine, he went out to the courtyard to watch the ball game and asked Guijie to play with two of them, one to pitch and one to strike. She jumped about, kicked, elbowed, and struck the ball to the great admiration of those looking on. If sometimes she could not catch it, they hastily caught it for her. When the game was over, they went to Ximen Qing for money. "Guijie's form's very greatly improved," one said. "When she elbows the ball, it takes us all our time to hold it. In a year or two, she may well be the finest ball player in all the bawdy houses. She's infinitely better than the Dong girls who live in the second lane."
By the time Guijie had played two games, dust covered her eyebrows and her cheeks were damp with sweat. Her limbs ached and she panted for breath. She took the fan from her sleeve and fanned herself, then held Ximen Qing's hand, while they watched Guiqing, Xie Xida, and Zhang Xian play a game. The others stood at the sides to pick the ball up for them. Ximen Qing drank wine as he watched them. Then Daian came with a horse. "My mistress and the other ladies have now been gone some time," he whispered. "Mistress Hua hopes that you'll come as soon as you can." Ximen told the boy to take the horse to the back and wait for him there. He refused to drink any more but took Guijie to her room for a while, and then pretended to go out to wash his hands. Leaving her room, he opened the back door, mounted his horse, and was off like a flash. Ying Bojue saw him go and told a servant to detain him but Ximen would not wait; he declared that he had business at home to attend to. He left Daian to give a tael and five qian to the ballplayers. Thinking that Ximen had gone to Wu Yin'er's house, they sent a servant to follow him there. Bojue and the others drank till the second night watch, and then the party broke up.

037

Hsi-men Ch'ing Is Inspired by Greed to Contemplate Matrimony & Li Ping'er Is Betrothed; Ying Po-chüeh Steals a March in Anticipation of the Ceremony

Doubt not the existence of beauties who can topple kingdoms and cities;
Yet dreams of clouds and rain on Witches' Mountain are ever deluded.
Too great an infatuation with rouge and powder can melt the sturdiest bones;
And lead one to neglect the claims of friendship in favour of moth eyebrows.
In Warm Soft Country one's prowess is still undiminished;
Affected by the Alluring Breeze one's carriage remains dashing.
The heedless fellow is not awake to the evanescence of spring;
Having spent a thousand for a night of pleasure he is reluctant to quit.

As soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing had made his way out the gate of the licensed quarter that day, with Tai-an in attendance, he whipped up his horse and headed straight for Li P'ing-erh's house on Lion Street. Arriving at her front door and dismounting, he saw that the gate was tightly shut and surmised that her guests must already have returned home in their sedan chairs. He told Tai-an to rouse Old Mother Feng, who opened the door for them.
When Hsi-men Ch'ing came in, Li P'ing-erh was standing in the candlelit reception room:
Her flowery headdress in perfect order,
Her white mourning-clothes very becoming,
as she leaned against the latticework of the door, cracking melon seeds with her teeth.
As soon as she saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had arrived, she:
Lightly moved her lotus feet,[1]
Gently lifted her beige skirt, and descended the steps to welcome him, saying as she did so, "If you'd come a little earlier your Third Lady and Fifth Lady would still have been here. They only got into their sedan chairs and departed for home a few minutes ago. Your First Lady left early today. She said you weren't at home. Where have you been?"
"This morning," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I set out with Brother Ying the Second and Hsieh Hsi-ta to see the lanterns. We had hardly passed by your front door when we happened to run into a couple of friends who dragged us off to visit one of the establishments in the licensed quarter. We've been carrying on there ever since. I was afraid you might be waiting for me, so when the pageboy showed up I pretended to have to go to the bathroom and made my escape through the back door. If I hadn't taken matters into my own hands that crew would have hung onto me so tenaciously I could never have gotten away."
"Thank you very much, sir, for your generous presents," said Li P'ing-erh. "Your ladies refused to stay any longer. They kept saying there was no one at home to look after the place but I can't help feeling rather left in the lurch."
Thereupon:
More vintage wine was poured, and
Another rare repast was spread.
In the reception room:
Decorated lanterns were lit up,
Heat-holding drapes were let down.
Animal-shaped briquettes replenished golden braziers,
The scent of ambergris wafted from jeweled censers.
On the festive board:
Rare delicacies rose in piles,
From the goblet's rim:
Fragrant wine overflowed.
The woman handed Hsi-men Ch'ing a cup of wine and then kowtowed to him, saying, "Now that my poor husband is dead I'm completely alone in the world. I offer you this cup of wine today in the hope that you will accept responsibility for me in the future. Sir, if you only saw fit not to reject me for my inadequacies, I'd be more than willing to:
Make the beds and fold the quilts,
for you. If you could just permit me to play the role of a younger sister among the ladies of your household:
I'd be prepared to die if I must.
But I don't know what you think about this."
As she spoke her eyes brimmed over with tears.
Hsi-men Ch'ing accepted the wine and said with a smile, "Please get up. Since you have deigned to express so much love for me, rest assured that where any request from you is concerned:
It is imprinted in my heart.
As soon as your mourning period is over you can leave the rest to me. There's no need for you to worry any more about it. Today is your birthday. Let's drink to it."
Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, drank off the wine and then, after refilling the cup, offered it in return to the woman. She bade him take the seat of honour, and Old Mother Feng went off to busy herself with the preparations in the kitchen. Before long she brought in a serving of birthday noodles.
As they ate, Hsi-men Ch'ing asked who had provided the entertainment during the day, and Li P'ing-erh replied, "Tung Chiao-erh and Han Chin-ch'uan were here today. When the party broke up they accompanied your Third Lady and Fifth Lady home to pick up some artificial flowers they had been promised."
Hsi-men Ch'ing sat on the left side of the table and the two of them fell to drinking together:
Exchanging cups as they drank.
Li P'ing-erh's maidservants, Ying-ch'un and Hsiu-ch'un, stood in attendance, pouring wine and fetching food for them as occasion demanded. Who should come forward at this juncture but Tai-an, who prostrated himself on the floor and kowtowed to Li P'ing-erh, wishing her a happy birthday.
Li P'ing-erh promptly rose to her feet and returned his salute, telling Ying-ch'un as she did so, "Get Old Mother Feng to set aside some noodles and savories in the kitchen, along with a jug of wine, for Tai-an."
"As soon as you've finished eating," Hsi-men Ch'ing told him, "you can go home with the horse."
"When you get there," said Li P'ing-erh, "if your mistress should ask, don't tell her that your master is here."
"Leave it to me," said Tai-an. "I'll just say that Father is spending the night in the licensed quarter and wants me to come and fetch him in the morning."
Hsi-men Ch'ing nodded approvingly, and Li P'ing-erh was as pleased as could be. "What a clever lad," she said.
"He doesn't miss a wink."[2]
She ordered Ying-ch'un to fetch two mace of silver for him, saying, "Here's a little something to help you celebrate the festival. Buy yourself some melon seeds to crack. If you bring me the outlines of your feet sometime soon, I'll make a nice pair of shoes for you."
Tai-an hastily kowtowed, saying, "How could I dream of such a thing?" and then withdrew to the kitchen.
When he had finished eating he led the horse outside, and Old Mother Feng put the crossbar on the front door to secure it for the night.
Li P'ing-erh and Hsi-men Ch'ing played at guess-fingers as they drank. After a while, a set of thirty-two ivory dominoes[3] was brought out. A madder red strip of felt was placed over the table and the two of them played dominoes and drank by the light of the suspended lanterns.
They enjoyed themselves in this way for some time, after which Li P'ing-erh ordered Ying-ch'un to light the candles in her bedroom.
It so happened that after the death of Hua Tzu-hsü, Hsi-men Ch'ing had already enjoyed the favours of both Ying-ch'un and Hsiu-ch'un, so there was no need to hide anything from them. They were instructed to prepare the bed and to bring along the food boxes and wine service from the reception room.
Thereupon, inside the bedstead, within the purple brocade curtains, the woman exposed her powder-white body and was joined by Hsi-men Ch'ing. With their:
Fragrant shoulders huddled together, and Jade bodies snuggled up against each other, the two of them continued to play dominoes and drink wine out of large goblets.
As they were so engaged, Li P'ing-erh asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "When are you going to be finished with the reconstruction work you plan to do over there?"
"I'm only waiting until sometime next month to:
Break ground and start construction," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'm going to tear down your old house and combine the two pieces of property into one. Then I'll erect an artificial hill and a summerhouse in the front, and make a garden and pleasure ground out of it. I'm also planning to build another three-room belvedere, like the one I already have, and call it the Flower-viewing Tower."
"In the tea chest over there behind the bed," the woman said, pointing as she spoke, "I've got forty catties of aloeswood, two hundred catties of white wax, two jars of quicksilver, and eighty catties of imported pepper stored away. If you will have it taken away sometime soon and sold off for its cash value, I'll contribute the proceeds of the sale to your building expenses. If you don't see fit to reject me for my inadequacies, please, whatever happens, tell your First Lady when you get home that I'd be more than willing to play the role of a younger sister among the ladies of your household. It wouldn't matter where I was ranked in the hierarchy. Darling, I just can't go on without you."
As she spoke a cascade of tears began to fall from her eyes.
Hsi-men Ch'ing solicitously endeavored to wipe them away with his handkerchief, saying, "Your feelings are fully understood by me. But we'd better wait until your period of mourning is over, on the one hand, and until I've finished the new construction work, on the other. Otherwise, if I took you into my household, you'd have no place to stay."
"If you really intend to take me into your family," the woman responded, "be sure, whatever you do, to locate the quarters you build for me next to those of your Fifth Lady. I don't know what I'd do without her, she's such a nice person. She and the Third Lady, née Meng, who lives in the rear compound, were just as friendly as could be to me on our very first meeting. The two of them are so alike they seem less like fellow-wives than sisters born of the same mother. Only your First Lady seems somewhat ill-disposed, as though:
Nobody amounts to much in her eyes."
"Actually," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "this humble wife of mine, née Wu, has a most accommodating disposition. If that were not the case, how could I ever manage to have so many bedmates at my disposal? What I plan to do is to build a three-room belvedere on your former property for you to live in, just like the one on mine, and provide access through two postern gates. What do you think of that?"
"Sweetheart," the woman replied, "that would please me no end."
Thereupon, the two of them:
Tumbled and tossed like male and female phoenixes,
Indulging their lusts without restraint.
It was the fourth watch before they finally:
Fell asleep on the same pillow,
Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh.
The next day it was past lunchtime before they stirred. The woman had not yet combed her hair when Ying-ch'un brought in some congee. She and Hsi-men Ch'ing had hardly finished half a bowl of the congee when wine was brought in and the two of them fell to drinking again.
It so happened that Li P'ing-erh was fond of doing it doggie fashion. Getting down on all fours, she made Hsi-men Ch'ing sit on the pillow and insert himself into her inverted flower while she:
Moved back and forth as she wished.
Just as the two of them were approaching their climax, what should they hear but Tai-an knocking at the gate, having arrived on horseback to fetch his master. Hsi-men Ch'ing called him over to the window and asked him what was up.
"There are three merchants from Szechwan and Hu-kuang waiting for you at home," replied Tai-an. "They have some excellent stock to dispose of and would like to weigh it out with Uncle Fu the Second and settle accounts. They are asking only a hundred taels down to conclude a contract, with the balance due in the middle decade of the eighth month. The First Lady sent me to ask you to come home and take care of the matter."
"You didn't say I was here, did you?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"I told her you were at Li Kuei-chieh's place in the licensed quarter," said Tai-an. "I didn't tell anyone you were here."
"She doesn't know how to handle things," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All she had to do was tell Uncle Fu the Second to take care of it. What need was there to send for me?"

"Uncle Fu the Second proposed to do just that," replied Tai-an, "but the merchants wouldn't agree to it. They refused to sign the contract until they had seen you in person."
"As long as they've sent the boy after you," said Li P'ing-erh:
"Business comes first.
If you don't go home you'll only upset the lady of the house."
"You don't know these lousy southern bastards," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "They never come knocking at your door, trying to unload their goods, unless the market is slow and they've got nowhere else to dispose of them. You've got to buy on time, for three months or half a year. If you pay them off any sooner than that they'll start getting ideas. I've got the largest store in the whole Ch'ing-ho district and do the largest volume of business. It wouldn't matter how long I kept them waiting, they'd still have to come looking for me in the end."
"To refuse a business deal,
Is to risk making an enemy," said Li P'ing-erh. "Why don't you do as I say: go on home, take care of them, and come back later? After all:
There are as many days ahead of us as there are leaves on the willow tree."[4]
Hsi-men Ch'ing acknowledged the force of Li P'ing-erh's rhetoric by slowly getting up, combing his hair and washing his face, donning his hairnet, and putting on his clothes. After Li P'ing-erh had provided him with something further to eat, without more ado, he put on his eye-mask and rode home on horseback.
There were four or five merchants waiting for him in the shop who went about their business as soon as he had supervised the weighing out of the merchandise, settled the account, and signed the contract.
Hsi-men Ch'ing then paid a visit to P'an Chin-lien's quarters.
"Where did you go yesterday?" she demanded to know. "If you tell the truth, I'll forget it; but if you don't, I'll kick up a real rumpus."
"Since you were all out being entertained at the Hua house," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I went for a tour of the Lantern Market with a few of my friends, after which we went into the licensed quarter and made a night of it. I didn't get home until the pageboy came to fetch me this morning."
"The pageboy went to fetch you all right," said Chin-lien, "but I doubt if any part of the licensed quarter saw so much as your ghost. So much for that! You lousy two-timer, you still think you can fool me do you? That whore yesterday was so anxious to get us out of the way it was obvious she was:
Up to her preternatural pranks.
She must have invited you over so you could screw the night away. She didn't let you go till you were screwed out, I dare say. And as for that lousy jailbird, Tai-an:
He's such a practiced old hand, he had one story for the First Lady and another story for me.
"Initially, when he came back with the horse and the First Lady asked him, 'Why hasn't your father come home? Who's place is he drinking at?' he replied, 'He went for a tour of the Lantern Market with Uncle Ying the Second and that crowd. They're all in the licensed quarter now, having a party at Li Kuei-chieh's place. He told me to come back and fetch him in the morning.'
"Later on, however, when I called him into my room and interrogated him myself, he just giggled and wouldn't say anything. Only after I began to give him a hard time did he say, 'Father's really at Mistress Hua the Second's place on Lion Street.' The lousy jailbird! How did he know that you and I are:
Of one heart and one mind?
You must have told him it was all right to tell me."
"I did nothing of the sort," said Hsi-men Ch'ing evasively.
Seeing that concealment was no longer possible, however, he went on to tell her all about Li P'ing-erh's invitation of the previous night.
"When I arrived she offered me a cup of wine and apologized for the scant entertainment she had been able to provide you. Then she started to weep and wail, telling me that her household was understaffed, that the rear part of the property was deserted, and that she was afraid to be alone there at night. Her one desire is that I will marry her. She asked when I was going to finish building the new house. She also showed me several hundred taels worth of aromatics, wax, and other valuable goods, and suggested that I broker them for her and keep the proceeds to help defray the building expenses. She wants me to start on the construction work as soon as possible so she can move in next to you and be a sister of yours. But I fear you may not agree to that."
"It's not as though I have:
A shadow too many,
here as it is," said the woman. "I only hope she does move in. That would be fine by me. This place of mine is completely deserted, and I'd love to have somebody to keep me company. It's always been true that:
A multitude of boats need not clog the channel,
A multitude of carts need not block the road.[5]
I could hardly refuse her the same sort of welcome I once received myself. It's not as though she were trying to take my place away from me or anything like that. My only fear is that:
Other people may not be as well disposed as I am.
You'll have to find out what the First Lady thinks about it."
"It's only something to talk about at the moment," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Her mourning period isn't even over yet."
Their colloquy at an end, the woman was helping Hsi-men Ch'ing off with his white satin jacket when an object fell out of his sleeve with a tinkling sound. Taking it in her hand, she found it had a heavy feel to it and was about the size of a fowling pellet. She scrutinized it for some time but couldn't tell what it was. Behold:
To the tune "Immortal at the River"
First introduced as a product of the barbarian armies;
It has found its way by recommendation to the capital itself.
Its body is miniature,
its interior hollow.
Once set in motion
by the merest touch;
It will roll around spontaneously,
stridulant as a cicada.
Adept at arousing consternation
in the beauty's heart;
A veteran contributor to the vigor of the loins;
Its sobriquet is "Brazenfaced Valiant Vanguard."
On the victory honours list forever number one;
It has won renown as
"The Titillating Bell."[6]
The woman examined it for some time before asking. "What on earth is it? And why does it give me a numb feeling halfway up my arm?"
"This is something you wouldn't be familiar with," Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed. "It's called a 'titillating bell' and comes from the southern country of Burma. Good ones cost four or five taels of silver."
"What do you do with it?" the woman asked.
"If you put it in your 'crucible' before doing the deed," said Hsi-men Ch'ing:
"It's too wonderful for words."
"You've been experimenting with Li P'ing-erh, haven't you?" the woman said.
Thereupon, Hsi-men Ch'ing gave a full account of the events of the preceding night, with the result that Chin-lien's:
Lecherous desires were suddenly aroused.
Though it was broad daylight, the two of them:
Took off their clothes and went to bed.
Truly:
Who knows what reason there might be that Wang-tzu Ch'iao;[7]
No sooner learned to "play the flute" than he became transported.[8]
To make a long story short, one day Hsi-men Ch'ing met with the appropriate brokers and weighed out the aromatics, wax, and other goods that had been stored in the tea chest behind Li P'ing-erh's bed. In all he was able to realize 380 taels of silver by the sale. Li P'ing-erh kept only 180 taels out of this sum for her own expenses and turned over the balance to Hsi-men Ch'ing to help defray the cost of the new building.
The yin-yang master was consulted and the eighth day of the second month chosen to:
Break ground and start construction.
Hsi-men Ch'ing turned over five hundred taels of silver to his head servant, Lai-chao, and his manager, Pen the Fourth, and put them in charge of procuring the necessary bricks, tiles, lumber, and stone, supervising the work, and handling the accounts.
This Pen the Fourth, whose name was Pen Ti-ch'uan, or Scurry-about Pen, was a young man who was by nature:
Dashing and affected,
Versatile and clever.
He had begun his career as a flunky in the household of one of the imperial eunuchs. But because he:
Was not the sort to abide by his lot,
Took his cut of both outgo and income;[9]
and got caught cooking the books, he had been dismissed. He supported himself for a while as a catamite, after which he took a job as a servant in a well-to-do household. From this position he had subsequently absconded with a wet nurse, whom he took as his wife, and set himself up as a dealer in the secondhand clothes trade. On top of all this he was also a proficient performer on the p'i-p'a, the flute, and other wind instruments.
Hsi-men Ch'ing was so impressed by the variety of his talents that he often patronized him, allowing him to weigh out the goods in his wholesale pharmaceutical business and earn commissions as a middleman. As a result, he had come to feel, in matters both great and small, that he could hardly do without him.
On the appointed day, Pen Ti-ch'uan and Lai-chao supervised the artisans of the various trades as they began the construction work. First they demolished the old house on what had been the Hua property and took down the intervening wall, then they laid the foundations and erected a summerhouse, an artificial hill, pavilions, terraces, and other recreational facilities. This was not the work of a day but there is no need to describe it exhaustively.
Light and darkness alternate swiftly,
The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.
Hsi-men Ch'ing had remained at home overseeing the construction of his new garden for more than a month when the hundredth-day anniversary of Hua Tzu-hsü's death that fell in the first decade of the third month, became imminent. Li P'ing-erh invited Hsi-men Ch'ing over beforehand to discuss the arrangements.
"I intend to burn Hua Tzu-hsü's spirit tablet," she said. "I don't know whether you plan to sell this house or not but I wish you would send someone over to look after it and take me into your own household as soon as possible. I don't want to stay here any longer than necessary. At night it's completely deserted and I'm afraid. There are often fox spirits about doing their best to drive me to distraction. When you get home, please tell the First Lady that if she would only take pity on me it would save my life. It wouldn't make any difference where you chose to rank me in the hierarchy, I'd be more than willing to:
Make the beds and fold the quilts,
for you without repining." As she spoke:
Her tears fell like rain.
"There's no need to get so upset," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I already mentioned what you told me to my wife and Fifth Lady after I got home the other day. Just wait until the house I'm building for you is finished. By that time your mourning period will be nearly over. It won't be any too late to have you carried over the threshold then."
"Fine enough," said Li P'ing-erh. "But if it's really true that you intend to marry me, I wish you'd expedite the building of the house and take me over there as soon as possible. If I were able to live for even a day as a member of your household:
I'd be prepared to die if I must.
As long as I stay here:
Each day is like a year."[10]
"I understand what you're saying," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"Even if the house isn't finished on time," said Li P'ing-erh, "once I've burnt the spirit tablet I could occupy the upper floor of the Fifth Lady's belvedere for a few days and then move into the new building after it's completed. Whatever else you do, when you get home speak to the Fifth Lady about it. I'll be waiting for your answer. The tenth of the third month is the hundredth-day anniversary of his death. I'll have to have a sutra reading and burn his spirit tablet then."
Hsi-men Ch'ing gave his assent and stayed overnight with the woman.
The next day he repeated everything she had said, word for word, to P'an Chin-lien.
"Of course, that would be fine," said Chin-lien. "I'd be perfectly happy to set aside a room or two for her to live in. It's the others I'd be worried about. You'll have to find out what the First Lady thinks about it. As far as I'm concerned:
There's water enough in the channel
for all the boats.[11]
It all depends on what our elder sister has to say."
Hsi-men Ch'ing went straight to Wu Yüeh-niang's room. He found her combing her hair and proceeded to give her a complete account of Li P'ing-erh's desire to marry into the family, from beginning to end.
"You really can't very well marry her," said Yüeh-niang. "In the first place: her mourning period isn't over yet. In the second place: you were formerly on intimate terms with her husband. And in the third place: you've already been engaged in hanky-panky with her, first buying their house and then stashing away all the valuables she entrusted to you for safekeeping. As the saying goes:
The loom may stay put but the shuttle gets around.[12]

I've heard people say that Hua the Elder from her husband's branch of the family is a tough customer. If any word of this should get about you'd only be:
Inviting lice onto your own head to scratch.[12]
What I say is in your own best interests but:
Be you Chao, Ch'ien, Sun, or Li,[14]
I've had my say, you may do as you please."
With these few words she succeeded in reducing Hsi-men Ch'ing to silence. He went out to the front reception hall and sat down in a chair all by himself to ponder the situation. He didn't see how he could either convey this reply to Li P'ing-erh or refuse to go back and see her. After thinking it over for some time he returned to Chin-lien's room.
"When you went to see our elder sister, what did she say?" asked Chin-lien.
Hsi-men Ch'ing told her everything Yüeh-niang had said.
"Her objections are certainly reasonable enough," said Chin-lien. "First you bought his house and now you want to marry his wife into the bargain, a woman with whom you only became acquainted through your long-standing relationship with her husband. And there's another thing to consider too. Since even between friends:
Though there may be no secrets, there are some constraints,
if it ever came to the attention of the authorities, they would take a dim view of it."
"I think I could handle that," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What worries me is that bastard, Hua the Elder. No doubt he resents the fact that he:
No longer has an arena for his tricks.
If he finds out about this and tries to make trouble on the grounds that her mourning period isn't over yet, what am I to do? Right now I'm at a loss how to reply to her."
"Phooey! What's so hard about that?" said Chin-lien. "Tell me, are you planning to give her your answer today or tomorrow?"
"She wants me to give her an answer of some kind today," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"When you go there today then," said Chin-lien, "this is what you do. Say to her, 'I talked it over with the Fifth Lady when I got home but there are such quantities of raw pharmaceuticals in storage on the second floor of her belvedere that there'd be no place to put your furniture if you moved in. You might as well wait a little longer. Your house is 70 or 80 percent completed already. I'll urge the artisans to speed up their work on the decorating, painting and varnishing, and other finishing touches, and by the time they're through your mourning period will be nearly over. If I take you in then, everything will be in proper order. That would be a lot better than having you move in on top of the Fifth Lady right now, while you're still in a ritual status that makes you:
Neither fish nor fowl.
You'd only get in each other's way and find it difficult to keep up appearances.' If you do as I suggest, I guarantee she'll give up the idea."
Hsi-men Ch'ing was so delighted by what he heard that he set out for Li P'ing-erh's house without delay.
"How did it go with that request of mine when you got home?" the woman asked.
"The Fifth Lady said," reported Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that you'd do better to wait until they've finished painting and varnishing your new house before moving in. Right now there's so much stuff:
Strewn about higgledy-piggledy, on the second floor of her place that if you went over there there'd be no place to store your things. And there's another problem as well. If your husband's eldest brother should complain that your mourning period isn't over yet, what would we do then?"
"He wouldn't dare interfere in my affairs," said the woman. "Quite aside from the fact that:
Each of us has his own life to live, and that a formal settlement of the matter of the disputed property has already been reached; as far as I'm concerned:
In one's first marriage one must obey one's parents;
In subsequent marriages one can suit oneself.
It's always been the case that:
Brothers and sisters-in-law do not
ask after each other.
My husband's eldest brother has no business interfering in my private affairs. As it is, he can see I'm having a hard time making a go of it but what does he care? If he so much as lets off a fart, by the time I'm finished with him, he'll:
Die in his chair,
Not daring to die in his bed.
You can relax on that score, sir. He won't dare give me any trouble."
"As for this house of yours," she then went on to ask, "how soon is it going to be finished anyway?"
"I've already instructed the artisans," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "to give priority to the three-room belvedere I'm building for you. By the time they're done with the painting and varnishing it will be the beginning of the fifth month."
"My darling," the woman said, "push ahead with it as fast as you can. I'm willing to wait until then if I must."
When they had finished talking, a maidservant brought in wine and the two of them fell to enjoying themselves and drinking together for the rest of the night.
From this time on, Hsi-men Ch'ing came to see her every three to five days, without fail but there is no need to describe this in detail.
Light and darkness alternate swiftly,
The construction work in Hsi-men Ch'ing's residential compound had already been under way for more than two months, and the three-room belvedere, called the Flower-viewing Tower, was nearing completion. All that remained was the summerhouse, for which the foundation had not yet been laid.
One day the Dragon Boat Festival, on the fifth day of the fifth month, rolled around.
In each household artemisia leaves adorn the gate,
In every dwelling efficacious charms deck the door.[15]
Li P'ing-erh prepared a feast in honour of the occasion and invited Hsi-men Ch'ing over to share the festival tsung-tzu with her, on the one hand, and to discuss the date she would be carried over his threshold, on the other. They decided that on the fifteenth day of the fifth month she would engage Buddhist priests to hold a sutra-reading and burn the spirit tablet of her deceased husband, after which Hsi-men Ch'ing would arrange to have her carried over his threshold.
Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked Li P'ing-erh, "On the day you burn the spirit tablet, are you planning to invite Hua the Elder, Hua the Third, and Hua the Fourth, or not?"
"I'll send them each an invitation," the woman replied. "They can come or not as they please."
Now that their plans had been made, all that remained was to wait for the fifteenth day of the fifth month. The woman engaged the services of twelve monks from the Pao-en Temple, who came to her home on the appointed day to perform the sutra-reading and preside over the burning of the spirit tablet.
The same day, Hsi-men Ch'ing wrapped up three mace of silver as a birthday present for Ying Po-chüeh. In the morning he also gave five taels of silver to Tai-an and instructed him to buy chicken, goose, duck, and whatever else was needed for a feast that evening to celebrate the end of Li P'ing-erh's mourning period. Then, taking P'ing-an and Hua-t'ung with him to look after the horse, he set out in the early afternoon for Ying Po-chüeh's house.
Among those attending the party that day were Tagalong Hsieh, Sticky Chu, Blabbermouth Sun, Heartless Wu, Welsher Yün, Cadger Ch'ang, Scrounger Pai, and the new recruit to the company, Scurry-about Pen. All ten members of the club were present, not one of them having failed to put in an appearance. Two boy actors had also been engaged to play and sing for them.
After everyone had been served with wine and they had taken their places at the table, Hsi-men Ch'ing called the two boy actors over to him. He recognized the first of them to be Wu Yin-erh's younger brother, Wu Hui.
The other, whom he did not recognize, knelt down and said, "I am Cheng Ai-hsiang's elder brother, Cheng Feng."
Hsi-men Ch'ing, who occupied the seat of honour, rewarded each of them with two mace of silver.
The party continued until the sun began to sink in the west. At this juncture Tai-an arrived with a horse to fetch his master.
Coming right up to the table, he whispered into Hsi-men Ch'ing's ear, "The lady would like you to come over as soon as you can."
Hsi-men Ch'ing responded with a wink, and Tai-an had started on his way out of the room when he was called to a halt by Ying Po-chüeh, who demanded, "You lousy dog-bone! Come over here and tell me the truth. If you don't tell the truth, I'll give your little ear a permanent twist. How many birthdays do you think your Daddy Ying has in a year, that you should come with the horse to fetch your father while the sun is still high in the sky? Where are you off to anyway? And who really sent you here? It may have been one of your mistresses at home but it may just as well have been that 'Eighteenth Youngster' [16] from the licensed quarter. If you don't tell me, a hundred years will go by before I ever put in a good word with your father to find this little dog-bone of his a wife."
Tai-an's only response was to say, "The truth is: nobody sent me. I feared it was getting late and thought Father might want to be on his way, so I brought the horse along early to await his convenience."
Ying Po-chüeh harassed him a while longer, without effect, and then said, "If you don't tell me what's afoot, and I find out about it later on, see if I don't settle accounts with you, you little oily mouth."
So saying, he poured out a cup of wine and selected half a saucerful of savories for Tai-an to eat when he had retired from their presence.
After some time, Hsi-men Ch'ing withdrew to the bathroom in order to adjust his toilet.
Summoning Tai-an, he drew him aside and asked him, "Who all showed up at the Hua house today?"
"Hua the Third is off in the country somewhere," reported Tai-an. "And Hua the Fourth is at home suffering from an eye ailment. No one came from either of their families. Only Hua the Elder and his wife showed up. After they had eaten their fill of the vegetarian fare, the husband went home first, leaving his wife behind. When she was ready to leave, Mistress Hua called her into her room and presented her with ten taels of silver and two sets of clothes, for which she actually kowtowed in gratitude."
"Did she have anything to say?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"She didn't venture so much as a word about it," replied Tai-an. "All she said was that when Mistress Hua is carried over your threshold she'd like to pay you a call on the 'third-day celebrations.' "
"Did she really say that?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"How would I dare lie about it," responded Tai-an.
When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this his heart was filled with delight. "Are the oblations completed as yet?" he went on to ask.
"The monks left some time ago," replied Tai-an. "The spirit tablet has already been burned. Mistress Hua said she'd like you to come over as soon as you can."
"I understand," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Go outside and take care of the horse."
Tai-an was on his way out when, unexpectedly, Ying Po-chüeh, who had been eavesdropping in the corridor, suddenly accosted him with a shout that gave him quite a start.
"You lousy little dog-bone!" he cursed. "You wouldn't tell me anything but I've already contrived to hear all about it. A fine thing your father and you are up to!"
"You crazy dog!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Don't make such a fuss or everyone in the place will find out about it."
"If you'd taken me into your confidence in the first place," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I might not have said anything about it."
Thereupon he went right back to the table and, thus and so, told everyone the whole story.
Taking hold of Hsi-men Ch'ing, he said, "Brother, what sort of a person are you anyway?
Can such things be,
that you should keep them to yourself without even letting your brothers in on them? Even if Hua the Elder had had anything to say about it, all you would have had to do was give us the word. Once we had spoken to him, he would have gone along with anything, never fear. If he had dared to utter so much as a single 'no,' we would have given him his lumps, make no mistake about it.
"Honestly, though, is this marriage set, or isn't it? Tell us all about it. Really! What are friends for, anyway? If there's anything we can do for you, we'd be willing to:
Go through fire for you, or Go through water for you.[17]
In fact:
We seek not to have been born the same day;
We seek only to die, every man for himself.[18]
As long as we're prepared to treat you this way, unless you have some reason you haven't disclosed, why should you want to keep us in the dark?"
Tagalong Hsieh picked up where he left off.
"Brother," he said, "if you refuse to tell us any more, we'll make such a fuss in the licensed quarter that Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh will hear about it and everyone will be embarrassed."
Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, saying, "All right, then, I'll make a clean breast of it. The wedding has all been arranged."
"The day for the ceremony, when you have her carried over the threshold, hasn't been set yet, has it?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.
"The day you carry our sister-in-law over the threshold," said Tagalong Hsieh, "we'll come to congratulate you. Whatever else you do, Brother, you'll have to engage four singing girls and invite us to a wedding feast."
"That goes without saying," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Of course, all of you will be invited."
"Rather than waiting to congratulate our brother on a future occasion," said Sticky Chu, "why don't we offer him a toast in advance?"
Thereupon, Sponger Ying presented the toast, Tagalong Hsieh held the flagon, Sticky Chu proffered some viands, and the rest of them all knelt down too, to keep them company. The two boy actors were also dragged into the act, being made to kneel down and sing the song suite entitled "30 Melodies," which begins with the words:

How happy this auspicious day.[19]

The planet Venus has appeared, dimly discernible amid variegated clouds.
See how the jade tree before the reception hall,
Has once again put forth a magic sprout.
Having been invited to attend the feast,
We offer a curved kingfisher feather with a sharp quill,
And a round gold embroidery frame
of paltry diameter,
As tokens of esteem for this lovely new face;
And in the hope that you will remain a happy pair,
And continue to live harmoniously together for a hundred years.

Five hundred years ago your destiny was sealed,
Only to be fulfilled today.
Here in your magistrate's tribunal, on the occasion of this birthday,
We offer a toast to your long life.
As pure as jade,
As captivating as a flower,
This is the flawless jewel of the age.
At this feast to celebrate the bathing of the child,
On this auspicious day,
The whole household is happy as can be.
Necklaces and bracelets hold in place the mermaid silk.
Our only wish is that,
Your longevity be that of a mountain,
Your good fortune as deep as the sea,
And that you share glorious success.
The happy hubbub at this elegant feast is not inconsiderable.
Truly: the Queen Mother of the Western Pool has temporarily abandoned paradise;
Immortal lads amid the clouds proffer
the peaches of immortality.
With her patent of nobility she is entitled to a coach and four,
The phoenix headdress and cloud-patterned cape.
Surrounded by attendant beauties,
Entitled to golden insignia and purple seal-ribbons,
He has returned to his old home,
Where, dressed in motley, he can join his family in enjoying the season.
If the proper rites are not observed it may give rise to resentment;
Human nature is such that one must be chary of too intimate relationships.
We are happy to live in an era of good government when the people are not disturbed,
And wish the nation to be at peace and the wind and rain harmonious.
A jade ch'i-lin has fulfilled the bear's portent of a noble birth.
So now that famous beauty, the elder Ch'iao, is as lucky as her little sister,
And with a baby to boot,
To bring glory to its ancestors,
And continue the family tradition of wearing gold and sable.
Tortoise and crane portend good fortune, sporting in pool and pavilion;
Pine and cypress intertwine their branches,
intimating endurance.
Grain grows in double ears; phoenixes alight in respect.
They are like birds that fly only in pairs,
like mating phoenixes.
Shadows of flowers tumble and toss on the screen;
The sound of singing resounds in the air.
The dancers with willowy waists like Hsiao-man's are danced out;
The tune "Rainbow Skirts and Feathered Garments" is finally over;
As they turn their heads, cloud-shaped palace head ornaments fall out.
The ornate halls are deep,
The gardens and courtyards secluded.
The incense floating from jeweled censers is curling upwards.
Roll up the embroidered curtains and beaded portieres;
Let the swallows come and nest
if they will.
We are confronted with crimson peaches,
seemingly afire,
Just as they should be.
We see butterflies, one pair after another, flying around us.
At this auspicious feast, this festival of flowers,
The small zither and great zither are in harmony.
Let us enjoy the music of pipes and woodwinds;
Unbutton our collars,
Open our mouths in laughter;
Give way to drunkenness, empty
the golden flagons;
And leave the red apricot blossoms to revel on their branch tips.
May your wealth and distinction flourish like the three months of spring,
And may the voice of the cuckoo never be heard to portend their end.
CODA:
May the incense of your sacrifices never cease,
your flowers never grow old;
May your good fortune be deep as the Eastern Sea, your longevity ever increase;
May you fulfill your days with mutual respect and enjoy your life together.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was made to swallow three or four cups of wine in a row. "Brother," said Sticky Chu, "on the day you invite us to the feast, you must be sure to include Cheng Feng and Wu Hui as well. That's settled then. Whatever happens, the two of you must go."

Cheng Feng, deferentially covering his mouth with his hand, replied, "We promise to report to your home for duty at an early hour."

Before long, after everyone had been served with wine, they returned to their places, sat down, and embarked upon another bout of drinking.

The day gradually waned and Hsi-men Ch'ing grew restless. As soon as he thought no one was looking, he got up and tried to slip away but Ying Po-chüeh attempted to block the door and prevent his escape.

"Brother Ying," intervened Tagalong Hsieh. "let him go. We wouldn't want to spoil his plans and arouse the resentment of our sister-in-law." Hsi-men Ch'ing seized the opportunity to leap on his horse and disappeared in a puff of smoke.

When he arrived at Lion Street, Li P'ing-erh had already divested herself of her mourning and changed into a more colourful outfit. In the reception room:

Ablaze with lamps and candles;[20]

the table was laid with a full complement of wine and delicacies, with a single folding armchair standing at its head.

Not until Hsi-men Ch'ing had assumed the place of honour was a jug of wine broached and decanted. A maidservant held the flagon, from which Li P'ing-erh proceeded to fill a cup to the brim and offer it to her guest.

She then kowtowed to him four times:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder, and said, "Today the spirit tablet of my poor husband has been burnt. If you, sir, deign not to reject me, I will enjoy the pleasure of:

Waiting upon you with towel and comb,

thereby:

Fulfilling my desire for connubial bliss."

When she rose to her feet after completing her obeisances, Hsi-men Ch'ing also got up from his seat and proffered the woman a cup of wine in return. Only then did they sit down to enjoy themselves together.

"Did Hua the Elder or his wife have anything to say today?" Hsi-men Ch'ing asked.

"After the noon vegetarian meal," replied Li P'ing-erh, "I invited them into my room and told them about your intentions. He expressed nothing but pleasure at the news and didn't have a word to say against it. All he said was that he'd have his wife pay you a call on the 'third-day celebrations.' I gave them ten taels of silver and two sets of clothes. The two of them were as happy as could be and thanked me again and again on their way out the door."

"If that was their only response," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I might as well let them come calling: what does it matter? But if they utter a single word of criticism, I'll never forgive them."
"If either of them so much as lets a hot fart on the subject," asserted Li P'ing-erh, "I won't let them get away with it."
Thereupon, Old Mother Feng brought out some soup and an assortment of appetizers from the kitchen. Li P'ing-erh had taken the trouble to:
Wash her hands and trim her nails, before personally preparing some miniature steamed dumplings with a stuffing of minced scallions and mutton. From a chased silver goblet filled with southern wine, Hsiu-ch'un poured out two cups for her mistress and her visitor. Hsi-men Ch'ing drank only the first half-cupful of his wine and presented the remainder to Li P'ing-erh.
One goes, the other comes;
and thus they proceeded to drink several cups in a row. Truly:
The sway of passion takes one's years away;
The force of setting makes the wine flow free.[21]
Because the day of her marriage was impending, Li P'ing-erh was even happier than usual. Her face was wreathed in smiles.
"While you were drinking just now at the Ying place," she said, "you kept me waiting a long time. I was afraid you might get drunk, so I sent for Tai-an to ask you to come over as soon as possible. Did anyone there catch on?"
"Beggar Ying, as usual, guessed that something was afoot," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He pressured the pageboy into letting out a few words about it, and then clowned around for a while. The members of the club demanded a chance to offer their congratulations, so I guess I'll have to engage singing girls and throw a party for them. They also ganged up on me and made me swallow a few cups of wine. As soon as I thought no one was looking, I tried to slip away but they blocked the door, and:
Argued the pros and cons,
among themselves before letting me go."
"The fact they let you go shows they understand a thing or two," said Li P'ing-erh.
Hsi-men Ch'ing, having noticed that:
Her drunken demeanor invited license; and
Her passionate eyes expressed desire, lost no time in abandoning all restraint. He:
Stuck out his clove-shaped tongue; and
Nuzzled her apricot cheeks.
Li P'ing-erh embraced Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "My darling, if you really do plan to marry me, make it as soon as possible. It's inconvenient for you to have to come and go this way. Don't leave me here to long for you day and night."
When she had finished speaking, they:
Tossed first this way and then that;
Till they were intertwined into one.
Truly:
A beauty who could topple kingdoms and cities
belonged to Emperor Wu of Han;[22]
A goddess who could make clouds and make rain appeared to King Hsiang of Ch'u.[23]
There is a poem that testifies to this:

In passion's thrall breast presses close to breast;
In tender aftermath, arms are gently enlaced.
Let the silver lamp burn brightly as it will;
They're still afraid it's nothing but a dream.

Ximen Qing left the bawdy house. With Daian following, he went to see Li Ping'er at her house in Lion Street. When they found the gate closed, they knew that the guests had got into their sedan chairs and departed. Daian called to old woman Feng to open the door. She let Ximen Qing in. Li Ping'er, holding a candle, was waiting for him in the hall. She looked very charming in her pretty headdress and soft white clothes. She had been leaning on the framework of the lattice longing for him to come; and when he came, she ran downstairs to meet him, her lotus-like feet moving swiftly, her silken skirt fluttering.
"If you had been a little earlier," she said, smiling, "you would have found two of your ladies still here. They have only just gone. The Great Lady went away early, because she said you were not at home. If that is so, where have you been?"
"Brother Ying and Brother Xie asked me to go and see the lanterns with them," Ximen Qing said, "and we were passing your door when we met two other friends. They carried me off to the bawdy house, and I could not get away before this late hour. I thought you would be waiting for me, and, as soon as the boy came, I said I was going to wash my hands. I slipped away through the back door. If I hadn't done so, they would have kept me and I should never have been able to get away."
"Thank you very much for the splendid present you sent me," Li Ping'er said. "I could not prevail upon your ladies to stay. They said there was no one at home but nonetheless I felt ashamed."
She heated some excellent wine and served food to him. The lanterns were lighted in the hall and the curtains drawn. Charcoal was put into the golden brazier and precious incense into the incense burner. She kowtowed before him and offered him a cup of wine.
"My foolish husband is dead now," she said, "and I have no other relatives. Today, my lord, I offer you this cup of wine and implore you to take me under your protection. Do not despise my lack of comeliness, for I wish nothing more than to be your slave and a sister to all your ladies. I have told you my wishes but what you may think about it I do not know." As she said this, she shed tears.
Ximen took the wine and raised her up. "Do not kneel," he said, "I am grateful for your love. When your period of mourning is over, I shall know what course to take. You need worry no longer. This is your lucky day, and we can enjoy our wine without a care." He drank his own wine and poured a cup for Li Ping'er. Then they sat down and, in a little while, old woman Feng, who was in charge of the kitchen, brought them some dumplings.
"Who were the singing girls today?" Ximen Qing said.
"Dong Jiao'er and Han Jinchuan," Li Ping'er said. "They went after your ladies to get some flowers from them."
They sat on the bed and drank wine, exchanging cups. Xiuchun and Yingchun waited upon them. Daian came and kowtowed to Li Ping'er to congratulate her upon her birthday. She rose quickly and returned his greeting. She asked Yingchun to tell old woman Feng to give him some birthday dumplings, cakes, and a jar of wine in the kitchen.
"You may go home as soon as you have finished," Ximen told him.
"And when you get home," Li Ping'er said, "if any of the ladies ask where your master is, don't tell them he is here."
"I understand," the boy said. "I will tell them that Father is spending the night somewhere else. Tomorrow morning I will come back for him." Ximen nodded approval and Li Ping'er was very pleased. "What an intelligent boy he is," she cried. "You can see it in his eyes." She told Yingchun to give him two qian of silver with which to buy melon seeds. "Let me know what size you take," she said to him, "and I will make you a pair of shoes."
Daian kowtowed again, thanked her, and went away when he had had a meal in the kitchen. Old woman Feng bolted the gate. Ximen Qing and Li Ping'er guessed fingers, and then, taking a set of thirty-two ivory tablets, set a cloth upon the table and played dominoes as they drank their wine. Then they told Yingchun to light them with a candle to the bedroom. Now that Hua Zixu was dead, both Yingchun and Xiuchun had yielded to Ximen's desire. The lovers did as they pleased in the presence of these maids, and were quite at their ease. They called for the bed to be prepared and for fruit and wine to be placed within the purple silk net. Li Ping'er unveiled her white body and Ximen Qing sat beside her. They went on with their game of dominoes, and drank great cups of wine together.
"When are you going to begin the rebuilding of the house?" Li Ping'er asked suddenly.
"I shall get the work in hand at the middle of the second month," Ximen said. "I propose to make the two properties into one and let the gardens run together. At the front I am having an artificial mound and a shelter made, and at the back a garden pavilion of three rooms where we can go to enjoy the flowers."
"In some tea chests behind that bed," Li Ping'er said, "there are thirty or forty pounds of aloes, two hundred pounds of white wax, two jars of quicksilver, and eighty pounds of pepper. Take them all away and sell them; you can use the money to help pay the building expenses. If I find favour in your sight, when you get home tell the Great Lady that I hope to take a sister's place among your ladies. Give me any place you choose but I cannot live without you." She began to sob again.
Ximen Qing took out his handkerchief and wiped away her tears. "I understand perfectly," he said, "but you must wait till the building is finished and your mourning is over. Until then there will be no place where you can live."
"If you really intend to marry me, you will build a little pavilion for me near that of your Fifth Lady. She is so nice, and I am very fond of her. The Third Lady too is very kind to me. One would never take them to be anything but sisters. The Great Lady is not quite so agreeable. Somehow those eyebrows of hers seem supercilious."
"My foolish wife is really one of the kindest of souls," Ximen Qing said, "or she would never have managed to keep such a large household in order. I will build a three-roomed pavilion with two little doors for you, as fine as the place in which you live now. What do you think of that?"
"Oh, Brother, what more could I wish for?" Li Ping'er said.
They played together unrestrainedly, as the male phoenix plays with his mate, and their delight was so great that it was the fourth night watch before they went to sleep. Then, close pressed in each other's arms, they slept until morning. Breakfast time came but they did not rise, and Yingchun brought them some rice porridge. They ate a little of it, and then called for wine. Li Ping'er liked to play at being a horse. She made Ximen Qing take up his position on a pillow, and she placed herself in the manner of a flower inverted. They were enjoying themselves like this when Daian, who had brought Ximen Qing's horse, came and knocked at the door. Ximen called him to the window and asked what he wanted.
"Three merchants from Sichuan and Guangdong have come to see you," the boy said. "They are waiting with a host of fine things. They have shown them to Uncle Fu. All they ask for them is a hundred taels of silver on the signing of the contract, and the rest in the eighth month. My mistress told me to ask you to come and see them."
"You didn't tell her I was here, did you?" Ximen Qing said.
"No," said the boy, "I told them you were spending the night at Guijie's house."
"They have no sense," Ximen said. "Your uncle Fu could have managed this perfectly well. Why send and bother me?"
"Uncle Fu has talked to them," Daian said, "but the strangers will not settle with him. They will not sign the contract unless you go yourself."
"Your family has sent the boy for you," Li Ping'er said. "Business must come first. You must go, or the Great Lady will be angry."
"You don't know these thievish barbarians," Ximen said. "They miss the proper season, can't get rid of their goods, and then come to me. If I show myself at all eager to accept their terms, they will very soon ask for more. In the whole of this district mine is the only wholesale house, and they must come to me, whatever I choose to offer."
"In business matters," Li Ping'er said, "you should take care not to turn friends into enemies. Please do as I tell you. Go home, and get rid of them. There are still as many days before us as there are leaves upon a willow tree."
Ximen agreed to do as she wished. He got out of bed in a leisurely manner, combed his hair, washed his face, and put on his hairnet and clothes. Li Ping'er served him with food. When he had eaten it, he put on his eye-shades and rode home.
Four or five merchants were waiting in the shop for him to check the goods and give them the money. When this had been done, they signed the contract and went away. Ximen Qing went to Jinlian's room.
"Where did you spend last night?" Jinlian cried. "Tell me the truth, or I will stir the dust with my complainings."
"You were all drinking wine with Mistress Hua," Ximen said, "so I went to the Lantern Fair with my friends. Afterwards we went to the bawdy house and spent the night there. This morning Daian came to bring me back, and here I am."
"I know the boy went to fetch you but pray, in which of the bawdy houses does your particular ghost live? You fickle rogue, you are trying to deceive me. Last night that strumpet turned us out and invoked the aid of gods and devils alike to get you to go to her. When you have had enough, you come home. That thievish lump of knavery, Daian, is cunning enough to tell one story to his mistress but it is quite another one he tells me. Last night when he came back, the Great Lady said, 'Why hasn't your Father come back? Where is he drinking?' and he said you and Uncle Fu had gone to see the lanterns, and that you had gone to Guijie's house to drink, and he was going to bring you back this morning. But afterwards, when I questioned him, he laughed and kept his mouth shut. When I pressed him, he admitted that you were spending the night with Mistress Hua in Lion Street. You villain, how does he know that I always let you do as you please? I suppose you told him."
"Indeed I did nothing of the sort," Ximen Qing said. He told her how Li Ping'er had asked him to take wine with her, how sorry she was that Jinlian had returned so early, how she cried and told him that she had no one to help her and was always terrified at night because her house was so lonely. "She begged me to marry her, and asked when I was going to rebuild the house. She has some incense and candles and all kinds of valuable stuff there, and she asked me to take it and use the money to pay the builder. She is very anxious that I should get the house finished quickly, so that she can come here and live with you as a sister. But it looks as though that won't suit you."
"One shadow more or less will not worry me," Jinlian said. "I shall be glad to have her, for, as things are, I'm very lonely, and, if she comes, she will keep me company. The fact that there are many ships on a river does not necessarily mean a block, and a road is not stopped because there are many carts upon it. There is no more reason why I should refuse to welcome her than others might have found when I came here myself. But I'm very much afraid you will not find everybody so amiably disposed as I am. You still have to see what our mistress thinks about it."
"Although I am talking about this matter now," Ximen said, "of course she is still in mourning."
Jinlian took Ximen's silken gown. Something dropped out of the sleeve, and fell tinkling to the ground. She picked it up and weighed it in her hand. It was like a little ball but very heavy. She looked at it for a long time but could not imagine what it was for. Jinlian stared at it.
"What is it?" she said, "and why does it seem so heavy?"
"Don't you know?" Ximen said, laughing. "They call it the Bell of Fecundity, and it comes from Burma, a country somewhere in the south. A good one is worth four or five taels of silver."
"Where do you put the thing?" the woman asked.
"First, you put it inside, then get on with what has to be done. The results are quite indescribable."
"Did you use it with Mistress Hua?" Jinlian asked.
Ximen Qing told her all that had passed during the night, and this so stirred up Jinlian's ardent mind that, though it was still day, these two disrobed themselves and behaved in a manner better befitting the night.
Ximen Qing went to see the valuers, taking with him the candles and wax and other things that belonged to Li Ping'er. They were all weighed up and sold for about three hundred and eighty taels of silver. Out of this Li Ping'er would take only one hundred and eighty taels, making Ximen Qing spend the rest on the house. He consulted the Master of the Yin Yang, and work was begun on the eighth day of the second month. He gave five hundred taels to his servant Laizhao and his manager Ben the Fourth, to buy bricks, tiles, timber, and stone, and gave them instructions to superintend the work and keep account of the expenditure. Ben the Fourth was a dissipated young fellow, something of a windbag but efficient and cunning. He began life as servant to a eunuch but was sent away because of some irregularity. Then he lent himself to practices of doubtful morality and, still later, took employment as domestic in a family of position. But he seduced the nurse and ran off with her. For a while he acted as a tailor's tout. He could play the lute, the flute, and the double flute. Ximen Qing, who appreciated such accomplishments, gave Ben the Fourth help from time to time, and finally found a place for him in his shop, so that he could earn commission. In this way Ben the Fourth came to have a finger in the pie of all Ximen's enterprises.
Ben the Fourth and Laizhao supervised the workers during the building of the house. To begin with, the old rooms of Hua's house were demolished, then the walls were pulled down and new foundations laid. They constructed the shelter, the artificial mound, and all the arbours and apartments. This took a considerable time.
The days passed quickly. The sun and moon crossed and recrossed like the shuttles of a weaver. A little more than a month after Ximen's setting to work upon the gardens, it was a hundred days since Hua Zixu died. Li Ping'er asked Ximen to go and see her, to talk over the future. "I will have Hua's tablet burned," she said, "and you must decide whether you wish to have this house sold or not. You need only to give your orders but you must marry me as soon as you can. Give me any position you like in your household. So long as I can be your chambermaid, I shall be quite happy." Her tears fell like rain.
"Don't cry," Ximen said. "I have told the Fifth Lady that, as soon as the house is finished and your mourning is over, I am going to marry you."
"If you really want me," Li Ping'er cried, "get my apartment finished first, and take me there. If I spend a single day in it and then die, I shall die content. Anything would be better than staying here, where each day seems like a year."
"I know," said Ximen.
"Why should I not go to live with the Fifth Lady for a few days, as soon as the tablet has been burned, and move into the new apartment as soon as it is finished? Go home and see what the Fifth Lady thinks of that, and I will wait. The hundredth day is the tenth of the third month, and I will arrange to have the dirge sung and the tablet burned."
Ximen Qing agreed, and spent the night with Li Ping'er. The next day he went home and told Jinlian all she had proposed.
"Very well," Jinlian said, "I am quite ready to clear a couple of rooms for her but you must go and ask the Great Lady first. As for me, I am like the water in the river, there is no reason why I should not do my part in washing the boats."
Ximen Qing went at once to see Yueniang. She was dressing her hair, and Ximen told her the whole story.

"It is not at all a suitable arrangement," Yueniang said. "To begin with, she is still in mourning. Secondly, you were a very intimate friend of her husband. Thirdly, you have already had dealings with her, purchased her house, and stored many of her goods. The proverb says, If the loom is not speedy, the shuttle is. I understand that one member of her family, Hua the Elder, is a rogue. If he gets wind of this, I very much fear we shall find many fleas about our heads. What I have said is plain common sense. By Zhao, Qian, Sun and Li, think the matter over and see if you don't agree with me."
Ximen could think of no answer to make. He went and sat on a chair in the hall, and pondered the matter. He was by no means decided how he should answer Li Ping'er but he could not make up his mind to give her up. The problem troubled him for a long time, and finally he went back to Jinlian's room.
"What did the Great Lady say?" Jinlian said. Ximen told her all that had passed.
"She is right," Jinlian said. "You did buy her house and you do wish to marry the widow of one of your most intimate friends. And, for that reason, you must forgo what otherwise you might have had. If you do not, your influential friends will look upon you with grave suspicion."
"That doesn't trouble me in the least," Ximen said, "but I am anxious about that fellow Hua the Elder. I don't want him to start interfering. If he hears what is going on, he will bring pressure to bear upon her before she is out of mourning. What can I do then? But I really don't know what to say to her."
"I see no difficulty at all," Jinlian said. "All you need do is to go and say to her, 'I have mentioned the matter to the Fifth Lady but it appears that there is a great stock of merchandise stored on the upper floor of her apartments, and there is no room for your things. You must wait a few days more. My place is nearly finished, and I will hurry on the workmen and get the painting and decorating done as soon as possible. By that time your mourning will be over and I will marry you. That seems much the best plan, far better than your staying with the Fifth Lady, packed like herrings in a barrel, neither one thing nor another.' That ought to satisfy her."
Ximen Qing was delighted with this counsel, and went at once to see Li Ping'er. "The Fifth Lady says: Wait till the painting and decoration of your apartment are finished, and go straight there. At present there is a whole heap of things in her place, and there would be no room for your belongings. There is one thing more I must remind you of. May not your brother-in-law say that your period of mourning has not been duly fulfilled? What can we do about it?"
"He has no authority over me," Li Ping'er said. "We have already come to an arrangement about the property and we have signed a document in the courts to say that our relationship is at an end. We women certainly have our first marriages arranged for us but for the rest we can surely please ourselves. There is a proverb that says: Brothers and sisters-in-law have no right to interfere in each other's affairs. My brother-in-law has not the slightest power to say a word in any matter that concerns myself alone. If I could not support myself, he would never raise a finger to help me. No, if that fellow dares to fart about, I shall tell him to die in his chair, and after that, he will not venture to die in his bed. Please don't let him worry you, my lord. He can do me no harm. When will the apartment be finished?"
"I have given orders for it to be painted and decorated before anything else. At the beginning of the fifth month it will certainly be ready."
"I will gladly wait till then but you must do your best to hurry it on." The maids brought wine, and they spent the night most pleasantly together. Thenceforth Ximen Qing went every few days to visit Li Ping'er.
It was not long before Ximen Qing had finished some of the side rooms and the three-roomed apartment. Only the arbour still remained to be done. It was the Summer Day, the fifth day of the fifth month.
Li Ping'er made preparations, and invited Ximen Qing to unfold the three-cornered dumplings, and also to talk over the arrangements for the wedding. She had decided to send for the monks to sing a dirge on the fifteenth day of the month, and then she proposed that Ximen should take her to his house.
"Are you going to invite the Hua brothers to the ceremony?" Ximen Qing said.
"I shall send each of them a card, and they may come or not as they please," Li Ping'er said. So the matter was settled.
On the fifteenth day of the fifth month, she asked twelve monks from the Temple of Eternal Felicity to sing a dirge at her house. The same day Ximen Qing took three qian of silver as a birthday present for Ying Bojue, and gave Daian five taels to spend in celebration of Li Ping'er's coming out of mourning. Just before noon Ximen mounted his horse and went to Ying Bojue's house. Ping'an and Shutong rode behind him. At Ying's house the ten brothers were already gathered, with Ben the Fourth, the latest accession to the band. Bojue had engaged two young actors to play and sing and serve them with wine. When everybody was seated, Ximen Qing called the actors to him. One of them, Wu Yin'er's brother, he knew already but not the other, who knelt down and introduced himself as Zheng Feng, the brother of Zheng Aixiang.
Ximen Qing, who was sitting in the place of honour, gave each of the boys two qian of silver. They drank till it grew dark, and Daian appeared to escort his master home. The boy went to Ximen Qing and whispered, "Mistress Hua hopes you will not stay very late."
Ximen Qing winked at him and made to leave the table. Bojue cried, "You thievish bone of a dog! Come here and tell me what it is all about, or I will pull your little ears till they are both on the same side of your head. How many birthdays a year do you think I have? The sun is still high in the heavens, and you come here with a horse. Who told you to come? The ladies of your family, or someone else we know? If you don't tell me, I will never ask your father to find a wife for you, even if you live to be a hundred years old, you little bald-pated dog."
"Really," said Daian, "nobody told me. I thought it was going to be a rough night and that it would be better for Father to go home early, so I brought the horse and came to wait for him."
Ying Bojue questioned the boy for a long time but Daian did not tell him the true story.
"So you won't tell me?" Ying Bojue cried. "Well, tomorrow I shall hear all about it, and then I'll settle with you, little oily mouth."
He gave Daian a cup of wine and half a dish of cakes, and told him to go away and eat them. Soon afterwards Ximen Qing came down to change his clothes. He called Daian to a quiet place.
"Who has been at the Huas' house today?" he asked.
"Hua the Third has gone to the country, and Hua the Fourth has something the matter with his eyes. Only Hua the Elder and his wife were at the funeral banquet. Master Hua went away first, and, before his wife followed him, Mistress Hua took her into her room and gave her ten taels of silver and two dresses. She kowtowed to Mistress Hua."
"Didn't she say anything?"
"Not a word, except that, when Mistress Hua was married, she would come to pay her respects on the third day."
"Did she really say that?" Ximen cried.
"I would not dare to lie to you," Daian said.
This was extremely satisfactory. Ximen asked if the service was over. "The tablet has been burned and the monks have gone," said Daian. "Mistress Hua says she hopes you will go as soon as you possibly can."
"Very well," said Ximen, "go and get the horse ready."
Daian was about to do so, when Ying Bojue, who had been listening in the passage, suddenly shouted and frightened him. "You thievish little dog bone," he cried, "you wouldn't tell me but now I've heard everything. This is a nice little plot you and your father are hatching together."
"Don't make so much noise, you funny dog," Ximen Qing said.
"Talk nicely to me and I won't," Bojue answered.
They went back to the party, and Bojue told them all that had happened. Seizing Ximen Qing's hands, he cried, "Do you really call yourself a man, Brother? You have something like this on hand, and not a word of it do you mention to any of us. Why, if Hua the Elder had tried to say anything, all you had to do was to tell us, and we would have gone and dealt with him. One word from him, and we would have raised a fine big bump on him. There would have been no difficulty in getting his assent. We had no idea that this marriage was decided. Tell us all about it, or what use is there in calling ourselves a brotherhood? If we can serve you in any way, we will gladly go through fire and water. That is how we feel about you. Yet you keep your secrets from us."
"If you won't tell us," Xie Xida said, "we will tell Guijie and Wu Yin'er tomorrow. Then there will be trouble."
"Give me a chance to tell you," Ximen said, laughing. "The marriage has been definitely arranged."
"When is our new sister-in-law going to your house?" Xie Xida asked. "We must come and pay our respects, and you must engage four singing girls to serve us with wine. So we will celebrate your wedding."
"Of course," said Ximen, "I shall do myself the honour of sending you invitations."
"Far better drink the wedding cup now," Zhu Shinian said. Ying Bojue took the cup, Xie Xida the wine jar, Zhu Shinian held the dish, and the others knelt down. The two young actors also knelt and sang the thirteen melodies known as "Happy Is This Joyful Day." Ximen Qing swallowed three or four cups one after the other.
"If you invite us to take wine with you on the wedding day," Zhu Shin-ian said, "you must have these two boys at the house." Turning to the young actors, he said, "You must make a point of going that day." Zheng Feng replied, "We will most certainly attend the banquet."
After a while the wine was finished, and they all sat down to dinner. By this time it was dark, and Ximen Qing would stay no longer. He seized the first opportunity, and got up. Ying Bojue would have stopped him but Xie Xida said, "Let him go, Brother Ying. Don't make him late when he has such important business to attend to. Our sister-in-law will be angry." So Ximen managed to escape, and went to Lion Street.
Li Ping'er had taken off her mourning clothes and changed into a dress of bright colours. The fire and lamps were burning brightly in the hall. She had prepared the finest of dishes and wine, and had set a single chair in the place of honour. She asked Ximen Qing to take it. One of the maids held the wine jar, and Li Ping'er poured out a cup of wine and kowtowed four times.
"This day the tablet has been burned," she said. "I am most grateful for the favour which will allow me to assist you at your dressing. The joys of marriage with you will be joys indeed." She rose, and Ximen Qing rose in his turn to offer her a cup of wine. Then they both sat down.
"Did Hua the Elder and his wife have anything to say?" Ximen said.
"I took them to my room after the banquet," said Li Ping'er, "and told them about our marriage. Hua said that, three days after it, he would tell his wife to come and see me. I gave them ten taels of silver and two dresses. They both seemed quite satisfied. In fact, they thanked me again and again."
"If they talk in that strain," Ximen said, "I shall have no objection to their coming. We have nothing to be ashamed of. But if they begin to talk any nonsense, I will never forgive them."
"If they dare to make a sound, I will never forgive them either," Li Ping'er said.
Xiuchun poured the wine into inlaid silver cups and handed them to her mistress. They drank many cups together. Though love may diminish with age, wine improves more and more. It is a question of circumstances. Li Ping'er rejoiced because her wedding day was drawing hear, and was even more lively than usual.
"You were drinking at Ying's house," she said, smiling, "when Daian went to ask you to come and see me. Do they know anything about this matter?"
"Ying Bojue guessed," Ximen Qing said. "He tried to get the boy to tell them, and they teased me for a long time. The Brothers insisted on congratulating me. They asked me to give a dinner party and send for singing girls. They tossed the wine down their throats, cup after cup. When I thought I had a chance, I tried to get away but they held me back. I gave them pleasant words and unpleasant words, and at last they were compelled to let me go."
"They know a thing or two, all the same," Li Ping'er said. "They let you come away." Ximen Qing saw that she was burning with desire, and he was by no means cold himself. He could refrain no longer. They passed fragrant sweetmeats from one to the other, and pressed their cheeks together. Li Ping'er kissed him. "If you love me truly," she said, "you'll make me your wife soon. I feel like a prisoner here. Don't leave me here alone by day or night." They turned again to the delights of love.

038
Censor Yü-wen Impeaches Commander Yang; Li P'ing-erh Takes the Amorous Doctor Chiang Chu-Shan as Mate

To the tune "Partridge Sky"

She remembers that time in the studio when they had just met;
The clouds and rain they enjoyed together were known to only a few.
When evening came, the phoenix and his mate alighted on adjacent pillows;
Left untrimmed, the silver lamp shed only a half light.
Thinking of the past, her dreaming soul deluded;
Tonight she is all too happy to enjoy the pleasures of connubial bliss.
Tumbled and tossed like male and female phoenixes, their pleasure knows no bounds.
From this time on, surely, the pair of them will never be separated.[1]

The twentieth day of the fifth month was the birthday of Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command. When the day came, Hsi-men Ch'ing sealed up five mace of silver and two handkerchiefs in a packet, as his contribution toward the cost of the celebration. Then, having dressed himself to befit the occasion, he mounted a large white horse and, accompanied by four pageboys, set off for the commandant's home to offer his birthday greetings. Among the others attending the party were the judicial commissioner, Hsia Yen-ling, the militia commander, Chang Kuan, the battalion commanders Ching Chung[2] and Ho Chin, and other military officials. The guests were met with drinks at the door and received to the strains of martial music. A southern-style play, of the genre known as hsi-wen,[3] was performed for their entertainment, and four singing girls had been engaged to ply the guests with wine.
Tai-an took Hsi-men Ch'ing's outdoor clothes and went home with the horse. When the sun began to sink in the west, Tai-an set out on horseback to fetch his master.
As he was passing by the western end of Lion Street he ran into Old Mother Feng and asked her, "Mother Feng, where are you going?"
"Mistress Hua sent me to ask your master over," replied Old Mother Feng. "Silversmith Ku has finished the jewelry she ordered for the betrothal ceremony and delivered it today in a box. She wants your master to come and see it. She also has something she wants to talk to him about."
"My master's at Commandant Chou's place attending a party today," said Tai-an. "I'm on my way to fetch him. You can save yourself a trip. When I get there I'll give him the message."
"I'm imposing on you," said Old Mother Feng, "but, whatever you do, be sure to mention it. Mistress Hua is waiting for him."
Tai-an whipped up his horse and headed straight for the commandant's headquarters. The officials at the party were devoting themselves to their cups and having a high time of it.
Tai-an went up to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place at the table and said to him, "On my way back from home with the horse just now, I ran into Old Mother Feng in the street. Mistress Hua had sent her to invite you over. She said that Silversmith Ku had delivered the jewelry and she wanted you to come and see it. She also has something she wants to talk to you about."
When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he gave Tai-an some savories, soup, and rice to eat and prepared to make his departure. Commandant Chou was reluctant to let him go, blocking the door and foisting a large cup of wine upon him.
"Since you do me the honour, sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I will drink this cup at your behest. But there is something I must attend to that prevents me from enjoying your hospitality to the full. Forgive me. Forgive me."
Thereupon, he:
Drained it in one gulp,
bade farewell to Commandant Chou, got on his horse, and headed straight for Li P'ing-erh's house. When he had finished the tea with which the woman welcomed him, Hsi-men Ch'ing told Tai-an to take the horse home and come to fetch him in the morning.
After Tai-an had left, Li P'ing-erh told Ying-ch'un to get the jewelry out of its box for Hsi-men Ch'ing to look over. All ablaze like golden fire, it was a fine set of jewelry indeed.
When it had been put away, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "You won't have to wait any longer than the twenty-fourth for the presentation of the betrothal gifts, and we'll hold the ceremony proper next month, on the fourth."
The woman's heart was filled with delight. She promptly brought out the wine, and she and Hsi-men Ch'ing drank deeply and unburdened themselves to each other. After they had been drinking for a while, she ordered a maidservant to wipe off the cool bamboo bed mat in her room, and the two of them took their places inside the gauze netting.
The incense was redolent of orchid and musk;
The bedspread was fashioned of mermaid silk.
Taking off their clothes, they sat:
Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh;
Drinking wine and making merry with each other.
After some time:
The glint of spring pervading their eyes;[4]
They were carried away by lecherous desires.
Hsi-men Ch'ing started out by engaging the woman in the sport of clouds and rain for a while. After that, responding to a drunken whim, he ordered her to lie down across the mat and indulge him by "toying with the flute." Behold:
To the tune "Moon on the West River"
The scent of orchid and musk pervades
the gauze netting;
The delicate beauty lightly proceeds to "play the flute."
Her snow-white jade body is visible through the bed curtains;
It's enough to make one's "ethereal and material souls take flight."
A single cherry might describe her tiny mouth;
Tender stalks are not as gentle

as her fingers.
The talented gentleman is moved to remark to his partner,
"I never knew the magic rhinoceros horn could feel so good."[5]
At this juncture, Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was in his cups, playfully asked the woman, "In the old days, when your Hua Tzu-hsü was still alive, did you ever do anything like this with him?"
"When he wasn't asleep he was in dreamland," the woman replied. "How could I ever have had the patience to do this sort of thing with him? All he ever wanted to do was fool around outside. And even when he came home, I wouldn't ordinarily let him touch me. Moreover, as long as the old eunuch director was alive, we slept in separate rooms. As for my husband, I used to curse him till he looked as though:
His head had been sprayed with dog's blood.[6]
If he gave me any trouble, all I had to do was tell the old eunuch about it and he'd give him a regular caning. He scarcely counted as a human being. What sort of stuff do you think he was made of, anyway? If I had played around this way with him it would only have given me the creeps. Who is there besides you who could suit me so perfectly? You're just what the doctor ordered. By day and by night, all I do is long for you."
The two of them fooled around for a while and then got back to business. Ying-ch'un waited on them, bringing in a small square box filled with assorted dainties, including nuts, rissoles, chicken and goose giblets and feet, and rose- and chrysanthemum-flavoured cakes. A small gold flagon was:
Filled to the brim with carnelian-hued nectar.
From dusk, when the lamps and candles were lighted, they intermittently played with one another and drank until the time of the first watch.
All of a sudden they were interrupted by the sound of loud knocking at the outer gate. When they sent Old Mother Feng to open the door and see who it was, it turned out to be Tai-an.
"I told him to come and fetch me tomorrow," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What's he doing coming back at a time like this?"
When he called him into the room to question him, the pageboy made his way as far as the door in a state of obvious agitation. Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman were still in bed, so he did not dare go inside but he spoke to them from the other side of the portiere.
"Your daughter and son-in-law have arrived," he said, "along with a large number of boxes. The First Lady sent me to ask you to come home as quickly as possible to discuss the situation with her."
When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he didn't know what to make of it.
"At such an hour, what could have happened?" he wondered. "I'd better go home and see what's going on."
He got up hastily. The woman helped him on with his clothes and heated a cup of warm wine for him to drink.
Whipping up his horse, he went straight home, where he found the rear reception room brightly lit with lamps and candles. His daughter and son-in-law were both there, along with a large pile of boxes, beds and curtains, and other family belongings.
Hsi-men Ch'ing could hardly believe his eyes.
"What are you doing arriving home at such an hour?" he demanded.
His son-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi, kowtowed and said, with tears in his eyes, "Recently our kinsman, the venerable Yang Chien, was impeached by a supervising secretary in the Office of Scrutiny, with the result that an imperial edict has come down ordering his arrest and incarceration in the South Prison to await the final disposition of his case. His protégés, relatives, and employees have all been tentatively sentenced to public exposure in the cangue and military exile. Yesterday his factotum, Yang Sheng, by traveling day and night, managed to get word of this to my father. My father was thrown into such a state of consternation by the news that he directed me to take your daughter, along with some boxes of family belongings, and seek temporary lodging with you until things blow over. He himself immediately set off for my paternal aunt's place in the Eastern Capital, to find out whatever more he could. When things return to normal:
Your kindness will be amply rewarded,
He will never dare to forget it."
"Did your father give you a letter, or anything?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"I've got his letter right here," said Ch'en Ching-chi, pulling it out of his sleeve and handing it to him.
Hsi-men Ch'ing broke open the seal and found that it read as follows:
Respectfully indited by his devoted servant, Ch'en Hung,[7] for the perusal of my most virtuous kinsman, Hsi-men Ch'ing:
I will dispense with the customary formalities. The northern barbarians are currently encroaching upon our frontiers, and their incursions have extended beyond the borders of Hsiung-chou. The failure of the minister of war, Wang Fu, [8] to dispatch adequate defense forces has resulted in a military debacle in which our kinsman, the venerable Yang Chien, is also implicated. They have both been impeached on charges of the utmost gravity by a supervising secretary of the Office of Scrutiny.
His Majesty is incensed and has ordered their arrest and incarceration in the South Prison, pending a formal inquiry by the Three Judicial Offices. Their protégés, relatives, and employees have all, in accordance with precedent, been tentatively sentenced to military exile in frontier guard units.
On hearing this news, my entire family has been thrown into consternation, having no place to turn. I have taken the initiative of sending my son and your daughter, along with what they are able to carry with them in the way of boxes of family belongings, to seek temporary refuge in your household. I am leaving immediately for the capital, where I plan to stay with my elder sister's husband, Chang Shih-lien,[9] and await word of the final disposition of the case.
Once my affairs are in sufficient order to permit my return home:
Your kindness will be amply rewarded,
I will never dare to forget it.
Fearing that there may be some repercussions in the district, I have also ordered my son to provide you with five hundred taels of silver, in the hope that, as my kinsman, you will do what you can to cope with the situation.
I shall endeavor to requite you in the future;
Not forgetting your kindness
as long as I live.[10]
Written in haste, by lamplight, I am unable to express myself more fully.
Date: The twentieth day of the middle month of summer.
Signed: Hung, again, respectfully salutes you.
By the time Hsi-men Ch'ing finished reading the letter he was extremely perturbed. He instructed Wu Yüeh-niang to prepare food and wine for his daughter and son-in-law, and ordered the servants to sweep out the three rooms on the eastern side of the courtyard in front of the main reception hall for the couple to stay in. The boxes of valuables were all stored away in Yüeh-niang's room in the master suite. Ch'en Ching-chi brought out the five hundred taels of silver and turned them over to Hsi-men Ch'ing to cover whatever expenses might be incurred in attempting to cope with the situation.
Hsi-men Ch'ing summoned his manager, Wu Tien-en, and gave him five taels of silver, along with instructions to go that very night to the office of the chief clerk in the district yamen and make a copy of whatever relevant documents had come down from the Eastern Capital. What did the texts in the government gazette actually say?
Memorial Submitted by Yü-wen Hsü-chung,[11] Supervising Secretary of the Office of Scrutiny for War, and Others
In Re: An Urgent Request for an Imperial Decision in Favour of Summary Execution for the Traitorous Ministers Who Abuse Their Power and Betray the National Interest, with a View toward Reinvigoration of Our Armed Forces and Elimination of the Barbarian Threat
Your servant has heard that the danger posed by the barbarians has existed since ancient times. In the Chou dynasty, the Hsien-yün; in the Han, the Hsiung-nu; in the T'ang, the T'u-chüeh; and in the Five Dynasties, the Ch'i-tan, all gradually became strong. And since our own Imperial Sung dynasty was established, the Great Liao has made incursions into the Central Plain for no little while. But I have never heard of a state being threatened by barbarians from without when it did not already harbour barbarians within.[12] As the proverb says:
When frost descends, the bell of Feng-shan sounds;
When rain falls, the plinth under the pillar sweats.[13]
That like breeds like is a necessary principle. The situation is analogous to that of a sick individual whose vital organs have long been ravaged by disease. When his natural vitality is sapped from within, he becomes susceptible to the penetration of malign influences from without. Once the entire body has become infected, not even Pien Ch'üeh of Lu[14] would be able to save him. How could he then long endure?
The present situation of the empire is just like that of an invalid in the final stages of debilitation. The ruler resembles his head; the chief ministers resemble his vital organs; and the lesser officials resemble his four limbs. If Your Majesty sits in state upon the throne above, and your officials fulfill their responsibilities below, the natural vitality of the body politic will be replenished within; its defenses will be strong without; and the menace of barbarian invasion will be eliminated.
At the present time, among those whose conduct has led to the menace of barbarian invasion, no one is more culpable than the grand academician of the Hall for the Veneration of Governance, Ts'ai Ching. His artful, specious, cunning, and dangerous nature, further abetted by the lack of integrity or shame, permits him to engage, indifferently, in slander and flattery. Above, he is incapable of supporting his sovereign in the exercise of his prerogatives, assisting in the primary tasks of ordering and transforming the realm. Below, he is incapable of promoting virtue or implementing policy, protecting and cherishing the common people. Solely devoted to fattening himself at public expense, he curries imperial favour in order to consolidate his position; engenders factions in order to conceal his traitorous designs; deceives his sovereign by keeping him in the dark; and underhandedly stigmatizes men of worth. The corps of loyal servants of the state has been dispersed;[15] the hearts of the citizens of the realm have turned cold; yet an unbroken stream of high officials, clad in crimson and purple, continues to congregate at his door.
Recently, as a result of the failure of his policy in the Ho-Huang region, the initiation of hostilities with the Liao, the cession of the three commandaries, the revolt of Kuo Yao-shih, [16] and the sudden proliferation of our losses, the Chin barbarians have broken their covenant and encroached upon the heartland of the empire. These egregious examples of betrayal of the national interest are all due to Ts'ai Ching's malfeasance.
Wang Fu is rapacious, mediocre, and unreliable; his conduct more befitting that of a buffoon. Having been dredged up by Ts'ai Ching, to whose recommendation he owes his post in the government, he was, before long, mistakenly entrusted with military power. He is ready to engage in appeasement in order to maintain his position but is quite without any policy to advance. Recently, on the occasion of Chang Ta's annihilation at T'ai-yüan, [17] he was too panic-stricken to know what to do. And now that the barbarians are threatening the interior, he has fled south with his wife and children, concerned only for his personal safety. [18] The enormity of this betrayal of the national interest is such that execution is too good for him.
Yang Chien was originally nothing but a gilded and pampered youth who, by availing himself of inherited privilege, and thereby exploiting the favour shown to the dead, has succeeded in obtaining access to military power and unwarranted responsibility for external defense. He is but an arrant traitor, feigning loyalty, [19] whose pusillanimity knows no parallel.
These three officials have conspired to form a cabal that fosters corruption in both the capital and provinces and is like a noxious venom gnawing at Your Majesty's vitals. For years now, their conduct has invited catastrophes and induced anomalies, destroying the health and vitality of the body politic. The burdens of corvée and taxation are heavy and vexatious; the common people are dislocated and scattered; banditry is rife; the barbarians have ceased to be loyal; the resources of the empire are exhausted; and the moral bonds that hold society together have broken down. Though we were to pluck out the hairs of our heads, they would not suffice to enumerate the crimes of Ts'ai Ching and his coadjutors.[20]
If your servants, who but await punishment in the aforesaid office in the discharge of their responsibilities as censors, were to see these traitorous ministers betray the national interest without calling the fact to Your August Majesty's attention, they would fail in their obligations to ruler and father, above, and violate the principles to which they have devoted a lifetime of study, below. We, therefore, humbly request an imperial decision, whether it be to relinquish Ts'ai Ching and the other malefactors of his faction to the hands of the penal authorities, in order to display your clemency; to subject them to the extreme penalty, in order to demonstrate their conspicuous disgrace; or to sentence them to public exposure in the cangue, in accordance with precedent, and condemn them to military exile on the distant frontier,[21] where they may contend against monsters and demons.[22]
Should such measures be adopted, there would be reason to hope that the favour of Heaven might be restored[23] and the hearts of the people made glad. Should the law of the land be thus reaffirmed, the barbarian threat would dissolve of itself. The empire would then be fortunate indeed! Your subjects would then be fortunate indeed!
This memorial had elicited an imperial rescript that read as follows:
Let Ts'ai Ching remain in office, for the time being, in order to assist Us in Our government. Let Wang Fu and Yang Chien be remanded to the Three Judicial Offices that will conduct a joint inquiry and report the result to Us.
Respectfully received and respectfully acted upon.
There followed a quotation from the report of the joint inquiry by the Three Judicial Offices that read as follows:
Wang Fu, Yang Chien, and the other malefactors of their faction are found guilty of malfeasance in regard to their military commands. In permitting the barbarians to penetrate deeply beyond our frontiers and wreak havoc with our populace, they have sustained heavy losses of officers and men and abandoned control of our territories. For such crimes the penalty prescribed by law is execution. Among the henchmen, clerical subofficials, functionaries, relatives, and adherents who have abetted them in their iniquities are Tung Sheng, Lu Hu, Yang Sheng, P'ang Hsüan, Han Tsung-jen, Ch'en Hung, Huang Yü, [24] Hsi-men Ch'ing,[25] Liu Sheng, Chao Hung-tao, and others. For all of the above whose names have been ascertained, the recommended sentence is: public exposure in the cangue for one month, followed by military exile in frontier guard units.
If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not read these documents nothing might have happened but having read them:
In his ears all he heard was a sighing rush of air,
As his ethereal and material souls fled
he knew not where.
Truly:
The shock affected all six of his vital organs,
including liver and lungs;
The fright damaged the three bristles and seven apertures of his heart.[26]
Hsi-men Ch'ing immediately turned his attention to the task of getting together a quantity of gold, silver, and valuable antiques, and seeing that they were properly packed.
He then summoned his servants, Lai-pao and Lai-wang, into his bedroom and gave them secret orders:
Thus and thus, and
So and so:
"Hire horses for yourselves and leave for the Eastern Capital this very night to find out what's happening. Make no effort to seek out the place where my relative by marriage, Ch'en Hung, is staying. If you get wind of any adverse repercussions, do your best to fix things up by any means you can think of, and hurry back to report to me."
Hsi-men Ch'ing had already provided the two men with twenty taels for their traveling expenses. Early in the fifth watch they hired drivers and set out on their way to the Eastern Capital. But no more of this.
Hsi-men Ch'ing was unable to get to sleep all night long. Early the next morning he directed Lai-chao and Pen the Fourth to put a stop to the construction work in the garden and send all the artisans of the various trades home for the time being. He gave orders that the main gate of his compound was to be kept tightly closed everyday, that his servants were not to venture outside the premises except on specific business, and that if anyone were to knock they should not be admitted.
Hsi-men Ch'ing confined his activities to his own quarters, restlessly walking outside and then back in again from time to time.
Worry piled upon worry;
Depression augmented by depression;[27]
he was just like:
A millipede on a hot surface,[28] and forgot his undertaking with Li P'ing-erh as effectively as though it had been:
Relegated to outer space, beyond the nine heavens.[29]
When Wu Yüeh-niang saw the way he kept to his room everyday:
His brows contracted by melancholy;

His face exhibiting a worried hue,[30]
she said to him, "It's a matter that primarily concerns the family of our kinsman by marriage, Ch'en Hung. After all:
For every injustice there is a perpetrator;
For every debt there is a creditor,[31]
why should you be so upset over something that hardly concerns you?"
"You're only a woman; what would you know about such things?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Ch'en Hung is our relative by marriage, and those two karmic encumbrances, my daughter and son-in-law, have moved into our house to live. This is an inescapable fact. The neighbours in the locality who have had reason to be annoyed with us in the past are extremely numerous. As the saying goes:
The loom may stay put but the shuttle gets around.
When the sheep is beaten, the colt and donkey tremble.[32]
If there should be any troublemakers about to point the finger at us or:
Pull up the trees to investigate the roots,[33] you and I would be hard put to protect ourselves."
Truly:
Though you sit in your house behind closed doors,
Catastrophe may yet strike you out of the blue.[34]
Hsi-men Ch'ing remained at home in a state of deep depression but we will say no more about it.
To resume our story, Li P'ing-erh waited first one day and then another but nothing happened. She sent Old Mother Feng to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place twice in succession but the main gate was:
Locked tight as an iron bucket, so that
Not even Fan K'uai himself could get through.
She waited around half the day but nobody came out, so there was no way for her to discover what was going on.
When the twenty-fourth finally arrived, Li P'ing-erh again sent Old Mother Feng to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place to deliver the jewelry she had had made for their betrothal and to ask him to come and have a word with her. Unable to get anyone to open the gate, she was waiting under the eaves of the house across the street when who should appear but Tai-an, who came out to water the horse.
On catching sight of her, Tai-an said, "Old Mother Feng, what are you doing here?"
"Mistress Hua sent me to deliver the jewelry," said Old Mother Feng. "Why is there so little sign of activity around here? She wants your master to come over and have a word with her."
"My master has been occupied with inconsequential affairs for some days," said Tai-an, "and hasn't had any free time. You'd better take the jewelry back with you for the time being. When I get done watering the horse I'll be sure to tell my master what you've said."
"My good fellow," said Old Mother Feng, "I'll wait right here if you'll just take the jewelry inside and speak to your master about it. Mistress Hua is annoyed enough with me as it is."
Tai-an was prevailed upon to tether the horse and go back inside. After some time he came out again and reported, "I've told my master what you said and he's agreed to accept the jewelry. He wants you to tell Mistress Hua to wait a few days longer until he's able to pay her a visit and speak to her in person."
Old Mother Feng went straight home and reported this message to her mistress, who had no alternative but to wait a few days longer.
Before she knew it, the fifth month came to an end and she found herself in the first decade of the sixth month.
Pining by day and longing by night;
Of news from her lover she has none.
Beset by dreams, harried in spirit;
Her day of consummation is delayed.
Truly:
Too indolent to paint her moth eyebrows,
Too abashed to retouch her powdered face;
Her bosom swells with unexpressed resentment,
Her jadelike spirit is utterly distraught.
The woman waited expectantly for Hsi-men Ch'ing but he did not come. Everyday:
Her intake of tea and food diminished,
Her spirits became ever more deranged.
At night:
Sleeping alone upon her pillow,
She tossed and turned obsessively.
Suddenly she heard a knocking at the gate and seemed to see Hsi-men Ch'ing coming in. The woman:
Welcomed him at the door with a smile, and
Led him into the room by the hand.
She asked him why he had failed to keep their tryst, and
Each of them expressed their innermost thoughts.
Inseparable and impassioned,
They devoted the night to pleasure.
Only when the cock crowed and the day dawned,
Did he extricate himself and return home.
The woman awoke with a start and gave a great cry but:
Her soul had already escaped.
Old Mother Feng hurried into the room to see what was amiss.
"Hsi-men Ch'ing just left," the woman said. "Have you locked the gate after him yet?"
"Your longing has addled your wits," said Old Mother Feng. "How could the Honourable Gentleman have been here? I haven't seen so much as his shadow."
From this time on, the woman's:
Dreamscapes were haunted.
Night after night she was disturbed by fox spirits with:
Assumed names and appropriated identities, who came to sap her vitality. Gradually her countenance grew wan and emaciated; she lost her appetite and took to her bed.
One day Old Mother Feng said to the woman, "I've asked that doctor, Chiang Chu-shan, who lives at the end of Main Street, to come and see you."
This man was still young, no more than thirty.
Petite in stature,
Precious in bearing;
he was as frivolous and untrustworthy a person as you could find.
Invited into the woman's bedroom, he found her with:
Misty locks and cloudy tresses,
Lying huddled in her bedclothes;
looking, for all the world, as though she were suffering from insurmountable grief.
After he had consumed the obligatory tea, a maidservant placed a cushion in the appropriate spot and Chiang Chu-shan approached the bed and proceeded to palpate the patient's pulse. The fact that the woman was good-looking was not lost upon him as he embarked upon his diagnosis.
"In attempting to ascertain the cause of your indisposition just now, I find that your hepatic pulse is thready, becoming full after passing the ostium pollicare[35] on the wrist; whereas your yin pulses are sluggish in their ascent from the ostium pollicare to the linea piscis[36] at the foot of the thenar eminence. This indicates a condition, engendered by the six desires and seven passions, in which:
Yin and yang contend with one another,
Producing alternate fevers and chills;
and is characterized by a feeling of internal melancholic congestion that cannot be dissipated.
It appears to be malaria but is not malaria,
It seems to be the ague but is not the ague.
By day you feel:
Enervated and sleepy,
Lacking all vitality;
and by night:
Your spirit will not keep to its abode,
But dallies with demons in your dreams.
If not treated in time, it may develop into a consumptive inflammation of the bones that is nearly always fatal.[37] What a pity! What a pity!"
"If you will be good enough to prescribe an efficacious remedy," the woman said, "should I recover I will see that you are amply rewarded."
"I will, of course, do my best," said Chiang Chu-shan. "If you take my medicine I am sure you will be restored to perfect health."
When the consultation was over he got up to go. Li P'ing-erh gave Old Mother Feng five mace of silver and sent her after him to fetch the prescription.
That evening the woman took the medicine he had prescribed and was able to sleep undisturbed. Gradually her appetite improved and she began to comb her hair again and get up and about. In the space of a few days her spirits were back to normal.
One day, having prepared a feast and set aside three taels of silver, she sent Old Mother Feng to invite Chiang Chu-shan to come over so she could thank him for his pains.
Now, ever since Chiang Chu-shan had diagnosed Li P'ing-erh's illness he had been coveting her[38] for no little while. Thereupon he no sooner heard the invitation than he changed his clothes and presented himself. He was ushered into the reception room where the woman, resplendantly attired, came out to greet him.
After the tea had been twice replenished, she invited him into her boudoir where:
Wine and viands were already laid out,
Amid the frangrance of orchid and musk.
The young maidservant, Hsiu-ch'un, stood in attendance, ready to present him with the three taels of silver on a platter decorated with gold tracery.
The woman:
Lifting high a jade goblet,
came forward and saluted him, saying, "The other day, when I was feeling so out of sorts, you were good enough to prescribe an efficacious remedy that provided immediate relief. Today I have prepared a meager cup of watery wine and invited you here to express my gratitude."
"That was only my professional responsibility" said Chiang Chu-shan, "something that principle required. What need is there to make so much of it?"
Then, seeing the three taels that were being offered in return for his services, he said, "How could I presume to accept such generous remuneration?"
"It is but a paltry expression of my gratitude, far less than propriety would demand," the woman said. "I sincerely hope that you will be good enough to accept it."
Only after repeated demurrals did Chiang Chu-shan consent to take it.
The woman presented him with the wine and they took their seats. After:
Three rounds of drinks had been consumed,
Chiang Chu-shan stole a glace at the woman and saw that she was:
Modeled in plaster, carved of jade;
Astonishingly seductive and voluptuous.
Without further ado he determined to see if he could get a rise out of her.
"I hardly dare ask," he said, "how old you are, young lady?"
"I'm twenty-three," the woman responded.
"There's another thing I'm curious about." he said. "Why on earth should someone like you, still in the flower of youth, born and bred in respectable circumstances, with ample means to supply all your needs, have been suffering the other day from a melancholic congestion and feeling of insufficiency?"
When the woman heard this, she smiled, and said, "I will not deceive you, sir. Since my poor husband passed away my domestic circumstances have been desolate. I am all alone in the world and beset by worry and longing. How could I avoid falling ill?"
"How long has it been, in fact, since your husband died?" asked Chiang Chu-shan.
"My poor husband," the woman replied, "during the eleventh month of last year, came down with an acute intestinal fever and died. It must be nearly eight months ago by now."
"Who prescribed for him?" asked Chiang Chu-shan.
"Dr. Hu from Main Street," the woman replied.
"You don't mean that Hu the Quack who lives in Eunuch Director Liu's house on East Street, do you?" said Chiang Chu-shan. "He never attended the Imperial Academy of Medicine as I did. What does he know about the pulse? Why did you call upon someone like that?"
"It was only because my neighbours recommended him," the woman said, "that I engaged his services. But my poor husband was simply not fated to live. It had nothing to do with him."

"Do you have any boys or girls?" Chiang Chu-shan went on to ask.
"No," the woman replied.
"What a pity," said Chiang Chu-shan, "that in the youthful prime of life you should be living the lonely life of a widow, without any children to keep you company. Why don't you seek some means of improving your lot? If you resign yourself to such melancholy seclusion how can you help becoming ill?"
"Recently I have entered into an engagement to be married," the woman said. "I'll be crossing my husband's threshold sometime soon."
"May I ask who it is you plan to marry?" inquired Chiang Chu-shan.
"It's the Honourable Hsi-men Ch'ing, who owns the wholesale pharmaceutical business on the street in front of the district yamen," the woman replied.
When Chiang Chu-shan heard this, he said, "That's bad! That's bad! Why would you want to marry him? I've often been called on to perform medical services in his household and know all about it. He's nothing but an influence peddler in the district yamen, and a loan shark as well. His home is a veritable flesh market. Not counting the maidservants, he's already got five or six bedmates, of higher and lower status, about the place, whom he subjects to a regular caning if they get out of hand. Whenever one of them fails to please him in any way, however slight, he calls in a go-between and disposes of her without more ado. He's:
The foreman of the wife-beaters,
The leader of the lotharios.
"It's a good thing you told me about it. Otherwise, if you had entered his household, it would have been like:
A moth darting into the flame.[39]
You would have been trapped, unable to escape in any direction, and it would have been too late to think better of it. Moreover, he has recently been implicated in an affair involving his kinsman by marriage and is holed up in his home, unable to come out. The construction work he has undertaken is only half-finished and has all been abandoned. Documents have been dispatched from the Eastern Capital ordering the prefectural and district authorities to arrest the implicated parties. It looks as though the buildings he was working on are likely to end up being confiscated by the government. Why on earth, for no good reason, would you want to marry someone like that?"
With this single speech he reduced the woman to tight-lipped silence. On top of everything else, there were all the valuables that she had stashed in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.
She pondered this for some time and kicked herself, thinking, "No wonder when I invited him again and again he never showed up. It really was because he was embroiled in something at home."
She also noticed that Chiang Chu-shan's conversation was animated and his demeanor unassuming and respectful.
"If I could only manage to marry someone like that in the future," she thought to herself. "I wonder if he already has a wife or not."
"I am much indebted to you for your advice," she went on to say. "If any family of your acquaintance should have a suitable match to propose, I would have no reason to refuse it."
Chiang Chu-shan rose to the bait. "May I ask what sort of person you have in mind, so I can come tell you about it if I should hear of anyone that fits the bill?"
"It really wouldn't matter to me whether his social status were high or low," the woman said. "Someone just like you would be fine."
If Chiang Chu-shan had not heard these words nothing might have happened but having heard them:
His joy was so great,
He lost his bearings.[40]
Thereupon, he got up from his seat, knelt down before her, and said, "I will not deceive you. I have lost my helpmate and no longer have anyone to look after me. [41] I have been living the life of a widower for some time and have no children. If you should be so considerate as to bestow your affections upon me and consent to a marriage alliance, it would fulfill the wish of a lifetime. Though I should have to:
Carry rings and knot grass;[42]
I will never dare to forget it."
The woman smiled and took him by the hand, saying, "Please get up. I don't even know how long you've been a widower, or how old you are. If you would like to marry me, you must engage a go-between to propose the match in order to fulfill the demands of propriety."
Chiang Chu-shan went down on his knees again and importuned her as follows: "I am twenty-eight years old and was born on the twenty-seventh day of the first month at six o'clock in the morning. Unfortunately, my poor wife died last year. I possess but meager resources and my origins are humble. Since you have been good enough to grant your gracious consent, what need is there for the intercession of a matchmaker?"[43]
When the woman heard these words she smiled, saying, "If you don't have any money, I have an old waiting woman here, named Feng, who can serve as go-between and witness. There's no need for you to present any betrothal gifts. All we need to do is pick an auspicious day and I will take you into my household as my husband. What do you think?"
Chiang Chu-shan hastily threw himself at her feet, with the words, "Young lady, you're like another set of parents to me, a reborn father and mother.[44]This must have been fated in a prior existence,[45]Such good fortune would suffice for three lives."[46]
Immediately, in the room they were in, the two of them exchanged loving cups, and the marriage contract was concluded. Chiang Chu-shan continued to drink with her until evening before going home. The woman discussed the situation with Old Mother Feng, saying, "Since Hsi-men Ch'ing's household's implicated in such an affair, the outcome is unpredictable. Moreover, I'm so alone here that when I fell ill I was lucky to escape with my life. Under the present circumstances, I might just as well take this doctor as my husband and try to make a go of it with him; why not?"
The next day she sent Old Mother Feng to communicate with him. She had selected the eighteenth day of the sixth month as the most auspicious date for the occasion, and when the time came she brought Chiang Chu-shan across the threshold and they became man and wife. After the "third-day celebrations" were over, the woman got together three hundred taels worth of capital and had a twelve-foot-wide segment of the frontage of her residence opened up to serve as a dispensary for Chiang Chu-shan. As a result, everything was put on an entirely new footing. [47]Originally, when he made calls on his patients, he had had to go on foot. But now he was able to buy a donkey to ride. He cut quite a figure as he came and went in the streets. But no more of this. Truly, even a puddle of stagnant water, completely undisturbed, may yet find its surface ruffled by the spring breeze.
The twentieth day of the fifth month was Major Zhou's birthday. Ximen Qing wrapped up five taels of silver and a pair of handkerchiefs, dressed himself in his best clothes, and, with four boys in waiting, set off to pay his respects, riding on a great white horse. Magistrate Xia, Captain Zhang, and other military gentlemen were there, and music and drama were performed for their entertainment. Daian took Ximen's cloak and went home with the horse. In the afternoon he came back to escort his master home. On his way through West Street, he met old woman Feng and asked where she was going.
"Silversmith Gu," the old woman said, "has finished my lady's headdress. He brought it today and she has sent me to ask your master to go and have a look at it. She wishes to have a talk with him."
"He is at a party at Major Zhou's house," the boy said, "and I am on my way to bring him back. Go home. I'll tell him what you say as soon as I see him."
"Tell him that my lady is expecting him."
Daian went on to Major Zhou's house. The gentlemen were still drinking together. He went to Ximen and said, "As I was bringing the horse for you, I met old woman Feng. She says the silversmith has finished Mistress Hua's headdress, and that her lady would like you to go and see it." This made Ximen anxious to get away but Major Zhou urged him to stay and pressed him to drink another great cup of wine.
"I am most grateful for all your kindness," Ximen said, "but really I mustn't drink so much. I have a number of things to attend to, and I'm sorry I can't permit myself the pleasure I should wish."
He drank the wine, said farewell to Major Zhou, mounted his horse, and rode off to see Li Ping'er. She welcomed him, and Daian was told to take the horse away and come back the next morning. Li Ping'er bade her maid take the headdress from its box, and show it to Ximen Qing. It was indeed very bright and handsome. They put it away again. Then they arranged that the wedding gifts should be sent on the twenty-fourth day of that month, and the bride should leave for her new home on the fourth of the following month.
Li Ping'er was now perfectly content. She brought wine and drank it with her lover in great delight. She told the maids to prepare the summer bed. The lovers took off their clothes and sat side by side within the silken net on coverlets of the rarest silk, perfumed with orchids and musk. They laughed and played together till the flush of desire mounted to their brows and the passion in their hearts made them tremble. Then they performed the mystery of clouds and rain, and did whatever the wine inspired. Ximen sat on the bed and made Li Ping'er place herself upon the cushions and play the flute for him.
Not from bamboo or stone, not played on strings,
This is the song of an instrument that lives,
That makes the emerald tassels quiver.
Who shall say whether the mode is Gong or Shang
Or Jiao or Zheng?
The red lips open wide; the slender fingers
Play their part daintily.
Deep in, deep out. Their hearts are wild with passion.
There are no words to tell the ecstasy that thrills their souls.
Ximen Qing was more than half drunk. "Did Hua Zixu enjoy himself with you like this?" he said.
"His life was one long dream," Li Ping'er said, "and he was still dreaming when he died. I had never any desire to act with him in this way. Day after day he went out and played the fool, and when he returned I would never allow him to come near me. In my father-in-law's lifetime I never shared my husband's room, and I cursed him till the dog's blood went to his head. I was always telling my father-in-law about him and getting him into trouble. No, I should have died of shame if anything of this sort had passed between us. But who could satisfy the cravings of my heart as you do? You act upon me just like a drug. I can think of nothing else by day or night."
They played some time longer, and once again performed the mystery. Yingchun brought in a small square box with all sorts of dainties, and a small golden jar of precious wine. From early evening till the first night watch they drank and sported together. Then, suddenly, they heard a loud knocking at the gate, and sent old woman Feng to see who was there. It was Daian.
"I told you to come for me tomorrow," Ximen Qing said. "Why have you come back tonight?" He told the boy to come in.
Daian, in a great flurry, ran first to the door of the room but, when he found that his master and Li Ping'er were in bed, he did not venture to go in. Standing outside the lattice, he said, "Sister and Brother-in-law have just come home, and brought all their luggage with them. The Great Lady has sent me to ask you to come home at once."
Ximen wondered what could have brought them at this late hour, and decided to go home. He jumped out of bed, and Li Ping'er helped him to dress. She gave him a cup of hot wine. He mounted his horse, and rode away.
In the hall the lamps and candles were lighted. His daughter Ximen Dajie and her husband were there with trunks, hangings, and furniture, all piled up. This alarmed him. He asked why they had come. His son-in-law, Chen Jingji, kowtowed and said, weeping, "A few days ago, the Censor brought an accusation against our kinsman, Marshal Yang, and his Majesty has given orders that he shall be put in the Southern Prison to await his trial. All his relatives and dependents have been put in the cangue, and banished. Yesterday Yang's people brought word to my father, traveling day and night without resting. My father was much upset and bade my wife and myself bring these things here for you to keep, for the time being. He has gone to the Eastern Capital to try to find out from my aunt what has really happened. When the danger has passed, he will make you a handsome present, and he will remember your kindness so long as he lives."
"Did your father send me any letter?" Ximen asked.
"Here it is," Chen Jingji said. He took a letter from his sleeve and handed it to Ximen, who opened it.
Your kinsman Chen Hong [he read] kowtows and offers this to the most worthy Ximen. The matter of which I have to speak is most urgent. Some time ago the border garrison sent word of a surprise attack, as a result of which the enemy have already invaded Xiongzhou. Wang, the Minister of War, did not send the necessary troops, and the military situation has become disastrous. In consequence of this our kinsman Yang has been accused by the Censor in the most direct terms. His Majesty is extremely angry and has ordered Yang's arrest and his incarceration in the Southern Prison. He is to be tried by three justices. Orders have been given that all those under him and his relatives shall be banished to the frontier.
When this news reached us, we were all much distressed, for we have no possibility of escape. I am sending my son and your honourable daughter, with their belongings, to stay with you for a while. I myself am just about to leave for the Eastern Capital, to visit my brother-in-law, Zhang Shilian, to see if I can hear any news. We hope to return when the matter has been settled.
I shall be eternally grateful to you for your kindness. Even in your district there may be some little difficulty, so I am giving my son five hundred taels that perhaps you will be good enough to expend on his account. I kowtow to express my gratitude, and so long as I have a tooth in my mouth I will remember your kindness.
Under the lamp, in haste, and without a proper expression of my affection.
Midsummer, the twentieth.
Your most obsequious kinsman Hong.
After reading this letter Ximen Qing was so perturbed that he did not know what to do with himself. He told Yueniang to give his daughter and her husband something to eat, and instructed the maids to make ready three rooms at one side of the hall for them to live in. The trunks and valuables were taken to Yueniang's room. Chen Jingji handed the five hundred taels to his father-in-law. Then Ximen gave one of his servants five taels, and sent him posthaste to the Town Hall to make a copy of the Imperial Gazette from the Eastern Capital. This is what it said:

THE PROCURATOR FOR MILITARY AFFAIRS, YUWEN XUZHONG

A Memorial

This is respectfully to implore Your Sacred Justice to punish the traitors in high places, that the morale of the army may be reconstituted and the disturbance at the frontier quelled.
I am not unaware that during every Dynasty there have been frontier attacks. In the Zhou dynasty this happened at Taiyuan; in the Han dynasty at Yinshan; and in the Tang dynasty at Hedong. During the period of the Five Kingdoms these attacks went on unceasingly. Since the great dynasty of Song has been established, our four frontiers have more than once been threatened. It is common knowledge that signs of decay without are an indication of the depredations of worms within. There is an old saying that when the bell booms in the hall, it is a sign of frost; and when the foundations are flooded, we may know that there has been rain. Good fortune and ill fortune alike have their proper causes. This is apparent in every case of sickness. When the heart and stomach suffer from disease, that disease has long been acquiring strength, and the patient's physique has been gradually sapped from within. Then, one day a cold wind blows, and the chill affects every part of his body. Even the physicians Lu and Bian can do nothing for that man and his days are numbered.
The condition of this Empire is precisely that of such an invalid, thin and wasted to a most precarious degree. Your Majesty is the head; the Ministers are the stomach and heart; and the lesser officers the limbs. Your Majesty sits in sublime state above the Nine Degrees, and, if the officers whose duty it is to carry on the business of the Empire are loyal and dutiful in their less exalted stations, then the natural vigor of the Empire will be sound indeed; the armies will afford protection against attack from without; and the menace of these barbarians can remain unheeded.
Now, of those who are chiefly to be held responsible for the trouble between our soldiers and the barbarians, there is none more infamous than Cai Jing, the Minister of the Palace of Chong Zheng. His courses of action have been both dangerous and unpolitic, and he is, moreover, improvident and without shame. Since he but flatters your Majesty, he is unable to assist you and your ministers to maintain the Sacred Authority and to improve the condition of the people. He is unable to foster virtue and concord among the lower orders, thus promoting peace among the people. He maintains himself by selling profit and position, seeking only for favour and to make his own position secure. He has set up a faction of his own, and harbours evil designs. All this he has done in secret, deceiving your Sacred Majesty. He has done injury to all the well-affected, and faithful men have been alienated. There is in his household none who has not robed himself in red and purple garments of office. Lately, when there broke out disorder in He Huang, he suggested a declaration of war in the east, and lost three districts. The rebellion of Guo Yaoshi was the cause of the Jin country's denouncing its treaty with us; and we lost its friendship.
These are his greatest misdeeds, and they are due entirely to his disloyalty. Wang Fu is greedy for money and misconducts himself, behaving like an actor but Cai Jing recommended him for appointment. Only a short time after securing this appointment, he led the army to disaster, and then, in the hope of saving his own skin, made a patched-up peace, without having any notion of further consequences. Now that Zhang Da has been defeated at Taiyuan, Wang Fu is terrified and all soldiers in a panic, so that by this time the invaders have already reached the interior, while he has escaped with his wife and children to the South. The guilt of such treasonable conduct deserves a punishment worse than death.
Yang Jian is nothing but a wealthy and ignorant young man, who relies upon the reputation of his ancestors and the favour of those in high official positions. He obtained a command but has succeeded very indifferently in this very vital position on the frontier. Though in reality he is a man of evil character, he poses as a devoted subject. His lack of determination is unrivaled.
These three officers have been in very intimate relations and, both within and without the Court, have been guilty of deceitful conduct. They are, as it were, the disease that has affected your Majesty's heart and stomach. For many years they have been the cause of troubles, and have brought upon us calamities that are sapping away the natural vigor of the body politic and undermining the State. Taxes have increased and the people have migrated in consequence. Bandits and thieves have shown unexampled boldness, and even bear arms against their lawful sovereign. The Imperial Treasury is exhausted and the laws of the Kingdom made of no effect. The crimes that these men have committed outnumber the hairs on their heads.
I accept responsibility for what I have said but it is my duty to point out that which is in need of amendment, and if, when I perceive traitors meddling in the affairs of State, I fail to convey the fact to Your Majesty, I should be untrue to myself and unworthy the favour of a Lord and Father. I pray therefore that Your Exalted Justice will summon Jing and the others before the officers of the law that due chastisement may be awarded.
The penalties suggested are
The Extreme Penalty
The Cangue
Banishment to a Far Country
Thus may the evil course be stayed and the favour of Heaven restored, while the desires of the common people will be satisfied. If the laws of this Empire are duly enforced, all disorders and troubles will come to an end of themselves. This would be indeed fortunate for our Empire, and for both officials and people.
Here follows the sentence of the Imperial Sage.
Cai Jing shall remain in office for the time being. Wang Fu and Yang Jian shall be sent before the Justices. Let them be tried with due care and the report sent to us.

TAKE HEED, TAKE HEED, AND OBEY.

The Findings of the Court

The traitors Wang Fu and Yang Jian are found guilty of negligence of duty as military commanders. They have permitted the soldiers of other nations to invade the interior, and many have lost their lives in consequence. Our armies have been defeated, many officers killed, and the territory of this Empire lost.

The Law decrees their execution.

Their households, secretaries, and underlings, Dong Sheng, Lu Hu, Yang Sheng, Bang Xuan, Han Zongren, Chen Hong, Huang Yu, Liu Sheng and Zhao Hongdao are all accessories in their crime, and, after wearing the cangue for one month, shall be banished to the frontiers as private soldiers.

When Ximen Qing had read this, his good humor vanished. He fell into a terrible state of agitation. At once he began to get ready gold, silver, and jewels, packed them with the greatest care, and, calling his two servants Laibao and Laiwang to his room, gave them secret instructions. They were to hire several beasts of burden, go to the Eastern Capital, traveling both night and day, and get all the information they could about the matter.

"It will be better for you not to go to Chen's house," Ximen said. "If the news you hear is bad, do what you can with these things, and come back and report to me." He gave them twenty taels of silver. Next morning, before it was light, they rose, hired drivers, and started for the Eastern Capital.

All that night Ximen Qing never closed his eyes. The next morning he ordered Laizhao and Ben the Fourth to cease work upon the garden and send all the workmen away. Everyday he had the gate most carefully secured, and no one in his household was allowed to go out except on business of the utmost urgency. Ximen himself paced up and down his room like a centipede on hot earth, brooding over his sorrows and anticipating all manner of trouble. As for his marriage with Li Ping'er, all thoughts of that were banished to regions beyond the clouds. Yueniang saw how greatly his anxieties weighed upon her husband—his appearance showed that clearly— and tried to console him.

"You need not be so distressed over this misfortune of our kinsman Chen," she said. "Hatred and debt always pursue their proper object."

"Oh, woman! what do you know about it?" Ximen cried. "Chen is my kinsman, and so long as my daughter and her husband live with us, they will be a millstone about our necks. Nearly all our neighbours detest us, and as the old proverb says: Though the loom be slow, the shuttle is speedy, and Beat the sheep, and the young donkeys will stir up trouble. If there are any small-minded men among them who take it into their heads to uproot the tree to see what the roots are like, neither you nor I will be safe from them, to say nothing of the rest of the family. Even if we lie low here and keep our door shut, trouble will find its way through the roof."

Ximen Qing remained sadly at home.

Li Ping'er waited for him, one day, two days but he did not come. She ordered old woman Feng to go to his house. The old woman went twice but the gate was shut as closely as the iron cover of a well, and, though she waited a very long time, not a sign of life was to be seen and she could not find out what was amiss. The twenty-fourth day was drawing near, and again Li Ping'er told old woman Feng to take the headdresses to Ximen and ask him to come and talk to her. The old woman knocked at the door but no answer was vouchsafed, so she took her stand beneath the eaves of a house opposite and waited. After a while Daian came out to water the horses, and saw her standing there.

"What are you doing here?" he asked.

"My mistress told me to bring these headdresses and find out why she has had no message from your master. She would like to see him."

"My master has been too busy to go out these last few days," Daian said. "Take the things back, old lady, and as soon as I have finished watering the horses I will tell him what you say."

"Take them in, good little brother," the old woman said, "and tell him that my lady is not at all pleased. I will wait here."

Daian tethered his horses, and went in. Some time later he came out again. "I have told my master, and he has taken the headdresses. He says you must ask your lady to wait a few days longer, and then he will come and see her."

The old woman went home and told her mistress all that had happened. For several days more she waited for him, till the fifth month had nearly come to an end. Morning and evening she longed for him to come but there was not a word from him. Her dreams were dashed to the ground, her good fortune seemed to have come to an end.

Ximen Qing's absence made Li Ping'er lose her appetite. She became very languid. Night after night she slept alone, tossing about on her bed, the same ideas constantly re-echoing in her mind. Suddenly, she heard a knocking at the door. Ximen Qing had come at last. She opened the door for him and smiled, taking him by the hand to lead him within. She asked why he had so long delayed their marriage, and they spoke to each other the deepest thoughts of their hearts. They spent the whole night in the enjoyment of their love. When day broke and the cock crew, he rose and went away. It was a dream. The woman woke with a start, gave a great cry, and fainted away. Old woman Feng heard and quickly ran in.

"Master Ximen has just gone," Li Ping'er said. "Have you bolted the door?"

"Where is his Lordship?" the old woman said. "Your mind is wandering. Not even his shadow has been here."

From this time onward Li Ping'er dreamed many unseemly things and, night after night, foxes came, taking upon themselves human form, and sucked away her very life. By degrees her face grew pale and thin. She could neither eat nor drink but lay all day upon her bed, unable to get up. With her permission, old woman Feng asked Doctor Jiang Zhushan of the High Street to come and see her. This Jiang was not more than thirty years of age, not very tall, and a very pleasant fellow. When he came in, Li Ping'er was lying on the bed with the bedclothes over her, her hair about her like a mist of cloud. The doctor could see that she was anything but well. After he had taken tea, a maid gave him a cushion, and he went to the bedside to feel his patient's pulse. This gave him an opportunity to find out how pretty she was.

"Lady," he said, "I think I know what is the matter with you. There is considerable irregularity in the pulse of the liver that, above the wrist, appears to be too strong. As for that pulse which is peculiar to ladies, it is so weak above the wrist that it cannot be felt but appears to have betaken itself to the hollow beneath the thumb. This is clearly due to the fact that the masculine and feminine principles are at war within you, thus interfering with the six passions and the seven emotions. So you sometimes feel hot and sometimes cold. Evidently you are suffering from repression of some sort. This produces a state of affairs rather like a fever, though it is not a fever, and makes you feel cold, though you are not cold. During the day it makes you weary, low-spirited, and anxious to lie down all the time; and at night you feel as though your spirit were on the point of departure, and dream that ghosts come and misconduct themselves with you. Unless something is done about it at once, the trouble will take a still more serious turn and you may even die. Oh, it is very serious, very."

"Doctor," Li Ping'er said, "please let me have some of your very best medicine, and when I am better you shall have a handsome fee."

"I will take the utmost care, Madam," Zhushan said, "and, when you take my medicine, you will soon be quite well again." He went away.

Old woman Feng took five taels of silver and went to the doctor's house for the medicine. The same evening Li Ping'er took it, and enjoyed an undisturbed night's rest. Gradually her appetite returned; she was able to get up and dress; and, in a very short time, was completely recovered.

One day she spent three taels, and sent old woman Feng to invite the doctor to dinner. As soon as Jiang Zhushan received the invitation, he dressed and went to the lady's house, for indeed, ever since he had first attended her, he had desired to possess her. Dressed in her most beautiful clothes, Li Ping'er received him in the hall. She made a reverence to him and offered him tea. Then she asked him to go into the inner room, where wine and dishes were set out and there was a delightful fragrance of orchids. Xiuchun came, holding a gilded tray upon which were three taels of white gold. Li Ping'er raised a jade cup high before her, and again made a reverence to the doctor.

"I was very ill," she said, "and I find it hard to express my gratitude to you for giving me such excellent medicine and curing me. Today, doctor, I have hastily prepared a poor cup of wine in token of my thankfulness, and now I beg you to accept it."

"It was no more than the business of a poor scholar like myself," Zhushan said. "It was my duty to come and attend you, and there was no occasion for you to give the matter a second thought." Then he saw the white gold. "I cannot possibly accept this," he said.

"It only represents a fraction of my gratitude," Li Ping'er said, "and is in no way what you deserve. But I hope, doctor, that you will condescend to accept it."

After much show of hesitation Zhushan finally accepted the present. Li Ping'er poured wine for him, and they sat down and drank together. Zhushan looked at her and realized how charming and attractive she was. He began to wonder what words he should choose to make an impression upon her.

"May I ask how old you are?" he said at last.

"I have lived twenty-four ill-spent years," she said.

"But that is a delightful age," Zhushan cried, "yet you live in such seclusion. You seem to be quite comfortably off and everything should be well with you. Why should you suffer so from depression?"

Li Ping'er smiled. "I will tell you, doctor," she said. "Since I lost my husband, things have been very lonely here. I live alone and worry. Does it surprise you that I should be ill?"

"When did your husband die?" the doctor said.

"It was the eleventh month of last year when he died of a fever. About eight months ago now."

"Ah," Zhushan exclaimed, "and whose medicine did he take?"

"Doctor Hu, who lives in the High Street, attended him."

"What? That foxy-mouthed Hu, who used to live in East Street in Eunuch Liu's house? He is not a member of the Royal Society of Medicine. He knows nothing about the pulse. What can have induced you to call him in?"

"The neighbours recommended him, and really I don't think it was his fault that my husband died so young."

"Have you any children?" Zhushan asked.

"None," said Li Ping'er.

"It is most unfortunate that you should have become a widow so young," Zhushan said, "especially since you have no children. Why do you not consider the desirability of another mode of life, something better than living by yourself like this and bringing sickness upon yourself?"

"As a matter of fact," Li Ping'er said, "I became engaged only a little while ago, and we are going to be married almost immediately."

"May I venture to ask to whom you are betrothed?"

"To Master Ximen, who keeps a medicine shop over by the Town Hall."

"Dear, dear!" Zhushan said. "Surely you haven't become engaged to him! I know him quite well. I often go to attend the members of his household when they are ill. He is the man who arranges things behind the scenes at the Town Hall and is mixed up in shady money-lending transactions. He makes quite a business of dealing in women. Apart from his maids, he must have at least half a dozen wives. He is always thrashing them. If one of his women upsets him in the slightest, he sends at once for the go-between and gets rid of her. In fact, he is a captain among wife beaters and a shining light among those who lead women astray.

"I am glad you have told me this, Lady, for otherwise you would have gone blindly to him, like a moth rushing headlong into a flame. If you do this, you will be in a hopeless position and it will be too late to repent. Moreover, only recently, one of his relatives has got into trouble. Ximen has had to hide away in his house and dares not go outside his own door. His new house is only half built but all the work upon it has been stopped. An order has come from the Eastern Capital that he is to be arrested and his property confiscated to the State. How can you think of marrying him?"

Li Ping'er could think of no answer to make to this. She reflected that all her wealth was stored in Ximen's house, and her foot tapped nervously upon the floor. "Now I know why he has not been to see me though I have invited him more than once," she said to herself. "There is evidently something seriously wrong. Zhushan seems very agreeable and pleasant. If I married a man like him, I should not do so badly but he may have a wife already for all I know."

"I am most grateful for your advice," she said aloud. "Thank you with all my heart. If you can think of anyone more suitable and will be kind enough to recommend him, I will take your advice."

Zhushan did not let this opportunity slip. "I have no idea what kind of man you would like," he said, "but I may be able to arrange matters for you, if you will speak quite frankly."

"Whether his family is of high or low degree is of no consequence to me," Li Ping'er said, "I should be quite satisfied with a man like you."

At this the doctor was so overjoyed he could hardly contain himself. He threw himself on his knees before her. "I have been long without a mistress in my house," he said, "and I am childless. Lady, if you will take compassion on me and link your destiny with mine, I can wish for nothing better. Even if you give me the work of a menial to do, I shall be eternally grateful."

Li Ping'er laughed and helped him to rise. "Please do not kneel," she said. "How long have you been a widower and under what star were you born? If you really wish to marry me, the Rites insist that you should send a go-between."

Zhushan kneeled down again. "I am now twenty-nine years old, and was born at the hour of the Hare on the twenty-seventh day of the first month. I grieve to say that my wife died last year. I am very poor, and, if you give me your promise, why should we trouble about a go-between?"

"If you cannot afford it," Li Ping'er said, smiling, "I have an old lady named Feng living with me, and we will make her our go-between. As for a betrothal present, don't worry about that. We will select an auspicious day, and you shall marry me and come and live here."

Zhushan bowed. "You are both father and mother to me, and have given me a new lease of life. Obviously our marriage was ordained several generations ago, and it is the greatest piece of luck I have had in any of my three lives."

They drank each other's health, and so this marriage was decided. Zhushan remained till nightfall. When he had gone away, Li Ping'er discussed the matter with old woman Feng, "Ximen Qing's," she said, "now in a bad way. It's impossible to say whether his luck will ever turn. There's no one to bother about me and I've been so ill I nearly died. The best thing I can do is to marry this doctor. There seems to be no reason why I'd not." The next day she sent old woman Feng with a letter to the doctor, saying:

The 18th day of the 6th month appeared to be an auspicious day. You're to come then and live with me.

3 days afterwards, she gave Zhushan 300 taels of silver, so that he could open a couple of rooms and decorate his surgery tastefully. Before this, he had always gone on foot to visit his patients. Now he bought a donkey and rode up and down the street.

039

Lai-pao Takes Care of Things in the Eastern Capital; Ch'en Ching-chi Supervises the Work in the Flower Garden; Ximen Qing Bribes Officers of the Court

It is deplorable but man's heart is more venomous than a snake;
Who is aware that the eye of Heaven rolls as relentlessly as a wheel?
The property once purloined from one's neighbour to the east;
Will someday revert to the family on the north.
Unrighteous riches are like snow sprinkled with scalding water;
Unearned property is like sand propelled by the tide.
If one takes craft and cunning to be the secret of success;
It will prove as evanescent as the morning and the evening clouds.

